b) Of course, a man cannot marry beneath his caste if the couple is to dwell in the man's family ('virilocality'). This constraint highlights a difference obtaining between man and wife in many cultures: women are more mobile, and this to the extent that French anthropologist Lévi-Strauss describes the matrimonial system as an exchange of women. In his theory, brides are a kind of gift, and a wedding can be compared to an exchange of gifts. When two parties exchange gifts, the act creates mutual obligations, particularly in the case of exogamy, where the bond exists only for women. The exchange need not be simultaneous: it can actually extend over a generation, as with some Australian tribes. A girl marries into the group from which her mother has come. In this case, of course, there must be at least three groups: for example, group A 'owes' a wife to group B, and this debt must be discharged within the same generation. Group B owes a wife to group C, and C owes one to A. This arrangement means that, in the same generation, a woman from B will be married to a man from A, a woman from C to a man from B, and a woman from A to a man from C. In this fashion, ever-new alliances are formed among various groups. This example, however, is fairly simple by comparison with other systems.

c) Less frequently, it is not the woman who transfers, but the man—this method is called uxorilocality, or matrilocality, as with the Hopi and the Iroquois. The reason for this is that, with these peoples, the wife is responsible for farming, and inherits the land. Accordingly, she is not mobile, while the husband must be, as he is responsible for hunting. And, although today husbands no longer hunt, the uxorilocal system has held. A matrilocal system does not mean that women automatically have more power than they do in patrilocal systems. Several factors are at play in the result. Thus, with the Iroquois, women have considerable political power, while Hopi women do not.

d) Since, in many societies, a wedding is more of a transaction between two parties than it is a union of two individuals, the celebration of a marriage is oftentimes accompanied by an exchange of gifts. In India, for example, as in earlier China, it was and is the tradition to give one's daughter a dowry. This is ordinarily a gift from the father-in-law to the son-in-law, so that the daughter generally has no share in the dowry. This usage is a reason why girls are killed at birth: the dowry is so high that, especially, poor families with several daughters would not be able to produce the corresponding means. And although the dowry has been forbidden in India since 1948, the custom is still very widespread. Money paid the bride's family by the bridegroom is called the bridal price (a misnomer, as the bride is not being sold). This system is customary in Islamic countries. The problem here is that it often takes the groom years to save up the amount necessary to be able to afford the bridal price.

The Dowry

Religious Rituals

3. With an event as important as a wedding, religious customs and rituals oftentimes play an important role. Many cultures see marriage itself as a divine institution, not only in Christianity, but also in Judaism, Islam, and Hinduism. In Hinduism, it is probably the most important sacrament, as it presents the transition from youth to adulthood, and hence functions as a rite of passage. In Hinduism, human marriage is an image of the divine marriage between sun and moon, and therefore serves the support of the dharma. In modern society, on the other hand, where life is hardly ever led according to rituals, and where the couple has engaged in sexual relations before the wedding, a wedding is no longer an event of profound importance. It is otherwise when the couple has not even made one another's acquaintance before the wedding, as in orthodox Islamic circles. Although the custom of marrying in a church has often become a ritual of the life cycle without emotional ties to the Church, in Christian thinking matrimony has always had a special value. The Hebrew Bible speaks of the relationship between God and Israel as of that between bridegroom and bride (Isa 54:5-6). In the New Testament, this notion was converted to one of the relationship between Jesus and the Church (2 Cor 11:2). From this viewpoint, it is surprising that matrimony came to be regarded as a sacrament only later. In the ancient Church, marriage was a private affair, although it might indeed be celebrated during divine service. Charlemagne undertook the attempt to make it of obligation to have the marriage blessed, but he found little support from the side of the Church in this matter. This changed in the following centuries, when the Church sought to have more jurisdiction over the laity. From 1215 onward, the Church recognized only those offspring who had been begotten of a church marriage as capable of inheritance. At the council in Lyon in 1274, matrimony was officially declared a sacrament. The Reformers, however, gave this up once more. Marriage was indeed a divine institution, but not a means to the attainment of salvation. This difference in the attitude toward matrimony is also one of the reasons why divorce is so much more difficult in the Roman Catholic Church than among Protestants.

Ancestors

4. Genealogy: Along with kinship in the synchronous sense, ancestry, or diachronous kinship, is also of essential importance. At times, ancestors have a higher status than the living, and are in a position to exercise influence over daily life. One meets this conception throughout the world, and there are even traces of it in European culture. The intimate bond between living and dead oftentimes rests on the idea that some part of the ancestors is present in the child ('uncle' = 'little ancestor'). Naming a child for a grandparent is a way of enabling the dead to live on in their descendants.

'Life' after Death

Since ancestors are still part of the community, if on a different plane, they must be nourished by means of sacrifice. In India, there are actually extensive prescriptions in this matter. Here, ancestors or forebears (*pitara*s) need the sacrifice in order to 'survive.' When a man dies without leaving a son who can offer him sacrifices after his death, this means his end for good and all. This conceptualization is older than that of rebirth, and it would therefore be inappropriate to identify the two. Nevertheless, in India, sacrifices are still presented to the ancestors.

Ancestors of a People

b) A common forefather can serve as a basis for social or ethnic relation. Thus, Jews appeal to descendancy from Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob as the ground of their identity. Another aspect of ancestry is that ancestors can be appealed to in legitimization of certain pretensions to power, as, for example, with families of the nobility. The case of a state with a hereditary monarchy is the best illustration of this feature. Not only physical forebears, but gods as well, can be reckoned among one's ancestry. Nearly all Anglo-Saxon royal dynasties of the ninth and tenth centuries traced their descendancy to Wotan. In ancient Rome, Caesar claimed to have descended from the goddess Venus.

The Totem

c) Associated with the concept of a community forefather is the idea of the totem. A totem is an ancestor in the form of an animal, a plant, or an inanimate object. This totem is sacred for everyone belonging to the same totem group. We find notions of the totem in Australia, Africa, and with the Native Americans. Members of the same totem may not intermarry: the infraction would be seen as a kind of incest. Thus, the idea of the totem functions as a criterion of exogamy. A distinction, however, must be made between marriage and sexual relations. It is possible that marriage be prohibited within the same totem group, but not sexual relations, since certain cultures permit young men a period of free sexuality before marriage.

Incest

5. The prohibition of incest is not everywhere of equal stringency, nor is the ascription of sexual relations to incest handled in a uniform way. It may be extended to all members of a totem group under all circumstances, even when actual family relationships lie very far apart. In ancient Egypt, on the other hand, a marriage between brother and sister was permitted within the royal family only in the later phase. In other cultures, as, for example, in Arab lands, a marriage between second cousins is not regarded as incestuous. Punishment of incest varies as well. In Western culture, incest is a crime, while in other countries it is seen only as objectionable behavior. Since differences are so extensive in the area of incest, it will be difficult to find a satisfactory explanation at all. It is worthy of note that in many cosmogonies (myths of origin) incest plays a role: Hera and Zeus, or Gaia and Uranus, are sister and brother, but Greek mythology does not enlarge upon the subject. It is significantly otherwise, however, in the mythology of India, in which, beginning with the late Vedic literature, the view prevails that the world has emerged from incestuous relations between creator god Prajapati and his daughter, for which Prajapati is punished by the god Rudra.

End of the Family?

6. Modern times have considerably altered the social meaning of the family. With the separation of domicile and place of employment, pressure toward mobility, and urbanization, the traditional model of the family is entering a crisis. If the religions see their basis disappearing as a result, it is nevertheless observable that there are alternatives to the bond between family and religion. (1) The 'family' to which the churches and Christian parties are attached is of an ideological nature. Values are projected upon it that transfer the rejection of modernity from society and political decision makers on the nuclear middle-class family or the pregnant wife. The family as it was presented in the nineteenth century, as the wholesome world of the anti-modern, fails to conform to the family as a normal social form of pre-modern societies. In the radical changes of urbanization, the religious community can offer a substitute for a lost sense of family security: religious communities making a commitment to individual concerns attract the interest of persons who have had to loosen the old ties for the sake of their employment. (2) The second point is that religions all but demand the explosion of the family bond. As a resistance movement in the underground, Jesus required his disciples to surrender the basic duty of burying the dead (Matt 8:21). In place of the traditional family, religion can be the new one, with its members as siblings and its leader as 'parent' (in monasteries, the 'father' or 'mother' and the 'sisters' or 'brothers').

Religions are tied to their societies. The modern age, as a decisive alteration of the social system, challenges religions to offer new models, and not to weep over ways of life of the past. Religion must face competition with other tenders of meaning. Conservatism is a possibility; but religion's opportunities also include the alternatives of a new way.

Literature

Avagianou, Aphrodite, Sacred Marriage in the Rituals of Greek Religion, Bern 1991; Bergunder, Michael, Wiedergeburt der Ahnen. Eine religionsethnographische und religionsphänomenologische Untersuchung zur Reinkarnationsvorstellung, Münster 1994; Bohannan, Paul/Middleton, John (eds.), Marriage, Family and Residence, New York 1968; Burguière, André et al., Histoire de la famille, Paris 1986; Fox, Robin, Kinship and Marriage, Harmondsworth 1967; Goody, Jack, The Development of the Family and Marriage in Europe, Cambridge 1983; Idem, The Oriental, the Ancient and the Primitives: Systems of Marriage and the Family in the Pre-Industrial Societies of Eurasia, Cambridge 1990; Kramer, Samuel N., The Sacred Marriage Rite, Bloomington 1969; Lévi-Strauss, Claude, Les structures élémentaires de la parenté, Paris [2]1967 ([1]1949); Nave-Herz, Rosemarie/Markefka, Manfred (eds.), Handbuch der Familien- und Jugendforschung, vol. 1: Familienforschung, Neuwied 1989, Schmitz, Carl A., Grundformen der Verwandtschaft, Basel 1964.

→ Ancestors, Child, Family Cult (Greek and Roman), Marriage/Divorce, Matriarchy/Patriarchy, Sexuality

Leo Tepper

Fanaticism

Most often, 'fanaticism' is a pejorative designation applied to others. Especially since the Enlightenment, it has become a polemical stereotyping and defamation of the person thus represented. Too often, the criticism being leveled would suit the person(s) making the criticism as well. Unlike the historical denotations of the term—which is derived from fanum (Lat., 'sacred precinct'), and was applied in Christian antiquity to any of various enthusiastic, non-Christian forms of religion, and then, in the post-Reformation era, to 'delusory' piety—fanaticism in the West today stands not for the content of any particular religious position, but for a mentality and attitude, which can attach to the content of any ideal or ideology: an attitude of radicalism, rigor, and extremism. Features of this mentality are (a) psychological: an exaggeration of and passionate over-identification with, the content of a given (religious or political) ideology, group, charismatic leader, and so on, tied to intolerance vis-à-vis other thinking; (b) sociological: authoritarian and repressive group structures; (c) philosophical: an absolute claim to truth, shutting out critical reflection and doubt; (d) political: 'ideological self-empowerment' for the success of one's own claim to importance with respect to all social, juridical, and political areas; here, the end justifying every means; (e) religious: assurance of the establishment of belief through dogmatic and moral legalism, often founded on a fundamentalist positivism in matters touching revelation.

Literature

Colas, Dominique, Civil Society and Fanaticism: Conjoined Histories, Stanford 1997; Haynal, Andre et al., Fanaticism: A Historical and Psychoanalytical Study, New York 1983; Hughes, Matthew/Johnson, Gaynor (eds.), Fanaticism and Conflict in the Modern Age, London 2004; O'Rourke, David K., Demons by Definition: Social Idealism, Religious Nationalism, and the Repression of Dissent, New York etc. 1998; Pollefeyt, Didier (ed.), Incredible Forgiveness: Christian Ethics between Fanaticism and Reconciliation, Leuven 2004; Rudin, Josef, Fanaticism: A Psychological Analysis, Notre Dame 1969.

→ Fundamentalism, Prejudices/Stereotypes

Reinhold Bernhardt

Fantasy, Genre

Concept

1. 'Fantasy' can denote a not unambiguously defined part of the 'fantastic' Western literature of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Typical of this fantasy as a genre is a break with the continuity of the reader's reality, to which, unlike the case of → science fiction, no scientific grounding is normally supplied. It manifests itself in the sketch of an independent world closed up in itself with alien life forms (dwarfs, dragons), the preternatural (→ Magic), a peculiar cosmology and history (with myths, sayings, scriptures), an impenetrable dualism of good and evil, and pre-modern social structures (feudalism, tribal structures). The action is directed to an end, and is often structured in the form of a 'quest' (salvific search). Here, however, on the occasion of the discharge by the protagonist of a specific task, a problem is solved that affects the whole of society (by contrast with the → fairytale and the adventure of the knightly journey). The store of materials applied is indeed frequently taken from the maxims and folktales of the most diverse traditions, but can also be borrowed from the popular genres of neighboring groups (science fiction, westerns, horror stories).

Fantasy Literature

2. The boundary between the fantastic literature of the Romantic Movement (E. T. A. Hoffmann, Edgar Allen Poe) and fantasy is fleeting. As early fantasy, texts of the nineteenth and twentieth century, some of which are characterized by a tendency to social criticism, can already be indicated (e.g., Lewis Carroll, Alice's Adventures in Wonderland, 1865; Karl May, Ardistan und Dschinnistan, 1907–1909). J. R. R. Tolkien's The Lord of the Rings (1954–1955), whose reception in the United States of the late 1960s led to a boom in fantasy literature—at first there, and later in Europe—was particularly influential. Tolkien's invention and presentation of various nonhuman peoples (Hobbits, Orcs, Elbs), as well as his detailed plan of a fantasy world ("Middle Earth") became fundamental for the further development of the genre. Since the 1980s, extra-European motifs have entered the fantasy scene along with the structure of the 'quest.'

Various directions can be identified in the fantasy literature, for example:

(a) Heroic fantasy (also Sword & Sorcery): In the early twentieth century, the original aspect of social criticism came repeatedly under the influence of the adventure novels of colonial literature (H. Rider Haggard, Allan Quartermain novels, 1887ff.). Robert E. Howard's Conan, the Barbarian (1932) became the model for this heroic fantasy, incarnating the type of the adventurer as hero in a fantasy world. George Lucas's Star Wars films likewise belong to heroic fantasy.

(b) Youth fantasy: As early as the nineteenth century, didactic fantasy texts were part of Victorian children's literature. These thematize initiatory experiences, as child protagonists switch back and forth between a fantasy world and an actual one, either to return changed, or to re-enter the fantasy world definitively through their death in the real one. Later, C. S. Lewis took up this tradition (The Narnia Chronicles, 1950ff.), and it developed into a children's-fantasy and youth literature of its own (Astrid Lindgren, Bröderna Lejonhjärta, 1973; Michael Ende, Die unendliche Geschichte, 1979).

(c) Counterworlds: Since the 1960s, in the United States, the fantasy world into which the protagonist finally changes definitively is presented as countersketch of the 'real' world lived in alien fashion. Unlike the case of youth fantasy, meaning is attained in flight to a world of appearances (escapism), and a new role definition is reached in stereotyped surrender to fantasy (John Norman, Gor, 1964ff.). Fantasy satire applies the model of counterworlds, along with figures of all fantasy directions to an ironic caricature of problems of contemporary society (T. Pratchett, Discworld, novels, 1983ff.; Alan Dean Foster's novels).

Fantasy Culture

b) Following films and comic strips, a new text form of fantasy arose in 1975 with the 'role playing game' (e.g., "Dungeons and Dragons"), in which a players' group improvises action and figures without foreseeing the outcome. Thus, in the course of the play an interactive fantasy appears. The interaction among the developers of role-played scenarios, players' groups, and fantasy authors produces 'shared worlds,' or 'forgotten realms'—fantasy worlds in which the action takes place. These in turn influence the development of computer games, board games, books of adventure plays, fortune-telling cards, and related popular genres.

Emergence from the Crisis of the Modern Age

3. The crisis of modernity is constitutive for the emergence of the genre. Fantasy enacts its narrative from a point of departure in typically modern conflicts of alienation. This is seen in its depiction of nature, its awareness of the ambivalence of technological self-assertion, and the presentation of functioning social communities (even in the framework of a moral → dualism). Its elaboration and reformulation of the most varied myths and tales, which has occasionally submitted fantasy to the reproach of traditionalist tendencies, is less instructive than its narrative handling of the conflicts and perversions of the modern world. It is precisely the conveyance of opposites—rather than rationalization, or else suppression—that reveals fantasy as a superstructure of myth (Lévi-Strauss). By way of a poetical presentation of crisis (initiation, tragic heroism), a meaning content is attained that demonstrates a closed-up world, with its cosmology, not as a backward-looking utopia, but rather—by analogy with myth—as a creative countersketch to the disenchanted, profane reality-concept of modern times. It is precisely in the fact that the modern experience of alienation is not denied that fantasy's achievement of orientation consists: its creativity works its effect not only in the individual reading, but, more especially, in the work of its collective shaping through the culture of fantasy.

Literature

Cornwell, Neil, The Literary Fantastic: From Gothic to Postmodernism, New York 1990; Hume, Kathryn, Fantasy and Mimesis: Responses to Reality in Western Literature, London 1984; Manguel, Alberto/Guadalupi, Gianni, The Dictionary of Imaginary Places, London 1999; Rabkin, Eric S. (ed.), The Fantastic in Literature, Princeton 1977; Vax, Louis, Les chefs-d'oeuvre de la littérature fantastique, Paris 1979.

→ Fantasy/Imagination, Fairytale, Film, Myth/Mythology, Science Fiction, Utopia

Almuth Hammer and Dörthe Schilken

Fantasy / Imagination

1. 'Fantasy' (Gk., phantasía, from phaínomai, 'appear') in the sense of imagination (Lat., imagin-, 'picture,' 'image'; → Social Myths and Fantasy Images) usually denotes the power of conceptualization or mental representation. Fantasy as a cognitive faculty was first described theoretically in the epistemology of the ancient Stoa—as the content of an imagined world (Gk., phantastón), or else in the sense of the creative activity that brings this content (phantastikón) to life. Fantasies are first formed intrapsychically, by way of play of thought, association, → dream and daydream, visions or hallucinations, before they are manifested in social exchange and endorsed or refuted.

Fantasy is frequently set over against realistic thinking. However, fantasy constantly plays a role in life: people are dependent on their fantasy, their imagination, for the control of → everday life and the solution of problems. Fantasies are stirred by outer reality, when not by an inner stimulus. Their configuration binds the individual image and symbolism (→ Symbol/Sign/ Gesture) with the collective. It can then influence processes of reality, since the grasp and appraisal of the information that we receive is also steered by our fantasies—even when our behavior suggests the appearance of being steered by pure reality. This relation to reality is commonly regarded as mediated by → perception. In addition, it is assumed that even unconscious perceptions are extensively influenced by → emotions, feelings, and desires, and that this effect constitutes a pathway to the formation of fantasies.

Fantasies as Psychic Representations

2. Human fantasies must be considered according to their type and their stage of development. Thus, fantasies of grandeur ("I'm the strongest") generally arise in a child. Fantasies of omnipotence can compensate for the insecurities, objective and subjective, appearing in this phase of life. Throughout the course of her life, especially in early childhood, the individual person develops representations of persons, events, and interaction that have been experienced or transmitted, and that become riveted in the psychic as representations. These may demonstrate conscious and unconscious dimensions, as well as ordinary connections to content.

Just as individual fantasies are regarded as realities in certain segments of life (a four-year-old believes in the reality of the Christ Child), religious images have been held for real in various phases of history. Thus, people have had a belief in → angels and → spirits, → demons and → composite beings, that, in the worldview of one's modern mentality—after being checked by → Enlightenment and → science—are today interpreted as fantasies. The same holds true for the development of religious conceptualizations and depictions of God: depending on cultural and religious environment, altogether determinate representations of a conceptualization of God, or of experience with the religious, are realistically developed, and attach themselves to the affects and emotions.

Collective Representations

Along with the individually formed representations, there are also collective representations. According to C. G. Jung, 'primitive images' or 'primitive forms' ('archetypes') form the content of the collective unconscious, and, with all peoples and in all times, appear as determinate motifs in religion as well as in art. An archteype, for Jung, is open to the respective interpretations of various religious and cultural systems of reference, so that Mary the Mother of God incarnates the archetype of the 'soul' (woman); in ancient Greece Hera or Artemis did the same. By way of social, political, or religious processes of symbolization, collective representations have historical validity as collective myths (see 3, below), or collective symbols and emblems (→ Cross/Crucifixion; German → Forest; → Collective Representations).

Myths as Religious 'Primitive Fantasies'

3. It may be assumed that every religion or idea of a divine being arises from an original fantasy of the human being, which contains the wish that there be no definitive separations, so that death can be denied. According to more recent psychoanalytic concepts, the roots for this process lie in the early mother-child relationship, in which the child did not as yet make any distinction between fantasy and reality. With regard to the reality of separation (from the mother) and individuation, during a gradual cognitive maturation, the experience of a total symbiosis becomes recognizable as an illusion. The myth of the lost paradise can be looked upon as an expression of this separation and maturation. The denial of ambivalence, of the simultaneous presence of good and bad components in relationships, leads, for instance in the picture of god, to an idealization, and to the split-off of evil as the realm of the → devil.

'Alogical' Thinking

The imagination, the fantasy, enables the subject to transcend the limits of reality, and of space and time. It is not tied to past or present, but can make the future thinkable, visible, and palpable, nor need it submit to logic. An example of the precisely non-logical, nonscientific manner of religious presentation is the child motif, which depicts the wondrous, fantasy-charged embellishment of the childhood of the holy one or the founder. In the Christian religion, this is embodied by → Jesus with his miraculous conception and virgin birth (→ Child/Childhood). The content of religion is thereby first formulated in the language of → myth, which is pictorial, symbolic, and 'fantastic.' It contains committed presentations and meanings, which otherwise could not be expressed so well and so totally. Like → fairytale, story, and legend, myths describe manners of human destiny and behavior, as well as nature and its relationship to the human being.

Conceptualizations of the Hereafter

Belief in God transcends the reality of separation, loss, and death, from a splitting of self and object. The believer anticipates the removal of this separation in the → hereafter. Belief in a life after death appears in many cultures. Wish fantasies of → security, harmony, equalizing justice and universal care in heaven can be regarded as reactions to an often disappointed life reality.

Stages of Raised Fantasy Production

4. As a religious phenomenon, the immediate intuition of God occurs not in experience or reflection, but in an insight akin to revelation, and in immediate grasp of reality. This insight usually occurs in the form of → visions and auditions, especially prophetical ones, which are reckoned as suprasensory perception. While the experience of visionaries was regarded critically earlier, toward the end of the nineteenth century a psychopathological interpretation gradually took over, which dealt with the phenomenon under the clinical concept of the hallucination. Today, it can once more be accepted that the possibility of an existence can be perceived that comes from deep strata of the → psyche. The division between fantasies and visions eventuates today as dependent on various standpoints. While an image of the imagination is felt to be self-produced, a vision is perceived as caused from without. Thus, reports of apparitions depict the vision as the event of a sudden penetration, as a paroxysm-like overwhelming by a more profound experience of reality. The dependence of an evaluation of such experiences, and capacities, of transcendence on the culture at hand becomes clear in the eminent role of religious specialists in → shamanism. Unlike visionaries, psychotics can set themselves in the place of God, and thereby abide in their grandiose self-fixation (→ psychopathology).

Elevated Affective States

States of elevated fantasy and visionary experience can be reached not only along the path of meditation, but also through elevated affective states. → Dancing, → fasting, deprivation of sleep, overexertion, and other things can lead to an unaccustomed ecstatic condition (→ Trance). Ecstatic states are described as altered states of consciousness, with a sensation of rapture and transport from reality—as conditions of intoxication and delirium, in which sights are seen and voices heard. Of course a role is played by the qualitative alteration of corporeal materials, such as hormones, which in turn affect the brain and body.

Madness

Although all creativity has its reference to fantasy—without it, one can think no alternatives, 'paint out' oneself no wishes, outline no visions of the future—fantasies frequently possess a pathological potential. In psychopathological disturbances, the production of fantasy gains the upper hand, and the psychotic no longer lives in the real world accessible to communication with other persons: hallucinations, phantoms (Gk., phántasma, 'deceptive image')—deceptions of perception, without any corresponding external stimulus or fascination—then more or less replace outward perception. They can occur with psychoses, but can also be provoked by the use of recreational or medicinal drugs, or hunger (→ Insanity; Intoxication/Drugs/Hallucinogens; Psychopathology).

Social Effectiveness

5. However, the power of fantasy is evinced not only in a religious context, but in all other areas of human living, as well, including the social and societal. The transferal to human society of the wish for a heavenly, just world effected concrete concepts of a 'classless society' with Karl Marx, which would be reached by way of an alteration of economic relations (→ Marxism; Utopia).

Scientific and Technological Visions

There is a particularly intensive relationship of alternation between science and technology, and fantasy. On the one hand, there were fantasies of flight (Icarus), space travel (Jules Verne), or magic mirrors long before actual aircraft, space ships, or television; on the other hand, scientific and technological developments afforded the foundations for new fantasies. Thus, after the first developments in a knowledge of → electricity, which had been developed from bioelectrical investigations, Dr. Frankenstein's monster appeared in the text of Mary Shelley's thriller of 1818: composed of parts of corpses and given life through electricity, it was described in her novel Frankenstein or, The Modern Prometheus (→ Prometheus). August Kekulé's dreamlike vision of 1865 led him to the discovery of the molecular structure of the benzene ring:[1] Kekulé recognized its structure in a vision of a molecule dancing before his eyes in the form of a serpent, which had circled about and was biting its own tail.

All cultures have conceived an especially vivid relationship between fantasy and art. Religious motifs in art have occupied a broad space into modern times. Thus they permitted their visualization, and thereby impregnated, in a given society, religious notions and images such as those of angels. Literally fantastic art usually remains the exception (→ Fantasy, Genre). Such art includes the depictions of Hieronymus Bosch, as for those of the modern surrealists (Salvador Dali, Max Ernst), or the Vienna school of 'fantastic realism' (Ernst Fuchs). Images of this kind present the artist's inner psychic conceptions, so that the interpretation of the content of the depiction is frequently left to the viewer. On the other hand, individual artistic fantasies are not understandable without their connection to the repertory of the traditions of signs and symbols of their respective religious environments. How difficult it can be to determine an interpretation of this kind is shown by Bosch's famous triptych of the Prado. Depending on one's standpoint, and scientific fantasy, it can be titled either in a moralizing direction—as a garden of delights—or as eschatologically heterodox, as the 'millenial reign' (Wilhelm Fraenger). The work of art bestows meaning in the → projection of the beholder.

1. Anschütz, R., August Kekulé, Berlin 1929, 2:942-93; cited by Marie-Louise von Franz, Spiegelungen der Seele, Munich 1988, 90.

Literature

Adams, Michael Vannoy, The Fantasy Principle: Psychoanalysis of the Imagination, Hove 2004; Brann, Eva T. H., The World of Imagination: Sum and Substance, Savage 1991; Eliade, Mircea, Images and Symbols: Studies in Religious Symbolism, Princeton 1991 ([1]1952); Jung, Carl Gustav, The Archetypes and the Collective Unconscious, Princeton 1975 ([1]1959); Kearney, Richard, The Wake of Imagination: Ideas of Creativity in Western Culture, London 1988; Leppert, Richard D., Art and the Committed Eye: The Cultural Functions of Imagery, Boulder 1996; McLean, George F./White, John K. (eds.), Imagination in Religion and Social Life, Washington 2003; Phillips, James/Morley, James (eds.), Imagination and Its Pathologies, Cambridge 2003; Robinson, Gillian/Rundell, John (eds.), Rethinking Imagination: Culture and Creativity, London 1994; Sartre, Jean-Paul, The Imaginary: A Phenomenological Psychology of the Imagination, London 2004 ([1]1940); Warnock, Mary, Imagination, Berkeley 1976; Eadem, Imagination and Time, Oxford 1994; Watkins, Mary M., Invisible Guests: The Development of Imaginal Dialogues, Boston 1990; White, Alan R., The Language of Imagination, Oxford 1990.

→ Collective Representations, Dream, Emblem, Fantasy (Genre), Image/Iconoclasm, Myth/Mythology, Projection, Psyche, Psychoanalysis, Psychopathology, Science Fiction, Social Myths and Fantasy Images

Brigitte Görnitz

Fasting

Traditional fasting practices are to be found in nearly all religions. In many tribal cultures, fasting is practiced before hunting, to avert natural catastrophes (solar eclipses, storms), before a battle, or as a sign of mourning. Fasting is generally regarded as a means of repelling insalubrious powers, or 'evil,' or of calling upon the good powers. It is practiced before the celebration of rites of initiation, as part of a fertility rite, or for the observance of the new year. In literate cultures, fasting is eminently an appeal to one's spiritual powers, and therefore used to defeat corporality. Here, as well, lies the relation to transcendence—ecstasy—and to the revelations made to the great religious founders. Moses fasted on Sinai before receiving the Torah; the Buddha fasted under the Bodhi Tree before his enlightenment; Jesus fasted in the desert before beginning his public ministry; Muhammad fasted on Mount Hira before the 'Night of Power,' the night of the bestowal of the Qur'an. For believers, fasting serves for the expiation of sin, or for obtaining God's grace. At times, fasting is undertaken in order to bring down, to debase, a physically superior enemy. On this tradition rested the religious aura of the fasting of Mahatma Gandhi, as he strove against the British colonial powers in India. In Christianity, beginning in the late Middle Ages we observe a mitigation of the severity of fasting regulations—along with an increase in the politicization of fasting, however. As early as the Reformation, Zwingli formulated opposition to the authority of the Church, in a condemnation of the prescriptions of fasting. Today, the 'hunger strike' has become one of the most effective 'weapons' of the confrontations of internal politics, for example in the movement for Irish independence. In early Christianity itself, a renunciation of nourishment symbolized victory over corporality and sexuality. For women, fasting has a very particular meaning. It expresses autonomy, withdrawal from community, and an intimate connection with the ambivalent community symbolism of the female → body.

Literature

Bright, Bill, The Coming Revival: America's Call to Fast, Pray, and "Seek God's Face," Orlando 1995; Brown, Peter, The Body and Society: Men, Women and Sexual Renunciation in Early Christianity, London 1990; Diamond, Eliezer, Holy Men and Hunger Artists: Fasting and Asceticism in Rabbinic Culture, Oxford 2004; Grimm, Veronika E., From Feasting to Fasting, the Evolution of a Sin: Attitudes to Food in Late Antiquity, London 1996; Vandereycken, Walter, From Fasting Saints to Anorexic Girls: The History of Self-Starvation, London 1994; von Braun, Christina, "Das Kloster im Kopf. Weibliches Fasten von mittelalterlicher Askese zu moderner Anorexie," in: Flaake, K./King, V. (eds.), Weiblichkeit und Adoleszenz, Frankfurt/M. 1992.

→ Asceticism, Body, Initiation, Penance/Penitent, Purity, Sexuality

Christina von Braun

Fatalism

The word 'fatalism,' derived from the Latin fatum ('saying,' 'dictum of the gods') denotes the belief that a higher power determines the inevitability of human 'destiny,' often enough blindly, and the consequent challenge of loyalty to that destiny. In Greek and particularly Roman antiquity, the concept of fatum was combined with the philosophical and religious idea of Heimarmenê and Tuchê (→ Destiny/Fate). Jewish and Christian philosophers and theologians generally stress human responsibility for human activity. In the Qur'an, God's determination is often cited, and the canonical literature of tradition explains these pronouncements on al-Qada' wa'l-Qadar, God's 'eternal and temporal decree' as part of the profession of faith. The Muslim's belief in God's omnipotence and wisdom includes trust in the divine mercy. But even before 700, in Syria and Iraq, ethical and political considerations occasioned an emphasis on responsibility and freedom of the will, as represented by the sects of the Qadariyya and the Mu'tazila, as well as by the Shia, and which the Qur'an also defines (e.g., sura 19:29). Beginning around 1900, reformist Islam propagated a critical, future-oriented reflection on Islamic history, under the motto, 'reason over transmission.' Popular belief in destiny is reflected in The Thousand and One Nights, and generates tolerance, as unrighteousness is not accounted personal guilt. The realistic literature of Islamic lands today characterizes its protagonists as tragically determined by socioeconomic and cultural relationships.

Literature

Bürgel, Johann C./Fähndrich, Hartmut (eds.), Die Vorstellung vom Schicksal und die Darstellung der Wirklichkeit in der zeitgenössischen Literatur islamischer Länder, Bern 1983; Gardet, Louis, "al-Kada' wa'l Kadar," in: Encyclopedia of Islam², IV (1990), 363-367; Qur'an translations by A. J. Arberry/W. Bell, indices, s.v. "fate," "predestination"; Ringgren, Helmer, Studies in Arabian Fatalism, Uppsala/Wiesbaden 1955; Ringgren, Helmer (ed.), Fatalistic Beliefs in Religion, Folklore, and Literature, Stockholm 1967; van Ess, Josef, "Kadariyya," in: Encyclopedia of Islam², IV (1990), 368-372; Wochenmark, J., The Concept of Fatalism in Judaism, 1977.

→ Destiny/Fate, Determinism, Orientalism/Exotism

Wiebke Walther

Fatwa

Islamic law knows various possibilities when it comes to legal determinations. One of them, permitted and customary in all schools of law, is the finding of a fatwa, an opinion of counsel, (nearly always) on religious, ethical, or juridical questions. The lawyers (scholars of the law) who are called muftis, or, in the Shia, the mujtahids are those authorized to make a fatwa. When a person or institution confronts a lawyer with a question upon which no legal determination has as yet been pronounced, the lawyer must search in the manuals of canon law for a similar precedent, and pronounce his judgment in conformity to that. He is not permitted to expound the law himself. If the questioner is dissatisfied with a fatwa, she or he can, in the same situation, without further ado ask another mufti to take a position in the matter. In the Shia, the situation is even more fluid. Here, in case of disagreement, the fatwa is besought of the next higher mujtahid in the hierarchy, and then of the next higher, so that the process may continue all the way up to the ayatollah. With the Sunnis, just as with the Shiites, a fatwa still does not have compelling validity for the Islamic community as a whole, since there is no superior religious authority in Islam. Each believer can decide for him- or herself whether to follow this determination of the law. Thus, a fatwa has the character of a legal recommendation, rather than that of a binding judgment.

The fatwa became familiar when, in 1989, the Ayatollah → Khomeini issued one against author Salman Rushdie, for hostility to and mockery of Islam in his novel The Satanic Verses. He charged the writer with → blasphemy and → apostasy, and sentenced him to death, along with his publisher. Apart from the fact that a Shiite was here pronouncing judgment on a Sunnite, who in Shiite categories was even so not in possession of true belief, Khomeini's claim to be pronouncing a binding legal judgment, that would have had validity throughout the world of Islam, was a great presumption. The death sentence was then rejected by other religious authorities, for instance by the Al-Azhar in Cairo, while it continued to be endorsed by Khomeini's followers. True, in October 1998 the President of Iran officially declared that Iran would no longer prosecute Rushdie. But as he possesses no religious authority, he could not prevent some religious organizations from reacting, and letting it be known that, as far as they were concerned, this sentence was still valid. The price on Rushdie's head actually increased significantly, owing to contributions from private persons. Rushdie, nevertheless, who had lived a number of years in concealment, now frequently appears in public, although his life continues to be threatened by religious fanatics.

Since fatwas answer current questions especially, in Islam they are important tools of reaction to social and political changes. But politicians often utilize them for their own purposes, such as furnishing governmental decisions with a religious endorsement, even in the case of a declaration of war. Still today, then, regardless of whether their policies are religious or secular, governments in the Islamic world seek to control the institution of the fatwa by way of state appointment of the muftis.

Literature

Bunt, Gary R., Islam in the Digital Age: E-Jihad, Online Fatwas and Cyber Islamic Environments, London 2003; Krawietz, Birgit, Die Hurma: Shariatrechtlicher Schutz vor Eingriffen in die körperliche Unversehrtheit nach arabischen Fatwas des 20. Jahrhunderts, Berlin 1991; Mazud, Muhammad Khalid et al. (eds.), Islamic Legal Interpretation: Muftis and Their Fatwas, Cambridge 1996; Mozaffari, Mehdi, Fatwa: Violence and Discourtesy, Aarhus 1998; Shourie, Arun, The World of Fatwas, Or, the Shariah in Action, New Delhi 1995; Skovgaard-Petersen, Jakob, Defining Islam for the Egyptian State: Muftis and Fatwas of the Dar al-Ifta, Cologne 1997.

→ Islam, Khomeini, Law, Specialists (religious)

Silvia Kuske

Fear / Dread

Main Themes

1. In the life of adults of the Western culture of the present, religious fears generally carry no weight. More impressive seems an unspecified 'fear of existence,' or Weltangst. Ultimately, a fear of death, however unconscious, underlies this feeling, along with, doubtless, the awe before an essence that inspires reverence or dread, a numen, or mysterium tremendum (Rudolf Otto; → Holy). Furthermore, the arousal of fear no longer figures among the pastoral concerns of the Christian churches, so that fear can readily be undervalued as an important component of pre-Enlightenment European piety, or of that of extra-European religions today. The 'fear of God' so often cited in the Bible, for example, was originally the altogether concrete fear of a deity of lightning, thunder, and death, and was only secondarily reinterpreted as reverence (e.g., Deut 10:12).

Religious fears appear as concrete dread of punishment at the hands of superhuman powers, in life as in death. Dread of immanent world disaster impregnates many tribal religions, in which one must shy away from innumerable taboo-violations. It is likewise a mark of ancient Roman religion, where an insalubrious outcome loomed over the possibility of any ritual mistake. But fear of what might lie in the hereafter was a key component especially of ancient European Christianity. A torrent of texts and images, in all manner of sadistic detail, describes the everlasting torments of hell, together with the 'temporal' ones of purgatory, nurtured especially by Judeo-Christian apocalyptic (second century BCE to second century CE), and the → visions of the mystics. We need only recall the apparitions vouchsafed to Saint Frances of Rome (d. 1440), with their singularly detailed descriptions of the punishments of the hereafter. After an initial tradition maintained only in Latin, and so restricted to monasticism and spirituality, these texts spread among the laity as well, in popular preaching, poetry, treatises, and dramatic presentations, from the twelfth century to the Enlightenment. No church edifice between the High Middle Ages and the Reformation was deprived of this presentation of the terror of the Last Judgment. Especially fearful was the Augustinian doctrine of predestination (in the Reformation, especially in its Calvinist revival), according to which humankind, that massa damnata (Lat., 'condemned mass'), the throng of those fallen into hell, hosted but few graced by the divine mercy.[1]

A formulation sung from the thirteenth to the twentieth century in nearly every mass for the dead, the hymn, the Dies Irae ("Day of Wrath"), can be taken as symptomatic: here, even "the just will scarcely be safe" (Lat., vix justus sit securus) before the God of Judgment.[2]

Fear of the subordinate evil beings of God—the → devils—who as the instruments of his designs worked in the world and underworld, and who, in terrifying forms, were abundantly present in sculpture (monsters, gargoyles) and painting (temptations of Jesus, the saints) in every church—rested as well on their cruel images of apparition, as on their capacity to seduce believers into mortal sin and thereby to take them to hell.

Fear and the Emergence of Religion

2. Many of antiquity's thinkers were aware that one of the crucial roots of piety is fear. Epicurus, Lucretius, and Statius attributed belief in the gods to: Primus in orbe deos fecit timor (Lat., "The first thing that made the gods in the world was fear").[3] They were at pains to dissolve, on rational grounds, the terror of existence 'implanted in mortals.'[4] The general reinforcement of religiousness in late antiquity, and its mental preponderance in the Middle Ages, demonstrate the failure of this explanatory model in the face of a waxing uncertainty in life. Only in the modern age was this thought taken up once more, in the critique of religion by the Enlightenment, especially in the philosophy of David Hume (The Natural History of Religion, 1757), Ludwig Feuerbach, and Karl Marx, in Sigmund Freud's psychology, and among scholars of religion, such as James G. Frazer and Bronislaw Malinowski. Today, owing to their one-sidedness, these hypotheses on the appearance of religion are perhaps too broadly rejected.

Fear as a Means of Priestly Discipline

2. Religious fears existed not only on grounds of direct experiences, for example of the God manifested in storms, of the water demon lurking in the shallows. At least in the European history of religions, they were also engendered, altogether essentially, by the menacing messages of religious specialists, as well. There are examples of intentional manipulation in this sense—for instance the hells filled in by Augustus in the Baian campaign, hells that presented the underworld concretely to those being initiated.[5] Nor was the like missing in Christianity (Purgative void of Saint Patrick in Ireland), but it is much more likely to assume that the priests who preached of hell and judgment did believe in the reality of their teachings, although it cannot be disputed that they also made use of these tools in their interests. Some practiced the sale of indulgences or contributions in exchange for assurances of the salvation of one's soul. The pastoral ministry of terror, whose vigor prevailed until the nineteenth century, was often proclaimed by the terrified. Preaching, confession, and pictorial presentations were the most important means of a disciplining of believers through fear. Only with the disappearance of a concrete belief in the hereafter in the nineteenth and twentieth century were such themes useless for catechesis. Some sects, of course, unlike the major churches of today, still work with traditional eschatological fears of the end of the world.

Shifting of Fears

4. Against a punishing deity, there are counter-figures built into the world of religious concepts. In Catholicism there is → Mary, the Mother of God, on, for instance, images of the plague as the Madonna with the protective mantle cloak between a lethal God and his creatures, as well as protective patron saints and 'guardian angels.' On the other hand, menacing elements in the image of God are split in two: while in ancient Judaism they still belong to JHWH, they seem in more recent times, especially in Christianity, loosed from him, so that a 'loving God' is left, who is now no longer fearful, but only to be loved (1 John 4:16-19). The fearful portion, especially temptation and punishment, are imposed, instead, on Satan, the → Antichrist, and (since the twelfth century) a personified death. Through the doctrine of Original → Sin, Christian philosophy believed itself absolved of the (unsolvable, granted) problem of God's exculpation (→ Theodicy), since thereby it is the human being who is responsible for all of the world's unwholesomeness and malignancy, rather than the Creator, who thus fashioned that world. Interlopers like the Cathari, in quest of consistency, excused God by way of a radical → dualism: it was the → Evil One who created the world, hence also suffering. Thereby fear and trustfulness are separated in their entirety, and divided into two suprahuman instances. For members of Satanic sects, existing ever since the late Middle Ages, an identification with 'terror' (along with rebellion against the divine 'Superfather'), actually serving as a deterrent for 'fear,' might be an unconscious motive for their deviant behavior.

Release from Fear

5. It was the pressure to utilize fears that maintained the system. But the religions offered teachings and rites calculated to render that pressure bearable. Rites of → initiation normally comprise a phase of the onset of fears, the control of which comports a psychically liberating cathartic effect, and assures admittance to a higher stage of existence. The struggle may be a matter of fear of (at times extreme) bodily torments, as with some Indian tribes, or the ill-treatment of a candidate before admittance to the noviceship, as the Rule of the Benedictines (58, 3) prescribes. Behavioral norms are always imposed for the purpose of forestalling a negative reaction by the gods (God, the Devil). These ordinarily consist of the → sacrifice of material goods and of bodily → asceticism. For example, the flogging processions witnessed in Catholicism from the thirteenth century until today (e.g., in Mediterranean countries and in the Philippines) have arisen out of fear of the wrath of God, which they have meant to appease by self-abuse. The plethora of defense resources ('apotropaia') known to the religions (blessings, amulets, 'sacramentals' such as holy water, and so on), on the contrary, expel only fear of the lower deities or demons, not that of the high god. Christian theologians, however, together with some psychologists (Carl Gustav Jung) appraise the function of religion as a fear deterrent as stronger than that of its performance as an inspirer of fear. Generally, it can be said that ritualization in the area of religion, be it by way of prayers (morning and evening prayer) or the embedding of rites de passage in ceremonies, has a settling or pacifying effect. This could be the reason, especially, for a choice of the monastic life, where, still today, the composing, quieting value of a ritualized life appears as a key element.

1. Augustine, Enchiridion on Faith, Hope, and Love, 27, 92-93.
2. Analecta Hymnica, 54, 269.
3. Statius, The Thebaid, 3, 661.
4. Lucretius, De Rerum Natura, 5, 1165.
5. Paget, F. R., In the Footsteps of Orpheus, London 1967.

Literature

Camporesi, Piero, The Fear of Hell: Images of Damnation and Salvation in Early Modern Europe, London 1990; Delumeau, Jean, La peur en Occident (XIVe-XVIIIe siècles): une cite assiégée, Paris 1978; Idem, Sin and Fear: The Emergence of a Western Guilt Culture, 13th–18th Centuries, New York 1990; Dinzelbacher, Peter, Angst im Mittelalter. Teufels-, Todes- und Gotteserfahrung: Mentalitätsgeschichte und Ikonographie, Paderborn 1996; Dinzelbacher, Peter (ed.), Europäische Mentalitätsgeschichte, Stuttgart ²1999 (esp. pp. 275-301); Gladigow, Burkhard (ed.), Angst und Gewalt. Ihre Präsenz und ihre Bewältigung in den Religionen, Düsseldorf 1979; Pfister, Oskar, Das Christentum und die Angst, Frankfurt/M. 1985; Scott, Anne/Kosso, Cynthia (eds.), Fear and Its Representations in the Middle Ages and Renaissance, Turnhout 2002; von Stietencron, Heinrich (ed.), Angst und Religion, Düsseldorf 1991.

→ Hereafter, Emotions/Feelings, Hell, Psychopathology, Death and Dying

Peter Dinzelbacher

Feasts and Celebrations

Meaning and Function

1. Holidays (cf. 'holy day') or feast/festivals (Lat., festum) have at least two peculiarities. For one, they are established in religious, cultural, and social frameworks as repeatable happenings; for another, on their occasion, persons are spontaneously inclined to gather in gladsome social celebration. In the festivity itself, an ebullient zest for life is the hallmark, and pleasing sensory events (festive meal, play, dance) set the tone. The holiday is a Preeminently, Judaism is the religion of the family holiday. There are memorial holidays to recall the deeds and sufferings of the people of Israel in a great historical cycle of rituals. Here, in 1983, on the eve of the holiday of Pesach (the 'Passover' of the Lord, who 'passed over' the Hebrews and slew the firstborn of their enemies only), the Seder supper is held, in commemoration of that people's escape from Egypt and slavery (Exod 12-13). The event must be symbolically recalled, and ritually 'staged' once more, and here a Polish family executes this charge. A special text is read to the children at this supper, the Pesach Haggadah, the narrative of the flight; mazzo wafers (→ Hasidism) and light wine stand on the table—food and drink for a journey sudden and unplanned; on the Seder plate, in the middle of the table, lie a hard-boiled egg (for the main sacrificial offering of a pilgrimage corporative event, to be celebrated only in the community form of a family, an assemblage of friends, a company of persons with a common interest, the community, the nation, or international groups.

'Festival' and 'holiday' are generally applied synonymously. The function of a holiday can lie in a restorative rest from daily work. But it can also be a celebration of work (e.g., by persons who practice the same trade or profession), or the therapeutic celebration of a victory in a crisis, such as wars or natural catastrophes, in whose remembrance national holidays, or holidays of thanksgiving, are held. The holiday is a 'stop sign' in the routine of daily activities. The celebrants often 'go too far,' and violate established or legal norms, or ignore received social values—and then return to them. This phenomenon occurs preeminently on Shrove Tuesday (→ Carnival): while the rest of the year protects itself with laws and religious commandments against anarchical tendencies, excesses, and violence, carnival time offers an alienation from the everyday. It calls it into question. There are even traditions in which a holiday is supposed to occasion a 'warped,' or 'upside-down' world.

Abandonment of the everyday, or integration therein, provides an opportunity for recollection, awareness, deliberation, reflection, or new orientation concerning individual and societal life conditions. All of these moods and factors are present on a holiday, and especially on a vacation. Eager religious participants not infrequently build themselves a utopia, a 'salubrious' and 'peaceful, restorative' counter-society to the daily—which, when the celebration is over, they must rejoin. In this sense, a celebration is a 'social drama' (V. Turner), which questions or legitimizes the given social structure, and the celebrants join for a tiny time a community (Lat., communitas, 'joint construction') that transcends societal structures. The religious or cultic acts or elements of the holiday encompass theatrical or playful aspects: social role-playing that frequently runs counter to the everyday (travesty), as well as symbols referring to the power, prestige, and identity of the particular actors, communities, or institutions. Particularly these latter have the opportunity, by coordinating and financing the holiday, to present themselves in public and gain prestige. And so the holiday can serve as a means for groups to present themselves, and to thematize current society.

Holidays

2. From antiquity to the beginning of industrialization, in so-called pre-modern, traditional societies, holidays were tailored to the respective prevailing religion, even when they ultimately were politically or economically motivated. Only the caesura of the → Enlightenment led to the disconnection of the religious holiday from a form of public and state direction that had been received from Greco-Roman antiquity. Holidays had been celebrated in those earlier times in honor of the gods, or with the staging of those mass 'plays' that were the battles of gladiators, chariot races, tourneys and grotesque comic foolishness of the Middle Ages—and in the Baroque, which reached its climax in an enhanced sense of life—and were an expression of the regime, both secular and spiritual, of the Church and feudal nobility. Until their profanation in modern times, 'popular' religious celebrations stood under a process of disciplining and control on the part of Church and State. The French → Revolution laid the cornerstone for national holidays whose purpose and effect was the creation and fostering of middle-class identification (→ Civil Religion). They legitimated the popular spirit that they had elicited, and constructed symbols of profane community formation (Field of Mars, Pantheon). From these processes modern forms of the holiday emerged, which (aside from purely religious feasts) can be divided into socially public, political, and private holidays or festivals. Even these forms of holiday, however, still integrate religious elements or are overlaid by them.

3. a) The feasts in celebration of salvation history, such as Christian Easter and Pentecost—or the Jewish feast of Passover, recalling deliverance from Egyptian rule and the Exodus from Egypt—are annual feasts. So is Mawlid, the birthday of the Prophet → Muhammad, on the twelfth day of the third month, when the community gathers to recall the life and work of the Prophet with readings from the Qur'an, and to offer him reverence by holding processions.

In recalling an event from the history of religion, the community of believers celebrates itself. This aspect underlies, for example, the feast of the Reformation. Here, religious → specialists undertake the transmittal of the historical traditions, foundational declarations, and content and events of the faith. Through the recitation of gospels or epics, festal liturgies provide the faithful with the elements of their religious and cultural heritage. Symbols, or special festal elements such as liturgy, dance, clothing, and décor, set the religious feast apart from everyday life as something special.

b) Feasts of the community and the saints, with their processions, for example, evince the networking of religion and public life. Public areas (streets, marketplaces, and so on), and institutions like churches and community centers provide locations at which particular groups, quarters, or cities can present and celebrate themselves. Choral presentations, carpets once upon a time), a 'bone' (e.g., a chicken leg), standing for the 'lamb' that must be eaten 'in haste,' and 'bitter herbs' (e.g., a cabbage salad), to recall the memory of a bitter life of slavery in Egypt; charosset, a delicacy of nuts, pieces of apple, dates, and spices stands for the clay from which the Israelites once had to fashion bricks for Pharaoh. The Seder evening is the Jewish family holiday par excellence; it can be compared to → Christmas as celebrated by religious Christians today. (Hubert Mohr) of flowers, etc., are there for all to see and hear, and temporary altars, in common enterprise, are festooned for visitation in procession. In southern Europe and in Latin America, splendid festivals of the saints, with processions, markets, and fireworks, are organized and financed by institutions and societies. Here religious and public secular interests intersect, to the enhancement of the prestige of organizers and participants. In festival, secular and sacred alike find the opportunity for a demonstrative, striking self-presentation to those outside. The public religious celebration—frequently organized, in all of its folklore, out of the economic considerations of a tourist attraction—must not see its importance diminished in the community. The entire population celebrate national holidays, recalling national unity, independence gained, a constitution, or a new form of government after a revolution. The holiday moment of identity and community is common to both the sacred and the profane.

Public and Social Holidays

c) Over against the feasts just cited, whose motifs are religious, (local) political, and national, there are public social and professional holidays. Local festivals, like forest, street, old city, or garden festivals, rest on the loose bond of a momentary gathering. Here, the eminent role is that of non-ritual activities, such as dance, song, or play. The celebration of one's own solidarity yields to individual special interests and social differentiations. Instead, the holidays of individual trade groups such as wine-growers, fishers, or defense or security personnel, serve the presentation of one's own guild. Today, ritual festal elements ('customs') such as fish-spearing, the sword dance, and costumes frequently relate only nominally to traditional forms of the holiday, and are usually integrated into new ones, as fragments of folklore or an economy of the past; gastronomy day, flower day, or holidays celebrated by quarters of the city, can stand as meaningful examples.

Political Religious Festivals

d) With the dissolution of traditional binding values and norms at the beginning of the nineteenth century, a political appropriation of former religious festivals strengthened. Liberals and Democrats of the Vormärz knew how to requisition public (popular) festivals as vehicles of their political goals. But the public festal culture can also express social opposition with a 'counter-feast.' This was the case with the First of May holidays in the Germany of the close of the nineteenth century, which served at first as 'Battle day' of the labor force against the official Wilhelmine national holidays of the Empire. The National Socialists, on the other hand, used public festivals to create a society of unity. The Reichsparteitage were intended to legitimize their political power, and bound the Führer and his 'people' in a symbolically enhanced unity, in order to stage a total state. In current middle-class rituals, the amalgamation of religion and politics is an essential element. This aspect is well illustrated in state funerals, for instance in the service of mourning for Lady Diana in 1997. Imbedded in the religious ceremonial (Requiem) were a private memorial address by her brother, and a musical interlude by a pop singer. Similarly, the interplay of religion and what we may call a 'political social' factor prevails on birthdays or weddings of heads of state.

Private Religious Celebrations

e) Festivals in the life cycle of the individual mark his or her passage across the frontiers between one stage and the next. Baptisms, first communions,

The Kumbha-mela ranks as the world's largest festival. During the month-long mela, many millions of pilgrims gather to bathe in the Ganges (the Ganga), which flows past Hardwar at the foot of the last stray Himalaya, into the Ganges. The festivities appeal to the myth of the Kumbha: as the gods agitated the ocean of milk, the Kumbha, among others, arrived, to produce from the floods the urn that bestowed the nectar of immortality, in order to bear the precious vessel to safety from the demons. It was drawn out of the water by Jayanta, the son of Indra, in the form of a crow. On the way, Jayanta set the urn down in three places: in Prayag and Hardwar on the Ganges, in Nasik at the river Godavari, and in Ujjain on the Sipra. In these four places, the bathing festival takes place. Every twelve years, the Purna-kumbha ('full urn') is celebrated, the lesser festival Ardh-Kumbha ('half urns') after six years each time. The festivals are held by turns, so that every three years a Purna-kumbha is celebrated in one of the four places. (Kirsten Holzapfel) confirmations, Bar-Mitzvah, weddings, the ordination of priests, graduation celebrations, jubilees, funerals, memorial services for the dead, are all rites of transition (in Fr., rites de passage), that accompany the life cycle from beginning to end, help to accentuate critical and joyful phases, and celebrate the latter and prevail over the former. The passage to the next phase is preceded by a phase of preparation, to which the transitional stages between 'old' and 'new' life attach. Once the new status or life segment is reached, a re-incorporation into the everyday begins.

Festivals as Structuring of Time

f) The reiterability of the feast or festival, in festive cycles and annual festivals, can be thought of as interplay between a ritual structuring of time and the change of seasons in pre-modern agrarian societies. Nature festivals such as the new year, the beginning of spring, the feasts of May, the solstice, or the feast of thanksgiving for the harvest mark the times of the year and the traditional rhythm of toil, through which, in industrial societies, there occurred to some extent a superimposition of the intensity of the festival through the altered conditions of life, as in the fact that the laborers' festival falls on the first of May. In principle the solar and lunar cycles enabled specialists to make a determination of seasonal feasts. For the Jewish-Christian → calendar, however, the traditional determination of dates such as the Sabbath or of → Sunday as a day of rest is not subject to astronomical conditions, but to social construction. Accordingly, the Christian calendar does not correspond minutely to natural time, but is organized in terms of the events of salvation history. Islamic temporal calculation begins with the departure of the Muslim community from Mecca to Medina in the year 622 of the Christian calendar, and the calendar is geared to the lunar year.

Problematization

4. Criticism of current holiday or festal culture is often provoked today by a so-called 'Disneyization' of feasts. Apparently, elements such as education, nostalgia or reverie, or a sensuous social 'togetherness,' are, to the advantage of pure entertainment and consumption of goods, shifted into the background. Although these processes produce a partial evacuation of originally religious feasts, which can now develop into ongoing festivals 'staged' rather than celebrated, this change does not mean the end of the festal culture. Despite the altering forms, the human need to celebrate festivals remains the same.

Literature

Assmann, Jan (ed.), Das Fest und das Heilige. Religiöse Kontrapunkte zur Alltagswelt, Gütersloh 1991; Bray, Tamara L. (ed.), The Archaeology and Politics of Food and Feasting in Early States and Empires, New York etc. 2003; Dalby, Andrew, Siren Feasts: A History of Food and Gastronomy in Greece, London 19996; Düding, Dieter/Münch, Peter F. P. (eds.), Öffentliche Festkultur. Politische Feste von der Aufklärung bis zum Ersten Weltkrieg, Reinbek 1988; Gebhart, Winfried, Fest, Feier und Alltag. Über die gesellschaftliche Wirklichkeit des Menschen und ihre Deutung, Frankfurt/M. 1987; Martin, Gerhard M., Fest und Alltag. Bausteine zu einer Theorie des Festes, Stuttgart 1973; Strong, Roy, Feast: A History of Grand Eating, London 2002.

→ Calendar, Eating/Nourishment, Dance, Drinking/Drink, Everyday Life, Fasting, Ritual, Time

Annemarie Gronover

Fetish / Fetishism

Problems of the Concept

1. a) Belief in an object with supernatural powers of spell or enchantment, or in an object whose mysterious workings are venerated in cult—with blood sacrifice, for example—is often designated 'fetishism.'[1] This notion must be applied with great caution, however—contrary to the general notion that they designate phenomena, they are in fact foreign explanatory constructs applied to misunderstood cultural systems.

b) The use of the term 'fetish,' as a category for other systems of symbolical reference, began in 1481 with the Portuguese seafarers, who designated with the word feitiço (Lat., facticius, made artificially) any object of veneration on the part of a local cult of inhabitants of the West African coasts. In this fashion, Christian sailors were unable to distinguish the symbol from the symbolized, such was the 'foreignness' of both to their own religion and culture.

'Fetish' as the wholesale label of a 'false belief' became the sign of a defective faculty of abstraction, and 'fetishism' the pejorative category for the multiplicity of religious cults of West African traditions. 'Fetishism' as a concept in the theory of religion comes down from Charles de Brosses (1709–1777), who used it as a name for the veneration of lifeless objects, whether natural or artificial. For de Brosses, fetishism represented the first stage of religion, in which an immediate, direct cultic action would be the basis for the later development of a theological system. In Auguste Comte's Enlightenment theory of → evolution, fetishism was the era of the first theological step of human development (fetishism—polytheism—monotheism), within the three-stage-law (theological—metaphysical—positive). The first criticism of the use of the concepts fetish and fetishism in sociology of religion was expressed by anthropologist Marcel Mauss (1872–1950), who subsumed them as 'cultural misunderstandings,' and called for their renunciation in any future theoretical activity concerned with religious phenomena. The phenomena of religion ought to be analyzed in their own conceptuality, and be interpreted in terms of their own symbolical meanings, Mauss argued. The final dismissal of fetishism is to be credited to the criticism of totemism by French anthropologist Claude Lévi-Strauss (b. 1908), who unmasked the idea of totemism as a fantasy, with an analysis that can also be applied to fetishism. In order to do justice to the meaning of objects that for the observer seem to be in a strange way included in ritual practices and content (e.g., the Holy Shroud of Turin in Catholicism's veneration of relics), it is preferable that these objects be interpreted in their own particular, culture-specific systems of concept and symbol, lest hasty misprisions result from the interpretation.

Psychological Aspects

2. With all of the conceptual inadequacy in this case, there is a psychological aspect common to the constructions of religious 'originality' connected with it: namely, the human need for 'something you can get hold of,' a symbol's material foundation, that could present a projection screen for religious conceptualizations and emotions. The content of thought surely needs a sensible component in order to become 'religiously felt.' The 'Holy' is embodied and conveyed to the believer through the visibly material constitution of a picture or an object. As a symbol, it must have, on the one hand, a common schema of interpretation belonging to believers; on the other hand, there must be knowledge, in the observer, of those common interpretations. A further area of use and interpretation of fetish and fetishism goes back to Sigmund Freud's treatise on fetishism (1927), where he denotes the latter as a sexual deviation going back to woman's penis envy or man's castration fear. With fetishism, Freud has thematized the alien in the individual, and shifted the concepts to the area of sexual disorders.

In the village of Sorobasso, in Mali, prophet and healer Dembele and his brother sit before certain old 'fetishes,' handed down from generation to generation. At the end of a three- to four-hour ceremony, a chicken is sacrificed to the fetishes. Owing to the 'fetisher's' good reputation, clients travel hundreds of kilometers to consult them on farming issues, to be healed from illnesses, to obtain advancement at work, or to solve personal problems. The fetishes are small, cotton-wrapped figures of iron or wood, around whom the compass of the years has laid the sacrificial blood of many generations of poultry. Besides chickens, sacrifice is made of goats and sheep brought along by the petitioner. The fetish receives only the blood, however: the flesh of the animals is usually consumed in a common meal held after the sacrifice. (Benita von Behr)

3. In sum, it can be said that the deprecatory Euro-centric notions concealed in the concepts of fetish and fetishism are no longer tolerable for today's observation of cultural and religious phenomena. As technical notions, they belong to that conceptual history of religious studies and anthropology that found such ready entry into the parlance of popular science either as 'exoticized' alienation, or as 'other reality' reinterpreted as 'perversion.' The currency of these apprehensions, then, lies less in their content, than in their character as demonstrating the intellectual and psychic difficulties of dealing with the foreign in culture or religion.

1. Loth 1987, 54.

Literature

History of the Concept: Comte, Auguste, Œuvre d'Auguste Comte. Cours de philosophie positive, vol. 5, Paris 1969 ([1]1841), 1-91; de Brosses, Charles, Culte des dieux fétiches ou parallèle de l'ancienne religion de l'Égipte avec la religion actuelle de la nigritie, Paris 1760; Haddon, Alfred C., Magic and Fetishism, London 1910; Lévi-Strauss, Claude, Totemism, Harmondsworth 1969 ([1]1962), Mauss, Marcel, Œuvre 2: Représentations collectives et diversité des civilisations, Paris 1968 ([1]1906/07), 244-246.

Secondary Literature: Apter, Emily, Feminizing the Fetish: Psychoanalysis and Narrative Obsession in Turn-of-the-Century France, Ithaca 1991; Fernbach, Amanda, Fantasies of Fetishism: From Decadence to the Post-Human, Edinburgh 2002; Freud, Sigmund, "Fetischismus" (1927), in: Idem, Das Ich und das Es. Metaphysische Schriften, Frankfurt/M. 1992, 327-333; Kohl, Karl-Heinz, "Fetisch, Tabu, Totem. Zur Archäologik religionswissenschaftlicher Begriffsbildung," in: Idem, Abwehr und Verlangen, Frankfurt/M. 1987, 89-102; Loth, Heinrich, Vom Schlangenkult zur Christuskirche. Religion und Messianismus in Afrika, Frankfurt/M. 1987; Shelton, Anthony (ed.), Fetishism: Visualising Power and Desire, London etc. 1995; Spyer, Patricia (ed.), Border Fetishism: Material Objects in Unstable Spaces, New York 1998.

→ Africa II, Colonialism, Relics (Veneration of), Symbol/Sign/Gestures, Voodoo

Lidia Guzy

Film I: Christian Contexts

1. Ever since the appearance of the new medium of film, film and religion have stood in a fertile tension. The relationship has held from the earliest silent films with biblical motifs, to the great Hollywood classics and the 'religious' films from the great directors of secular France, to the transferal of the subject to the new myths of cinema and television. One may ask why films with biblical motifs have belonged to the repertoire of the history of film across the board ever since the invention of the new technology. Doubtless the answer is that the unfamiliar—and rather eerie—'language' of the medium of moving pictures can be conveyed to the mass audiences of the West through a connection to familiar matter from Christian iconography. The acculturation of a medium occurs by steps, with the discovery of new technological dimensions. The presentation of the miracle or wonder is almost like the sensations and art pieces of an annual fair. A theory of cinema and its history will not be complete without the aspect of religion in film. While, at first, the churches often greeted the new medium with skepticism, out of considerations of morality and social politics—an attitude that Protestant groups still have today—it is more and more accepted by them as a means of mass communication, announced and commented on in publications, or even promoted. The use of the opportunities for inter-religious dialogue presented by technologies like television, video, and interactive media, is only now getting under way.

Film as a Medium

2. From the outset, film was used not only for conveying news and information, but also, and to an even greater degree, for the presentation of fiction. Especially since the coming of the color film in the 1930s, film, unlike the traditional media of oral speech, writing, and printing, has reinforced, by joining image and color, speech and motion, the character of the word as witness. Its essential trait is its 'narrativity,' its recital in images of motion, which is what makes it so apt for conveying → myth. Here is where one of the foundations of the great success of the Hollywood style seems to lie—together with, perhaps, that myth's capacity for the amalgamation of new ones, an enterprise to which the structure of film can readily adapt. It is even in a position—at all events, more so than are the other mass media—to create new mythologies. Its earmark is suggestiveness and presence, and it can credibly 'stage' → epiphanies. Unlike television, which came from radio, and which lives on news, 'live' broadcasts, and documentation, film has access to 'higher' incorporations of fiction (dream, magic, miracle, myth), and thus stands in closer company with certain phenomena of the experience of religion. The presentation of stories in motion (and here it maintains its kinship with the stage play) is film's most important field of activity.

One of the religious films whose material was supplied by the Bible was a spectacular, slushy production that became one of Hollywood's greatest successes: Cecil B. DeMille's "The Ten Commandments" (USA, 1957). The 1990 video-cassette reissue is absent from no video store, and tourists may visit the set of the famous trick-scenes of the miraculous crossing of the 'Red Sea' as reproduced at Universal Studios in Hollywood—the original set at Paramount Studios no longer exists. And the legend of a legend is born.

By contrast, the documentary film withdraws a little into the background—despite the manifold changes within the genre, which, if we correctly interpret the most recent developments (drama in the style of documentary), are gradually shifting it closer to the dramatic film. Very early, the medium took advantage of its unique opportunities to store up information in documentary films, especially in anthropology. There, during and after the First World War, anthropological fieldwork flourished. The documentary film as a medium and the discipline of anthropology have to some extent engaged in each other's promotion, and an ideology has arisen that, in conscious or immanent criticism of Western civilization and Christianity, has made it its project to cling tightly to a paradise irrecoverably lost in Europe. Religion was presented in rituals, but this step rendered a mixture with fiction unavoidable, since, in fiction, religion was even 'staged.' A much-discussed example of dramatization, stylization, and even falsification of reality in the documentary film is Robert J. Flaherty's "Moana" (USA, 1926).

A special area is that of the animated film, with the numerous techniques proper to itself of a suggestive presentation of the supernatural. Over twenty productions were offered in church media-centers on biblical topics alone. In 1998, Moses as "Prince of Egypt" appeared on the screen, supported by many stars—and yet this is only one out of thirty-two new productions of this genre in Hollywood, so that, just from the flow of the mighty investments in this sector, we may judge that the fuse is lit for an explosion of religious and pseudo-religious topics and presentations. Not counted in this enumeration are the numerous presentations made for television and videotape.

The video market has gained a special importance in the areas of both production and marketing, above all in the United States. Here, there is scarcely a video store without classics of the popular history-film with biblical references like The Ten Commandments, or Ben Hur. On the one hand, video-films constitute a genre of their own, with its proper laws and economic conditions, and at the same time present numerous transitions to the screen-film genre (see illustration).

Just so, passages between cinema and television are subject to different marketing laws: dramatic films form the backbone of most television. Conversely, creations composed of the elements of successful TV series ("X-Files," 1998, a presentation built to last a whole evening, extravagantly enriched with special effects, and built on the success of the series), or parallel versions ("Enterprise") are shown in theaters.

3. Genres: In drawing up the elements of the area, 'religion in the dramatic film,' one will have to attend to various sub-genres that ought to be listed in the selection, even though definitions and borderlines are disputed:

a) Even film stars often describe the Bible as 'the most exciting film scenario ever written.' In a certain sense, the same view has prevailed ever since the beginning of the silent film, although Sacred Scripture as film scenario had constantly to be altered, enriched with subjects 'good for movies,' and 'improved.' As early as 1897, five Bible films appeared—brief sequences, with a primary interest in the supernatural element of miracles and of the Resurrection of Jesus. Passion plays were filmed, featuring a remarkable expansion of certain gospel materials from newly discovered apocryphal texts. Even producers from the cinema's infancy kept an eye on the market, and filmed generally familiar materials that would facilitate distribution, and that would serve as a 'language course' in the new medium for the broad public. The list of productions with motifs from the Hebrew Bible and the New Testament from the era of the silent film alone, contains about one hundred films. Total listings of Bible films in the strict sense name some forty titles, counting the 'Jesus films.' Among the great classics, in any case to be emphasized, are the spectaculars "Intolerance" (→ Ancient East), "The Ten Commandments," and "Ben Hur." But the Bible also served as a peg on which to hang the blockbuster 'sandal films' (Babington/Evans, 1993) of the 1950s, with which Hollywood sought to defy television. Religion—anything in religion—is frequently a pretext for a more effective presentation of subjects such as sex and crime. Often, in adventure or crime films, biblical or religious elements will be applied even though the content has absolutely nothing to do with them. An extreme example is Bruno Dumont's La Vie de Jésus (Fr., "The Life of Jesus"), the portrait of a town in northern France, in which the subject is everyday racism and the loss of standards of value.

Pier Paolo Pasolini's "The Gospel According to Saint Matthew" (Italy, 1964) is an example of a "Jesus film," and at the same time of a unique attempt at an artistic and timeless gospel film with a broad, enduring effect. Pasolini did not try to produce a spectacular Bible-film: his concern was to show where the message was to be accomplished—among the 'poor' of Galilee. He found his many actors in the rural proletariat of the bleak Southern landscape of Lucania, in Matera, in Italy.

Jesus Films

b) One of the most effective genres that has repeatedly come into new unfriendly confrontation with Christian thematics is that of the so-called Jesus film. In extremely few instances, however, has this been a matter of direct presentations of the life of Jesus as based on New Testament sources. In part, they are even 'filmed novels,' which is occasionally overlooked by criticism (Martin Scorsese's "The Last Temptation of Christ," based on the novel by Nikos Kazantzakis). Extraordinarily rich in dark humor and criticism of the Church is the British Monty Python group. Their "Life of Brian" parodies the people's credulousness in miracles and the cunning of the preachers, with direct, at times provocative references to the history of Jesus's life. Very frequently, religious founders and other religious persons are presented ambivalently, either as heroic champions of ethics and morals, or as tragic or comic figures.

Clergy and Religious

c) The clerical melodrama has all but become a genre of its own. From the mid-1930s to the mid-60s, in consequence of the promulgation of the Motion Picture Production Code in the United States (no ridiculing of tenets or beliefs, no disparagement of religious dignitaries), films appeared whose priest hero is set in a positive, even worshipful light (Keyser 1984): Graham Greene's The Power and the Glory was repeatedly filmed; Bernhard Wicki's "Das Wunder von Malachias" (Ger., "Malachy's Miracle"; Germany, 1961) arose out of the amusing novel by Bruce Marshall. Toward the end of the 1960s, this sort of religious film was somewhat criticized. In "The Thorn Birds," based on the novel by Colleen McCullough, the subject of 'Catholic priests and sexual relations' was addressed. As a rule, however, the problem was approached with sensitivity, as in Fred Zinnemann's "The Nun's Story" (USA, 1959), or Antonia Bird's "Priest" (UK, 1994), about a young priest who comes into conflict with his homosexuality. An arbitrary portrait of a successful, authoritarian awakening preacher appeared in the ambitious film project "The Apostle" of Robert Duvall (USA, 1997), with the presentation of charismatic religiousness and Protestant piety.

Religious Films in the Stricter Sense

d) As identifying mark of a genre, the concept 'religious films' seems of scant utility, at least as a concept for a thematic special group that goes through all genres. Historical films, crime films, comedy, or melodrama can all exhibit religious motifs. The notion of the 'religious' in more recent attacks is readily replaced with the concept of spirituality, where the levels of experience are more strongly included. Under the latter rubric, let us now nevertheless name the prominent artistic chefs-d'oeuvre, which succeed in translating a genuinely religious proclamation in film: after Franz Werfel's novel, Henry King's "Song of Bernadette" appeared relatively early (USA, 1943), and then "Ordet" (Danish, "The Word") of C. T. Dreyer (Denmark, 1954): here the miracle of the raising of a dead woman is 'simply happening.' Dreyer succeeds in showing the miracle just as miracle, without sensation. Pier Paolo Pasolini has contributed to the genre doubtless the most enduring chef-d'oeuvre, "Gospel According to Saint Matthew." From more recent times, directors Wim Wenders, Krzystof Kieslowski, Andrei Tarkowsky, and Theo Angelopoulos ("The Suspended Step of the Stork") ought to be cited. But there are also numerous elements of the religious in the genres of comedy, satire, and parody, in the musical, in the crime film, and in the science fiction film. In many films, the 'Christ incognito' can be found.

Missionary Films

e) American preacher Billy Graham has well recognized that film can be used as a missionary medium, and he has produced his own films with this goal in mind (→ Televangelism). From a production series of his own, propagated with great financial outlay, the so-called Genesis Project (Old and New Testaments), comes one of the films that have been translated into the most languages, "The Crucifixion of Jesus." This film consists of an allegedly 'literal' filming of the Passion story of the Gospel of Luke, a production introduced in both theaters and schools, and in mission establishments as far away as Mongolia. The pinnacle of this genre might be seen in Mel Gibson's controversial "The Passion of the Christ" (USA, 2004).

New Myths in Film—a New Mythology?

4. From the beginning of the history of film, religious subjects enjoyed great popularity with directors, but soon ran into criticism at the hands of theological authorities. Old silent films with religious subjects are, for instance, "Golem" and "The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse". The problem, both with pseudo-historical bible films and with the presentation of 'miracles' and 'ESP phenomena' in fantastic films ("Frankenstein"), is that here, as a rule, neither are religious backgrounds laid out, nor can critical considerations be engaged, but instead, the viewer is confronted with one version, out of a massive repertory of vantages, as (film) reality. Another trend goes in the direction of a partially contemplative/meditative, partially historical/informative, transmittal of culture. Thus, from 1994 to 1998, theaters were filled with neo-realistic films dealing with Tibet, in which basic Buddhist ideas were conveyed ("Kundun," Martin Scorsese, UK, 1997; "Little Buddha," Bernardo Bertolucci, France/UK, 1994). Religion and 'fairytale' play a remarkably growing role in horror and science fiction films. It is not only in dramas with religious titles that ideas of belief are transmitted: in the first three installments of George Lucas's film series "Star Wars" (USA, 1979–1982), the director takes up the theme of redemption and redeemer. He shows redemption as rebellion; the actual redemption of hero Luke Skywalker, however, transpires not by the sword, but by 'spiritual forces' that, in the sequel, "Return of the Jedi" (1981), the young hero manages to engage. Through the hero's belief in higher power, Lucas has the weak conquer the strong. In the 1990s, pessimistic films on the end of the world were produced more and more, including television series in which Satan is presented as mighty, or evil is incarnated in the extraterrestrial (e.g., Peter Markle's "X-Files: Emily," USA, 1997). Traditional myths and religious practices (Jesus stories, Percivale, Zen Buddhism) are adapted and transformed into new, popular myths, even grand myths of Western history. The principal figures are knights who lend help and support, who must suffer without cause. Magic, secret symbolism, and conspiracy theories on extraterrestrial or super-earthly influences are well received, especially when these 'new myths' are broadcast at the best times.

Cliché images and myths are intermingled in abundance: 'innocent heroes' and their antitheses, the one 'possessed by Satan,' the 'Catholic wife, to give birth any time now,' the 'Jewish mother' as an ideal figure, and so on, are presented in unreal cliché images that rest on old religious images. Film can be an instrument for cementing the images of outsiders (→ Prejudices/Stereotypes). When religious subjects are invoked as legitimization, this tendency is especially problematic. Not only negative propaganda, and the intentional construction of hostile stereotypes (e.g., in National Socialist film), but even a subtle, constant exposure to clichés leaves its effects. Even its presentation in everyday reality (conflicts with believers of other faiths) is looked upon as a confirmation of the prevailing cliché.

As a rule, directors and producers undertake biblical films in new images that presumably will be accepted by the audience. Abraham, of course, is perfect as the symbolic figure for the 'Abrahamite ecumene' (Jews, Christians, and Muslims). He is shown as such in the two-installment "Abraham" (Joseph Sargent, 1993), with familiar Jewish clichés, as mighty destroyer of his uncle's idols, in the spirit of the 'church Bible.' New myths are based on worlds of archaic images (cf. Röll 1998).

5. Not only individual films, but the basic notion of filming religious content, continue to be objects of discussion and dispute. The religious feelings of one part of the prospective audience are obviously incompatible with freedom of personal expression. The first great conflicts arose in the 1960s, with the films of Ingmar Bergman ("The Silence," 1963), Luis Buñuel ("Viridiana," 1961), and Pasolini ("La Ricotta," 1962, and "Teorema," 1968). To an extent, these led to a rethinking and a new praxis of evaluation on the part of the film commissions. In the 1970s and 80s, Christian circles protested Roman Polanski's "Rosemary's Baby" (USA, 1967), Friedkin's "The Exorcist" (USA, 1973), and Scorsese's "The Last Temptation of Christ" (USA, 1988), since certain sequences were judged blasphemous.

Concrete Utopias

6. As a positive example of what film can achieve, and of the extent to which the medium of film can bring religion closer to the audience, we may cite a short documentary, with very convincingly acted sequences, by Francisco Omachea, "Ajuyu" (Bolivia, 1966). A traditional ritual of the Aymara Indians is documented: the deceased are prepared for their journey to the realm of the dead, incense, favorite dishes, and provisions are sent along, as are gifts for relatives and friends, who receive them at an encounter in the next word. Finally, the father meets his childlike daughter once more, in a brilliant garden of paradise, and goes to work with his hoe.

Literature

Babington, Bruce/Evans, Peter, Biblical Epics: Sacred Narrative in the Hollywood Cinema, New York 1993; Fore, William, Mythmakers: Gospel, Culture and the Media, Cincinnati 1990; Fraser, Peter, Images of the Passion: The Sacramental Mode in Film, Westport 1998; Friedman, Lester, Hollywood's Image of the Jew. With Photographs, New York 1982; Hagmann, Karl Eugen/Hasenberg, Peter (eds.), Jesus in der Hauptrolle. Zur Geschichte und Ästhetik der Jesus-Filme, Cologne 1992; Hasenberg, Peter et al. (eds.), Religion im Film. Lexikon, Cologne 1993; Hodgson, Robert/Soukup, Paul, From One Medium to Another, Kansas City 1997; Johnston, Robert K., Reel Spirituality: Theology and Film in Dialogue, Grand Rapids 2000; Keyser, Barbara/Keyser, Less, Hollywood and the Roman Catholic Church, Chicago 1984; Lyden, John C., Film As Religion: Myths, Morals, and Rituals, New York 2003; Martin, Joel W./Ostwalt, Conrad E., Jr. (eds.), Screening the Sacred: Religion, Myth, and Ideology in Popular American Film, Boulder 1995; May, John R./Bird, Michael (eds.), Religion in Film, Knoxville 1982; Röll, Franz, Mythen und Symbole in populären Medien, Frankfurt/M. 1998; Valentin, Joachim (ed.): Weltreligionen im Film, Marburg 2002.

→ Ancient East (illustration), Bible, Film II, Jesus, Media, Myth/Mythology, Televangelism, Television

Andreas Reichert

Film and Religion: Selected Examples

Year	Title	Country	Director	Category	Religious Theme/s
1916	Intolerance	USA	David Wark Griffith	C	Spectacular epic, Bible episode
1925	Ben Hur	USA	Fred Niblo	C	Biblical epic; Jewish-Roman conflict
1928	The Passion of Joan of Arc/La passion de Jeanne d’Arc	DK	Carl Theodor Dreyer	C	Film on a saint
1943	The Song of Bernadette	USA	Henry King	C	Film on a saint
1947	Monsieur Vincent	F	Maurice Cloche	C	Film on a saint (Vincent de Paul)
1949	Francis, God’s Jester/Francesco, guillare di Dio	I	Roberto Rossellini	C	Film on a saint
1950	Diary of a Country Priest/Journal d’un curé de campagne	F	Robert Bresson	C	Wrestling with grace
1950	God Needs Men/Dieu a besoin des hommes	F	Jean Delannoy	C	Parish without a priest
1951	The Little World of Don Camillo/Le petit monde de Don Camillo	F/I	Julien Divivier	C	Comedy: Catholicism vs. Communism
1954	The Road/La Strada	I	Federico Fellini	C	Parable: guilt
1954	The Word/Ordet	DK	Carl Theodor Dreyer	C	Miracle, Resurrection
1956	The Seventh Seal/Det sjunde inseglet	S	Ingmar Bergman	C	Mystery play; quest for meaning

Year	Title	Country	Director	Category	Religious Theme/s
1957	The Ten Commandments	USA	Cecil B. deMille	C	Bible film
1959	The Nun's Story	USA	Fred Zinnemann	C	Conflict in the soul: vows
1961	Viridiana	SP	Luis Buñuel	C	Criticism of religion, social activity
1963	The Silence/Tystnaden	S	Ingmar Bergman	C	Existence-need, abandonment by God
1964	The Gospel According to St. Matthew/Il vangelo secondo Matteo	I	Pier Paolo Pasolini	C	Bible film: socio-revolutionary interpretation
1965	The Greatest Story Ever Told	USA	George Stevens	C	Bible film
1965	Balthazar/Au hasard Balthasar	F	Robert Bresson	C	Parable: ass as figure of the Passion
1965–1968	2001—A Space Odyssey	USA	Stanley Kubrick	C/M	History of humanity, utopia
1965–1968	Andrei Rublev	USSR	Andrei Tarkovsky	C	Russian painter of icons (14th–15th cent.)
1966	A Man for All Seasons	USA	Fred Zinnemann	C	Film on a saint (Thomas More)
1968	Theorem/Teorema	I	Pier Paolo Pasolini	C	Parable: figure of a redeemer
1968	The Milky Way/La voie lactée	F/I	Luis Buñuel	C	Criticism of religion, church history
1969	Color of Pomegranates/Sayat Nova /Nran gouyne/Zwet granaty	USSR	Sergei Parajanov	C	Film poem: Armenian myths
1971	Jesus Christ Superstar	USA	Norman Jewison	C	Bible musical
1976	The Last Supper/La ultima cena	Cuba	Tomas Gutierrez Alea	C	Parable: master-slaves conflict

1976	Taxi Driver	USA	Martin Scorsese	C	Parable: black angel
1977	Jesus of Nazareth	I/GB	Franco Zeffirelli	C	Bible film (television)
1981	E.T.—The Extraterrestrial	USA	Steven Spielberg	C	Extraterrestrial figure of a redeemer
1985	Hail Mary/Je vous salue, Marie	F	Jean-Luc Godard	C, M	Mystery of life
1986	Mission	GB	Roland Joffé	C, M	Jesuit mission (18th cent.)
1986	The Sacrifice/Offret	S/F	Andrei Tarkovsky	C	End of world, sacrifice
1987	Therese/Thérèse	F	Alain Cavalier	C	Film on a saint (Theresa of Lisieux)
1987	Wings of Desire/Der Himmel über Berlin	D	Wim Wenders	C	Angels, redemption
1987	Babette's Feast/Babettes gæstebud	DK	Gabriel Axel	C	Meaning of life, metaphor of meal
1987	Brightness/Yeelen	Mali	Souleymane Cissé	O	African myths
1988	Decalogue, 1-10/Dekalog	PL	Krzystof Kieslowski	C	Parables: ethical questions
1989	Jesus of Montreal/Jesus de Montreal	Can.	Denys Arcand	C	Modern passion play, Jesus parallels
1989	Why Has Bodhi Darma Left for the East/Dharmaga tongjoguro kan kkadalgun	South Korea	Yong-Kyun Bae	O	Buddhism, Zen master and his disciples
1989	Crimes and Misdemeanors	USA	Woody Allen	O	Jewish intellectuals, guilt
1991	The Fisher King	USA	Terry Gilliam	M, C	Guilt and redemption, legend of the Grail

Year	Title	Country	Director	Category	Religious Theme/s
1992	Bad Lieutenant	USA	Abel Ferrara	C	Violence and redemption, apparition of Jesus
1993/94	Three Colors: Blue, White, Red/ Trois couleurs: Bleu, Blanc, Rouge	F	Krzystof Kieslowski	C	Question of meaning, values-orientation
1995	Dead Man Walking	USA	Tim Robbins	C	Death penalty, guilt and forgiveness
1996	Breaking the Waves	DK	Lars von Trier	C	love and redemption, Christ figure
1997	Eternity and a Day (L'èternite et un jour)	Gr/F/ It/D	Theo Angelo-poulos	C	Death, meaning of life
1999	The Matrix	USA	Larry and Andy Wachowski	C/O/M	Apocalypse, redeemer, religious references
2000–2002	The Lord of the Rings	USA	Peter Jackson	C	Fantasy film, Christian subtext
2004	The Passion of the Christ	USA	Mel Gibson	C	Bible film

Explanations of the List of Films

- Definition: “Religious films” here are religious films in the traditional sense: on the basis of their presentation of their material (Bible, lives of the saints), as well as of protagonists (e.g., pastors), of the milieu and the choice of subjects. The classic religious Autorenfilm (‘authored’ film; Bresson, Bergman, Buñuel, Pasolini, etc.) is defined by the (wholly or partially) religious determination of its standpoint by the directors, which in the work itself can come to expression either explicitly or only implicitly. Recent research looks for traces of the religious in all film genres—in the ‘authored’ film of artistic ambition (Tarkowski, Kieslowski, Wenders, etc.), but also in the film for popular entertainment that opens up religious dimensions, often alongside other tenders of meaning. A growing role of considerations other than those of content is played by the:
- Aesthetic form: In the age of the silent film (filmed Passion plays, beginning in 1897), the spectacular religious film developed, whose aim was to overwhelm the viewer by gigantic display (décor, costumes, extras) and cinematic technique (miracles as trick sequences). In ‘authored’ films, more pretentious aesthetic forms of the transposition of religious experiences, and so on, develop by the condensation of the film narrative into a metaphorical structure, by stylization, and by abstraction or associative-meditative montage.
- History: In the era of the silent film, on into the time of the early color film, the purely illustrative transposition of religious materials predominated. After the war, through the introduction of modern film techniques (color, wide screen, stereophonic sound) in Hollywood, the spectacular film was revived. In Europe, classic religious films appeared, with representative figures of the faith (saints, pastors, etc.), powerful religious lives (Bresson, Duvivier, Delannoy). With directors like Buñuel, Bergman, Pasolini, what occurred was the ‘thematizing’ of the existential meaning of the faith, the encounter with the question of God, and the social currency of the Christian proclamation. Since the 1970s, we have a multiplicity of religious references in genre films and Autorenfilme, that—explicitly or implicitly—introduce patterns of religious interpretation, and open religiously relevant questions (guilt, redemption, search for meaning, etc.).
- Category: C = Christian; M = Mythological; O = Other.

Peter Hasenberg

Film II: Film and Islam

Egypt

1. a) Film industry and film creators: The history of film in the Arab Islamic world began in Egyptian Alexandria, where, in a café in 1896, the first rolls of film by the brothers Lumière were played. In 1912, Europeans produced the first film production on Egyptian soil. Mohamed Bayyumi, a student of the Ufa Studios in Berlin, was the first Egyptian director; in 1921, he established the film company, Bayyumi Foto Film, in Alexandria. The first full-length Egyptian film, the silent "Leila" (150 min.), 1927, was produced by a woman, Aziza Amir, formerly a theater actress, who belonged to the upper-class woman's movement of the 1920s led by Hoda Shaarauwi. In 1934, in Giza, near Cairo, the building of Studio Misr was begun, to develop into the largest exporter of Egyptian films, and to supply the Arab and Asian worlds alike with its own productions. After the Second World War, film production by Studio Misr and other companies rose to some forty acted movies. The success of Egyptian films in other countries rested on the similar situation of these countries, intelligent marketing, and attractive content, with preference to unhappy love-stories with happy endings, comedies, and the much loved musicals.

Maghreb Countries

b) Egypt already had one of the largest international film industries, before the first film in North Africa was produced—in Tunisia—in 1939. Since then, Tunisia, Morocco, and Algeria have created an important film industry of their own. With their annual film festival at Carthage (Tunisia), these countries have established their own, internationally recognized forum, by which even European film festivals, like those of Cannes and Venice, are influenced and inspired. Some productions of the North African film were successful exports in Europe, where, especially in the 1980s and 90s, they were shown in program theaters. Among them are Nouri Bouzid's "Bezness" (1992), Merzak Allouache's "Bab el-Oued City" (1994), Moufida Tlatli's "La Silence des Palais" (Fr., "The Silence of the Palaces"; 1994), and Mohamed Chouikh's two films, "La citadelle" (French, "The Citadel," 1998) and "Youcuf ou la Légende du Septième Dormant" (Fr., "Youcuf, or the Legend of the Seventh Sleeper"; 1993). Internationally, Youcuf Chahine became the most important director in Egypt of the present time, whose "Al-Muhager" (Arab., "The Emigrant") was also shown in Europe.

West Africa

c) In 1970, Senegalese Muslim Ousmane Sembène founded the Pan-African Federation of Cinema Directors, which represented a first step in the independence of African film production. Economically, the goal is to create independent productions, without European financing. Content-wise, an attempt is made to discharge the burden of the European legacy of colonization, as well as the burden of religion. This effort is evident in Sembène's "Camp de Thiaroye" (Fr., "Camp of Thiaroye," 1988), whose theme was French-German collaboration in Senegal during the Third Reich, or in "Mossane" (1996), by Senegalese Safi Faye, the first female director in Central Africa. "Mossane" portrays the conflict between a reflective traditional consciousness and a bigoted modernistic consumer orientation, which drives the main character Mossane to suicide.

Islam and Film / Islam in Film

2. The history of film in countries of Islamic culture is, above all else, a history of confrontation with censorship. A potential for conflict lurks especially in films with religious content. This prospect is only understandable, in view of the fact that film was especially fashioned by and for the intellectual—the urban middle class, who enjoyed a higher degree of education than the rural population, and whose cultural orientation was European. In other words, acceptance or non-acceptance of the film reflected class difference, especially in Egypt. On the other hand, film is also the ideal means of transmitting messages to the people in countries characterized by oral cultural traditions and illiteracy. Thus, filmmakers have frequently found themselves, as they still do today, in the situation of having to undertake an artistic balancing-act between received religious tradition and projects of modernization.

In his film "Muhammad," which he made in the 1970s, Syrian Sunnite director Mustafa Aqqad observed the Islamic prohibition against visual → images of the Prophet by portraying Muhammad exclusively 'headless': instead of a head, a globe of light would appear on the screen. In justification of his compromise solution, Aqqad appealed to the director of the Egyptian office of censorship, who had explicitly determined in the 1960s that, although neither Muhammad or his wives nor the authentic caliphs, Muhammad's successors, might appear in film, but the censor had also ruled that this prohibition need not necessarily be in force for all time. He had thus divorced himself from the claim to absolute authority maintained by the theological al-Azhar University. The first difficulties arose in October 1970, with the unanimous censure of the film project by the Pan-Islamic "Constituent Congress of the Islamic World League," strongly supported by Saudi Arabia. A massive attempt was then made to exert influence over the book of "Muhammad." From 1973 on, in nearly all parts of the Arab world, Aqqad's film project was the subject of lively and sometimes bitter controversy, although the prohibition of images had been consistently observed neither in the early nor during the classical Islamic period. From the side of Saudi Arabia, under the verbal leadership of Moroccan religious scholar Sheikh Muhammad al-Muntasir al-Kattani, an attempt was launched to charge Aqqad with heresy (Arab., zandaqa) or even unbelief (Arab., kufr)—both of these being capital crimes under orthodox Islamic law. The campaign against Aqqad could not be prevented from being realized, however, and, ironically, it was especially the Moroccan government that led the way: Morocco emphatically promoted the production of the film, inasmuch as it allowed taking outdoor scenes in Morocco. Aqqad had two versions of his film produced. One was intended as an international version, with Anthony Quinn as Muhammad's companion Hamza, and Irene Pappas as Muhammad's adversary Hind bint Utba. An Arabic version was also produced, with Abdallah Gait and Muna Wasif in both of these main roles. The public presentation of the film proved to be impossible, however, in most Islamic countries. Beginning in 1977, the international version was released in the United States, Great Britain, Western Europe, Japan, and elsewhere, leading to bomb threats and abundant demonstrations of protest on the Muslim side. Aqqad's film was not shown in Egypt. It was presumably the criticism of pro-Shiite tendencies in the film, however, that led to the project's being approved by the High Shia Council of Lebanon. This dimension might also explain the harsh reaction of Saudi Arabia and the rest of the Sunnite world.

This shot shows the key scene of the film "Bab el-Oeud City" by M. Allouache. Boualem, the baker, dismantles the mosque's loudspeaker—'God's mouthpiece,' in the language of the Islamists—and thereby commits a 'serious sin,' which must be punished by Said, leader of the Islamists, and rival of the moderate imam of the mosque and his followers.

Equally sharp confrontations over films of religious content or with implied or actual criticisms of religion occurred in the 1990s with the Algerian production, "Bab el-Oued City" (1994) of Merzak Allouache, as well as the Egyptian "Al-Muhager" (Arab., "The Emigrant") by Youcuf Chahine. "Bab el-Oued City," from the Centre du Monde Arabe in Paris, distinguished with a prize, has consistently aroused vigorous objection with many Islamicist oriented Muslims, on the basis of its precise presentation and criticism of the exploitation of religion by political extremists of the Front Islamique du Salut (Fr., "Islamic Salvation Front") after the unrest of 1988. "The Emigrant" (1994) provoked religious censorship for its allegedly lascivious scenes.

It is also a matter of political and religious conflicts between Christians and Muslims in Senegal in Ousmane Sembène's 1992 "Guelwaar," based on a true story. Deceased politician Guelwaar, due to a bureaucratic error, is interred in an Islamic cemetery, which comes close to unleashing violent confrontations. The film reflects fear of Senegal's escalating fundamentalism.

3. The future of film in Islamic countries will depend extensively on their socioeconomic development, as well as on an avant-garde interpretation of the Qur'an there. In his "100% Arabica" (1977), Algerian French director Mahmoud Zemmouri has a modern, moderate imam say that it all comes down to reading the Qur'an forward instead of backwards.

Literature

Bergmann, Kristina, Filmkultur und Filmindustrie in Ägypten, Darmstadt 1993; Ende, Werner, "Mustafa Aqqads 'Muhammad'-Film und seine Kritiker," in: Studien zur

Geschichte und Kultur des Vorderen Orients. FS für Bertold Spuler, Leiden 1981; Harwazinski, Assia, "Filmemachen in Schwarzafrika: Die Eroberung des eigenen Blicks durch das Erzählen von Geschichten mit der Kamera," in: Internationales Afrikaforum 31/4 (1995), 377-380; Landau, Jacob M., Studies in the Arab Theater and Cinema, Philadelphia 1958; Shafik, Viola, Arab Cinema, Cairo 1998.

→ Colonialism, Film I, Fundamentalism, Image/Iconoclasm, Islam, Media, Orientalism/Exotism

Assia Maria Harwazinski

Flagellants

The Flagellants (from Lat., flagellum, a 'whip') were a socio-religious penitential movement of the high and late Middle Ages, whose purpose was the purification of the soul through bodily pain. The members of this lay movement, which had spread throughout Europe, took the vow to flog themselves for thirty-three-and-one-half days, in correspondence with the years of Jesus's life, also to confess their sins to one another, to live without sin, and, every Good Friday, to devote themselves anew to thorough self-flogging.

Italian Cistercian Abbot Joachim of Fiore (1130–1202) had predicted, for the year 1260, a 'change of the world,' in conformity with his doctrine of three ages: those of the Father, of the Son, and—now being awaited—the era of the Holy Spirit. This mystical, symbolical interpretation of the world and time based on biblical speculation combined in the fourteenth century with apocalyptic dread of an approaching world annihilation. Accordingly, two main waves of the Flagellant movement surged up, the first around 1260, emerging from central Italy, and the second in the middle of the fourteenth century, following the epidemic of the 'Great Plague' in Europe. The movement's penitential marches, sweeping from city to city and attacking not only church, but secular institutions, and provoking anti-Jewish pogroms, led to the outlawing of the Flagellants, and exposed them as heretics to the castigations of the Holy → Inquisition. This sequence demonstrates the specific relationship of clergy and state to lay movements: tolerated and encouraged at first, with citation of Christian values (penance, conversion, repentance), their support ended because they had mobilized broad segments of the population. With the abating of plague and Inquisitorial measures, the flagellants also disappeared as a mass social phenomenon.

As a rite of individual purification through self-scourging, flagellantism has survived to the present in some Christian groups, as well as in Shiite Islam, and is still found today, in individual instances, as a public rite of penance, in Good Friday processions in the south of Spain, southern Italy, Latin America, and the Philippines.

Literature

Cooper, William M., The History of the Rod: Flagellation and the Flagellants in All Countries from the Earliest Period to the Present Time, London 2002; Lambert, Malcom, Medieval Heresy: Popular Movements from the Gregorian Reform to the Reformation, Oxford [2]1992; Reeves, Marjorie, The Influence of Prophecy in the Later Middle Ages: A Study in Joachimism, Notre Dame 1994.

→ Anti-Semitism, Penance/Penitent

Stefan Hartmann

Fool

The fool, as 'fool pope' and 'boy-bishop' (or 'ass-bishop'), was closely connected with Christmas ('feast of the innocent children'). He was at once a figure of protest and a symbol of Christ, who entered Jerusalem on an ass, and later was crowned as 'king of fools.' Thus, in the Middle Ages the fool functioned as antitype of the ruler (the fool-scepter presented a contrast with the ruler's staff); as part of a 'topsy-turvy world,' he might 'tell the truth' (as still today, in the European carnival) without having to reckon with sanctions. Toward the end of the Middle Ages, the image of the fool was transformed: the fool stood for that which is sinful, sex-driven, the raw and brutish, the bestial. The allegory of the 'ship of fools,' from the early modern age, embodies the rudderless ship of life, fated for destruction, as the reversal of the ship of salvation, piloted by Jesus Christ.

→ Carnival, Christmas, Trickster

Jutta Bernard

Forest / Tree

Tree and Forest as Place of Worship and as Symbol

1. Trees and forests had been a component of cultic practice since time immemorial. A distinction must be made between 'sacred trees' and constructions such as the world tree, trees of life, ancestor trees, and tree diagrams. All of these forms can be read as an expression of an individual or a societal self-communication. There are contrary ascriptions of meaning, however. The tree can symbolize either the cyclic renewal of life and fertility, and thereby victory over death, or else transience and death—for example, the rise, blossom or prime, and fall of nations. It symbolizes distinct conceptions of the connection of heaven, earth, and underworld. As a place of cult, it may form the group center at which sacrifice can be made, celebration held, or justice dispensed, or it can even be the residence of the god(s). The custom of planting trees at the birth of a child is as widespread as the marking of a grave with a tree. Proverbs are positive as well as negative: "The apple doesn't fall far from the tree"; "Arrogance must be felled like a tree."

While, as a rule, the tree conveys anthropomorphic or identifying values, a forest (in its etymological meaning as land 'outside'—in Latin, terra inculta or foris, 'not enclosed, land not under cultivation') often becomes the space of projection of the 'outside' quality of a given group to which the menacing, strange, or forbidden is banished.

According to Buddhist tradition, Siddhartha Gautama achieved the redeeming insight, and became the Buddha, while sitting in meditation at the foot of a fig poplar. In the northern Indian pilgrimage place Bodh Gayā (state of Bihar) such a tree can be found today. In its shadow a seat with a red stone plate marks the place of Gautama's enlightenment. During the yearly pilgrimage feast of Tibetan Buddhists, the tree is decorated with colored prayer flags. Behind the tree is the Mahābodhi stupa ("Stupa of the Great Enlightenment"), surrounded by temples of Burmese, Chinese, Japanese, Nepalese, Taiwanese, and Tibetan Buddhists. The tree of Bodh Gayā stimulated many legends and artistic representations (as the Bodhi tree, i.e. the 'Tree of the Awakening'). (Kirsten Holzapfel)

Since the Enlightenment, trees and forests have equally become representatives of a → nature that—as counter-image of a rational understanding of nature—is described as displaced and suppressed, or, since the twentieth century at the latest, open to destruction.

Myths of Tree and Forest

2. With the thematization, since the eighteenth century, of 'nature peoples' and their religions, myths of trees and woods in prehistoric tribal societies have increasingly become an object of research. Here the spectrum of scientific interpretational models indicates an interest in setting one's own relation to nature, felt as deficient, over against that of earlier societies. Inferences of an earlier worship of female tree-divinities are drawn from, among other things, Stone Age caches of female statuettes with tree-like shapes.[1]

According to a tradition of the Jakuti, the goddess-mother of animals and human beings lived in a 'tree of life.'[2] The ancient Egyptian goddess Isis is visualized as a tree that nurses the king. As examples of 'world trees,' their loftiest branches connecting earth and sky, their roots earth and underworld, we have the 'world Ash tree' Yggdrasil, as we read in the Teutonic Edda, or else a silver pine whose peak reaches the very house of the god Bai-Ulgan, in the ancient Altaic belief of southern Russia. The function of forests as the social 'outside' is attested in, for example, the initiation rites of shamans-to-be.

A comparison of individual tree myths points to their spatial context. Indeed the ash is among the tallest of deciduous trees, in the thickly wooded North of Europe, just as is the silver fir in Asian space. In the hot wastelands and plateau regions of Egypt and the ancient Near East, on the other hand, trees are rare, although they are of importance as shade trees and a sign of the presence of water. The sacred tree is a motif of ancient Near Eastern and Egyptian presentations, and was adapted by Judeo-Christian religion.

The Trees of the Paradise

For the Christian religion of redemption, the trees of Paradise—the tree of knowledge and the tree of life (Gen 2:15ff.)—are configuring motifs in their complex meaning associations. Different kinds of trees are presented as attributes of the Holy, or represent specific human characteristics. The wood of Christ's cross is taken to have been that of the oak, for example, by reason of its endurance, or of the aspen, whose leaf has 'whispered' since then, or of the holly.[3]

The Forest as District of Menace

3. Since the early Middle Ages, a symbolism of the tree immanent to Christianity has coexisted with the ascription of trees and woods to the ambit of the 'pagan.' The Church has practiced a gradual razing of the forests, mostly for the sake of arable land, or for the economic utilization of wood, as a 'work pleasing to God.' The metaphorical equivalency of 'forest' and 'sinfulness' is attested, for example, in the theological textbooks of Alnus, or in the usage of Christian asceticism, in which a sojourn in the woods is explicitly set forth as part of resistance to temptation.

There is further logical and existential opposition to the prevailing metaphoric of the tree in, for instance, the motif of the forest in Gottfried von Strassburg's epic, Tristan. Here, the wood becomes the brightsome ideal landscape, and asylum for the ostracized lovers. Reports of the medieval practice of demonstrative destruction of autochthonous tree-worship are usually from a later point in time. For example, the episode of Boniface's legendary felling of the oak sacred to tribal god Donar and the construction of a church of its wood is from the nineteenth century.[4]

Tree and Forest in Modern Times

4. From the beginning of modernity, various approaches have been mounted against a 'de-sacralized' understanding of a 'de-divinized' nature. Criticizing a belief in the reason and progress of the Enlightenment, these currents of thought reach back to conceptions of a natural order. Their commonality consists in their refusal to understand nature as a construction of societal history. Part of this tradition is the concept of nature as promoted by the French → Revolution. With its new concept of society as based on 'natural law,' national unity was anchored in a 'superordinate' power lying outside history. The Liberty Tree, shining sign of the Revolution, also implied a relationship to nature. In harmony with a cultural policy of reforestation, each community was to have a Liberty Place, with the oak as Liberty Tree, an Equality Place, with assorted native trees, and a Fraternity Place, with exotic trees as the sign of a universal unity and connection. The breach with toppled power and its understanding of nature found expression in, among other things, the Resolution of the 'Committee for Public Works,' "for the deliverance of orange trees from the servitude of the castes."[5]

The Tree as Sacrifice

In the course of the twentieth century, nature, in the form of the 'environment,' became the object of interests of social policy. The process of the environmental crisis, viewed as unstoppable, was interpreted as a consequence of human failure. In a context of both the Waldsterben (Ger., 'death of the woodlands') by contamination of the air (ozone, acidic rain), and the plundering of the rain forests, the tree was attributed the status of a sacrifice, which it has occupied since the 1980s. As the 'second "I" of man,' the tree now serves as an object of identification that, in its vicarious function, permits us to draw the conclusion that we ourselves are a sacrifice. This connection manifests itself in, for instance, an environmental action program called, "First the tree, then die we," as well as in artistic pieces like Joseph Beuys's project, "Stadtverwaltung-Stadtverwaldung" (Ger., "City management = City forestation") for "Documenta 7," in Kassel, with the planting of 7,000 oaks.

Obviously, the tree can symbolize utterly self-contradictory content. Thus, for example, the oak can be the Cross of Christ, the Liberty Tree of the French Revolution, the popular stereotype of the 'German Tree,' or an admonishing sign of the environmental crisis. This state of affairs transcends a common acknowledgement of the characteristics of the tree, and there it is—the nature myth, alive and well. The received practice of rooting conceptualizations of the social order in an unscrutinized totality of nature, in order to lend that totality the character of an unscrutinizable certainty, is based on a disregard of nature's historicity and finitude.

1. Baudy 1990, 113.
2. Lurker, Manfred, "Der Baum in Glaube und Kunst," in: Studien zur deutschen Kunstgeschichte, vol. 328, Baden-Baden 1960, 79.
3. Sachs, Hannelore et al., Christliche Ikonographie in Stichworten, Berlin 1994, 56.
4. Dinzelbacher 1993, 567; Köhler, Joachim, "Heilige und unheilige Bäume," in: Schweizer 1986, 143-66.
5. Harten/Harten 1989, 64.

Literature

Baudy, Gerhard J.: "Baum," in: Handbuch religionswissenschaftlicher Grundbegriffe 2 (1990), 109-116; Dinzelbacher, Peter (ed.): Europäische Mentalitätsgeschichte, Stuttgart 1993; Harten, Hans-Christian/Harten, Elke: Die Versöhnung mit der Natur: Gärten, Freiheitsbäume, republikanische Wälder, heilige Berge und Tugendparks in der Französischen Revolution, Hamburg 1989; Parpola, S.: "The Assyrian Tree of Life: Tracing the Origin of Jewish Monotheism and Greek Philosophy," In: Journal of Near Eastern Studies 52 (1993), 161-208; Schama, Simon, Landscape and Memory, London 1995; Schweizer, Harald (ed.): ". . . Bäume braucht man doch!", Sigmaringen 1986.

→ Environmentalism, Landscape, Mountains (Five Sacred), Nature, Nature Religion, Paganism/Neopaganism, Place (Sacred)

Ursula Pieschel

Francis of Assisi

1. Francis (1181/82–1226) is more than just one more saint in the Christian 'pantheon.' His importance for the history of religion and culture reaches far beyond the communities of the Franciscan Order and the Catholic Church, and was rediscovered at the end of the nineteenth century by Protestant theologian Paul Sabatier (Vie de Saint François d'Assise; Fr., "Life of Saint Francis of Assisi"; 1894) and art historian Henry Thode (Franz von Assisi und die Kunst der Renaissance in Italien; Germ., "Francis of Assisi and Renaissance Art in Italy"; 1885) for a middle-class secular public. Now Francis's image as the through-and-through orthodox believer, the order-founding saint charged with ecclesial piety, that had been propagated since Bonaventure of Bagnoregio's description of his life (1263), was on the way to its 'demythologization.' Ferdinand Gregorovius, in his History of Rome in the Middle Ages (German 1872) had already seen 'an inspired aspect of the divinity' in Francis, and had declared that he would have been a 'founder of religion' even in 'other ages.'

The twentieth century's newly awakened interest in Francis, and in the movement he called to life, lies on the consciousness, or rather, the surmise, of many persons, of their supra-confessional and timeless meaning. Nevertheless, Francis is medieval, and his religiousness manifests characteristics that exclude their hasty exploitation for modern religious requirements, and that call for an assiduous historical and philological investigation of the not always unambiguous sources.

Withdrawal from the World

2. Born in Assisi, eldest son of wealthy draper Pietro di Bernardone, Francis was baptized 'John Baptist,' but was called 'Francesco' ('Frenchman'). After a year's imprisonment in Perugia, and a protracted illness, Francis experienced a number of visions, in which he felt called to a life of radical poverty in the following of Christ. The most important of these experiences was the vision of the crucifix of San Damiano, in the summer of 1206. Portrayed in a painting in the ruined church of San Damiano below Assisi, the Crucified instructed Francis to 'rebuild' his 'house.' Francis at first took this injunction in a literal sense, and set himself to the restoration of a number of dilapidated churches. Soon, however, he understood it in a transferred sense as well: he was to renew church society itself (Christianitas; Lat., 'Christianity'), by summoning it to repentance and an exemplary life. The vision of the crucifix of San Damiano was a crucial step in his 'departure from the world'—marked exteriorly by his overcoming his revulsion for the victims of the plague, and exercising active compassion for them, and then by his spectacular rift with his father. At the same time, this vision inaugurates his progressive assimilation to the suffering and crucified Christ.

The Franciscan Brotherhood

3. Beginning in April 1208, Francis joined to himself his first like-minded companions, generally well-to-do members of middle-class families of Assisi, but also including simple artisans. In the spring of 1209, he journeyed with his first eleven companions to Rome, in order to receive the approval of Pope Innocent III of his 'form of life according to the Gospel.' The Pope granted the young community authorization to preach, and after long hesitation, (verbally!) endorsed their lifestyle of absolute poverty. Critically for this decision, Francis recounted and expounded to the Pope the dream of a poor, beautiful woman in the wilderness. The notion of 'Franciscanity' that came to expression in it—the idea of an elite church within the church, leading the way—is a radical, potentially heretical idea, far exceeding concepts of reform on the part of earlier medieval religious founders. At first the Franciscan brotherhood met with scant success, but by 1221 it had grown to several thousand members in the countries of Western Europe. In 1223, Pope Honorius II approved an extensively abbreviated Rule (the Regula Bullata; Lat, "Rule Sealed with Lead," or 'rule authorized by a [papal] bull'). It had been brought into conformity with prevailing ecclesiastical law, and is still fundamentally in force today.

4. For himself and his community, Francis had drastically radicalized the traditional ideals of life in a religious order. With him, the ideal of obedience had escalated to complete humiliation and self-emptying. Asceticism degenerated into self-torture, and hatred of one's own body, which finally led to a complex, self-destructive form of illness. Likewise, the ideal of chastity and virginity was realized, at times, in masochistic practices. Life in poverty went far beyond the practice of Jesus and the primitive Church. The performances staged by Francis in this connection were subversive of nature: they expressed a critical distance from the Church of his times, although he unremittingly swore his utter obedience to the hierocracy and shunned any appearance of heresy. Here Francis stands in a tradition, going back to Diogenes of Sinope and the ancient Cynics, that seeks to express its criticism of prevailing social circumstances less in words than in manner of life and sensational symbolic actions. The final aim of this lifestyle, however, was assimilation to the crucified Redeemer, which Francis attained two years before his death in his stigmatization on Mount La Verna. It means not only a fusion with the traditional Redeemer, but, in the figure of the beautiful crucified Seraph who appears to Francis, and brings him the Five Wounds, an all-encompassing redemption of the entire cosmos. In his lifelong, intensive encounter with all of the phenomena of nature (animals, plants, water, stones, wind, sun, moon, stars), in which he saw the brothers and sisters of human beings, but surely as well under the influence of contemporary Catharism, he reached the conviction that all beings were ensouled creatures of a good God, and must be restored to their divine source in a world redemption enwrapping all beings (not only human beings!). This included Satan (the earlier Lucifer) and the demons, with whom Francis wrestled in the caves of the 'eremitorium' (Greccio and Poggio Bustone in the valley of Rieti, as well as Santo Urbano in the vicinity of Narni).

5. Immediately after Francis's death, his successor as Minister General, Brother Elijah of Cortona, reported the fact of the stigmata and the appearance of the corpse, which resembled that of a crucified, in a circular letter. At the behest of Pope Gregory IX, who canonized Francis (1228) two years after his death, Elijah built (by 1239) the twin churches of the slope westward of Assisi. Francis's notions of world redemption, and of his own role as 'second Christ,' go beyond the bounds of ecclesial orthodoxy. In other circumstances, his Christology and soteriology could have made Francis one of the major heretics of the Middle Ages. Then the movement he initiated would have led not only to a reform of the Church, but to a redesigning of the Christian religion. Pope Gregory IX, the saint's 'friend' and foil, very probably recognized this. The canonization brought Francis back down to the measure of an exceptional, but ultimately 'normal' saint. In the bull Quo Elongati, the Pope then explained the "Testament," in which the dying Francis had established his spiritual bequest, as non-binding and without effect. Thus, he lopped off the revolutionary tip of the Franciscan movement, and passed it the canonical corset of a normal order of the Catholic Church. The same aims were also served by the official historiography of the Order (legends of Thomas of Celano and Bonaventura). But it is precisely these intentionally choked off traits of a redemptive figure, and of a religion with all-embracing, cosmic characteristics that would seem to explain the great currency of the Franciscan movement in the present—a prevalence transcending the interests of religious history.

Literature

Critical Edition of the Most Important Original Texts: Fontes Franciscani, a cura di Enrico Menestò, S. Maria degli Angeli-Assisi 1995; see also Fahey, Benen (trans.), The Writings of St. Francis of Assisi, Chicago 1988.

Secondary Literature: Hoeberichts, M. J. J., Francis and Islam, Quincy 1997; Manselli, Raoul, We Who Were With Him: A Contribution to the Franciscan Question, St. Bonaventure 2000; Smith, John Holland, Francis of Assisi, London 1972; Williams, Barrie, The Franciscan Revival in the Anglican Communion, London 1982.

→ Heresy, Mysticism, Poverty, Stigma/Stigmata, Veneration of the Saints

Helmut Feld

Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is to be distinguished from religious → tolerance. Religious tolerance is accorded the followers of another cult, and of deviant conceptualizations of belief. Meanwhile, since the French → Revolution of 1789, religious freedom represents a constitutionally guaranteed right of every citizen, and is limited only by laws that are valid for every citizen. Article 18 of the United Nations' "Declaration of Human Rights" states: "Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief, and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance."[1] A full religious freedom can be realized only in circumstances of a separation of church and state or corresponding organizations, and with a privatization of religion. Not all religions acknowledge the separation of state and church (cf. Matt 22:21); rather, they demand—as, in the extreme case, do many 'fundamentalist currents'—that all public and private questions be to be decided, even for others, on the foundation of religion. The basic thesis of religious freedom, then, represents a problem—especially for societies in course of modernization, which at the same time wish to preserve their cultural traditions. Even in Christianity, religious freedom must be "won by a struggle on the part of deviants against established churches."[2] Thus, they were able to connect with the teachings of Lactantius and Tertullian, for example, and, consequently, with their own tradition.

1. United Nations, Declaration on Human Rights, 1948, Art. 18; Ermacora, Felix: Menschenrechte in der sich wandelnden Welt, vol. 1, Vienna, 1974, 562-567.
2. Geldbach, Erich, in: Taschenlexikon Religion und Theologie 4 (1983), 243.

Literature

Cookson, Catharine (ed.), Encyclopedia of Religious Freedom, New York/London 2003; Zinser, Hartmut, Der Markt der Religionen, Munich 1997, 15-32.

→ Constitution, Fundamentalism, Government/Rule/Politics/State, Human Rights, Law, Tolerance

Hartmut Zinser

Freemasonry

General Characteristics of Freemasonry

1. Freemasonry (or Masonry) is a traditional fraternal society that was developed on the basis of the customs and conventions of late medieval stonemasons. Its standard definition among contemporary Masons is "a peculiar system of morality, veiled in allegory and illustrated by symbols" (Knoop/Jones 1947, 9). Freemasonry was the prototype of many modern social and fraternal organizations, and it has been accorded a fair level of undeserved notoriety as a paradigmatic 'secret society' (→ Secrecy). Although Masons do make pledges of confidentiality when they become members, only certain ritual specifics are considered to be 'secrets' of Freemasonry, and these have been repeatedly published. In countries where they are not actively persecuted, Masonic lodges make no secret of their location, membership, or times of meeting. Masonic leaders are public figures. Masons are open about the goals and general principles of their society.

Freemasonry inculcates charity. This principle was at first based on the premise that stonemasons would support each other in defending their means of livelihood, and then extended to the mutual relief of fraternal members in distress. Later, it was further amplified to cover a general moral exhortation regarding charity towards the larger society, and Masonic bodies have organized and funded philanthropic efforts for such causes as disaster relief, medical research, hospice care, and scholarships.

One of the original bases of the Freemasonic brotherhood was conviviality. While this dimension of Masonic organizing has been downplayed in some cases, as distracting from the ethical goals and high purpose of the society, banqueting is still an important function of many Masonic bodies.

The principle of education was also inherent in the earliest organizing of Freemasonry. It is customary for Masons to provide each other with lectures and instructions in their meetings. Masonic traditions emphasize the seven liberal arts and the development of intellectual discipline. Freemasonry places great stress on individual morality and personal piety, as well as freedom of religious and political opinion, and these qualities are generally tied to its educational mission.

The ceremonial dimension of Freemasonry is integral to its character. Besides the degree rituals through which Masons become members, Masonry also uses ritual forms to open and close its meetings for routine business, and to elect and install officers. There are Freemasonic ceremonies for laying the cornerstone of a new building. And there are distinctive Masonic funerary rituals. The customary ritual dress of Freemasons includes an apron and gloves.

Symbolism is inherent in Masonic ceremonies and ritual regalia, and in the decorations often evident on their buildings and documents. Some historians maintain that the symbolic mode of instruction is a vestige of Renaissance arts of memory incorporated into the earliest methods of Freemasonry. Whether or not that is the case, the activities of Freemasonry have diffused far and wide a recognizable set of Masonic symbols: the square and compasses, the all-seeing eye, the two pillars, the letter G, and many others.

Organization

2. Masonic bodies are in operation throughout the world. There are Freemasons in most countries and on all populated continents of the globe. There is, however, no single institutional authority set over worldwide Masonic organizing. The basic local organization of Freemasonry is the lodge, which is presided over by a Master, two Wardens, and other officers. The principal officers of a lodge are typically elected by the lodge membership. Lodges enact the three fundamental initiatory degrees of 'Craft Freemasonry.' These degrees, known in English as Entered Apprentice, Fellow Craft, and Master Mason, are also called the "blue degrees," and the lodge is sometimes called a "blue lodge." Lodges are ordinarily formed by the issuance of a charter from a national body known as a Grand Lodge. (In the USA, there are Grand Lodges for individual states.) Other terms roughly interchangeable with "Grand Lodge" are "jurisdiction," "obedience," and "Grand East" (or "Grand Orient"). Not all jurisdictions recognize each other's legitimacy or 'regularity.' There have been centuries of intricate conflicts, difficult accords, and complex diplomacy among different Masonic jurisdictions.

In addition, various organizations have been formed along the Masonic pattern to offer initiation and membership only to those who have already become Craft Freemasons. These further degrees are administered through their own distinct institutions, and are often referenced as Masonic 'Rites.' The most widespread and successful of these is the Ancient and Accepted Rite, known in many countries as the "Scottish Rite," which confers degrees numbered through thirty-three. In the USA, another popular system of additional degrees is called the "York Rite." In most cases, these rites have no authority over the Craft jurisdictions or their individual lodges, notwithstanding the occasional misleading characterization of the subsequent degrees as 'higher.' Some of these rites and further degrees, such as the Ancient and Accepted Rite in England and the Masonic Knights Templar in the USA, require from their applicants a specific profession of Christian faith.

Early History

3. a) There is a great amount of lore and legendry concerning the ultimate origins of Freemasonry, going back to the Crusades, the temple of King Solomon, ancient Egypt and beyond. Satirist Ambrose Bierce joked that Masonry "has been joined successively by the dead of past centuries in unbroken retrogression" (Bierce 1958, 45).

The earliest Freemasonic lodges appear to have formed circa 1600 in Scotland. During the seventeenth century, British Masonic lodges increasingly included "Accepted" Masons, i.e. gentlemen members who were not 'operatives' or actual working stonemasons. The initiatory methods and instructions of Scottish Masons were propagated to lodges in England and Ireland where they were made the basis for lodges of Accepted Masons. In 1717, four English lodges agreed to form the first Grand Lodge. This seminal event is referred to among Masonic historians as the "Revival," despite the fact that the Grand Lodge was an unprecedented institution. This Premier Grand Lodge at first claimed authority only for the limited area in and around London. The Grand Lodge model proved successful, however, and Grand Lodges were established for Ireland before 1725 and Scotland in 1736. During the eighteenth century Masonry also spread rapidly to the European continent and to the colonies of European powers.

Internal Divisions

b) In 1751, there was a "Great Schism" in the governance of English Masonry, when the "Ancient" Grand Lodge was established in resistance to and competition with the Premier Grand Lodge, which was by contrast called the "Moderns" (in spite of its chronological priority). The new jurisdiction at first included some lodges that had never accepted the authority of the Premier Grand Lodge, some that had been stricken from the rolls for non-compliance, and others that broke away in protest of its policies. The Ancients expressed particular dissatisfaction with the Moderns' position on religion. In an effort to avoid sectarian conflicts, the Premier Grand Lodge had ruled in its 1723 Constitution that members could not be atheists, but asserted that the religious expressions of Masonry should be limited to "that Religion in which all Men agree, leaving their particular Opinions to themselves" (Anderson 1947, 233). According to the Ancients, this stance was a capitulation to Deism, against which they sought to maintain a traditional Christian character in their rituals and usages. The competition between the two Grand Lodges seems to have stimulated rather than hampered their respective efforts to organize, and the two grew in parallel until their reconciliation as a single body in the United Grand Lodge of England in 1813. The Articles of Union reasserted the principle of religious tolerance, stipulating that members should enjoy freedom of "religion or mode of worship" as long as they would believe in "the glorious architect of heaven and earth, and practice the sacred duties of morality" (Newton 1946, 119).

The Grand Orient of France—the oldest of the French Masonic jurisdictions—revised its constitution in 1877 to eliminate "the existence of God and the immortality of the soul" from its stated principles, instead affirming "absolute liberty of conscience" (Newton 1946, 135). This change resulted in a formal rift between the French Grand Orient with its allied jurisdictions and the majority of other Masonic obediences, including virtually all English-speaking Grand Lodges. This divide solidified over time, and the Grand Orient of France also came to be characterized by enthusiasm for the political Left and anti-clericalism, rather than the conservative liberalism, political neutrality, and religious tolerance previously cultivated by Freemasonic institutions. These ideological differences continue to separate many Masonic obediences across national boundaries, and within various nations.

Male, Female, and 'Mixed' Lodges

4. a) The earliest Masonic lodges admitted men only, and in most cases, Freemasonry has maintained this attribute to the present. Criticisms of English Masonry in the early eighteenth century accused the lodges of misogyny, against which the Masons protested their innocence. There are also several stories from that period according to which a woman overheard or spied upon the workings of a Masonic lodge, and upon discovering her the Masons felt compelled to admit her to membership and swear her to secrecy. By the 1760s, "Lodges of Adoption" began to be established in France and other European countries for the parallel initiation of women. Starting in the 1850s American Freemasonry has endorsed and supported some "androgynous degrees" in which membership is open to male Masons and their female relations. These degrees include the Order of the Eastern Star and the Heroines of Jericho, among others. In the 1890s a French Grand Lodge for "mixed" Masonry was established, in which men and women would be admitted to the same degrees in shared lodges. In addition to the original French group, now known after the name of its first lodge as "Le Droit Humain," a mixed jurisdiction was developed as "Universal Co-Freemasonry" under the presidency of Theosophical leader Annie Besant (→ Theosophical/Anthroposophical Society). Another "co-Masonic" obedience called "Ancient Masonry" emerged by schism from Besant's group in 1908. None of the mainstream Grand Lodges have ever formally recognized mixed or co-Masonry.

Racial Divisions

b) In the racially divided society of the early USA, blacks formed their own system of lodges, tracing their provenance through African Lodge No. 459, warranted by a 1784 charter from the Grand Lodge of England with Prince Hall as lodge master. When other American lodges refused to recognize the black lodge, it reorganized itself into a sovereign jurisdiction as African Grand Lodge in 1791. Many arguments of a technical nature have been advanced to discredit the legitimacy of the African Grand Lodge and its organizational offspring, which eventually spread throughout the United States. It is evident, however, that racial prejudice and segregation created the original conditions for all of those arguments (→ Race/Racism). After the Civil Rights movement of the mid-twentieth century, an effort began among the historically 'white' jurisdictions to accord formal recognition to the black "Prince Hall" Grand Lodges. Today, most American Grand Lodges recognize the Prince Hall jurisdictions. The exceptions are all in the southeastern portion of the USA.

Anti-Masonic Propaganda

5. a) Freemasonry has always maintained that it is not 'a religion,' because it seeks to encourage and not to usurp the diverse religious creeds and affiliations of its members. However, the ceremonial, educational and charitable features of Masonry have caused it to be viewed as hostile competition by some churches at various points in history. Official opposition by the Roman Catholic Church dates back to the condemnation of Masonry by Pope Clement XII in 1738, and has been affirmed over the centuries in no fewer than sixteen different papal pronouncements. Membership in Freemasonry is grounds for excommunication from the Catholic Church. The Catholic Church has also sanctioned the Knights of Columbus as a fraternal organization intended to compete with Masonry by offering similar activities under Catholic auspices.

During a period of anti-Masonic fervor in New York in the late 1820's, multiple Baptist conferences abjured Masonry and resolved to spurn Masons from church and civil leadership as well as "Christian Fellowship." In the late twentieth century, fundamentalist evangelical Christians renewed vilification of Masonry (→ Fundamentalism). With the ascendancy of fundamentalists in the Southern Baptist Convention, a campaign against Freemasonry began there. Prominent televangelist Pat Robertson wrote a book called The New World Order in which he accused Masons of colluding with "European bankers" to subjugate the USA (→ Televangelism). In this respect, Robertson has entered a long tradition of anti-Masonic propaganda that hybridizes anti-Masonry with → anti-Semitism.

Masonic Influence on Modern Religions

b) Although Freemasonry does not advocate the institution of new religions, it has nevertheless been influential on several religious movements of modern origin. Masonic tropes and symbolism are traceable in the scriptures and rituals of The Church of Latter Day Saints (→ Mormons). Mormon founder Joseph Smith's older brother, who joined him in establishing his church, was at that time a Mason. Joseph Smith and many of the other members of the church community were initiated into Masonry during their time in Nauvoo, Illinois. Masonic ideas were also incorporated both directly, and through their presence in contributory magical and esoteric orders modeled on Freemasonry (→ Esotericism; Occultism), into the British witchcraft religion of Gerald Gardner, a premier institution of modern → Paganism/Neopaganism. African-American Masonic initiate Noble Drew Ali included Masonic symbols and teachings in his Moorish Science Temple, an eclectic and esoteric religious body that was a forerunner to the Nation of Islam.

Whether or not Freemasonry should be regarded as 'a → religion' in its own right, it has had religious consequences for Masons throughout its history, and it continues to inspire both reaction and imitation among religions today.

Literature

Anderson, James, The Constitutions of the Free-masons, in: Little Masonic Library Book I, Richmond 1946; Béresniak, Daniel, Symbols of Freemasonry, Paris 1997; Bierce, Ambrose, The Devil's Dictionary, New York 1958; Curl, James Stevens, The Art and Architecture of Freemasonry: An Introductory Study, New York 1993; Cass, Donn A., Negro Freemasonry and Segregation, Chicago 1957; DeHoyos, Art, The Cloud of Prejudice: A Study in Anti-Masonry, Kila 1993; Hamill, John/Gilbert, Robert (eds.), Freemasonry:

A Celebration of the Craft, North Dighton 1998; Jacob, Margaret C., The Radical Enlightenment: Pantheists, Freemasons and Republicans, London 1981; Knoop, Douglas/Jones, G.P., The Genesis of Freemasonry, Manchester 1947; Lennhoff, Eugen/Posner, Oskar, Internationales Freimaurer Lexikon, Graz 1932; Ligou, Daniel, Dictionnaire universel de la Franc-Maçonnerie: Hommes illustres pays, rites, symboles, Navarre Prisme 1974; Newton, Joseph Fort, Modern Masonry, in: Little Masonic Library Book II, Richmond 1946; Piatigorsky, Alexander, Who's Afraid of Freemasons?, London 1997; Ridley, Jasper, The Freemasons, New York 1999; Rogalla von Bieberstein, Johannes, Die These von der Verschwörung 1776–1945. Philosophen, Freimaurer, Juden, Liberale und Sozialisten als Verschwörer gegen die Sozialordnung, Flensburg 1992; Stevenson, David, The Origins of Freemasonry: Scotland's Century 1590–1710, Cambridge 1988; Waite, Arthur Edward, A New Encyclopedia of Freemasonry, New York, 1970; Wolfstieg, August, Bibliothek der Freimaurerischen Literatur, Hildesheim 1911.

→ Charitable Organizations, Esotericism, Initiation, Occultism, Paganism/Neopaganism, Prejudices/Stereotypes, Secrecy

Matthew D. Rogers

Freud, Sigmund

1. Sigmund Freud, founder of psychoanalysis, was born May 6, 1856 in Freiberg (Mähren), and died September 23, 1939 in London. He studied medicine from 1873 to 1881. In 1885 he was named Privatdozent (unsalaried university lecturer) for nervous diseases, and received a travel stipend that placed him in a position to study hysterical phenomena, especially their generation through hypnotic suggestion, for some five months, at the Salpetriere, Paris, with Jean-Martin Charcot (1825–1893). The impressions that Freud gained there became the premise of his systematic search for unconsciously functioning memories of unpleasant emotional experiences. Charcot's female and male patients reported things under hypnosis that they could not recall in their 'waking' state. In collaboration with Josef Breuer (Studien zur Hysterie; Ger., "Studies on Hysteria"; 1895), Freud developed, from hypnosis, the 'cathartic'—only later 'psychoanalytic'—'talk cure' or therapy. Here, through 'free association,' more and more heretofore repressed memory content became accessible to conscious manipulation, so that, in many cases, the hysterical symptoms disappeared. In the method of free association, the patient is instructed to "say everything that comes to his mind, even if it is unpleasant, even when it seems unimportant, irrelevant, or nonsensical" (VII, 385). The experiment showed Freud that free associations (in whose production Freud soon altogether abandoned hypnosis) are free of the patient's rational and moral criticism, or 'censorship mechanisms,' and can contain previously repressed material. Now, with the help of the analyst's suggestions for interpretation, one can sometimes reach the vital impressions that have produced the symptoms. His growing inclination to conceptualize "neuroses altogether generally as disturbances of the sexual function" (XIV, 50), was repugnant to his contemporaries, but his discovery of the infantile sexual life was even more so. In the construction of the → Oedipus complex, whose materialization he held as certain in all male development, he began with the son's sexual desires, in the narrower sense, for the mother: these aroused in the son a conflict between affectionate and jealous emotional impulses vis-à-vis the father. Freud's theoretical treatment of female sexuality, on the other hand, is one of the most energetically disputed of the various psychoanalytic directions. Its first critique has been as early as that of Karen Horney, who cast doubt on his theories in this question as all too nearly in agreement with the infantile sexual theories (see Horney 1954).

Attitude toward Religion

2. Theories on the strength of the unconscious that Freud had developed in his psychoanalytic practice, were extended by him in later writings to matters beyond theory of neurosis, to matters of cultural and religious scholarship: Totem und Tabu (Ger., "Totem and Taboo"; 1912–1913), Die Zukunft einer Illusion ("The Future of an Illusion"; 1927), Das Unbehagen in der Kultur ("The Disquieting Element in Culture"; 1930), and Der Mann Moses und die monotheistische Religion ("Moses and Monotheism"; 1939). The legitimacy of this step is disputed. Two tendencies can be observed in Freud's attitude toward religion. On the one hand, he regards it as a kind of preliminary step to a scientific stance on the world, or a scientific foundation of culture, and is overcome by the latter. In a sense influenced by Ludwig Feuerbach, he explains religious notions and actions as the projection of human desires and fears. With this conception, he of course contests the direct truth value of religious propositions. On the other hand, he thereby takes the seemingly irrational ideas and imagings of the religions just as earnestly as the seemingly irrational symptoms of the neurotics: as indications of an origin in need of explanation, and of attempts to control conflicts that would be insupportable without them. In his comparisons between religious institutions and certain neurotic repressions (first set forth in Zwangshandlungen und Religionsübungen, "Compulsive Behaviors and Religious Practices"; 1907) he described the difference between the two phenomena, inasmuch as he said, "A compulsion neurosis [is] a caricature of a religion, a paranoid delusion a caricature of a philosophical system." Neuroses are asocial imagings; they seek to accomplish by private means what has arisen in society through collective work. A religious ritual makes human society possible: while, with its help, conflicts may not be solved, they nevertheless receive a binding collective configuration. Neurosis, instead, signifies a flight from the real world, and this "aversion from reality is at the same time an abandonment of human society" (XI, 92-93). Religions both sketched out paths/routes for cultural accomplishments (gradually more highly regarded by Freud over the course of his life) through drive curtailment, and compensated them for their pretensions (XIV, 339). In Der Mann Moses, Freud recapitulates his proposition, already presented in Totem und Tabu, of a 'primitive patricide' by a 'primitive horde,' and in terms of this idea reconstructs the history of the Mosaic religion, which he considered with critical distance, without ever denying his membership in the Jewish majority. Along with it, at the end of his life, he became a victim of National Socialistic anti-Semitism, and was driven into exile in London in 1938. Freud acknowledged that Christianity had come closer to exposing a truth concerning the origins of the religions—at the price, to be sure, of what he had ascribed it in terms of progress in the 'spirituality' of monotheism. Freud himself believed that, in all of his works, he was indebted to an understanding of science whose orientation was to the natural sciences.

Literature

Sources: FREUD, Sigmund, Gesammelte Werke, vol. I-XVIII, Frankfurt/M. 1948ff., supplement Frankfurt/M. 1987; Studienausgabe, 10 vols. and supplement, ed. by Alexander MITSCHERLICH et al., rev. ed. Frankfurt/M. 1989; Freud-Bibliographie mit Werkkonkordanz, bearbeitet von Ingeborg MEYER-PALMEDO und Gerhard FICHTNER, Frankfurt/M. 1989; English translation: The Standard Edition of the Complete Psychological Works of Sigmund Freud, London 2001.

Secondary sources: GAY, Peter, A Godless Jew: Freud, Atheism, and the Making of Psychoanalysis, New Haven 1987; Idem, Freud: A Life for Our Time, London 1988; GRINSTEIN, A., The Index of Psychoanalytic Writings, 13 vols., New York 1956ff.; HORNEY, Karen, New Ways in Psychoanalysis, London ³1954 (¹1939); JONES, Ernest, The Life and Work of Sigmund Freud, Harmondsworth 1964.

→ Criticism of Religion, Judaism, Psyche, Psychoanalysis, Psychopathology

Gesine Palmer and Hartmut Zinser

Friendship

The Problem

1. Statement of the problem: Friendship is a type of social relationship bearing distinct impresses in the various societies, and not a religious phenomenon. In its historical manifestations, however, in the concepts to which it has its orientation, and in the patterns of behavior in which it is realized, friendship exhibits multiple connections with religion and religious history. The group relationships that it shapes follow the pattern of religious societies (founder, fusion among membership, council). Its orientation is to ideals that are open to a religious triumph when it comes to selflessness and readiness for sacrifice. It is realized in attitudes and actions that can have a ritual or sacred character (friendship celebrations, hero cults), it is articulated in religious language ('holy,' 'sacred,' 'everlasting' friendship)—just as, contrariwise, theology makes use of the language of friendship—and it is situated in imaginary or real religious spaces (garden of paradise, temple, monastery). In all of these discrete aspects, friendship can be the object of religious scholarship. If and when the noted characteristics meet, one may speak of a cult of friendship (Enlightenment, Classicism, and Romanticism). Religious configurations of friendship are preponderantly recognizable in groups, more than in the relations of friendship in pairs.

Antiquity

2. Historical survey: The store of tradition from which modern, European discourse and practice of friendship takes its origin is the tradition of Hellenistic-Roman antiquity, which attests to friendship most eminently as a relation among men. Its norms (equality, reciprocity, loyalty) are ordered not so much to the feelings prevailing in private relations, as to the framework of activity of the polis, or the political public forum. Its premise is that social institution, solidly established since ancient times, that is identifiable as 'ritualized friendship.' The first (political) memorial of this type of friendship consists in the twin statues of tyrannicides Harmodios and Aristogeiton, erected in the agora of Athens in 477–476 BCE.[1] Pairs of heroic friends—Achilles and Patroclus, Orestes and Pylades—are generously transmitted adown the centuries in literature and iconography. The ancient philosophy of friendship (especially Aristotle's Nicomachean Ethics, Epicurus, Cicero, Seneca) forms the point of departure of all later reflection on friendship. Following Socrates's model, the relationship between teacher and pupil in the schools of Greek philosophy is designated friendship (philía). Epicurus, especially, promoted friendship to the philosophical lifestyle of his school, and founded in his garden a cult of friendship, with regular friendship festivals that, after Epicurus's death, were maintained as memorial feasts. Now the model is available that arises once more in the friendship cults of the eighteenth century, with their "philhellenistic" orientation. Antiquity developed no religion of friendship, however.

Christian Antiquity and Middle Ages

Theologians of early Christianity were averse from individual friendship as a worldly 'particular interest,' invoking the New Testament (James 4:4). Especially in the monastic orders, it was seen as a threat (Benedict of Nursia, Cassian). Where members of distinct faith groups designated themselves as friends, this was done primarily in the service of a demarcation from heterodoxy (Gr., 'other-teaching,' 'believing otherwise'). Friendship, Augustine emphasizes, is consensus in the faith. Between heathen and Christian, then, there can be no friendship. Theologically, friendship was bound up with the biblical notion of the 'friendship of God,' hierarchically conceived and applied only to the elect, prophets, or ecclesiastical dignitaries. This position was rethought by scholastic theology, and, especially by English Cistercian Abbot Aelred of Rievaulx (1109?–1966), integrated into a new model of spirituality and life practice as 'friendship of God' (De Spiritali Amicitia; Lat., "Spiritual Friendship")—a model that came to be operative in various religious groups. In a framework of small mystical groups, women too had access to, and importance for, relations of friendship.

Modern Age: Reformation and Pietism

The tension between the adoption of the idea of friendship for the establishment of group cohesion and identity, and the rejection of the individual dynamics of private, self-determined, and thereby tendentious antiauthoritarian relations of friendship, has been a constant of the history of Christianity into early modern times, and has survived the Reformation. Thus, it became a particular aspect of the German Pietism of the seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries. The antinomy between radical interiority and social isolation on the one hand, and on the other, the need for affective bonds, provoked a reaction in foundations of 'new communities' as distinct as the Herrnhut Brotherhood of Zinzendorf (1722, with its own festival of the doctrine of friendship) or the Frankish foundations. Analogously, the American Quakers designate themselves a Society of Friends.

Enlightenment, Classicism, and Romanticism

A pathos of interiority, and an affective intensity, are unquestionable notes of Pietistic socialization, in the context of eighteenth-century middle-class individualization and release from aristocratic domination. This period, then, is the proper 'age of friendship,' along with voluntarily organized, special social groups (lodges, orders, unions, brotherhoods, congresses, secret societies, literary societies, unions, and so on). They all based their cohesion on friendship, without being inclined to see the latter in Christian religious terms. With the inclusion and collaboration of women,[2] however, a sacred cultivation of friendship did develop: on the one side, friendship temples were erected in (preponderantly aristocratic) landscape gardens; and gardens generally, along with open nature, became 'sacred groves' of friendship. As a consequence of Sturm und Drang and enthusiasm for Klopstock's friendship literature, on the other hand, enthusiastic intellectual friendship leagues (the Göttingen Grove League, 1772, Hölderlin's seminary friendships) were formed. Here a new 'community utopia' developed, nourished in part by enthusiasm for the French Revolution ('Friends of Liberty and Equality'). The distinguishing mark of all of these formations of friendship is that, despite (or because of?) its dissolution from Christianity and Church, friendship became charged with religious pathos, formulated in religious language, and realized in religious forms. Tied to a more or less private reference, this piety, which might well be spoken of as 'friendship cult,' indeed friendship religion, is still open to inference on the part of religious studies.[3] The friendship circles of the Romantics are legatees of the first-century emphasis on friendship. In his Discourses on Religion (1799), Friedrich Schleiermacher makes one more attempt to reclaim friendship theologically. But on the whole, friendship in the nineteenth century, especially in the second half thereof, seems to lose its power of independent organization. Nietzsche's "cloister of free spirits"[4] never materialized. In the twentieth century, friendship is ideologized as a group relationship among men especially (George Circle, youth movement, National Socialism).

1. Cf., for reception: Fehr, Burkhard, Die Tyrannentöter, oder: Kann man der Demokratie ein Denkmal setzen?, Frankfurt/M. 1984.
2. "Freundschaft im Gespräch," in: Querelles 3, 1998.
3. Cancik, Hubert, in: Elsas, Christoph/Kippenberg, Hans G. (eds.), Loyalitätskonflikte in der Religionsgeschichte: Festschrift C. Colpe, Würzburg 1991, 12-34.
4. Treiber, Hubert, in: Nietzsche-Studien 22 (1993), 165-221.

Literature

Bell, Sandra M./Coleman, Simon (eds.), The Anthropology of Friendship, Oxford 1999; Fehr, Beverley, Friendship Processes, Thousand Oaks 1996; Fitzgerald, John T. (ed.), Greco-Roman Perspectives on Friendship, Atlanta 1997; Gehrke, Hans-Joachim/von Reibnitz, Barbara: "Freundschaft," in: Neuer Pauly 4 (1998), 669-674; Haseldine, Julian (ed.), Friendship in Medieval Europe, Stroud 1999; Konstan, David, Friendship in the Classical World, Cambridge 1997; Lankheit, Klaus, Das Freundschaftsbild der Romantik, Heidelberg 1952; Porter, Roy/Tomaselli, Sylvana (eds.), The Dialectics of Friendship, London 1989; Rouner, Leroy S. (ed.), The Changing Face of Friendship, Notre Dame 1994; Tenbruck, Friedrich, "Freundschaft," in: Kölner Zeitschrift für Soziologie und Sozialpsychologie 16 (1964), 431-456.

→ Emotions/Feelings, Group, Love

Barbara von Reibnitz

Fundamentalism

State of the Question

1. The term and concept of fundamentalism are employed to designate various groups from the most widely varied areas. As a self-description, it is expressed with a certain pride, while as a designation for others it is usually pejorative. Originating in the religious context, it has meanwhile been taken over into the area of the political. It does not enunciate what fundamentalism ultimately is, as there is no such thing as fundamentalism plain and simple: it is a double-faced phenomenon. What we do have are phenomena or movements that seem at first to exhibit a superficial kinship, but that, upon observation of their socioeconomic context, one sees as clearly to be distinguished, with regard both to their motivation and representation, and to their aims and goals. The definition suggested by sociologist Martin Riesebrodt is "mobilized and radicalized traditionalism,"[1] while that of Ahmet Cigdem is "de-privatization of religion,"[2] thus denoting the public and political character of its movements. Fundamentalist movements can always be seen as reaction to rapid social change; and they are a universal phenomenon, to be met in all religions of salvation and redemption. As a rule, fundamentalism is a religious justification that replaces, or is intended to replace, a nonfunctioning, or no longer functioning, socioeconomic or political justification (cf. → Iran since 1979 and Algeria since 1988). All fundamentalisms evince an ambivalent relation to the modern age, which they frequently accept and adopt in terms of its technological attainments, but often reject when it comes to alterations of a cultural milieu and its prevailing values. A further trait of religious fundamentalist movements is their radical orientation to received patriarchal conceptions of order, while women nevertheless make up an essential part of their representation. Various authors point to their similarity and proximity to movements of the extreme right (e.g., Riesebrodt).

Origin of the Concept

2. a) The term 'fundamentalism' was coined at the beginning of the twentieth century by North American Baptists under Curtis Lee Laws. Indeed, the beginning of the movement can be identified in the last third of the nineteenth century in the United States. Two groups, in the main, can be considered as the 'sources' of Christian fundamentalism: the representatives of the 'Princeton theology,' and the 'dispensationalists.' The former, in 1881, formulated the "Princeton doctrine," whose key proposition is that the texts—at least the original texts—of the Bible have been inspired by God verbatim, and are therefore inerrant. The dispensationalists were a pre-millenarian movement (→ Millenarianism/Chiliasm), of English provenance, which became known through the Scofield Reference Bible. Along with Fundamentals, this book can be regarded as the publication that made fundamentalism known. After recognizing the Princeton Doctrine, the highest authoritative instance of the Presbyterian Church, the General Assembly, formulated the "five fundamentals," which can be thought of as constituting the theological basis of fundamentalism. They are: (1) the inerrancy of the Bible as the verbally inspired revelation of God; (2) Christ's physical Resurrection; (3) his Virgin Birth; (4) his vicarious expiatory sacrifice; (5) his anticipated physical return to earth.

From 1910 to 1915, wealthy entrepreneurs financed the publication of a series of writings called The Fundamentals: A Testimony of the Truth. It appeared in an edition of three million copies, and was distributed, for free, especially at schools and universities, as these were seen as the chief propagators of modernism. In the ninety contributions to the Fundamentals, sixty-four American and English authors defended the five fundamental propositions against 'modernism,' referring particularly to the exegesis of the Bible in terms of historical criticism and the theories of Charles Darwin. Darwin's theories, of course, were in contradiction to the biblical doctrine of creation, and thereby introduced a basic alteration of worldview (→ Theory of Evolution). After the First World War, the World's Christian Fundamental Association was founded in Philadelphia (1919). But there was still no clearly recognizable group that designated itself fundamentalist. Such a group materialized only in 1920. Curtis Lee Laws, publisher of the Baptist newspaper Watchman Examiner, issued a call to a General Conference on Fundamentals. This call by Laws coined the concept "fundamentalistic" as a self-designation of a group.

Anti-Evolutionism: the 'Monkey Trial'

b) The fundamentalists became known especially from their 'Anti-Evolution Crusade.' This 'crusade' was directed against the teaching of the Darwinian theory of evolution in schools and universities; the descent of the human being from the ape was felt as an enormous provocation, if not indeed as blasphemy. The climax was reached in the famous 'monkey trial' of biology instructor John Scopes. Here, a connecting link appeared with movements of the extreme right, such as the → Ku-Klux Klan and the Aryan Nation: By large segments of the fundamentalist movement, God was thought of as 'white,' just as Jesus was, of course. For fundamentalists, the concept of a descent of the human being from the ape was seen as calling into question the superiority of the white. This notion was a crucial assault, as it would then follow that blacks were fully persons (→ Human Rights; Race/Racism; Apartheid).

Public Activity: Televangelism

c) Arisen in the urban centers of the American Atlantic coast, the fundamentalist movement vanished from public gaze. But it did not abandon its concerns, of which the chief was its presence in the educational system. It also recognized quite early the possibilities offered by the mass media for the formation of opinion. In 1944, evangelical and fundamentalist groups founded an association of National Religious Broadcasters. Besides the radio stations, from the 1950s on it was especially television preachers like Jerry Falwell and Billy Graham who daily brought the evangelical and fundamentalist message to American living rooms. → Televangelism and the electronic church were born, and still ply their media offensive of conservative religion. Right from the 1970s, the fundamentalist and evangelical camp had religious television firmly in hand; it became the agent of the movement, and established its leaders.

Contemporary Fundamentalism in the United States

3. a) From the 1970s onward, the fundamentalist movement experienced a definite upswing. Some of the values that until then had been regarded as society's mainstay were radically called into question. At the end of that decade, the fundamentalists bonded with the political ultra-right. They formed the New Religious Right, or indeed the New Christian Right. Chief initiators were televangelist Jerry Falwell from the side of the fundamentalists, and Richard Viguerie and Paul Weyrich from the side of the right. In the 1980s, Falwell launched the New Christian Right's most effective instrument, The Moral Majority. In 1988, televangelist Pat Robertson sought the Republican presidential nomination, and is the founder of the currently most effective association of the religious right, the Christian Coalition, which in 1998, in the name of religious freedom, exerted the strongest political pressure on incumbent President Bill Clinton. The Moral Majority understands itself as being the "silenced majority" (B. Bretthauer). In the 2004 presidential election, this movement—now known as Born Again Christians—played a decisive role in the re-election of president George W. Bush, himself an outspoken "Born Again Christian." Polls reveal that in 2004 thirty percent of the US voters regard themselves as belonging to this movement. What Max → Weber noted as early as 1910 turns out to be true, that in the United States the 'sect' type of religion is indeed the religion of the masses.

While American fundamentalism's bogeys were from the beginning communism and secular humanism, the protests and actions of fundamentalists in the course of the decades were directed principally against pornography, equal rights for women, abortion rights, sex education at schools, and the emancipation of homosexuals, and in favor of the reintroduction of school prayer. In the 1990s, protests of the televangelists have broadened: against the Equal Rights Amendment and against high divorce rates, against premarital as well as extramarital sexual intercourse. They have taken strong sides against the privatization of morality. The public debate of moral questions from the side of the fundamentalists and the religious right in the United States reached a climax in 1998, with the Clinton-Lewinsky affair, in which the medium of the Internet, as well, was applied in order to widen the campaign of political defamation against the incumbent American president.

b) The Moral Majority, founded in 1979, is the largest group in the New Christian Right. Founding fathers were preachers of various Baptist denominations. Jerry Falwell, who until 1987 was Chief Executive Officer of the Moral Majority, Inc., is preeminent among them. By 1981 the Moral Majority was represented in all fifty states of the United States. The group has some 110,000 preachers in the United States, and, by its own count, some 65 million members. For the financing of its gigantic media campaign, it requires an annual income of some $110 million, some of which is made up of contributions from its radio audience: nearly 400 stations broadcast Jerry Falwell's weekly "Old Time Gospel Hour," and the silent majority's daily commentaries on political occurrences (scarcely in silence then).

The Moral Majority sees its tasks and goals as moral education and people's active involvement in daily political events. In television appearances and through mailing lists people are called upon to further the goals of the group by turning to political officials personally, and thereby to advance the 'cleansing process' of American society. The moral majority aims chiefly at the public school system. One of its co-founders, Greg Dixon, is of the opinion that the present public school system has been atheistic and socialistic since its conception. Consequently, the group founds its own religious schools, in order to work against secular humanism there. The Moral Majority has until now founded approximately 300 Christian universities and 25,000 schools, and seeks to be present to all bodies and groups, on the local as well as the federal level. Its self-concept is not that of an opposition, but of an organ of control. The membership of the Moral Majority is heterogeneous, in other words, there is no societal group that is not represented (including former gays and lesbians who have 'converted' to heterosexuality). This heterogeneity includes the confessions; the Moral Majority comprises Protestants as well as Catholics and Jews. It makes no claim to be universalistic and expressly stresses that it is not its aim to evangelize the world. It is incumbent on all members and parts of the Moral Majority that they be convinced that America has a special role to play in the world (→ Civil Religion). Pressure for an incorporation of the individual into global salvation history is absent, and a rigorous nationalism takes up the slack.

Fundamentalism in Islam: Forms

4. Fundamentalism in Islam is a phenomenon of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. It denotes various political positions supported by religious ideology. Since the concept of 'fundamentalism' originates in the Christian milieu, it may be more appropriate to use the term 'Islamism' in the Islamic area in order to preserve the boundary between Christian and Islamic fundamentalism. Although the term 'fundamentalism' is new to Muslims, the concept of 'fundaments' (Arab., usul) is as old as Islam itself. Logically, therefore, the Arabic term for fundamentalism is usuliyya.

Five chief phenomenal forms of fundamentalism are distinguished in Islam:

(1) Conservative al-Azhar fundamentalism is taught principally in Al-Azhar University in Cairo (Egypt), the normative theological institution for higher education for Sunnite Islam, and prioritizes the ethical determination of the Qur'an. In this milieu, a cautious and clear distinction between scholarly learning and revelation is avoided.

(2) Strict scripturalism: here, modern science and scholarship are reckoned as emerging from Islamic roots. The modern manner of reading the Qur'an is interpreted as uncompromising conformity between 'religion' (din) and 'science' or scholarship (ilm). Consequently, no distinction whatever is made between science and belief. The thinking of medieval Islamic political theologian Ibn Taimiya (1263–1328 CE) is identified with the thought of his declared enemies, the Greek-influenced rational philosophers of Islam; the influence on Europe of the Arabic Islamic science and scholarship adopted through Spain and Italy is interpreted as the intellectual influence of the Qur'an. Here, consequently, a connection between political theology and mysticism is attested.

(3) Puristic fundamentalism: Arab-German sociologist Bassam Tibi holds this to be the most intolerant form. It is classified as a 'fanaticism of doctrines of purity.' The Greek-influenced philosophy and natural science of medieval high Islam is pitilessly attacked and rejected, or classified as → heresy, and an inquisitorial Islamization conducted that excludes a good part of its writings as 'un-Islamic.' Islam is reduced to its orthodox understanding of religion and law in a compressed sense: Islam is normative for science; to divide science from Islam is criminal. The core notion here is that no distinction is found between natural sciences and humanities; there are only Islamic sciences; everything else is Western decadence and hostile to Islam. This direction represents the connection between political theology, mysticism, and purist fanaticism. Puristic Islam's headquarters—run by Saudi Arabia—the International Institute of Islamic Thought, is maintained in Washington, therefore in the 'decadent West.' The diametrical opposite—an international, rhetorically aggressive headquarters of Christian fundamentalism in a country of Islamic culture—is scarcely conceivable.

(4) Revolutionary fundamentalism constitutes a minority group. Its identifying characteristic, in keeping with the tradition of the Islamic rationalism of Greek influence, is its partial agreement with enlightened thought, and its qualified acknowledgment of the validity of autonomy and the freedom of human understanding. It is based on a selective view of the Islamic fundament, decidedly rejects scripturalism, and calls for a primary reliance on reason. In addition, this group calls for a serious, genuine renewal of Islamic dogmas, and an earnest dialogue between secularists and fundamentalists. The following assertions on the part of its most prominent representative, Hassan Hanafi, occasions Tibi's justifiable doubts concerning Hanafi's self-classification as 'fundamentalist': "Secular ideologies can influence only a minority of intellectuals, but they can never reach the ears of the masses. [. . .] Only Islam is capable of mobilizing the masses and having them make sacrifices for its aims."[3]

(5) Militant fundamentalism: Its followers regard themselves as the 'only true Muslims,' reproach the majority of Muslims with 'ignorance' (jahilya), accuse them of 'unbelief' (takfir), and thus legitimize a 'holy war' (jihad) against this majority. They stress the unity of the 'community of Muslims' (umma), with a simultaneous denial of the multiplicity actually at hand, and the prevailing normative distinctions. In association with the teachings of Egyptian fellow Muslim Hasan al-Banna, they propagate 'Islamic soldiery,' according to the idea of the jihad, in the early, militarily aggressive meaning of this term. Believers are also soldiers, their supreme task is the realization of Islamic goals, be it through sacred texts and the 'argument of the word' (dalil al-qaul), or by bombs and dynamite. While the temperate wing of this direction, therefore, strives more for a reinterpretation of the jihad, from the 'small' to the 'great jihad'—the pacific variant, in the meaning of 'spiritual, intellectual struggle'—the militant wing means to combine political theology, mysticism, and militarism (terror).

5. Islamic fundamentalist or 'Islamist' ideologies are distinguished by a selective adoption of modern accomplishments, largely limited to technology and science. Their conspicuous notes are: (a) a rejection of the primacy of human reason—the radical subordination of reason to revelation; (b) a rejection of the emancipatory principles of the modern age; (c) a dismissal of the idea of popular sovereignty, with its secular consequences; (d) a rejection of individuation or individuality, and the principle of subjectivity it entails; (e) a rejection of the universality of → human rights.

The concept of a revival of the 'world of Islam' is accompanied by an outlawing of 'Westernization' as 'new ignorance' (neo-jahilia). Inasmuch as Muslims regard themselves as already in possession of the absolute truth, a truth scarcely in need of review, they hold a critical reflection on their societies (in opposition to Western societies) to be unnecessary. Everything inducing uneasiness in an Islamist view counts as 'un-Islamic' and 'Westernized.' This explains the refusal, typical of the fundamentalists, of the whole of Islam's rational philosophy and religious criticism, as well as attacks on and murders of intellectuals and artists in the twentieth century. Islamists propagate a simple, closed worldview; complexity, criticism, and contradiction are repugnant to them. Islamists share this outlook with Christian fundamentalists and with fascist thinkers. The most striking product of this position is its exclusion of the emancipation of woman as guaranteed by the United Nations Declaration on Human Rights.

Islamist Groups in Germany

6. The rise of Islamist groups in Germany can be observed clearly since the early 1980s. Therefore, it can be related to the Islamic Revolution of Ayatollah Khomeini 1979 in Iran. Centers of Islamist organizations in Germany are Munich with the Islamic Centre, Soest with the Islamic Council for Germany/Islamic Archive, Hamburg with the great Shi'i and other mosques as well as Cologne and Berlin; most of the Islamic organizations are represented in the city of Cologne.

The majority of these groups show a combination of religion and politics. Due to Article 4 of the Germany Constitutional Law, they enjoy a scope of action of religious freedom that does not exist in their home-countries, for example laic Turkey. On the other hand, this civil rights freedom is directly used by Islamist groups to recruit young Muslims of the second generation of migrants who find themselves in a cultural vacuum, due to false politics of integration, and due to their longing for identity beyond plain German citizenship.

Fundamentalist Movements in Other Religions

7. Their are fundamentalist movements and parties in other religions too, for example the movement of the radical Jewish settlers in the border-zone between the West Bank and the State of Israel, or the radical Hindu movement, which crystallizes in the political party of the Vishva Hindu Parishad (founded in 1964). Both movements are combining radical ideas of the combination of 'blood/descent' and 'earth/territory' in a religious ideological context. As many of the settlers in the West Bank are explicitly racist anti-Palestinians, the Vishva Hindu Parishad is explicitly racist anti-Christian and anti-Muslim. The major concern of the Vishva Hindu Parishad is to strengthen the Hindu population against the threat of Christian or Muslim proselytism and to avoid conversion with the help of Hindu nationalists and modern gurus by using strategic mimesis. In both cases, elements of race and religion are combined to form a sort of religious theology (Hindutva theology) to 'resist the aggressors' from the outside.

1. Riesebrodt 1990, 19.
2. Bielefeldt/Heitmeyer 1998, 91-108.
3. Tibi 1993, 120.

Literature

Abbas, Hassan, Pakistan's Drift into Extremism: Allah, the Army, and America's War on Terror, Armonk 2005; Appleby, Scott R., Religious Fundamentalism and Global Conflict, New York 1994; Idem (ed.), Spokesmen for the Despised: Fundamentalist Leaders of the Middle East, Chicago/London 1997; Atkins, Stephen E., Encyclopedia of Modern Worldwide Extremists and Extremist Groups, Westport 2004; Bielefeldt, Heiner/Heitmeyer, Wilhelm, Politisierte Religion, Frankfurt/M. 1998; Carpenter, Joel A. (ed.), The Early Billy Graham, Sermon and Revival Accounts, New York 1988; Dalmia, Vasudha et al. (eds.), Charisma and Canon: Essays on the Religious History of the Indian Subcontinent, New Delhi 2001; Fundamentalist Versus Modernist: The Debates Between John Roach Straton and Charles Francis Potter, New York 1988; Gellner, Ernest (ed.), Islamic Dilemmas: Reformers, Nationalists and Industrialization, London 1985; Georgianna, Sharon Linzey, The Moral Majority and Fundamentalism: Plausibility and Dissonance, Lewiston 1989; Gerecht, Reuel Marc, The Islamic Paradox: Shiite Clerics, Sunni Fundamentalists, and the End of the Clash of Civilizations, Washington 2004; Jaffrelot, Christophe, "La Vishva Hindu Parishad: Structures et stratégies," in: Purushartha 17 (1995); Mahmood, Saba, Politics of Piety: The Islamic Revival and the Feminist Subject, Princeton 2005; Katz, David S., God's Last Words: Reading the English Bible from the Reformation to Fundamentalism, New Haven 2004; Marshall, Paul A. (ed.), Radical Islam's Rules: The Worldwide Spread of Extreme Shari'a Law, Lanham 2005; Marty, Martin E., Fundamentalisms Compared, Unterdale 1989; Marty, Martin E./Appleby, R. Scott (eds.), Fundamentalisms Observed, Chicago 1991; Milton-Edwards, Beverley, Islamic Fundamentalism Since 1945, London 2005; Noll, Mark A. (ed.), The Princeton Defense of Plenary Verbal Inspiration, New York 1988; Rahman, Fazlur (ed.), Revival and Reform in Islam: A Study of Islamic Fundamentalism, Oxford 2000; Riesebrodt, Martin, Fundamentalismus als patriarchalische Protestbewegung. Amerikanische Protestanten (1910–1928) und iranische Schiiten (1961–1979) im Vergleich, Tübingen 1990; Ruthven, Malise, Fundamentalism: The Search for Meaning, Oxford 2004; Saha, Santosh C. (ed.), Islamic, Hindu, and Christian Fundamentalism Compared—Public Policy in Global Perspective, Lewiston 2003; Idem (ed.), Religious Fundamentalism in the Contemporary World: Critical Social and Political Issues, Lanham 2004; Tibi, Bassam, Islamischer Fundamentalismus, moderne Wissenschaft und Technologie, Frankfurt/M. [2]1993; Weinberg, Leonard/Pedahzur, Ami (eds.), Religious Fundamentalism and Political Extremism, London 2004.

→ Confession, Conflict/Violence, Human Rights, Jihad, Group, Media, Millenarianism/Chiliasm, Sexuality, Televangelism, Terrorism, War/Armed Forces

Assia Maria Harwazinski

Funeral / Burial

1. a) The purpose of a funeral is not only the ritual removal of the corpse, but also the ritual defeat or management of the experience of death and separation. The funeral ritual fulfills several functions in these categories. With reference to the dead, it excludes them, and sets them in their new context (the smoke of the funeral pyre indicates the route of the soul to the beyond; the grave marks the departed one's new residence and abode). But it can also render the memory of the dead a public affair, or account for the persisting community with the living. (E.g., endocannibalism: by eating the ashes of the corpse, a village community can conserve the power of the dead.) For those who remain behind, it performs the function of managing grief, and of filling the gaps that have appeared (reintegration). As a rule, a neglected funeral is reckoned a misfortune. On the one hand, then, a funeral service is held even when a corpse cannot be found. On the other, intentional denial of a funeral on the part of criminals or enemies, or subsequent obliteration of the name of the defunct (damnatio memoriae), is seen as a special punishment or injury inflicted upon that person.

The two most widespread forms of interment are burial underground and funeral by fire. A certain correlation can be observed with conceptualizations of the next world, since burial in the earth is more easily associated with

Funeral ceremony in Hong Kong. According to traditional Chinese notions, the afterlife corresponds to the present one. Here, then, as in ancient Egypt, the dead are provided with all of the objects of daily life: houses with servants, clothing, spiritual money, vehicles for travel (automobiles, airplanes), and so on. Fashioned of bamboo wood and papier-mâché, these objects are burned in order to convey them to the departed. (B. Heusel) a subterranean world, while burning in a funeral pyre is readily appraised as a symbol that the dead enter heaven or the sky. Less frequently, burial in water (e.g., immersion in the sea) is practiced, or the corpse is exposed to decay (and thereby, perhaps, supplied with a transitus to ethereal spheres), or abandoned to animals for their sustenance; or, on occasion, the dead are consumed in ritual → cannibalism. Secondary interment means that, after the flesh has decomposed, the bones are exhumed and buried elsewhere (e.g., in charnel houses, in the Middle Ages), or, in the practice of exposure of the corpses, are gathered up after the flesh has been stripped from them. As a rule, the ashes of a cremation are also gathered, and placed in an urn or small casket (e.g., at a crematorium) or scattered.

Funeral Ritual in Zoroastrianism

b) The forms a funeral may take in a religion can be the subject of great variety. Apropos of Zoroastrianism, then: the Avesta as normative sacred scripture of Zoroastrianism shows various coexisting funeral forms. A dakhma is, for one thing, is a kind of mausoleum, intended as a protection from the impurity attaching to death (for instance, the tomb of Cyrus, or the 'tower tombs' of Pasargad and Naqsh-e Rostam). At the same time, the word dakhma denotes the location at which, for at least a year, the dead are exposed to sun and rain, while their flesh is consumed by the birds of the air; the bones are then gathered and set in a the cleft of a rock, or in a coffer. Inscriptions clarify and emphasize the character of a memorial. The incursion of Islam into Iran cuts a decisive benchmark in religious history, when, from the ninth century onward, not only was exposure the only regularly permitted Zoroastrian form of burial, but the place of that exposure was architecturally altered to the form of the dakhma—the 'tower of silence.' The architectural figure of a round, tall construction, open at the top, makes possible the exposure of the corpse in the open, but prevents its profanation by the Muslim majority of Iran. Zoroastrians emigrating to India in the tenth century, known from that time as Parsees, took this form of funeral to their new country. External causes thus changed a religious option to the sole permitted possibility. Another turning point came in Iranian Zoroastrianism, when, in the 1920s, an earthen burial once more became the only kind allowed. This reform was an indirect result of the influence of European hygienic notions, propagated by some Parsees in Bombay, but also by traditional Zoroastrian groups in Iran. Now the 'towers of silence' in Iran were replaced one by one with cemeteries, until the last Iranian dakhma was abandoned at the beginning of the 1970s. But burial in a cement sarcophagus, in order not to violate the prohibition against the contamination of the earth by a corpse, brought an additional change with it, in that the grave—on the Christian and Islamic model alike—was marked with a gravestone, showing the vital dates of the deceased. The grave now facilitated a concrete recollection of the dead, which was not the case with exposure of corpses in collective dakhma. Traditional Parsees have not made this change in the funeral ritual, even though, since the beginning of the twentieth century, they have been urged to give up exposure of corpses on aesthetic and hygienic grounds; individual 'reform Parsees,' meanwhile, make use of crematoria. Despite manifold change, a continuum abides: although external circumstances condition a change in the form of ritual behavior with the dead, still the concern abides to use a funeral procedure, for the dead, and for the protection of those surviving from dangers that can issue from the dead.

Costs of the Funeral

c) For a funeral to fulfill its functions with regard to living and dead, it must be conducted in an appropriate way. To this purpose, unions or brotherhoods are founded to provide the financial contributions to ensure that, after the death, the funeral be conducted correctly. Such institutions are attested not only in antiquity, but in modern times as well, when burial associations or funeral societies also meet this need.

Specialists

Death is ambivalent; thus, the duty arises of entrusting the funeral either to the closest members of the family (as an obligation of 'piety' vis-à-vis the departed), or to ritual ('entombment') specialists, who are expected to use their ritual 'know how' for the neutralization of the hazards of death. Funeral specialists therefore often have a special place in their society, and are characteristically avoided (because of their involvement with the sphere of death), but at the same time tendered the tribute of respect, in view of their necessity.

Classifications and Feelings

2. The need for an 'orderly' funeral is not neglected outside the religious context: secular institutions are more and more involved, and this trend can also lead to conflicts of interest. Religious minorities must therefore at times modify their funeral rites in terms of alien religious premises, or are no longer permitted to practice certain forms of their management of the separation between living and dead. The loosening of family connections can also lead to alterations: for example, in today's Japan, persons sometimes solemnly conduct their own funeral ritual during their lifetime.

Literature

Fischer, Norbert, Vom Gottesacker zum Krematorium, Vienna 1996; Genet, Jean, Funeral Rites, London 1990; Gittings, Clare, Death, Burial and the Individual in Early Modern England, London 1984; Grenet, Frantz, Les pratiques funéraires dans l'Asie centrale sédentaire, Paris 1984; Grinsell, Leslie V., Barrow, Pyramid and Tomb: Ancient Burial Customs in Egypt, the Mediterranean and the British Isles, London 1975; Hutter, Manfred, "Leichenaussetzung und Erdbestattung," in: Kippenberg, Hans G./Luchesi, Brigitte (eds.), Lokale Religionsgeschichte, Marburg 1995, 73-83; Schneider, Mareleyn, History of a Jewish Burial Society: An Examination of Secularization, Lewiston 1991; Suzuki, Hikaru, "Japanese Death Rituals in Transit. From Household Ancestors to Beloved Antecedents," in: Journal of Contemporary Religion 13 (1998), 171-188; van Gennep, Arnold, The Rites of Passage, Chicago 1961 (French 1909).

→ Cemetery, Death and Dying, Grave/Tomb, Ritual

Manfred Hutter

Gandhi, Mahatma

Biographical Data

1. Mohandas Karamchand Gandhi, surnamed Mahatma (Sanskrit, 'of the great atman' or principle of life and consciousness in everyone, carrying or representing Brahman), is a key politico-religious personality of India's struggle for independence in the twentieth century. The power of the nonviolent resistance (satyagraha) of this religious restorer, social reformer, champion of civil rights, and politician shed its light far beyond India.

Gandhi was born in 1869, on the peninsula of Kathiavar/Gujarat, the son of a prime minister of Indian princes (raja). The family belonged to the merchant and landowner → caste of Bania, which stands in the religious tradition of the *vaishnava*s (devotees of the God Vishnu). Married at the age of thirteen, Gandhi went to England (1888) for four years to study law. There, after a free, rootless student life, he came in contact with the thinking of the → Theosophical Society, concerned himself with the ancient Indian didactic poem Bhagavadgita, and returned to Hinduism. This personal conversion, along with his interest in the Sermon on the Mount, and in other, non-Christian religions, laid the bases for his reforming religious concepts and political goals. In 1893, Gandhi was sent from his law chancellery to South Africa, where he lived for twenty-one years, and became engaged in politics and charity. In the battle for the political rights of the Indian minority there, he developed the method of nonviolent resistance, 'holding fast to the truth' (satyagraha). Refusal to cooperate with administrative authorities ('non-cooperation'), and 'civil disobedience' to unjust laws, were the means of his political battle. He and his adherents consciously risked prison sentences. In 1910, Gandhi founded the Tolstoy Farm, on which he and his family lived with his followers according to a rigorous principle of self-sufficiency. After the outbreak of the First World War, he returned in 1915 to India, then an already well-known and respected personality. In Ahmadabad, he founded the Satyagraha → Ashram, a place of religious instruction and social community, to create a model instance for the future ordering of Indian society. Using the means of nonviolent struggle, between 1920 and 1934 Gandhi led the Indian National Congress as its elected President. He organized the 'Hand-Spinning Movement' against the British textile monopoly, and with his 'Salt Marsh' mobilized the mass protest against the salt monopoly of the British crown. Along with political involvement, Gandhi worked as a reformer of Hinduism, pillorying the social handicapping of the 'untouchables' in the Indian caste system, and designating them positively as Harijan ("Children of God"). After his departure from the Congress, he devoted himself entirely to his program of popular religious education by preaching (1935–1939). But again and again he inserted himself into political life. In spite of radical protest fasting, he was unable to prevent the division of India (1947) into two states—India and Pakistan—which provoked bloody riots between Hindus and Muslims. In 1948, Gandhi was shot to death by a Hindu fanatic.

Nonviolent Resistance

2. Gandhi's foundational themes in the political religious program were (a) swaraj, the combat for independence and self-sufficiency; (b) satyagraha, nonviolent fight for truth; (c) ahimsa, nonviolence, and (d) brahmacharya, sexual abstinence as a foundation of political religious gains.

In the swaraj, the spinning-wheel became the token of the political ideal of an economic self-reliance and a moral self-control. Gandhi's public activity is characterized by a shift from the religious to the political. As he sought to politically mobilize a Hindu cultural movement, he hoped for the return of asceticism on the political level in the sense of self-sufficiency and moral behavior of the person in control. Gandhi's societal religious model is to be understood as a criticism of the modern age. Although his doctrine and his activity came to be understood by him in the sense of an ethical reform, Gandhi is also the great modernizer of traditional Hinduism.

Gandhi as Legendary Figure of a Leader

3. Gandhi's personality attained charismatic proportions, as he succeeded in forging an individual synthesis between the Indian and European world in a universalistic approach. On one hand, he embodies the traditional figure of the holy Indian wandering ascetic (→ sadhu), on the other hand the idealism and activism of the champion of civil rights. This synthesis generated the symbolical power of his moral greatness. In India, Gandhi has become the national identity figure and holy national authority, who can be regarded as the guide and precursor of political Hinduism. For the Western world, he became the personification of the nonviolent struggle for human rights, and the pilot figure of pacifism. Gandhi's person has become the universal icon that one may rightfully display either for Indian self-awareness, or for other idealistic, nationalistic, and even commercial interests.

Literature

Sources: Gandhi, M. H. K., An Autobiography. Or the Story of My Experiments with Truth, Ahmadabad 1927; Idem, What Is Hinduism, Delhi 1994 ([1]1914).

Secondary Literature: Coward, Harold (ed.), Indian Critiques of Gandhi, Albany 2003; Erikson, Erik H., Gandhi's Truth: On the Origins of Militant Nonviolence, London 1970; Hardiman, David, Gandhi in His Time and Ours: The Global Legacy of His Ideas, New York 2003; Nojeim, Michael J., Gandhi and King: The Power of Nonviolent Resistance, Westport 2004; Wolpert, Stanley, Gandhi's Passion: The Life and Legacy of Mahatma Gandhi, New York 2001.

→ Apartheid, Asceticism, Hinduism, Indian Subcontinent, Peace

Lidia Guzy

Garden / Paradise

Horticulture

1. There are steppes, wasteland and forest, mountain crag and open field, and then again there are gardens—things purposely shaped by the human hand, bound off and protected by hedge, fence, or wall—inner reserves for specially selected animals or plants. In comparison with the economy of the beasts of the wild, which live 'from hand to mouth,' and work and skim off what the natural environment spontaneously offers, gardening ('horticulture') demands a thoroughly planned out, long-term, nurtured and tended cultivation, regular irrigation, a constant purging of weeds and undesirable entanglements, stability, and defense against the outside. In the ancient Near Eastern high cultures, we find, along with women's small domestic gardens, orchards (Pers., pardesu; Gk., parádeisoi; archaeologically demonstrable since the second millennium BC) distributed across the countryside in a pattern calculated to serve their utility in war; we find horticultural oases and the very extravagant pleasure gardens of the elite. These persons absorbed from without everything that might offer amenity and contentment, power and prestige. Most written and artistic testimonials deal only with these upper-class gardens.

Royal Gardens as Symbols of Power

2. Horticulture reflected the specific religiosity of the elite. In ancient Egypt, the twin gardens that are afterlife and earth existed only for the upper class. In the realms of the ancient Near East, as also in India and China, the royal garden demonstrated the ruler's absolute power of life and death, and royal pretensions to the upkeep and restoration of the vitality of the land. The absolute superiority of the ruler was incarnated in the royal tree of life, the evergreen, such as the palm, the cedar, the laurel, and the fig; warranted by fresh water from sacred springs and four-armed cosmological wells; evinced in the trophies of subjected opponents and peoples; symbolized in the mount of the gods and the labyrinth of immortality; signified by beasts of life and beasts of death, like serpents, birds, and lions. Majestic style and ritual usages underscore the royal monopoly on the dispensation of life. The monument in the garden symbolized immortality achieved. Sacerdotal activity, dependent on military protection from without by the power elite, accordingly developed strategies of demarcation, and priestly control of royal power. Sometimes it did so by transforming land that had been withdrawn from the influence of royal power into temple or monastery horticulture, as in Babylon and Egypt, Buddhism, Christianity, and Islam. Sometimes it did so by way of narrative accounts, that estranged the water and fruits of immortality from the royal garden, and transferred them to the confines of the world, or that subtracted them from seizure by power-hungry warlords (mount of immortality, 'Hanging Gardens' of Chinese Daoism, the epic of Gilgamesh, the apples of the Hesperides). And at times they did so by replacing the tree of life with the tree of the knowledge of good and evil (Gen 2:8-3:24).

3. The three great individualistic religions of salvation, Buddhism, Christianity, and Islam, radicalized this antiauthoritarian tendency by furnishing their followers with a history of the wandering founder: the Buddha goes abroad from the garden of his princely parents; Adam and Eve move their home from the orchard of God the Lord, through Eden, into the wilderness; Muhammad and his followers emigrate from the garden oasis of Mecca. Instead of the gardens of earthly lords, the promise of these religions is, even to the destitute, an imaginary, future, or inner Gnostic, paradise of satiety and completion. At last, in a faraway future, dawns the age of the conversion of the awful power of life and death. As community of the just (→ Qumran), as Church of all the baptized (Christianity), as liturgical festival (Eastern Church), as pious soul (Islam and Christianity), believers behold the eschatological paradise already spiritually present in the here and now. The mystical believer, in her or his very self, is at once the gardener, and the divinely sequestered garden. The conditions of paradise can also be sought at a geographical distance ('islands of the blest,' Garden of Eden in the farthest reaches of the world). Even sacred inebriation and exalted sensuousness found their points of religious contact (Rose novels; 'Garden of Pleasures'). These pure, disappointment-proof paradises of faith nevertheless underlie the cycle of illusion and disillusion soon visible (Edmund Spencer, The Faerie Queen, 1540). Contrariwise, the lifespan share of the real garden of the actual religion of redemption is always trimmed to the hierarchic status of the individual. Only bishops and abbots, emirs and sheiks, sat safe in their gardens for their whole lifetimes. The simple believer was left with the annual trek to the paradisiac place of pilgrimage. The heavenly gardens of the Chinese emperors went on for miles. The powerless Chinese functionaries and Japanese nobles were left with only their little Daoist or Zen Buddhist gardens into which to withdraw in private.

Religions of Salvation

4. A specific line of Western development ties possession of a garden to gardening by one's own hand, and thereby overcomes the trench of feudal history between lord and servant, as well as that of religious history between clergy and laity. The garden emerged from Xenophon's ancient aristocratic Greek economic theory and practice, which bound up with each other, for the sake of plant experiment and cultivation, the agricultural work ethos and the divine ray of creative horticulture. Through Cicero and Pliny the Elder, it was transmitted to the Benedictine and other monasteries of Western Christian religion and culture. After the occupation of Roman lands in the sixth and seventh centuries, these religious communities spread across Europe like a net. Here, the 'praying and working' monks united earthly garden and heavenly paradise in one location, where the future paradise at the end of time was thought of as already realized right here, in its purest form. In the sixteenth century, the new English gentry took over the monasteries and convents expropriated by Henry VIII. They gave new dynamism to the already present monastic economy of the garden and its theory of an intra-worldly paradise, to produce a movement, comprising a broad part of the population, of constant improvement of horticultural yield in a framework of what nature, having shifted into the place of God, presents and renders possible. Gardens, henceforth, became the microcosmic mirror of how the garden's

Gardening

The rock garden of the Ryoan-ji Temple in → Kyôto is located in the precincts of the most important monastic and temple installation of Japanese → Zen Buddhism, the Daitoku-ji. Here, the Zen Buddhist aesthetic of renunciation and concentration may well find its most pure expression. The dry landscape garden is composed of but fifteen stones of different sizes, some raked gravel, moss, and a border wall. Arranged in the ideal 7-5-3 principle, the shape of the space follows the "concept of an asymmetrical harmony" (Karl Henning), familiar from Chinese Yin-Yang thinking. The "harmonious distribution of weights in the empty space" serves both as an aid to meditation and a presentation of the aesthetic elements of naturalness, reduction, and quiet, as well as the renunciauser stood to nature: heroically, enhanced by the neopagan landscape garden with its irrigation ditch; sentimentally, attuned by gateway and arbor; nostalgically, in a return to Rousseau's nature garden; experimentally and selectively, as Charles Darwin in Down; according to nature and in a spirit of reform of life with the garden-city movement between 1880 and 1933, or with the vegetable farming colony of Eden (founded in 1893).

5. As once during Hellenism and the Renaissance, many garden-wishes and paradise-promises are in competition today. For instance, option Decameron—the rhetoric of 'blossoming landscapes' in Europe; option annual pilgrimage—ecstasy pills in the Berlin 'Garden of Pleasures'; option Xenophon—aristocratic garden-farming; option Zen—the little garden of private transcendence; option Diana—cult of heroes with garden ditch; option Darwin—experimental fields for genetic engineering. The archetypal radiance of a paradisiacal garden, in which the corporeal and good are united with the useful and the intransitory, will probably also inspire a future global civil religion.

Literature

Cheng Liyao, Imperial Gardens (Ancient Chinese Architecture), Vienna/New York 1998; Cowell, Frank R., The Garden as a Fine Art: From Antiquity to Modern Times, Boston 1978; Hunt, John Dixon (ed.), Garden History: Issues, Approaches, Methods, Washington 1992; Kuitert, Wybe, Themes in the History of Japanese Garden Art, Honolulu 2002; Luttikhuizen, Gerard P. (ed.), Paradise Interpreted: Representations of Biblical Paradise in Judaism and Christianity, Leiden 1999; Morris, Paul/Sawyer, Deborah (eds.), A Walk in the Garden: Biblical, Iconographical and Literary Images of Eden, Sheffield 1992; Prest, John, The Garden of Eden: The Botanic Garden and the Re-Creation of Paradise, New Haven 1981; Quest-Rison, Charles, The English Garden: A Social History, London 2001; Schulz, Max F., Paradise Preserved: Recreations of Eden in Eighteenth- and Nineteenth-Century England, Cambridge 1985; Strong, Roy, The Renaissance Garden in England, London 1979; Thomas, Keith, Man and the Natural World: Changing Attitudes in England, 1500–1800, New York/Oxford 1983.

→ Eating/Nourishment, Environemtalism, Forest/Tree, Heaven/Sky, Landscape, Nature, Prestige, Salvation, Work

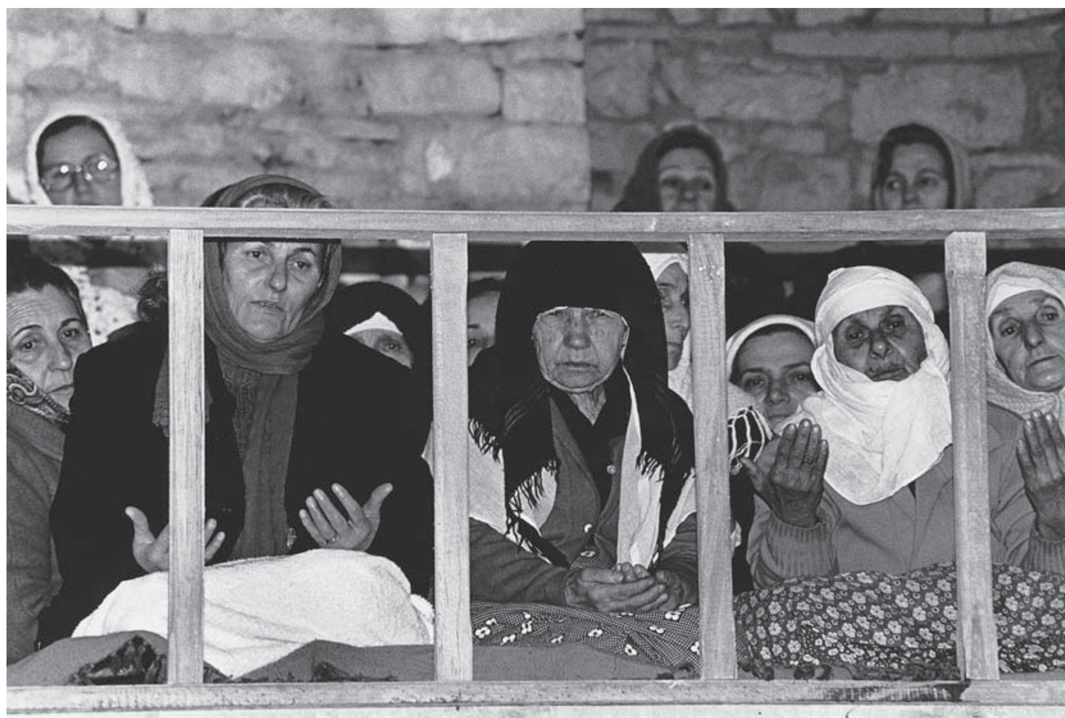
Hemma Boneberg

tion of any symbolism. Meditation in the garden is possible in either of two ways: during a ritual sitting exercise (zazen), the monks can contemplate the garden from a terrace constructed of wood, or—as shown here—by daily gardening, by which weeds and leaves are eliminated and the gravel raked. (Hubert Mohr)



Gender Stereotypes

Thematic Overview

1. Through prescriptions, myths, narratives and theologies, religions have a strong influence on imagined and real gender roles. 'Gender' is usually differentiated from 'sex' as denoting the social and cultural construction of the differences between male and female, while the latter refers to the biological differences. Images of the 'real man,' or of the 'feminine' or 'unfeminine' woman and her place in society, work, and family mark individual identities, social and political structures, and their changes (visible, for example, in the discussion in Islamic feminism of a culture-specific image of woman). Especially through the stereotyping of gender images—as also the reference to 'public' and 'private' space, and their various evaluation—women and men develop distinct, frequently subtle strategies to gain influence and to exercise power. Religious role images reproduce (partial aspects of) reality, and affect it, but are not identical with it.

Images of Woman

2. There is often little to be learned about the reality of women's life in the writings of the monotheistic religions, addressed as these frequently are only to men by men (cf., e.g., the Commandment: "You will not covet your neighbor's wife"). The monotheistic religions are distinguished from other religions, whose gods have gender and biographies, by the conceptualization of a God above gender, who is nevertheless to be addressed as 'Lord' and 'Father.' Female figures with whom one might identify include the historical women of the Bible, and the wives and daughter of Muhammad (Khadiya, Aisha, Fatima). The image of the esteemed Greek hetaire, the 'temporary marriage' co-stipulated by the wife (possible spaces of self-determination), and counter-worlds such as the menacing ancient society of the → Amazons, are as absent as are the goddess figures of competing religions. Father and husband have legal power of determination over the daughter and wife. Islamic law excludes her from public life as too strong a seductress, but assigns her husband not only the right to her chastity, but the duty of her sexual satisfaction. Jewish law also provides within marriage for a sexuality lived in joy. Woman's role is reflected in the cliché, 'Jewish mother': highly respected, on the one hand, because she promises the existence of the people of Israel. (Both people and religious membership are transmitted by the mother). On the other side, her monopoly on influence in the home (child-rearing, and a management of the household that frees the husband to study the Torah) is criticized and caricatured. Depository of family piety, she is nonetheless present only passively in the synagogue, in a sequestered area; this has changed in the Reform Judaism of recent decades. The Hebrew tradition conveys the models of seductive Eve, of the imperious and demonic woman

The enclosed prayer space, and the head coverings (→ Veil) of these praying Muslim women in Albania are, obviously, outward signs of religious sex discrimination. For the observer, as for the women themselves, the function and meaning of these signs can be most divergent. Although women make up a great portion of the number of believers, and thereby are vessels and vehicles of the religion on the level of decision-making they are not—or only by way of exception—visible in the public sphere.

(Lilith), of the companion and wise counselor (Esther, Abigail), of the hero (Judith), or of the woman whose active (Ruth) or forbidden (Lot's daughter, incest) sexuality ultimately contributes to the salvation history of Israel. A description of the 'ideal woman' is found in the biblical 'praise of woman' (Prov 31:10-31); male gender as a religious privilege is reflected in the daily morning prayer, in the form of the expression of gratitude for not having been born a woman (Menachot 43b).

The image of woman in Christian tradition is interpreted in a controversial manner today. In terms of cultural history, the division of female sexuality into Eve and Mary, witch and saint, mother and whore had most powerful effects. In the tradition of the Fathers of the Church, woman—as the Eve of the Fall—became identified with sexuality, with the body, and with evil. In salvation theory, she means danger, and man's deflection from his relationship to God—justification for her massive annihilation as witch; socially, she is the agent of procreation, and of necessary drive-satisfaction (1 Cor 7). The image of the passive female 'vessel' for the fruit of male seed has survived, from ancient ideas of procreation to the Christian view of the human being, and then to nineteenth-century medicine. Women's capacity for redemption is called into doubt theologically (has woman a soul?—is she 'created equal' to man?)—or she is connected in her world and life to the imitation or approximation to the life of the morally and corporeally unblemished Mother of God, → Mary.

Over against this, it is feminist theology especially that draws a direct line from the Jesuan tradition to socio-historical 'women's liberation.' Adduced:

—Jesus's interaction with women as underprivileged of society;

This picture of Pope John Paul II in the circle of German bishops at his 1996 visit in Paderborn represents, for one thing, the supreme hierarchical level of an institutionalized religion, and its public presentation, and for another, the male construction of this image (association of men). The seeming obviousness of male religious power—here supported by dress suggestive of gender neutrality—has been analyzed and criticized as a product of concerted power-strategies. The gender question has become today one of the key touchstones of traditional religious organizational forms.

—creation of humanity in the image of God as man and woman (Gen 1:27), as over against Eve's second rank as 'image of the image' in her creation from the rib of Adam (Gen 2:21-25, 1 Tim 11:15);

—the large number of female disciples at the time of Christianity's inception;

—the establishment of monogamy, understood in terms of esteem for woman;

—the abolition of gender discrimination in Christian worship and community, initiating a nonsexual contact between women and men, and thus contributing to a modern ideal of partnership.

Biblically grounded feminism, usually concretized in a greater participation of woman in existing structures (women's ordination), forms the basis of new religious phenomena (e.g., equality of the sexes in American community groups of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries), and a considerable part of the women's movement. The 'new piety' of recent decades has expressed itself in the search for models of feminine spirituality. The interpretation of woman's images in foreign or past cultures as prototypes of a 'female identity' of today often overlooks the facts: even in tantric sexual practices, woman functions only as a means of men's salvation. New female ideals of 'motherliness' tend to maintain the Marian symbol of the moral superiority of the (religious) nurturer of the nineteenth-century middle-class family. In terms of the history of mentalities, woman's place in the body-soul schema has had its effects down to our own day. The sole model of woman as a spiritual being is the asexual nun, whose opportunity for salvation is seen in her 'masculinization': a concept of woman that endures as well in labor, politics, and science. Against this background the rediscovery

Pop singer Madonna uses religious (Christian) stereotypes as a dramatic means to sacralize eroticism (e.g., in "Like a Prayer," 1989), and to eroticize the religious, as, here, the posture and attitude of prayer or in her fashioning as a 'Madonna' ("Like a Virgin," 1984). The various stagings of this figure are not for the purpose of establishing a new role image, but are playing with the stereotypes of saint and whore, mother and vamp, and thus produce a modern connection between emancipated sexual self-determination and passionate 'religious' dedication.

and positive interpretation of female role models (witch, priestess) is crucial for a modern 'female spirituality.' For example, the Wicca religion (→ Witch/Persecution of Witches) connects the female with a special knowledge of nature and the body and places emphasis on 'experience' in contrast to 'dogma.' In this respect the 'repression of femininity' is a pivotal pattern of religious criticism and new forms of spirituality as well.

3. A problem with the religious analysis of images of men is that, in most religions, the male experience is considered to be the norm for the human being across the board. The man who controls or overcomes his sexuality is the measure of the ideal human being, that operative subject of religious writing and, as active, creative principle, authentic representative of the 'human race.' Although such ideals fail to express the reality of individual men, the religious, political, and family power of men down the centuries goes without saying. That 'masculinity' nevertheless is a salable cultural product is shown in numberless religious rituals for the transition of the child to male adult. Few cultures look on masculinity as something that does not arise in extreme or brutal actions, and separation from the status of a being to be nurtured (Gilmore 1989). The averting from the feminine in the monotheistic religions goes along with the essentially superior evaluation of the man. The religious man defines himself by 'unfeminine' (that is, spiritual) activity, and by 'pure' (in the sense of legitimated) relations to women (matrimony), or he must be protected or separated from woman's seduction, as in celibacy.

Encouraged by the feminist criticism of the 1970s, (→ Women's Movement/Spiritual Feminism) men have recently confronted anew the relationship between maleness and religion, especially Christianity. Assessing their spiritual and emotional deficits, they now seek to sketch the image of a 'new man.' Here they frequently make reference to Jesus as the 'first new man' (F. Alt), or posit a fundamental 'wholeness': that is, 'masculine' and 'feminine' characteristics ought to be integrated. Another current, the 'mythopoetic men's movement,' endeavors to reawaken spiritual sources (myths, folktales, religious writings, archetype theory), in order to repair the sundered relationship of man to religion, and thereby counter the 'new disease of misandry' (Arnold 1994), and draft a male and religious identity. This movement offers the criticism of Christianity that it has 'wounded' man as well, repressing and scorning his once admired aggressiveness. But a responsible masculinity is deemed possible only through the rediscovery within man of the 'inner warrior,' and of the qualities of the 'ruler,' the 'pilgrim,' and the 'man wild and wise.' A third current, 'body theology' (Krondorfer 1996), takes up feminist criticism and the body concept of historical anthropology, and attempts a critical reconstruction of the union of religious conceptualizations and the male experience of body. The idealization of the phallus, of the spontaneous activity and creativity of the erect penis, is regarded as spiritualized in Christianity, and the ideal concepts of male potency are applied to asexual redemption. Thus, the idea of the spiritual conquest of nature, drive, and death as a male power concept of absolute autonomy becomes the fundamental characteristic of (a) the relation to woman: she can be grasped in this idea only as a threat of impotence, and in no case representative of the divine; eroticism is linked to dominance; (b) man's relation to his body: ideal phallic spirituality belies the reality of the body, and calls for its ascetical mortification, unfeeling hardening, and 'immaculateness'; (c) relation to men: through the phallic ideal and the exclusion of woman, there arises an exclusive power community (union of men), which would be threatened by tenderness or eroticism. Sexuality, then, is relegated to the concept of a 'compelled heterosexuality.'

From this perspective, only the paradoxical veneration of the phallic ideal by way of asexuality opens the door to the feminine aspects of the interpretation of Jesus Christ, whose maleness is still central for the Church's understanding of symbol today. Hence, there is a connection between men's withdrawal from religion, which now oftentimes becomes a private and female affair, and the transition of the phallic power concept to the achievement community (politics, economics, science, the military), along with its ideal of body and sexuality.

Such a reconstruction of religious ideologization of not only the female body poses the open question: how can mind and spirituality be thought of as matching real experience of the body on the part of men and women?

Other Images

4. Heterosexuality is the central model of sexuality in the dominant religions of European culture. Theoretically, if not practically, Islam, Judaism, and Christianity filter out homosexuality, bisexuality, or 'trans-' and 'intersexuality.' Only ancient mythology has positive images of non-heterosexual sexuality. To be sure, relations between men are part of the culturally coded masculine ideal of virtue, and the Platonic interpretation of the male-female hermaphrodite as the symbol of a primal, androgynous perfection stands in stark contradiction with the rejection of real 'effeminate' men. Other cultures have—or had, until they had been missionized—designations and roles for sexual variance. With the Sambia of Papua New Guinea, for example, persons whose sexuality is indistinguishable at birth (pseudo-hermaphroditism) have their own designation and special religious task (healing). Social interchange of gender roles is found, for example, in the cultic transvestism of the shamans (at worship, men assume a role actually proper to a woman, adopting female garb and behavior), or with the man-women or woman-men in Indian culture, who adopt transsexual roles, assuming, in dress, comportment, and sexual partnership the opposite role from their biological sex, and who are ascribed greater powers than univocally defined persons.

Religious models of changing sexes are—without idealization—challenging for the Western debate over gender and sex. In view of the different possible ways of living gender roles, it scarcely seems possible to realize the demand for a more just sexual relationship either through the idea of a 'holistic' and 'integral' sexual identity, or in the framework of the Pauline Christian understanding of 'equality' as the elimination of differences (Gal 3:28: "There is no longer Jew or Greek, . . . no longer male and female; for all of you are one in Christ Jesus").

Literature

Ahmed, L., Women and Gender in Islam, New Haven 1992; Arnold, P. M., Wildmen, Warriors, and Kings: Masculine Spirituality and the Bible, New York 1991; Bulloughs, V., Sexual Variance in Society and History, New York 1976; Butler, J., "The End of Sexual Difference?," in: Bronfen, E./Kavka, M. (eds.): Feminist Consequences: Theory for the New Century, New York 2000; Carmody, D. L., Women and World Religions, Englewood Cliffs 1989; Conner, R. P., Blossom of Bone: Reclaiming the Connections between Homoeroticism and the Sacred, San Francisco 1993; Duby, G./ Perrot, M.

(eds.), A History of Women in the West, 5 vol., Cambridge 1992/3 (Rome 1990); Gilmore, D. D., Manhood in the Making: Cultural Concepts of Masculinity, New Haven 1990; Haddad, Y. Y. (ed.), Women, Religion and Social Change, New York 1985; Hanegraaff, W. J./Kloppenborg, R. (eds), Female Stereotypes in Religious Traditions, Leiden 1995; Krondorfer, B. (ed.), Men's Bodies, Men's Gods: Male Identities in a (Post-)Christian Culture, New York 1996; Laqueur, Th., Making Sex: Body and Gender from the Greeks to Freud, Cambridge 1990; Mernissi, F., Beyond the Veil: Male-Female Dynamics in Modern Muslim Society, Bloomington 1987 (Paris 1983); Pool, R., Eve's Rib: The Biological Roots of Sex Differences, New York 1994; Sered, S. S., Priestess, Mother, Sacred Sister: Religions Dominated by Women, Oxford 1994; Theleweit, K., Male Fantasies, 2 vols., Minneapolis 1987 (Frankfurt/M. 1977/78).

→ Body, Communication, Conflict/Violence, Family/Kinship/Genealogy, Homosexuality/Homoeroticism, Identity, Matriarchy/Patriarchy, Sexuality, Women's Movement/Spiritual Feminism

Alexandra Grieser

Genetic Engineering

The Concept

Genetic engineering encompasses all methods by which the genetic material (genome) of organisms is isolated, characterized, altered and/or recombined with foreign genetic material ('recombinant DNA'), in part across species boundaries. In nature, genetic transfer is only found in bacteria and other microorganisms; it is not possible, using classic breeding methods, to selectively transfer certain DNA sequences. Therefore the term 'genetic engineering' refers to direct intervention of human beings into the genetic material of living organisms. The term 'transgenic' means 'altered by means of genetic engineering'. Transgenic organisms are plants, animals, and microorganisms whose genetic material has been stably altered using genetic engineering methods and whose altered genome is transmitted to its descendants. Such genetic alterations can even cross species boundaries. By means of targeted recombination of genes, in part across species boundaries, human beings attempt to create new performance profiles in order to achieve a certain desired effect and to utilize nature in this way. In so doing, the slow process of evolution is jumped over, which also means that the organisms that are constructed using this method have not stood the test of a long experiential process of evolution. Since the birth of the cloned sheep Dolly and other cloned mammals whose existence shows that it is possible to clone mammals using the method of somatic cell nuclear transfer (SCNT), genetic engineering has posed increasingly profound scientific, ethical and legal challenges. The fact that it is now possible to clone mammals has sparked off a global prospective discussion, which addresses the ethical problems connected with human cloning.

In some areas, genetic engineering has become a common practice, for one in the area of pharmaceutical research, where numerous agents for medications are in the meantime produced using genetic engineering. Other applications for genetic engineering such as individual areas of medicine (e.g. somatic gene therapy) are still controversial, however, and some are rejected completely or even outlawed, as is the case with germ line therapy on human beings and human cloning, for example. Among the controversial areas of application are agriculture and food production.

Goals, Expectations, and Fears

The application of genetic engineering procedures for plant breeding is connected with a number of goals and expectations. Hopes are set in genetic engineering as a means of altering economic plants used for foodstuffs and fodder to make them resistant against detrimental insects and herbicides. Proponents anticipate higher yields and a reduction of environmentally detrimental chemicals, with adverse effects on plants and animals in the agrarian ecosystems being minimized and the bio-diversity of agricultural cropland being increased. Not only industrial nations, but also developing countries are expected to profit from such measures, which are purported to deliver the solution to the problem of world hunger. Another goal of genetic engineering is to increase the nutritive value of plants, for example the vitamin content of rice (Golden Rice), and to promote the production of vaccines in useful plants (e.g. vaccine bananas) for the benefit of the developing countries.

Such expectations are countered by the fear of an uncontrolled spread of transgenic agricultural plants and crossbreeds with other plants. The undesirable transfer of resistant genes to plants for which they are not deliberately intended as well as a loss of bio-diversity could result. Moreover, there is a fear that genes for resistance to antibiotics, which for technical reasons are often transmitted when plants are altered transgenically, can also penetrate pathogens, making it impossible to combat them using conventional antibiotics. Another fear is that genetic engineering will not provide the promised solution to the problem of world hunger but rather result in even greater exploitation of developing countries by industrial nations. The key word in this context is bio-piratry by firms in industrial nations, i.e. the wrongful appropriation of biological resources in developing countries whereby genetically engineered indigenous plants of these countries are sometimes even patented without these countries benefiting from the profits. Losses in exports and a deterioration of the economic basis of such countries as well as higher unemployment could be the consequence.

Consumers are often very mistrustful of genetic engineering in agriculture because they do not perceive any direct benefit for the end product, i.e. for the foodstuffs and fodder that are produced from the genetically modified plants. Worries about health-hazardous side effects such as allergies, the risks of genetic engineering for the environment, and the possibility that industrial countries might exploit developing countries are highlighted here.

Recent Developments

Research is now being carried out whose aim is to attain useful proteins and pharmaceutical agents from transgenically modified animals and to use such animals as pharmaceutically useful 'bio-reactors' ('gene pharming'). Intensive research efforts are also being made to breed transgenic farm animals to increase yields and improve product quality in the production of foodstuffs and raw materials (meat, milk, wool etc.) ('gene farming') as well as infection-resistant animals and transgenically modified animals for use in transplantation medicine (xenotransplantation, or transplantation of animal organs in human beings). Cloning of transgenic animals is expected to make for particularly effective proliferation. Here the ethical issues raised concern the high degree of animal consumption and possible animal suffering, which even pose problems in the research stage. Another concern is that the negative effects which transgenic modification might have on the well being of these animals and the potential affliction of pain and suffering have not yet been sufficiently investigated. If animals are instrumentalized in this way, it is necessary to ethically weigh up risks against benefits, especially considering the fact that the utility that such genetically engineered modifications have for human beings remains questionable.

Germ Line Therapy and Human Cloning

Genetic engineering is a particularly controversial issue when it comes to human beings. Those who favor it point out its therapeutic potential for the treatment of serious illnesses. Somatic gene therapy (healing through modification of genetic information to body cells) is in an early stage of development. There have been setbacks here, and so far there has been no indication of success. Selective intervention into the human germ line (germ line therapy) is not ethically justifiable due to the risks to developing individuals and to future generations connected with them. Germ line therapy and human cloning would constitute human experiments. The use of human embryos as sources of embryonic stem cells and research cloning are subject to ethical controversy due to the fact that embryos are appropriated and destroyed in the process. Genetic engineering also often evokes horrific visions of human beings being bred (→ Eugenics); the legitimization of each individual case must be examined carefully.

Sweeping objections to genetic engineering based on the premise that it is not permissible to 'meddle with nature or God's creation' cannot provide a basis for collective bindness in our secular society, but with fact-based arguments against certain kinds of intervention into human and non-human nature, the legitimacy of such a view should be carefully examined in individual cases.

Literature

Burley, J./ Harris, J. (eds.), A Companion to Genethics, Malden, Mass. 2002; Haker, H./ Beyleveld, D., The Ethics of Genetics in Human Procreation, Aldershot 2000; Honnefelder, L./Lanzerath, D., Klonen in biomedizinischer Forschung und Reproduktion. Wissenschaftliche Aspekte—Ethische, rechtliche und gesellschaftliche Grenzen / Cloning in Biomedical Research and Reproduction: Scientific Aspects—Ethical, Legal and Social Limits, Bonn 2003; Nuffield Council on Bioethics (ed.), Genetically Modified Crops: The Ethical and Social Issues, London 1999; Nuffield Council on Bioethics (ed.), The Use of Genetically Modified Crops in Developing Countries: A follow-up Discussion Paper, London 2004; Reiss, J. M./Straughan, R., Improving Nature? The Science and Ethics of Genetic Engineering, Cambridge 1996; van Zutphen, L. F. M./van der Meer, M. (eds.): Welfare Aspects of Transgenic Animals, New York et al. 1997; Walters, L./Palmer, J. G., The Ethics of Human Gene Therapy, New York 1997.

I would like to thank Dr. Susan Nurmi-Schomers for the translation from German into English.

→ Bioethics, Ethics/Morals, Eugenics, Nature, Science

Eve-Marie Engels

Genius

Antiquity

In Greek and especially Roman antiquity, the figure of the genius is met, for example, in the conceptualization of a procreative power residing in the male human being. Genius, which is also regarded as a protective divinity, and enjoys cultic veneration, can be ascribed to an exalted personality (as Lat., genius Augusti); but it can also, collectively, be seen in the (Roman) people, and, last but not least, in a place (Lat., genius loci, 'genius of the place'). The genius comes into view in, for example, the form of a serpent (that from time to time emerges from the earth and attests the 'sacredness' of the place), or of a horn of plenty. After the prohibition of the old worship, by Theodosius I (392 CE), the notion of the genius survived in Christian reinterpretation, as a spiritual principle. From Origen on, a merger obtained between the genius and the Christian guardian angel. The genius of Christian reception also adopted the function of an advocate (on grave markers), and further developed to the popular and ecclesial angel.

The modern notion of the genius first appears in the 'time of the genius,' or literary movement of Sturm und Drang (second half of the eighteenth century). Examples of this artistic ideal peep out of Goethe's essay, "Von deutscher Baukunst" (Ger., "German Architecture"), or some of his hymns (e.g., "Prometheus," 1777/78; or "Mahomet," 1774). The notion of the genius gained importance as a concept with which to proclaim celebrate the transition from enthralled vassals to mature, enlightened citizens, and exemplarily in the form of the autonomous poet. The genial poet declares, with pathos, the truths revealed to him alone, an event that implodes in its original creative power, which has him become the demiurge. To him, the extraordinary hero, societal veneration falls even in the present, but still more certain for him is renown in the afterworld. Toward the end of the nineteenth century, the form of the genius takes on darker features, as well, and produces the precarious connection between the genius and illness or insanity. As the twentieth century opens, a genial, not overdrawn, personality ideal, as propagated in Dionysiac rapture by Thomas Carlyle, and not least of all by Friedrich → Nietzsche, calls sobering critics to the field—immediately after the First World War, vis-à-vis the lionized genius concept, lined with enthusiastic pathos, E. Zilzel favored a Socratic personality ideal, who devotes himself, with a cheerful and serene heart, to service to the matter at hand. With his contemporary, Max → Weber, we find an altogether similar criticism, which, to be sure, bears even clearer traces of an 'antidotic,' sobering pathos.

Englightenment and Romanticism

The mass efficacy of charismatic genius reached its catastrophic climax in the topos, transferred in terms of National Socialism, of the 'Führer genius,' whose self-appointed herald was Josef Goebbels. Thereafter, things became quieter when it came to the genius. Instead, at least in the area of the new religious movements, new masters now, as well, have emerged in the form of Far Eastern gurus. The question of whether Max Weber's ideal was not, after all, able to promote positive masterly qualities for the personality dedicated to his project, ought not all too flippantly be swept from the table, with all failed, crazy, and extravagant genius experiments.

Literature

Eysenck, Hans J., Genius: The Natural History of Creativity, Cambridge 1995; Grappin, Pierre, La théorie du génie dans le préclassicisme Allemand, Paris 1952; Nitzsche, Jane Chance, The Genius Figure in Antiquity and the Middle Ages, New York 1975; Schmidt, Jochen, Die Geschichte des Genie-Gedankens in der deutschen Literatur, Philosophie und Politik, 1750–1945, 2 vols., Darmstadt 1985; Zilsel, Edgar, Die Geniereligion. Ein kritischer Versuch über das moderne Persönlichkeitsideal, mit einer historischen Begründung, ed. by Johann Dvorak, Frankfurt/M. 1990 ([1]1918).

→ Angel, Hero/Heroism, Veneration of Persons/Personality Cult

Georg Hartmann

Ghetto / Ghettoization

The Jewish Ghettos

1. The word 'Ghetto' emerges for the first time in the early sixteenth century, in Italy. Here the Republic of Venice erected for the Jews (once more admitted, after a long banishment) their own closed quarter, which probably got its name from the foundry (Ital., getto) in the vicinity. Once the diaspora had begun, the Jews lived together in certain urban quarters just like many minorities, until about the beginning of the second millennium in Catholic Western Europe. At that moment, by church law, they were compelled to withdraw into sturdily bounded and closely controlled urban neighborhoods. In the wake of the Counter-Reformation, many Italian, German, and French cities built 'Jewish wards' ('quarters'), surrounded by walls and locked from the outside at night. Their inhabitants lived under strict conditions. There were regulations on their immigration and population growth, the legal age for marriage, and the number of marriages permitted each year. In the course of the nineteenth century, with the granting of civil rights to Jews, the ghettos were opened for good and all—the last of the kind in 1870 in Rome, once the ecclesiastical state had been occupied by Italian troops.

In Eastern Europe as well, Jews lived in special neighborhoods (in Yiddish, shtetl). There were no civilly obligatory, sealed ghettos. The concept then received a new, particular meaning with National Socialist Germany's policy of persecution and annihilation of the Jews in the Second World War. In occupied Poland, they were driven together into living areas surrounded by impenetrable walls and fences, as a preliminary to physical annihilation. The best-known ghetto of this kind was the Warsaw ghetto, where in the spring of 1943 there was actually an armed uprising against the German occupiers, which, hopeless as it was, nevertheless became the symbol of Jewish resistance to the Holocaust.

The Afro-American Ghettos in the United States

2. Today, 'ghetto' generally means any place where → minorities live or must live in freely chosen or compelled separation from the majority of the population. In the large cities of the United States, in the last quarter of the nineteenth century, Eastern or Southern Europeans, massively recruited for heavy industry, moved as a rule into ethnically homogeneous living areas. Nevertheless, by the second generation at least, and financial status permitting, they looked for new places to move to, usually in a green suburb. Now they had become emancipated, individual 'Americans'—though the mechanism of the American 'melting pot.'

These short-lived 'ethnic ghettos' are to be distinguished from the permanent Afro-American 'racial ghettos,' the 'black ghettos.' These arose as a result of demographic shifts occurring in the last quarter of the nineteenth century and after, and—paradoxically—in consequence of the twentieth-century political and legal emancipation of the Afro-American population. Now, where there were no Jim Crow laws (legal grounds for social distance—factual apartheid in the rural areas of the South until into the 1960s), the majority of the population, of European extraction, reacted with the imposition of spatial distance. The emergence of practically closed 'black' residential areas in the inner quarters of large American cities began as had the ethnic ghettos of the Europeans in the eighties of the century before. As the immigrants from the rural areas of Europe, so also many rural Afro-Americans from the South moved to the industrial cities of the North. This development, in part conditioned by the Second World War, accelerated in the forties of the twentieth century, and continued unchecked into the sixties. Of course, the white, majority society forced the Afro-Americans to continue to maintain residence in the black ghetto—simply by reason of the fact that, by tacit agreement, whites would not sell them homes in a 'white' residential quarter. Since the last third of the twentieth century, as 'racial relations' in the United States polarized, so has the nature of the black ghetto. On the one hand, for members of the professional Afro-American middle class, or for successful individuals (entrepreneurs, sports figures, entertainment artists), practically no discrimination is any longer practiced. On the other hand, living conditions for the majority of the 'American lower class' have relatively worsened. Through neglect and exclusion, their neighborhoods today once more meet the criteria of an impenetrable ghetto in the classic sense.

Influence of the Ghetto on Religion

3. In the black ghettos of large cities, Protestant (preponderantly Baptist) Christianity at first played a role similar to that of its central influence on daily life in the old South. Their churches were the only institutions that Afro-Americans might themselves control; thus, not only religious, but also, to a large extent, cultural and political life was played out in them and determined them. Even the special religious content and forms of the black churches in the cities corresponded to the origin of these churches in the Southern states. In them, an altogether specific form of Christian faith was cultivated and furthered: here, Afro-Americans were the chosen people of God, and—passively, of course, to a great extent—awaited deliverance from their slavery at the hands of the white male. This outlook often found liturgical expression in melancholy religious songs ('gospel songs,' as, for example, "When Israel was in Egypt's Land"). From a practical viewpoint, the churches in the ghettos functioned as the pivot and organizational headquarters of social life. This role changed only in the 1960s, as a new generation of blacks proclaimed the view that Christianity is a 'white' religion, and therefore cannot be integrated with the struggle for emancipation being waged by Afro-Americans. Malcolm X and the Nation of Islam represented a new separatism based on, and aiming at, power. In reaction, black Christian theologians radicalized the message of Christianity, as well, in the direction of a more aggressive theology of liberation. Recently, an attack by black theologians on sexism in black churches has been launched as well, and is accelerating.

Development after the Second World War

4. After the Second World War, in the wake of the worker immigration and migration, ethnic neighborhoods have also sprung up in many large western European cities, some of which are designated as ghettos. An intense political debate has arisen with respect to the French banlieux (suburbs), home mostly to North Africans, or the Kreuzberg district in Berlin, the majority of whose residents are Turks. The question is whether it is possible for the resulting multicultural or multiethnic society to live in harmony. These questions arise differently in each country and prevailing political culture. For example, it makes a decisive difference whether or not a given ethnic or religious group of 'foreigners' ('others') are recognized as citizens of the country in which they live. The critical distinction is provided by the class status of the (voluntarily or otherwise) excluded. In some western cities of the United States and Canada, there are entire quarters occupied in the majority by Asian immigrants. But it would not occur to anyone, least of all to the immigrants themselves, to say that they lived in a 'ghetto'; these Asians see themselves as highly respected and economically fully integrated members of society, as indeed they are.

Literature

Blumental, Nachman/Kermish, Joseph, Resistance and Revolt in the Warsaw Ghetto: A Documentary History, Jerusalem 1965; Gutman, Yisrael, The Jews of Warsaw, 1939–1943: Ghetto, Underground, Revolt, Brighton 1982; Hirsch, Arnold R., Making the Second Ghetto: Race and Housing in Chicago 1940 to 1960, Chicago 1983; Klein, Dennis B. (general ed.), Hidden History of the Kovno Ghetto, Boston 1997; Leman, Nicholas, The Promised Land: The Great Black Migration and How It Changed America, New York 1991; Wilson, William Julius, The Truly Disadvantaged: The Inner City, the Underclass, and Public Policy, Chicago 1987.

→ Anti-Semitism, Diaspora, Judaism, Migration, Minorities, New York, North America

Frank Unger

Gnosticism

Problems of Definition

The Greek word gnôsis means 'knowledge,' and refers more specifically to a salvational knowledge of one's own Self and its divine origin. Emphasis on gnosis is found not only in the late antique currents and ideas that have become known as 'gnosticism,' but also in e.g. Clement of Alexandria and, notably, in → Hermetism/Hermeticism.

Until recently, it was widely assumed that the 'heretics' attacked in the second and third centuries CE by orthodox Christian authors such as Justinus Martyr, Irenaeus of Lyons, Hippolytus of Rome, and Epiphanius of Salamis belonged to an identifiable 'gnostic current' or 'gnostic religion.' Gnosticism in this sense was characterized by a strong → dualism between the completely transcendent God of light whence originated man's inner divine 'spark,' and the dark and negative material world created by an evil or ignorant demiurge to keep that spark imprisoned in bodies and prevent it from returning to its origin. Although such ideas were certainly held by a number of groups and authors in this period, it has become evident in recent years that the generic concept of a 'gnostic religion' is an abstraction or simplification that does not do justice to the actual complexity of the textual evidence. Michael Allen Williams has demonstrated this in detail, arguing forcefully that the 'dubious category' of gnosticism should better be discarded altogether,[1] and Karen L. King explains how this rhetorical category created by a deeply polemical discourse was eventually reified and mistaken by scholars for a historical entity.[2] The fact is that the very substantive 'gnosticism' was coined only as late as 1669 (by Henry More, see Layton 1995) and that, with only a few exceptions, the early Christian polemicists did not call their opponents 'gnostics,' but labeled them quite generally as 'heretics' (if they not simply called the groups by the names of their respective founders).[3]

While they must be seen as integral parts of a broad type of late antique religiosity that appealed to 'gnosis' as indispensable for salvation—and which could be found in pagan and Jewish as well as in Christian contexts—most of the heretical groups and ideas targeted by the polemicists seem to have been characterized more specifically by the fact that their central ideas are expressed in myths. This mythological gnosis therefore roughly coincides with 'gnosticism' as traditionally understood, but even so, there are various texts that complicate any attempt at clean categorization. For example, the Gospel of Thomas emphasizes gnosis but contains no mythology, and a hermetic text like the Poimandres (Corpus Hermeticum I) is not considered a gnostic text in spite of its mythical content.

With respect to late antiquity, therefore, one must never lose sight of the difference between 'gnosticism' as an artificial polemical construct, on the one hand, and the complexity and variety of the historical currents rightly or wrongly associated with it, on the other. For later periods the situation is easier: here we can concentrate on the → reception history of the reified construct itself, which took on a life of its own and actually caused new 'gnosticisms' to come into existence.

'Gnostic' Texts

That today we are able to distinguish, to some extent, between the polemical construct and the historical reality of 'gnosticism' is mainly due to the discovery of the Nag Hammadi library in 1945. Until the eighteenth century, scholars were dependent on the anti-gnostic polemics preserved in the works of early Christian theologians and neoplatonic authors (notably Plotinus, who criticized the gnostics in Ennead II, 9, later called "against the gnostics" by Porphyry). Although the 'heretical' groups and ideas often had little in common, theologians sought to present them as one coherent current with a genealogy of its own: 'gnosticism' was supposed to have originated with the arch-heretic Simon Magus. The myth of coherence and the preoccupation with genealogy were both inherited by modern scholars, leading to fruitless debates about 'the' origins of 'the' gnostic religion. As part of their polemics, the anti-gnostic writers sometimes transmit long excerpts from original gnostic writings, such as the Excerpts from Theodotus in Clement of Alexandria, and the Letter to Flora in Ephiphanius's Panarion. New original documents only began to be discovered from the eighteenth century on: the Pistis Sophia preserved in the Codex Askewianus (discovered around 1750), the Books of Jeû and the so-called Untitled Treatise preserved in the Codex Brucianus (discovered in 1773), and the Gospel of Mary, Apocryphon of John and Sophia of Jesus Christ preserved in the Codex Papyrus Berolinensis 8502 (discovered in 1896). And then in December 1945 came the spectacular chance discovery of the so-called Nag Hammadi Library: a collection of thirteen codices containing forty-seven different works—including a few non-gnostic ones—preserved in a pottery jar hidden in a cave near Nag Hammadi in Upper Egypt.[4] This discovery has revolutionized academic research into 'gnosticism,' and has ended up undermining the essentialism of traditional approaches.

Mythological Gnosis in Late Antiquity

In spite of the enormous variety of ideas found in the textual corpus, some stand out as particularly characteristic. They can be seen as variations on what might be called the gnostic 'master myth.' Man's inner self (→ Soul) does not belong in this material world but has originated in a divine world of light (the 'pleroma'), which is the manifestation of a wholly transcendent God. Sparks of the divine light have become separated from their origin and have lost their way in our lower world of spiritual darkness and materiality. Trapped in gross bodies and subject to worldly temptations, they have forgotten who they really are and where they come from. But they can be saved from this tragic condition of ignorance and alienation by remembering their origin. This is the salvational knowledge of gnosis, as formulated in an exemplary statement attributed to Theodotus: true gnostics are those who remember "who we were and what we have become, where we were and into what we have been thrown, whither we hasten and from what we are redeemed, what is birth and what rebirth" (Clement of Alexandria, Excerpts from Theodotus, 78, 2). Only he who has regained this knowledge will, after death, be able to move upwards through the seven heavenly spheres—passing by the 'archons,' quasi-demonic beings who will block the way to anyone without gnosis—and finally find the way back to his divine origin.

Every aspect of this master myth was susceptible to a great variety of explanations and developments. Thus there are many divergent explanations—often assuming quite different metaphysical and cosmological frameworks—of how and why the sparks became separated from the pleroma, and how the lower material world came into being. The original, fatal rupture takes place in the pleroma itself, and the creation of the world is a secondary event that eventually follows in its wake. This creation is typically attributed to a lower deity, the demiurge: an evil or at least ignorant being who masquerades as the true God and seeks to prevent human beings from discovering the truth about themselves. Hence the typical gnostic exegesis of the Genesis story: the God who created the world in seven days is really the demiurge, the serpent is a messenger from the true God, and by eating from the tree of knowledge (i.e. gnosis) Adam and Eve's 'eyes are opened': they remember who they are and are freed from the tyranny of this world and its ruler.

Probably because of a wish to emphasize the distance between the transcendent God and the negative world of matter, many texts describe "a cascade of divine entities down from the summit of being."[5] Thus we have the divine qualities or attributes called 'aeons,' who are described in spatial and temporal terms, and together make up the pleroma; there are many levels of reality between the divine world and the earthly realms (a point that was strongly criticized by Plotinus, who assumed only three levels); and on all these levels we encounter a multitude of spiritual entities. Gnostic mythology flourishes in elaborate descriptions of the interactions between such personalized entities and the dramatic events that result from them.

Nevertheless, the ultimate focus of gnostic mythology is the human Self. Each gnostic could personally identify with the dramatic story of how the pneuma, or spark of the divine light, gets separated from its origin; how it loses its way until it gets entangled and trapped in the world of matter; how it lives and suffers there in ignorance of its real identity, origin, and spiritual destiny; and of how it finally finds its way back to salvation by the grace of gnosis, and is reunited with God. This essentially simple and elegant explanation of the human condition, and the hope that it provided for future deliverance, explains why—in spite of its sometimes abstruse complexities—gnostic religiosity could have a strong emotional appeal to believers.

For Christian gnostics, Christ was an esoteric teacher who saved men by bringing them gnosis. One of the major complaints of the orthodox polemicists against the gnostics was their docetic christology: Christ had no material body of flesh and blood, and hence did not really suffer on the cross. The concept that gnosis meant a radical liberation from this world and all that belongs to it, was interpreted by some of the anti-gnostic polemicists as implying immoral behavior: since they were no longer bound by earthly laws, the heretics—notably the Borborites and Carpocratians—were believed to indulge in sexual licentiousness, perhaps even in a deliberate effort to mock the demiurge who had created those laws. Since these accusations appear only in anti-gnostic polemics, and there are no authentic texts that advocate sexual libertinism, it is most plausible that the ‘libertine gnosis’ was a figment of the polemicists’ imagination. The Nag Hammadi library breathes, rather, a thoroughly ascetic atmosphere.

Medieval Gnosticism?

→ Manichaeism contains elements of redemption and salvation that link this ‘religion of light’ to gnostic cosmologies; but whether or not it should be considered a form of ‘gnosticism’ very much depends on one’s position in the theoretical and terminological debate alluded to above. As for the religion of the medieval Cathars, its frequent characterization as ‘gnostic’ is debatable, as well. Like Manichaeism, Catharism has been associated with gnosticism mainly because of its strongly dualistic worldview, which holds that the material world was made by an evil creator and seeks the liberation of the soul that is imprisoned in the → body. But some of the most central Cathar ideas about the Spirit and the soul have no similarity with those of late antique ‘gnosticism,’ and perhaps most notably: the notion of gnosis plays no significant role in it, and the Cathars never developed a mythology about events in the heavenly world that had led up to the present state of estrangement.[6] To the extent that those two elements—the appeal to gnosis and participation in a gnostic ‘master myth’—are considered central to ‘gnosticism,’ as has been argued above, it would be inconsistent to see Catharism as a gnostic religion. Incidentally, a similar argument can be applied to the heresy of Marcion, who has often been seen as a gnostic because of his dualism, but who emphasizes faith (pistis) instead of gnosis, and who claims that man is saved by a wholly alien God instead of returning to the divine origin from whom he has himself been born.

The Modern Reinvention of 'Gnosticism'

Throughout the medieval and early modern period, the polemical discourse that saw gnosticism as "the primal enemy, that had not come from outside, but sat at the very root of the origin of Christianity" (Hans Blumenberg[7]), was entirely dominant. Hence, 'gnosticism' functioned exclusively as a term of opprobrium used by orthodox theologians in their battles with heresy. The earliest example of an apology of gnosticism was written in 1629: it appears in Abraham von Franckenberg's Theophrastia Valentiniana, and did not become available to a wider public until 1703, when it was published by Gottfried Arnold (Gilly 2000). Only a few years earlier, Arnold himself had published his famous Impartial History of Churches and Heretics, which has made history as the first public defense of ancient gnosticism (and of later heresies).

This new phenomenon of 'gnosticism' as a positive concept made it possible for thinkers in the immediate wake of the → Enlightenment to explore attractive new ways of interpreting its historical role in the ideological and social battles between Christian orthodoxy and heresy. Notably in the context of the Vernünftige Hermetik (Ger., "Enlightened Hermeticism") of the eighteenth century,[8] the criticism of Christian orthodoxy and the established churches naturally went hand in hand with a sympathy for the gnostics as their traditional opponents. From such a perspective, it became possible to suggest that the program of the Enlightenment should not lead to the complete annihilation of religion, but rather to the transformation of traditional religion into a new kind of gnosis.

Probably the most influential representative of such a perspective was the important historian of theology Ferdinand Christian Baur, whose Die christliche Gnosis (Ger., "The Christian Gnosis") was published in 1835. Baur drew straight connections from the gnosticism of late antiquity to the Christian theosophy of Jacob Boehme, and from Boehme to Schleiermacher, Schelling, and Hegel. From a Hegelian perspective, Baur described gnosis as the quintessential manifestation of the philosophy of religion as such, that seeks to find the true essence of religion underneath its limited manifestations in paganism, Judaism, and Christianity. The perennial goal of gnosis was to arrive at 'absolute knowledge as such,' and it had finally succeeded in Hegel's philosophy of religion (→ Esotericism).

'Gnosticism' and Modern Ideologies

Since German Idealism and → Romanticism were in fact strongly influenced by hermetic-theosophical thought in the wake of Paracelsus and Jacob Boehme,[9] it is not surprising that Baur believed he had found his own Hegelian philosophy back in Boehme. For many later thinkers, who saw German Idealism—and dialectical materialism as its 'reversal'—as the historical root of all modern political ideologies (→ Political Religion), it was easy to conclude from his synthesis that 'gnosticism' was the ultimate root of all the troubles of the modern world. However, because Baur's concept of gnosis itself rested on Idealistic premises, it could hardly be used as basis for a criticism of Idealism; instead, one frequently fell back on the old heresiological model of gnosticism as the 'primal enemy.'

From these foundations derive most of the theories of 'gnosticism' that have been developed by modern thinkers as a tool for analyzing → modernity. One of the most influential among them is the political philosopher Eric Voegelin (1901–1985), who vehemently denounces the 'gnosticism' of modernity in general and the great political → ideologies in particular. In fact, however, Voegelin's theory is based upon a fatal confusion between gnosticism on the one hand, and apocalypticism and millenarianism on the other (→ Apocalypse; Millenarianism/Chiliasm);[10] as a result, a great variety of modern currents and phenomena that actually have no connection with anything resembling ancient 'gnosticism' are nevertheless presented as such. In Voegelin's imagination, which sometimes borders on the paranoid, 'gnosticism' became the demonic enemy of all true 'classical and Christian' values, and the term ultimately covered the whole of modernity and all that he rejected in it.

No less influential is the theory of Hans Blumenberg, which again reflects a basic terminological confusion. In sharp opposition to Voegelin, Blumenberg sees modernity not as "the gnostic era" but as "the second victory over gnosticism" (for the first victory, by the Christian church, had only seemingly been successful). It is quite clear that for Blumenberg, 'gnosis' actually means the doctrine of Marcion. However, we have seen that Marcion is a boundary case at best: a 'gnostic' who does not appeal to gnosis, and in whose perspective one does not find the basic myth of the return of the divine spark to its origin. Accordingly, the celebrated "Blumenberg-thesis" in fact argues (correctly or not) that modernity is the "second victory over Marcionism," not gnosticism.

Quite similar conclusions can be drawn about most other contemporary constructs of 'gnosticism.' Ioan P. Culianu has argued very to the point (and very amusingly)[11] that almost all modern currents and personalities of any importance have sometimes been characterized by somebody as 'gnostic.' In many cases we are dealing here with dubious associations and intuitions that have their ultimate basis in the heresiological construct rather than in a careful comparison between late antique ideas and their alleged modern counterparts. In the wake of authors such as Voegelin, connections between gnosticism and → National Socialism have been particularly common; but it is quite clear that the intuitive attraction of such comparisons rests mainly upon popular images of gnosticism as the diabolical enemy par excellence. In recent years, the genre of cultural criticism based upon the 'gnosticism'-model has been gaining considerably in sophistication: reflecting the burst of new scholarship based upon the Nag Hammadi collection, authors such as Michael Pauen,[12] Kirsten J. Grimstad,[13] or Cyril O'Regan[14] (to take only a few examples) seriously discuss the ancient sources and the problems of scholarly interpretation and terminology before applying their concepts of gnosticism to philosophers such as Jacob Boehme, Ludwig Klages, Ernst Bloch, Martin Heidegger, Theodor W. Adorno, or Thomas Mann. Still, the very title of a book such as Pauen's, Dithyrambiker des Untergangs: Gnostizismus in Ästhetik und Philosophie der Moderne (Ger., "Dithyrambics of Decline: Gnosticism in Modern Aesthetics and Philosophy"), relies for its appeal on the suggestion that the old enemy of 'gnosticism' has been responsible for the catastrophe of the Third Reich.

Relatively independent from this entire tradition of 'gnosis'-constructs in the wake of Baur, Hans Jonas (1903–1993) proposed a quite different thesis about "modern gnosticism" in the second edition (1962) of his standard work The Gnostic Religion.[15] Jonas saw a profound similarity between the ancient gnostic experience of 'alienation' from the world and the modern experience of Geworfensein that is basic to modern nihilism and existentialism. This was a fruitful thesis that has led to interesting insights, but has also been frequently misused. Notably, quite some authors have concluded that if the gnostics felt themselves to be strangers in this world, it follows that any reference to such 'alienation' is proof of a gnosticism; the result is, again, that countless authors who have nothing in common with the ideas of ancient 'gnosticism,' are confidently presented as 'gnostics' merely because they express some sentiment of alienation.

Neo-Gnosticism

Entirely independent of the tradition outlined above, there have been various attempts in modern history of reviving 'gnosticism.' Up to the discovery of the Nag Hammadi Library, such attempts were bound to rely essentially on the testimonies of the anti-gnostic writers. The worldviews, beliefs and practices rejected by Christian orthodoxy could be read as sources of inspiration for those who rejected conventional Christianity and its values, but also by those who saw in gnosticism the deeper core of true Christianity that had unfortunately been rejected by orthodoxy.

The complex myth of fall and reintegration expounded by Martines de Pasqually (d. 1774), and basic to his initiatic order of Élus Coëns, is a good early example of the latter approach: the members of this order were required to be practicing Roman Catholics as well.[16] Very different in that respect is the Église Gnostique (French, "Gnostic Church") created in 1890 by the spiritualist and occultist Jules-Benoît Doinel: inspired by ancient gnosticism as well as by Catharism, Doinel created a kind of gnostic counter-church complete with a hierarchy of bishops, which spawned several offshoots.[17] This was the beginning of an entire lineage of occultist groups with a special interest in 'gnostic rites.' Among them, special mention must be made of the Ordo Templi Orientis (OTO) of Aleister Crowley (1875–1947); in 1913 Crowley wrote a "gnostic mass," full of sexual symbolism and clearly inspired by the heresiological concept of a 'libertinist' gnosis, and which was intended for public service in the context of the OTO.[18] Such a perception of 'gnosticism' as involving sexual rites can be found in various other magical/occultist orders of the twentieth century (→ Occultism), such as Giuliano Kremmerz's Fraternity of Miriam and its offshoots, or the Fraternitas Saturni founded by Eugen Grosche in 1926.[19]

Throughout the twentieth century, 'gnosticism' has become a standard ingredient of esoteric religiosity. Due notably to the writings and translations of the Theosophist G. R. S. Mead (1863–1933), the known gnostic sources became a source of inspiration in the Theosophical Society (→ Theosophical/Anthroposophical Society). Jörg Lanz von Liebenfels's (1874–1954) extreme anti-Semitic worldview of Ariosophy uses gnostic mythology to describes the Aryan 'man of light' as a spiritual being who must free himself from the darkness, materialism, and bestiality of the inferior Semitic races (→ Anti-Semitism).[20] Entirely different again is the Lectorium Rosicrucianum founded by Jan van Rijckenborgh (1896–1968), which combines Rosicrucian and Theosophical Christian traditions with a strong dualism explicitly based upon gnostic models. Gnostic models are basic even to various contemporary → UFO-cults; for example, in 1997 the members of a group called Heaven's Gate decided to leave this material world and return to the spiritual world of light by committing collective suicide.

While all the examples mentioned above rely essentially on the model of mythological gnosis, as the Nag Hammadi Library became more widely known since the 1980s, newly discovered texts such as the Gospel of Truth or the Gospel of Thomas have become a source of inspiration for those in contemporary Western society who are searching for a ‘new spirituality’ (→ New Age). Instead of dualistic myths of fall, alienation and return, such new developments emphasize, rather, the universality of ‘gnosis’ as an intuitive rather than a doctrinal road of access to divine truth. Remarkably, those who are inspired by such types of ‘new gnosis’ may see them as quite compatible with an optimistic and world-affirming religiosity.

1. Williams 1996.
2. King 2003.
3. King 2003, 7.
4. For a more detailed overview, see van den Broek 2005.
5. Van den Broek 2005.
6. Van den Broek 1998.
7. Blumenberg 1985, 144 (“den Urfeind, der nicht von außen kam, sondern schon an der Wurzel des christlichen Ursprungs saß”).
8. The term was introduced by Rolf Christian Zimmermann in his standard work on the worldview of the young Goethe (notably Zimmermann 1969, 19-38); for recent developments, see Neugebauer-Wölk 1999.
9. For Romanticism, see e.g. the overview in McCalla 2005. For German Idealism, see e.g. Vieillard-Baron 1999.
10. Hanegraaff 1998.
11. Culianu 1984.
12. Pauen 1994.
13. Grimstad 2002.
14. O’Regan 2001; 2002.
15. Jonas 1963.
16. Var 2005a; 2005b.
17. Toth 2005.
18. For Crowley, and for a guide to the literature on this figure, see Pasi 2005a. For the OTO, see Pasi 2005b.
19. Introvigne 2005; Hakl 2005.
20. Goodrick-Clarke 1992.

Literature

Blumenberg, Hans, Säkularisierung und Selbstbehauptung, Frankfurt/M. 1985; Culianu, Ioan P., “The Gnostic Revenge: Gnosticism and Romantic Literature,” in: Taubes, Jacob (ed.), Religionstheorie und Politische Theologie, vol. 2: Gnosis und Politik, Paderborn 1984, 290-306; Carlos Gilly, “Das Bekenntnis zur Gnosis von Paracelsus bis auf die Schüler Jacob Böhmes,” in: van den Broek/van Heertum 2000, 385-425; Goodrick-Clarke, Nicholas, The Occult Roots of Nazism, London/New York [2]1992; Grimstad, Kirsten J., The Modern Revival of Gnosticism and Thomas Mann’s Doktor Faustus, Rochester 2002; Hakl, Hans Thomas, “Fraternitas Saturni,” in: DGWE; Hanegraaff, Wouter J., “On the Construction of ‘Esoteric Traditions,’” in: Faivre, Antoine/Hanegraaff, Wouter J. (eds.), Western Esotericism and the Science of Religion, Louvain 1998, 11-61; Idem (ed.), in collaboration with Antoine Faivre, Roelof van den Broek & Jean-Pierre Brach, Dictionary of Gnosis and Western Esotericism, Leiden 2005 (=DGWE); Introvigne, Massimo, “Kremmerz, Giuliano,” in: DGWE; Jonas, Hans, The Gnostic Religion, Boston [2]1963; King, Karen L., What is Gnosticism?, Cambridge 2003; Layton, Bentley, “Prolegomena to the Study of Ancient Gnosticism,” in: White, L. Michael/Yarbrough, O. Larry (eds.), The Social Worlds of the First Christians, Minneapolis 1995, 334-350; McCalla, Arthur, “Romanticism,” in: DGWE; Neugebauer-Wölk, Monika (ed.), Aufklärung und Esoterik, Hamburg 1999; O’Regan, Cyril, Gnostic Return in Modernity, Albany 2001; Idem, Gnostic Apocalypse: Jacob Boehme’s Haunted Narrative, Albany 2002; Pasi, Marco, “Crowley, Aleister” and “Ordo Templi Orientis,” in: DGWE; Pauen, Michael, Dithyrambiker des Untergangs: Gnostizismus in Ästhetik und Philosophie der Moderne, Berlin 1994; Robinson, James M. (ed.), The Nag Hammadi Library in English, Leiden 1988; Rudolph, Kurt, Gnosis: The Nature and History of Gnosticism, San Francisco 1983; Segal, Robert A. (ed.), The Allure of Gnosticism, Chicago/La Salle 1995; Sloterdijk, Peter/Macho, Thomas H. (eds.), Weltrevolution der Seele: Ein Lese- und Arbeitsbuch der Gnosis van der Spätantike bis zur Gegenwart, 2 vols., Gütersloh 1991; Toth, Ladislaus, "Gnostic Church," in: DGWE; van den Broek, Roelof, Studies in Gnosticism and Alexandrian Christianity, Leiden 1996; Idem, "The Cathars: Medieval Gnostics?," in: van den Broek/Hanegraaff 1998, 87-108; Idem, "Gnosticism I" and "Gnostic Literature I," in: DGWE; van den Broek, Roelof/Hanegraaff, Wouter J. (eds.), Gnosis and Hermeticism From Antiquity to Modern Times, Albany 1998; van den Broek, Roelof/van Heertum, Cis (eds.), From Poimandres to Jacob Böhme: Gnosis, Hermetism and the Christian Tradition, Amsterdam 2000; Var, Jean-François, "Martinism: First Period" and "Pasqually, Martines de," in: DGWE; Vieillard-Baron, Jean-Louis, Hegel et l'Idéalisme Allemand, Paris 1999; Williams, Michael Allen, Rethinking "Gnosticism": An Argument for Dismantling a Dubious Category, Princeton 1996; Zimmermann, Rolf Christian, Das Weltbild des jungen Goethe, 2 vols., Munich 1969/1979.

→ Antiquity, Body, Dualism, Esotericism, Hermetism/Hermeticism, Light/Enlightenment, Meaning/Signification, National Socialism, Occultism, Political Religion, Reception, Soul

Wouter J. Hanegraaff

God / Gods / The Sacred

1. Should one seek to apply the expression 'God,' 'the Sacred,' or 'the Holy,' academically, one would first have to become clear on the presuppositions involved. The Christian tradition has long opposed the one true God to the many false gods, first those of antiquity. God is essentially a 'person,' that is, a 'vis-à-vis.' The concept of God implies evaluations (true/false, good/bad) and a distinction between monotheism and polytheism. The one excludes alternatives, and the other presupposes them. This classification underwent a relativization in the Renaissance. Antiquity then became regarded as a positive exemplar of a world of gods. The Enlightenment introduced the principle of reason as a norm into the concept of God: God was determined essentially by (the one) reason. Thus the conception of a person vanished: it was no longer the powerful vis-à-vis, but a calculable structure, that shaped the deity. In a counterstroke, Romanticism found the experience of the divinity in aesthetics and emotions; God became 'unnamable'; the divine was now but within, accessible only to individual experience, and no longer in a world beyond. In this case as well, a depersonalization manifests itself.

'The Holy'

Corresponding to this modern tendency is the replacement of God as the fundamental religious object, in religious studies around 1900, with an impersonal concept: namely, the idea of the 'Sacred' or 'Holy.' Now, this Sacred can be conceived basically in various ways—either as a subjective area, e.g. as a certain experience, or as an element of relation. In the latter case, the Sacred appears as related to a counter-concept, the Profane; or in further relations, as between the Sacred and the Pure.

Since the nineteenth century, religion has gotten into the undertow of concepts of evolution. The idea of progress suggested, to culture and therewith to religion, a constant development (→ Evolutionism). Correspondingly, the conceptualization of God was supposed to have unfolded from an impersonal primitive condition of belief in demons to polytheism and then to monotheism. Or contrariwise, the primordial unity (also of the concept of God) has been broken. The two notions returned as academic concepts: as the model of perfectibility and unification on the one hand, as a model of decadence on the other.

God, child, and thespian: Rāma at the Rāmlīlā. A rest period during the thirty-day presentation of the sacred drama Rāmlīlā (Rāma's Play, in Ramnagar in the vicinity of Benares). The youth playing the god Rāma sits under an arbor of leaves, clad, painted, and bejeweled as a divine image. For the duration of the presentation, he forsakes his individual name, and himself becomes the god Rāma whom he represents (svarūpa). He sits motionless, while men reverence him by fanning him, seeking his proximity and his glance (darśana), or reciting the Rāmacaritamānasa—textual basis of the sacred drama—and a paraphrase of the Sanskrit epic, Rāmāyana. (J. Gengnagel)

Scholars tried to determine the status of the concept 'sacred/holy' (1) as metaphysical, (2) as transcendental, or (3) empirically. In the first case, we are dealing with a 'theological' determination. To it, an antithetical religious criticism corresponds: God or the Sacred is then 'nothing else' but a projection of unattainable human wishes. Rudolf Otto attempted the second possibility. On this count, the Sacred would be an a priori category closed to further elucidation, but lying at the basis of every concrete religious experience. In modern academic study of religion, the last of the three possibilities, the empirical determination, has prevailed.

2. Looking at the history of theory one must be skeptical of so-called universally valid definitions of 'God,' or of 'the Sacred,' in the sense of alternatives, or of homonymous determinations of being, or even only as constant determinations of function. 'God' and 'the Holy' are therefore being handled here not as the 'basic datum' of religion, but—etically—as concepts of descriptive speech, which denote first of all what one has designated as 'God' and 'the Sacred' in the Western/Muslim cultural context. In other contexts, 'God' and 'the Sacred' can name comparable things; the comparability, however, always has to be demonstrated.

Does Every Religion Need 'God'? Anthropomorphism

a) To describe God as a 'person' suggests an interpretation of the 'other,' or of → transcendence, mainly after the enlarged model of the human being ('anthropomorphism'). There are also other possibilities: interpretations after the form of beasts ('theriomorphism'), of plants ('phytomorphism'), or of other elements of nature (sky, wind, rain, sunset, mountains, rivers, and so on), and finally after the form of buildings, elements of the same, musical instruments, and so on ('technomorphic' interpretations). In many religions, distinct conceptualizations are available for one and the same form. In ancient Egypt, for instance, the deity of heaven could take form as a woman, a cow, the roof of a temple, and the sky.

For the Greeks, this treatment of the gods was striking, since in Greece non-anthropomorphic interpretations had extensively disappeared. Gods, therefore, must first be investigated in terms of the material of their formation.

Superhuman

b) The analogy of the human form, however, typically collapses when 'the other' manifests itself in the deity. Gods are different from human beings, and they manifest their 'otherness' through typical qualities distinct from the human: they are immortal (this is the main characteristic not only of the Greek gods, but also of the Mesopotamian), or else can cross the boundaries between life and death, in either direction. Often—although they guarantee justice!—they are unjust (for example, Zeus; but also rather frequently, YHWH). They are not male or female, but androgynous (as the Egyptian 'primordial gods'), and so on. Otherness is variously accentuated: it is stressed most powerfully in the exclusive monotheisms. For Christianity and Islam, God is the 'utterly Other,' other not only from human beings, but from the world as such. The distinction between God and not-God is the fundamental characteristic of these symbolical systems. Nevertheless, anthropomorphism is retained in the concept of God, and this feature leads to problems—which, in each of the three religions, were developed somewhat differently, and were reflected on in different theological ways (although not solved).

c) On the one hand, the anthropomorphic form of the god can be developed in various degrees, and on the other, naturally, it is always dependent on human beings' perception of themselves that is specific to each respective culture. As for the degree of development, it is of importance, for example, whether the figure is lent constancy or not, whether it has a determinate profile, whether it has a name, whether intercommunication with it is possible. This is shown in the very bestowal of the name: figures that appear only once, or that are scarcely perceptible, that express themselves only in aggressive violence, and for whom no communication exists, will scarcely have the word 'god' attributed to them.

An anthropomorphic interpretation of the gods suggests possibilities for the area of differentiation and relationship that are also valid for the world of human beings. Thus, gods are often distinguished by gender (male and female), are ordered according to generation ('old' and 'young' gods, or even three generations: grandparents, parents, and children), have social and economic functions (represent professions, etc.).

Different Gods

Relations among the Gods

d) As a rule, even the individual god of a polytheistic system represents a rich network of relationships. In polytheistic systems, for example, gods often mark a social position, certain areas of experience, a geographical orientation, and much else (thus, Zeus stands for rule and government, disposition of the course of storms, he dwells on Olympus and in other particular regions). In gods, then, relations are thematized that stamp the order of the world; the web of relationships among the gods represents this order as a whole. If the multiplicity of the gods is limited to one figure, then the complexity of the latter must increase: it embraces an infinitely great number of sometimes fleeting relations.

Representing the Gods

3. Gods must be somehow open to human → communication. Speech, behavior, image, and music are variously suited to express concepts of God. A deity understood as a person can first and foremost come to presentation in speech and image. One can recount of gods, describe them, reflect on them. One can paint them, form them in plastic art, and present their behavior (gods can be presented dramatically or imitated in dance).

Here it is striking that, frequently, only certain possibilities are selected as means to presentation. In many religions, a rich, often also profoundly meditated, iconography determines the presentation of the gods; in other cases, the visually perceptible image may not be permitted—in Judaism, and subsequently in Islam as well, and (albeit in a relativized way) in Christianity.

God in Persons' Lives

The processes of communication in which the gods appear can be described from syntactic, semantic, and pragmatic viewpoints respectively. First, syntactically, one must describe the other elements of the symbolical system with which gods are connected. Semantically, one can inquire after the 'meanings' belonging to a divinity, typical experiences occasioned by it in devotees, when these have to do with them, or 'fields of resonance' in the world of human life with which the effectiveness of a god is connected. The Mesopotamian sun god, for instance, is experienced in the brightness of sunlight and judicial decisions, the Greek Ares in the senseless slaughter of war. Finally, pragmatically, one must inquire into the communicational context of application in which a deity appears. 'Gods' are not always the object of concern: there are also 'high gods,' upon whom one calls only in dire need, or 'personal gods,' in whose constant company one abides by way of amulets.

Conversation and Care

While God appears in the view of (religious) scholarship as an addressee of religious communication, God is also a partner (in communication), albeit in an entirely different way. In many religions, an I-Thou relationship stands in the foreground: God can be addressed in prayer or oath, God's image can be 'dealt with' (greeted, clothed, nourished). This activity forms and thematizes a boundary between God and the human being. Further, 'identifying' forms of communication also appear, and in multiplicity: in Australian rituals summoning the 'dream time,' the participant in worship plays the higher beings; but mystical experiences also readily occasion the surrender of the distinguishing I-Thou relationship in favor of an identification.

4. Communication with the god implies certain experiences: the 'Other' is established in a region characteristically raised up above the 'normal.' This phenomenon can be described, on the one side, with respect to the social dimension and its varying regulation; or, instead, with regard to a psychological dimension. Here, the complex of the Sacred is adjoined to the problematics of God.

'The Sacred': Social and Spatial Separation

a) In a social respect, the Sacred can be specified as societally determined and established spaces of experience, which transcend the space of profane experience: for both spaces, particularities prevail in the regulation of behavior and relationship, of communication. However, there are often stages or steps in sacred space, there are distinct non-sacred spaces, there exist different relationships between these spaces and a multifarious drawing of boundaries. One schema is quite widespread, for example, in which the center of spatial orientation, as the place where the divinity or its representation are to be found, is maximally sacred, with particular subordinate spaces being thereupon preferred to others, such as dwelling space, garden, heath, or deep forest (as with the Lugbara). Here, however, multiple relationships prevail between the 'sacred' and the 'foreign' (for example, deep forest), and both regions are excluded from the 'normal.' This is also the reason why connections frequently exist between concepts of the 'unclean' and those of the 'sacred.'

Differently regulated areas are not limited to the world at hand: they also appear in the imagination of a linguistic or graphic presentation. In this dimension, the Sacred becomes more flexible: for example, temporal dimensions can be introduced. In paradise God and human beings lived together at the same place. Divisions were established with the 'Fall'—denoting certain important weighty events that are often ambivalent, and therefore not unambiguously unsalutary, and yet without which a 'sacred space' cannot be constituted. Eschatological expectations render such differentiations retroactive, and await a sacralization of the entire world (Paul, for instance, awaits a world in which God is 'all in all')—or else a transformation of all into chaos.

Transition to Sacred Space

b) The differences in regulation meet with very distinct dimensions of relation. First, there are certain ethical or ritual prerequisites for approaching a transition to a special space; specific forms of 'purity'; frequently, particular → initiations are prerequisite. The transition is accompanied by changes in vesture (removal of shoes, shaving the head—or instead, covering it—donning of special clothing—or instead, nudity), gesturing (prostration at transition, execution of determinate motions, washing and cleansing oneself), seclusion (→ Penance/Penitent). In sacred space itself, things occur that are otherwise impossible. It is a widespread principle that the slaughtering of animals be limited to sacred space. The killing not only serves the nutrition of persons, but simultaneously puts in motion a communication with the powers beyond, that are in a position to grant life and take it.

Psychic Confrontation

c) The psychological side, the quality of the Sacred (or → Holy) by which it can be experienced, has been described by Rudolf Otto in an influential treatise: the essential thing is an experience of ambivalence, which, on the one hand, attracts and fascinates, and on the other frightens and arouses fear. This experience is especially charged with feeling: it remains in the memory, and is thus enabled to render impressions permanent if they are engraved in sacred space. Granted, it must be kept in mind that this ideal experience receives its respective specific societal imprint in each cultural context, and that the intensity of the experience as one enters sacred space is highly variable. And ritual routine can make the extraordinary element in the experience of the Sacred shrink to zero.

5. In cultures whose religious system is subjected to a reflection, the concept of God, or an impersonal correlate, finds a rational treatment.

Greek Antiquity

a) In Greece, even in Hesiod we observe a configuration of the image of Zeus as the dominant God developed in this way. In Orphism, pantheistic tendencies arise. Zeus, as the actual being of the world, is transformed into various shapes. In most configurations of Greek philosophy, the premise of a unitary world-principle and its identification with the one God is self-evident. Here proximity or distance vis-à-vis traditional religious practice is ranged along a broad spectrum. While certain currents make use of received cults and their traditions (under interpretative refiguring, naturally, especially in the Stoa and in Neo-Platonism), other approaches to traditional religion are critical (Xenophanes), or at least skeptical. Many groups dissociate themselves from society altogether (Pythagoreans).

Hinduism and Buddhism

In Indian culture, similar speculations occur scattered throughout the Vedas already; then, in post-Vedic time, they form into different 'schools.' Here, first, an impersonal notion of the divine prevails, within a monistic or dualistic interpretation. The depersonalization (and detachment from objective thought at all) becomes unsurpassable in Buddhism, where conceptions of transcendence are completely transformed, and made over altogether to the area of spiritual processes. But personal concepts, as well, are developed (in the framework of Hinduism, in the Bhakti movement; in Buddhism, with the emergence of the concepts of the Bodhisattva). First and foremost, these are elitist concepts of God or the 'Sacred,' which justify the lifestyle of the upper class, who have invented them. Transitions to a folk piety (especially in Indian culture) are nevertheless possible.

Jewish-Christian-Muslim Tradition

b) In the area of Jewish-Christian-Muslim tradition, reflection was challenged by concrete historical events, and this history has determined the image of God accordingly. Here, the personal notion of the 'Other' has prevailed. Monotheism—that is, the sharp antithesis of God and the world—means first of all the immunization of the concept of God from historical questioning: God is uncoupled from the lot and fortune of his people, his venerators, from the processes and conditions of the world. This separation makes the concept of God more attainable, as it were; but it also makes it more difficult to convey. Religious practices of socialization must be intensified: membership in the religious (and not simply the traditional) community is no longer self-evident.

All of this rational configuring of concepts of transcendence, as God or as impersonal transcendence, is marked in a high degree by linguistic discursive moments. That is, types of → theology, and of philosophy of religion, appear that attempt to express the intellectual content of the respective concepts as precisely as possible. To be sure, the aspects not representable through this type of communication win little attention: there remains only an elitist image of God or of impersonal transcendence.

6. In manifold ways, the Western → Enlightenment has been understood as the 'upbeat' of a gradual → disenchantment of the world, and of its deprivation of its gods. Actually, there are various interrelated processes to be observed: the traditional religious symbolical systems have lost plausibility; they are appropriated individually (if at all); and concepts of God, in this individualization, frequently surrender their contours—they are unstable and fluctuating. Social control of the symbolical system has more or less disappeared: individuals have complete freedom of belief, which is guaranteed by the constitution of the modern state. Logical positivism has finally declared the discourse upon God as meaningless. Furthermore, ecumenical movements in inter-confessional, or even inter-religious, discourse have stressed an identity of the God reverenced in all confessions and religions, and movements of revitalization see the traditional gods once again at work. The measure of the dependency on these religious contextual conditions, when it comes to concern with God and the Sacred in religious studies, is not to be underestimated. It was the modern disappearance of the gods that provided room for religious studies to critically consider its objects in the first place, and the new upswing of the religious element would counsel against any underestimation here.

Literature

Barth, Ulrich/Gräb, Wilhelm, Gott im Selbstbewußtsein der Moderne. Zum neuzeitlichen Begriff der Religion, Gütersloh 1993; Bennett, Clinton, In Search of the Sacred. Anthropology and the Study of Religions, London 1996; Durkheim, Émile, The Elementary Forms of Religious Life, New York 1965 (French 1912); Eliade, Mircea, The Sacred and the Profane, New York 1959; Dux, Günter, Logik der Weltbilder, Frankfurt/M. 1982; Gooch, Todd A., The Numinous and Modernity: An Interpretation of Rudolf Otto's Philosophy of Religion, Berlin/New York 2000; Hick, John, An Interpretation of Religion: Human Responses to the Transcendent, New Haven/London 1989; Hornung, Erik, Der Eine und die Vielen, Darmstadt 1971; Idinopulos, Thomas A./Yonan, Edward A. (eds.), The Sacred and its Scholars: Comparative Methodologies for the Study of Primary Religious Data, Leiden 1996; Idowu, E. Bolaji, Oludumare—God in Yoruba Belief, London 1962; Molendijk, Arie L./Pels, Peter (eds.), Religion in the Making: The Emergence of the Sciences of Religion, Leiden 1998; Otto, Rudolf, The Idea of the Holy, London 1950 (German 1917); Smith, Jonathan Z., Imagining Religion: From Babylon to Jonestown, Chicago 1982; Stolz, Fritz, Einführung in den biblischen Monotheismus, Darmstadt 1996; Topitsch, Ernst, Vom Ursprung und Ende der Metaphysik, Munich

1972; Vergote, Antoine/Tamayo, Alvaro, The Parental Figures and the Representation of God: A Psychological Cross-Cultural Study, The Hague 1981.

→ Holy, Monotheism, Polytheism, Religion, Transcendent

Fritz Stolz

Golem

The diagram by Mark Podwal is based on a conceptualization that the golem was created with the assistance of kabbalistic alphabetical mysticism. Dancing symbols surround the ten Sefirot (traits of God), which are sketched here as spheres and arranged in anthropoid form.

The golem (Hebr., 'unformed mass'), a figure from Jewish folk mythology, is an artificial anthropoid, whose magical creation is attributed in most literary sources to historical Rabbi Loew (c. 1512–1609). The origin of the legend of the golem is difficult to trace. Its first mentions (in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries) refer to a golem narrative said to date from the fourth century BCE. The key setting of the presentation of the golem is most often a situation of need or persecution among the population of the Jewish ghetto in Prague. In order to counter this situation, the golem is made of mud or clay, and appears as a powerful defender, given life through kabbalistic number-mysticism (symbols on the forehead or miraculous amulets). The golem performs persons' labor, and defends the weak. Finally, he goes out of control, becomes a danger—even for his creator—and must be destroyed (becoming earth or loam once more).

Gustav Meyrink's free adaptation of the material in his novel Der Golem (Ger., "The Golem"; 1915), and the silent film Der Golem, wie er in die Welt kam (Ger., "The Golem: How He Came into the World"; 1920) familiarized a broad non-Jewish audience with the motif. The history of its reception can be traced through theater presentations, comic strips, books, and fantasy plays down to our own day. A related plot is found in Mary Shelley's Frankenstein (1818). In addition to its function as prime image of the monster who is fundamentally good natured, but of uncouth fashion and creation, and therefore unpredictable, the golem became the code for the possibilities and risks of scientific and technological progress.

Gershom Scholem (→ Kabbalah) is deliberately referring to this when he names the first Israeli computer, constructed in the Weizman Research Institute, "Golem Aleph." The intelligent machine lifts burdens from human shoulders, but not all consequences can be calculated. A further literary entry in this vein is Stanislaw Lem's Golem XIV (1981), a process calculator with qualities of understanding, which finally becomes superior to its human creators.

Literature

Goldsmith, Arnold L., The Golem Remembered: Variations of a Jewish Legend, Detroit 1981; Idel, Moshe, Golem: Jewish Magical and Mystical Traditions on the Artificial Anthropoid, Albany 1989; Scholem, Gershom, Die Vorstellung vom Golem in ihren tellurischen und magischen Beziehungen, Zurich 1954.

→ Demon/Demonology, Judaism, Kabbalah, Magic, Zombie

Claudia Haydt

Government / Rule / Politics / State

Secular and Religious Power

1. a) As Jesus is interrogated before Pilate as to whether he has planned an overthrow of Roman rule, the Roman governor asks him: "Are you the King of the Jews?" Jesus answers (in John 18:33-19:30): "My kingdom is not of this world." The philosophically trained general presses the higher ruler of the world, as he has understood things, to defend himself; however, the latter does not see the meaning of his mission in the preservation of his life: "You would have no power over me unless it had been given you from above." (The expression "from above" is used in order to avoid pronouncing the name of God, which was forbidden to the Jews.) In the Judeo-Christian tradition, principles seem to emerge from this confrontation as to how the relationship between government and religion is to be defined. That is, (1) they belong to discrete echelons of life. (2) The exercise of power is not the task of religion; rather, it is left to secular rulers. (3) But secular power has its limits in the power of God: regimes are introduced by God, and judge themselves in terms of how they have succeeded. Thus, history is left to God's decision—sooner or later.

b) However, the scene of Pilate's interrogation did not permit the positing of supra-temporal principles. The Evangelist John sees, for one thing, the God-human Christ in a struggle against the world. For another, the Jewish religion (except for the four hundred years of the kingdom that lasted until the destruction of Jerusalem in 587 BCE) was always under foreign rule; only as the State of Israel was founded in 1948 have Jews had a state of their own (albeit not a religious one). The first Christians too lived in opposition to a foreign rule, and the idea was not basically altered even as Christianity became the religion of the Empire. That religion does not form its own government, but is dependent on a good secular government—the 'two kingdoms'—becomes a doctrine formulated programmatically by → Augustine in his City of God (after 410) and by Luther in the 'doctrine of the two kingdoms' (around 1525). Christians regarded resistance to the prevailing political order, then, as something unthinkable, even against the Nazi reign of terror. This makes Christians' deficiency in their understanding of government rather clear.

Separation of Church and State

c) A peculiarity is presented in the Western world by its sharp separation of government and religion. In its battle with the absolutist kingdom 'of God's grace,' the French Revolution defined the state in non-religious terms (1794). The reaction was that the churches themselves formed into institutions that followed their own (particular) interests. Especially in France, the conflict became so acute that, to this day, the churches are not financed by public funds; nor may they be represented in the schools, but children are instructed in 'morality.' Émile Durkheim, who fought for the corresponding law in 1905, stamped into religious studies the sharp split of the world into 'sacred and profane.' While in the tradition of the → Enlightenment (Rousseau's religion civile; → Civil Religion), the notion of 'morality' denotes a system of values and norms for which society is responsible; the contrary position finds its expression in the formula, "The liberal legal state posits premises that it cannot itself guarantee."[1] The state must hold a "neutral worldview," and guarantee the religions the free space to form conscience (→ Freedom of Religion).

Politics or Religion? The act of then Minister President, and President of the German Federal Council, Gerhard Schröder, who on 24 March 1998 laid a stone on the grave of assassinated Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin (1922–1995), originates in Jewish tradition, coming down from the time in which grave markers were made of heaps of stones. In order to preserve the grave, each visitor placed a stone on it, a custom maintained even after gravestones came into use. Symbolic gestures such as these belong to the standard repertoire of the modern politician. It seems worthy of note that the boundaries between sacred and profane acts are intentionally blurred: Schröder 'acts as if' he were a member of the Jewish community. (Hubert Mohr)

d) But the state guarantee of religious freedom leads to quite distinct consequences. In France, laicism completely separates church and state; in Germany, the ruler of the region was patron of the church, so that priests were regional functionaries in charge of moral supervision and instruction in the schools. The Weimar constitution (parag. 149) and the German Basic Law (art. 7, no. 3) provide for extensive privileges for religion, for example, in the areas of religious education and church taxes.

e) In the Islamic Revolution, in → Iran and Algeria, the separation of government and religion is abolished once more. From a Western viewpoint, the rationalization of government becomes retroactive. However, this outcome owes less to Islam's having no Enlightenment—in fact, the contrary is true—than to pressure from the colonial powers to introduce the Code Napoléon and a non-religious, liberal form of state. When the constrained separation is removed, it is a question not of a faulty development, but of the discovery of an identity of two cultures in conflict. The liberal state seems a form of rule of the West over the Arab world.

Invisible Foundation of Government

2. a) Government seems to be based on inequality. Since ancient times, government has been founded on the notion that nature (and God as its creator) has willed a system of 'superordination.' The series of creatures becomes a series of ranks—a natural 'sacred order,' willed by God, and termed Greek a → hierarchy. For his fight with democracy in his home city of Athens, Plato, in his Politics (c. 365 BCE), maintains that, after the model of the soul, governance must make reason the ruler of the soul, and suppress the desires. Accordingly, in human society, the philosophers (such as Plato himself), with their military subordinates, ought to rule the rest of human beings, who (as Athenian democracy shows) determine politics correspondingly with their desires (interests). Everyone has had his 'natural' place assigned in society. In the Middle Ages, the three-tiered government, with the philosopher-kings, the military, and the people, became the model for the state. The mystical

As military dictator of Iraq, Saddam Hussein had been concerned to ban the influence of religion on public life. Even before the Gulf Wars of 1980–1999, the aim of laicism began its about-face: large mosques were built with public monies, religious prohibitions such as that against alcohol were officially legislated. The dictator was himself shown in the media at prayer. Religion—and this not only in Islam—was once more perceived as a potential for resistance, and as a factor in government.

vision of the first philosopher to be converted to Christianity, Denis the Areopagite, became the basis for Luther's doctrine of 'calling' that transfers to the rulers the calling (i.e., God's 'assignment'), but refuses self-determination to the revolutionaries of 1525. (A Neoplatonic philosopher composed a work entitled The Heavenly Hierarchy under Denis's name around 500.[2]) The National Socialists claimed that they stood in the tradition of the three conditions with their dictatorship and its own three conditions—Lehrstand, Wehrstand, Nährstand (Ger., "teaching condition, defense condition, nutrition condition"). They further claimed that these conditions were primordial, namely, the oldest model of government, and that they had originated with the Indo-Europeans themselves.[3] Inasmuch as the fantasy hierarchy is projected into the beyond, and returns as 'God's will,' it is not revisable or questionable. The prevailing order can be justified as a 'holy order,' a norm presented as contrary to the received norm. Terrestrial government is but the earthly division of a comprehensive world order, transparent only to the 'knowing,' but extending down to the least details.

b) But the 'knowing' are not always the governing. Although they have a better understanding of things, they must submit to foolish decisions. The discrepancy calls for an explanation—as they see it—that persons should accept governance that runs counter to their good and, indeed, causes → suffering. The end of the world, whose ultimate cause is the unattainable God, is not expected here and today; thus, conflicts are deprived of a concrete purpose. The best, the genuine, comes only later. Then would religion be the invention of those who govern, or of the weaker, the 'opiate' that makes life bearable? In Christianity, with its concern for the weaker, → Nietzsche saw the expression of a slave morality.

Representation

3. Representation of government: a) Rule or government is first of all a claim, a pretension. For it to become reality (power), it must be imposed on the ruled. Government, as Max → Weber defined it,[4] is the "prospect of finding obedience for commands with an indictable group of persons." Government of person on person is rather the exceptional case, however:

it presupposes that both accept the super- and subordination. Government is always an arrangement—not always, or 'originally,' a voluntary consensus. Since the governor can seldom personally impose it, its pretensions must be raised through representation: through signs, habituated procedures and institutions, it expects acceptance even when it provides something that the governed (and frequently even the governor) fails to perceive. Belief in an authority ensures a behavior upon which the individual does not personally decide; religion either is itself such an authority, or certifies rule; less often, it forms an alternative. Especially in the Judeo-Christian tradition, in theory, it is reserved to religion to set up a norm in confrontation with actual government; in practice, however, religion usually legitimizes the prevailing governance here as well.

Personal Government or Rule

b) In 'personal governance,' the accouterment of rule is bound up with the person of the governor. He traverses his realm, to be present at times. Normally, however, he is absent. He seeks to bind local rulers to self-obligation by means of oaths: substitutes can represent him locally. A 'service' (in Lat., cultus, officium), performed before the image or other representations of the ruler, can recall loyalty to the absent ruler. The invisible God, who also becomes visible only in his representation, forms a possible analogy. The Pope, for example, is called "vicar of Christ on earth."[5] The death of the ruler becomes a critical moment. With the end of the governor, the governance ends, as well. Anarchical plundering of the papal residence follows his death.[6] Proclamations must be once more declared by the next ruler, dated 'by year and day,' in order not to lapse into invalidity. Lest power be endangered by this manner of anarchy, 'transpersonal' concepts of rule develop that survive the death of the ruler, such as that of the 'King's two bodies':[7] besides the mortal body, there is also a body of the 'royal worth.' In actuality, then, the choice of a successor has to be made during the king's lifetime, founded on the 'sanctity of blood' of the ruler's family. In Jewish history, the expectation that, from the family of David, after generations of foreign government, an 'Anointed' one (in Hebr., mashiah, 'Messiah'; in Gk., christós) would be born, was an important element, even after the fall of Jerusalem in 70 CE when there was no longer a political and religious center.

Theologies of Empire

c) It was precisely in this struggle with the Romans that the Jews summoned up their courage from a prophecy that the Roman Empire would perish, and that the Lord of the World would come out of the East.[8] The Romans, after the destruction of Jerusalem, could triumphantly proclaim, instead, that the Roman Empire was the last and the everlasting (see Virgil, Aeneid, 1:279). The dream that Daniel had interpreted and according to which one realm after the other would be destroyed (Dan 7), a promise to the lowly, became the conservative preservation of the existing government. It provided that the continuation of the Empire, instead of the empires, must remain valid for history. The Christians adopted this Translatio imperii (Lat., "transfer of the Empire") as a theology of empire. The end of the world would come only when the last empire had perished: all of them are tools of God's deeds in history. The hope of Revelations (see particularly Rev 13) for the end of the world, which would reverse present unjust relations into their opposite, became the hope that the present world would exist as long as possible. Here the 'Roman' Empire served as a bastion (the katechon, Gk., 'restraining' of 2 Thess 2:6) that would delay the end of the world and the temporary victory of the Antichrist. As Islam threatened the Byzantine Empire in the seventh century, the prophecy (under the name of Methodios) gave hope of a continuation of the Empire. This task of the Emperor was extended in the Western Middle Ages. Only with the prophecy of Joachim of Fiore (1135–1202) do the theology and philosophy of history lose their conservative function, and await the ideal government 'of the Spirit' from a third empire. Karl Löwith, in his Weltgeschichte und Heilsgeschehen (Ger., "World History and Salvation Event"; 1949), reduced all philosophical outlines of history, including those of → political religion, to the same fundamental Christian model, even in cases when, for example, Marx's thinking would have argued without Christian or even clerical notions.

Government and Office in Religions

4. Government within the (revelatory) religions defends its authority on the basis of its claim to the 'true doctrine.' The latter must be demonstrated, inasmuch as competing groups hold that they possess, authentically, the words of their founder. Furthermore, there is need of an uninterrupted succession of the transmittal of those true words through those called to make that transmittal (successio apostolica). Thus, the popes presented themselves (1) as representatives of the master, with their authority from Jesus himself ("You are Peter, and on this rock [in Gk., petra] I will build my church"; Matt 16:18). This claim competes with (2) the equality of all of the disciples, and leaders of the communities (patriarchates), and (3) the model of summons, upon which Paul bases his authority. In Islam, there is the double model of authorization through kinship, or through appointment. After the death of Muhammad, a rift occurred in Islam: the Sunnites regarded the leader of the community, as the one appointed by Muhammad, as equipped to expand the tradition of the written word by hadith, while the Shiites regarded his son-in-law, Ali, as the rightful successor (caliph), who could lead the community on the strength of his personal holiness. In Judaism, on the other hand, the competing expositions by the rabbis and their pupils were seen as equally legitimate.

Charismatic Government

5. Charismatic government: a self-contradiction? a) If religion is essentially to be truth, then it cannot be legitimized by majority vote: it is fundamentally monopolistic, centralistic, without alternatives. In 1932, Carl Schmidt sketched his Politische Theologie on the analogy of hierarchical Catholicism as the only legitimate form of political leadership, i.e. dictatorship. Not only this extreme 'doctrine' but many images of Church and religious institutions expressly support the concept of hierarchy, as the body that goes astray without a head, the ship that needs a captain, the solicitous father of a family (father of a country). A one-sided Christian tradition leads to an image of a God of subjugation (Kreaturgefühl ['creaturely feeling'] vis-à-vis the Holy in Rudolf Otto's The Idea of the Holy [Ger. original 1917]). Concepts in the phenomenology of religion like 'might' and 'power' transmit this one-sided idea that is supposed to be uncontrollable by human beings.[9]

b) But there is a contrary position, even in Christianity. Rule or government is conferred on a group, oligarchically. The twelve apostles become heir to the empowerment of the founder. Or representatives of all Christians meet in synods and councils. Long-forgotten conciliarism becomes a principle in the later Middle Ages and the Reformation. This principle is akin to that of the representative democracy. But this one arises from another root, the self-awareness of the cities and guilds, which also determined their religion itself, determined the priest, chose their saint, and did not need to beg salvation from a stranger.

c) In the nineteenth-century confrontation after the French → Revolution, the monarchical principle became the counter-principle of a democracy that must come to terms with the reproach of regicide. Flying in the face of all reality, the Catholic Church exaggerates the principle of hierarchy: in 1871, at the First Vatican Council, truth and hierarchy merged in the declaration that the pope is infallible. Let the Catholics of Europe battle the principle as they would, they were accounted as steered from abroad, namely from beyond the Alps (ultramontane). The Protestants, on the other hand, posited that no institutional government was necessary in their church, since God himself exercises government and rules through the gifts of grace, the charísmata (R. Sohm, 1878). It was only 'early Catholicism' that had founded the offices that made salvation accessible not directly, but by way of 'intermediaries.'

d) But is religion 'democratizable' to begin with? Can democracy be authorized only against religion? In the daily round, this scarcely plays any role, not even with the parties that call themselves religious. Government by laws that have once been legislated has no need to question the validity of these laws. But at this point Max → Weber introduced the fundamental distinction: nearly all forms of government enjoy legality, in a formal lawfulness; but their legitimacy is open to political discussion. Among the types of 'legitimate' government presented by Weber, democracy is missing. Was Weber correct when he filed democracy under the heading of 'illegitimate'?[10]

Charisma

e) Weber subsequently introduced a religious category that can breach the concept of legality, and that possesses its legitimacy outside the other types of government: the charismatic types. This type no longer exists only at the ideal beginning, when founders rebel against the old religion, and inspire their disciples with their → charisma, without having any organization or economic bolster, being unworldly. Weber expresses hope for it even in the escape from the 'steel-hard housing' of current bureaucracy. Although the latter does have rational criteria, Weber holds, and thus is open to planning—unlike hereditary government, where birth and 'seniority' are the deciding factors—but ultimately, bureaucracy too is rational only in its goal of maintaining its government. Thus, Weber hoped for a charismatic elite, to open the way to a rationally planned future: a revolution, in the sense that it can perforate empty legality while receiving its legitimacy from outside.

Regulated Anarchy

6. The absence of governance: a) Religion does not necessarily have to provide governance with stability, least of all in the institutional form of a hierarchical pyramid of command and control. As the colonial states sought such a bolster in the nineteenth century as would correspond to the Christian tradition of stabilizing rule and governance, and as would function adequately among the governed peoples, they at times grasped at empty air: there are cultures that simply abide no governance. Against the prejudice that this could only mean chaos, revenge, and anarchy (→ Anarchism), it appears that, in the 'regulated anarchy' (of segmentary societies) there is an egalitarian society, but one that, by 'divine right,' defends the weak (→ Asylum) and prevents punishment from degenerating into revenge (punishment being imposed not by a state power-monopoly, but by the actual injured parties).

The Egalitarian Principle

b) The equality of everyone before the law, and equality as such (in French, égalité), is a frequently shrouded or sheltered principle (see Matt 23:8-12; in the Pope's title, "Servant of the Servants," it is the other way around); however, the professionalization of religious functionaries creates structures of government that contradict the basic proposition of quite a number of religions (such as the 'priesthood of all the faithful'). It is not enough to keep theology separate from the institutional organization of the members of a religion. Not even for theology is the image of an absolutist God the only possible one. There are alternatives—for instance, the relationship of God and his people in Judaism is a covenant (in Lat., testamentum), by which God too must abide. He has not abrogated his covenant with the Jews in favor of the Christians ('New Testament'), as Paul explains. God and his people each have their rights and duties, and the covenant cannot be abrogated.

1. Böckenförde 1976, 284.
2. Greek text published by G. Heil, Berlin, 1990; Ruh, Kurt, Geschichte der abendländischen Mystik, vol. 1., Munich 1990, 32-84.
3. For critiques, cf. Schlerath, Bernfried, in: Kratylos 40 (1955), 1-48, and 41 (1996), 1-67.
4. Weber, Max, Wirtschaft und Gesellschaft, 1922, 5th ed. 1985, 122.
5. Paravicini Bagliani 1997, 75-76.
6. Paravicini Bagliani 1997, 149-153; Ginzburg, Carlo, "Saccheggi rituali," in: Quaderni storici 22 (1987), 615-636 (as a rite de passage).
7. Kantorowicz 1957; Paravicini Bagliani 1997, 76-82.
8. Tacitus, Historiae, 5, 36; cf. Virgil, Aeneid, 1:279, the "kingdom without end."
9. Meier, Heinrich, Die Lehre Carl Schmitts, Stuttgart 1994; Gladigow 1981.
10. Wirtschaft und Gesellschaft, 727-814 (ed. Johannes Winckelmann); Sternberger 1981.

Literature

Auffarth, Christoph, Der drohende Untergang, Berlin 1991; Böckenförde, Ernst-Wolfgang, Staat, Gesellschaft, Freiheit, Frankfurt/M. 1976; Bruce, Steve, Politics and Religion, Cambridge 2003; Gager, John G., Kingdom and Community: The Social World of Early Christianity, Englewood Cliffs 1975; Gladigow, Burkhard (ed.), Staat und Religion, Düsseldorf 1981; Hengel, Martin/Schwemer, Anna-Maria (eds.), Königsherrschaft Gottes und himmlischer Kult, Tübingen 1991; Huntington, R./Metcalf, P., Celebrations of Death: The Anthropology of Mortuary Ritual, Cambridge 1979; Kantorowicz, Ernst H., The King's Two Bodies, Princeton 1957; Kehrer, Günter, Einführung in die Religionssoziologie, Darmstadt 1988; Koch, Klaus, Europa, Rom und der Kaiser vor dem Hintergrund von zwei Jahrtausenden Rezeption des Buches Daniel, Hamburg 1997; Paravicini Bagliani, Agostino, Der Leib des Papstes, Munich 1997 (Engl. ed.: The Pope's Body, Chicago 2000); Peil, Dietmar, Untersuchungen zur Staats- und Herrschaftsmetaphorik in literarischen Zeugnissen von der Antike bis zur Gegenwart, Munich 1993;

Price, Simon, Rituals and Power, Cambridge 1984; Sternberger, Dolf, Herrschaft und Vereinbarung, Frankfurt/M. 1981; Topitsch, Ernst, Gottwerdung und Revolution, Pullach 1973.

→ Anarchism, Civil Religion, Colonialism, Democracy, Freedom of Religion, Law, Mao (Cult of), Monarchy/Royalty, National Socialism, Political Religion, Secularization, Theocracy, Veneration of Persons/Personality Cult

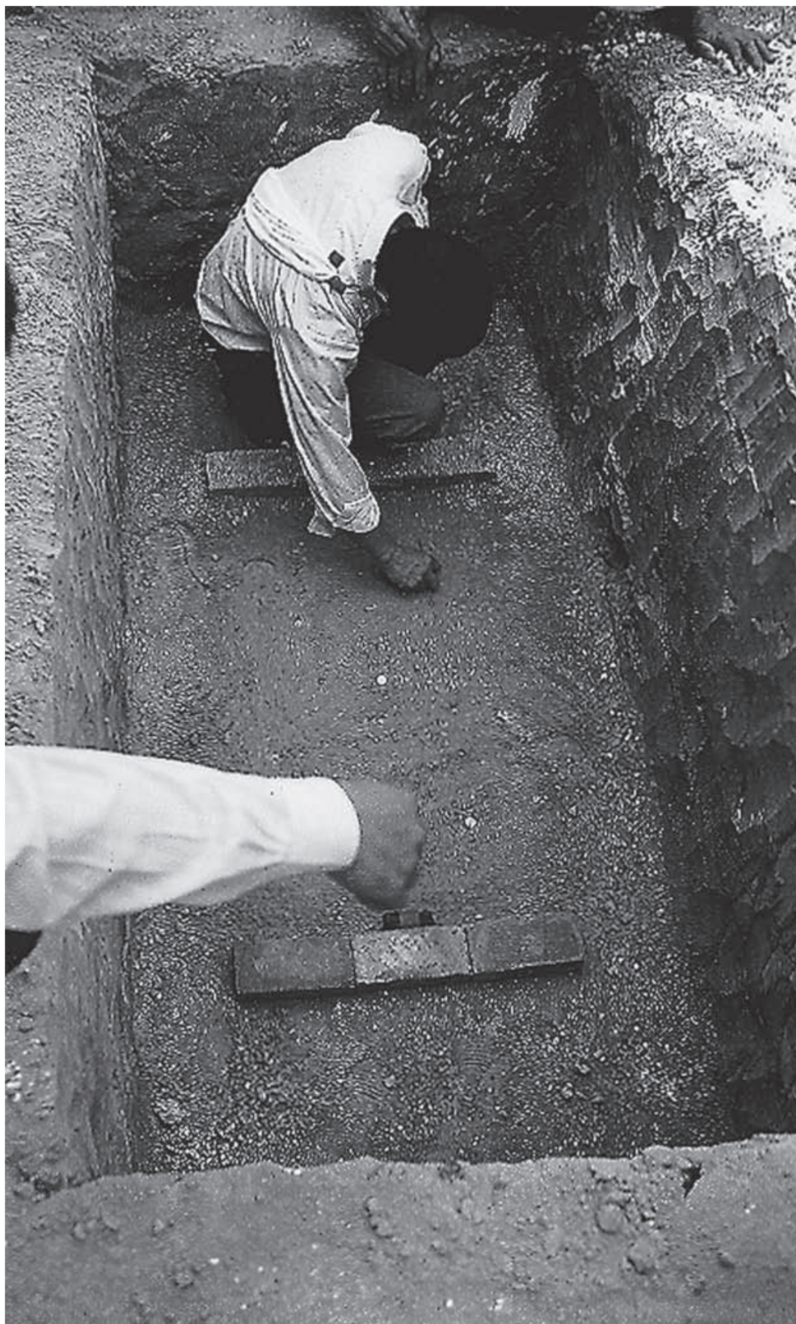
Christoph Auffarth

Grave / Tomb

The grave or tomb is a place of repose for the dead, and a station along their journey. It has (1) the character of a defense in their regard, inasmuch as it preserves them from desecration by persons, from devastation by animals or natural catastrophes, and from hurtful assaults by demons: inscriptions or protective symbols reinforce this aspect. It has (2) a function of security for the living: the dead are kept in the tomb lest, frightening and terrorizing, they be able to penetrate the realm of the living. It is (3) the right place to go when contact with a deceased person is sought for the purpose of interrogation, or when she or he is to be offered sacrifice. Finally, (4) as a memorial, it preserves the memory of the dead person or persons.



The construction of the tomb provides an opportunity for indirect conclusions regarding conceptualizations of death, although these must not be generalized from particular cases. Family or house tombs emphasize the community of the dead (and in some cases, a cult of ancestors); individual burial assigns stronger importance to an individual destiny in the beyond. Also, the position of the corpse in the grave reveals the direction in which the beyond is imagined to lie: for example, the face may be turned in the direction of sunset. That position may also evince a relationship to eschatological notions that are specific to a given religion. Various architectonic types of tombs (e.g., megalith tombs, Southwest Siberian tumuli, tombs with domes, pyramidal tombs) are to be distinguished primarily in terms of their specific cultural architectural forms, and only secondarily in terms of their function as graves. Only tomb-steles (Gk., stele, 'pillar'), such as stone idols, menhirs, or stone circles, emphasize the commemorative aspect of the tomb as 'seat' of the soul.

Literature

Bahn, Paul G. (ed.), Tombs, Graves and Mummies, London 1996; Caland, Willem, Die Altindischen Toten- und Bestattungsgebräuche, Amsterdam 1896; Colvin, Howard, Architecture and the After-Life, New Haven 1991; Curl, James Stevens, A Celebration of Death: An Introduction to Some of the Buildings, Monuments, and Settings of Funerary Architecture in the Western European Tradition, London 1980; Panofsky, Erwin, Tomb Sculpture: Its Changing Aspects from Ancient Egypt to Bernini, London 1964; Robinson, David/Koontz, Dean, Beautiful Death: Art of the Cemetery, New York 1996.

→ Cemetery, Death and Dying, Funeral/Burial, Monument/Memorial Places, Memory

Manfred Hutter

A Chinese burial ritual, with its basis in the Daoist cosmology, calls for the collaboration of an expert in Feng Shui. This system, called "Wind and Water," is supposed to enable the geomancer to use his knowledge of currents of wind and water to determine the favorable places for domiciles of the living and the dead. Before the body of the deceased may be laid in the grave, a geomancer steps into the grave and verifies whether its lie is in conformity with prescriptions. He places five gold pieces in the excavation, to mark the five directions of the sky, North, South, West, East, and middle. Then, using a thread hanging over the excavation, he determines the directional axis along which the deceased must be lowered. If the place has been well selected, and the → orientation of the grave is good, the deceased, from the world of the ancestors, will contribute to the well being of their descendants. (Kirsten Holzapfel)

Modern science and religion in conflict: In 1995, orthodox Jews have occupied an archaeological site in Israel, a grave, and are reciting the Prayer of Mourning. They are protesting the disturbance of the grave's rest and repose by the excavators. The place of the conflict is a cave, in which twenty-six sarcophagi from the time of the Maccabees (second century BCE) have been discovered. All cultures have sanctions and laws intended to guarantee the repose of the dead; but as a rule, today's Western sciences are permitted to open graves, out of scientific interest, to move them, even to ship the dead in boxes and stack them in museum cellars. This practice in many cases causes conflicts with religious customs. (Hubert Mohr)

Group, religious

1. With few exceptions, religions have always been a social phenomenon. The forms of their community formation and societal nature, as well as their types of social organization, are worthy of inquiry. Individual paths, such as those of hermits, or pillar-dwellers, or mystics, are to be found at least in all differentiated religions. The significance of these "religious virtuosi" (M. Weber) for the shaping of concepts of the saints, for example, and the significance of the paths to salvation that they select, has long since been pointed at, by Schleiermacher and William James. Whether it is individual experiences or collective processes that constitute the origin of religious concepts is a question that frequently cannot be answered, by reason of the very situation of the sources. Let us recall, furthermore, that all of the hermits who withdraw to hermitages 'take along' the ideas of religion that have been transmitted in their cultures. Then, by building on these, and by separating themselves from society, they develop their own notions. At the same time, their concepts and activities, even in this separation from society, retain their societal connections in other ways. Religion can no more be cut off from history and society than can other cultural creations—and this is verified even for all individual forms of religion.

Definition

Religious conviction can bring groups into being, and weld them together come what may. The more strongly they are distinguished from their social environment, by convictions, way of life, or attire, the more attached they are to their own community. The Old Order Amish of Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, numbering today some 18,000, are a rigoristic offshoot of the Mennonites, or Anabaptists (→ Baptists). By way of an extreme conservatism, they seal

2. A social group must be clearly distinguished from the concept yielded up by its statistical classification. A statistical group concept will be constituted by, for example, all married pipe-smokers over forty years old, without it being taken into account whether they also act together, or belong to one social group. In the latter case, the concept of a group is the product of a consideration of the social belonging of persons in a society who, on at least one point, also act in common (e.g., through participation in a cult, or a common confession of belief), and are "mutually oriented" (M. Weber). This is not the place to discuss the various sociological and socio-psychological theories of 'group.' The theories of these sciences were formed by way of an examination of administrative bodies, businesses, and prisons, and not (or only by way of exception) of religious groups. Nevertheless, the structures of division of work and function, of the leadership hierarchies, of the formal and informal orderings, of group pressure, of the relation of 'in-groups' to 'out-groups,' of the goal models, the continuance models, and the distinctions among members, followers, sympathizers, patrons, and so on, play an important role in religious groups as well.[1]

3. In terms of ideal types, we may distinguish two forms of association in religious communities and societies: (1) obligatory units, in which all persons must be members of one people, state, or occupation, (2) groups in which, "of a given number of persons, some unite on religious grounds for common activity,"[2] and relate to one another in the same. Their group formation includes repetition of the common activity, and duration. Between these two extreme positions, there are numerous transitions, especially since many—not all, not even the majority—of religious groups seek to hinder a withdrawal of members by social, economic, and ideal measures, and thus attempt to assimilate the quality of a compulsory unit. Or they have developed from a voluntary group, as in early Christianity, to the religion of the state, and later lost this status. On the other side, there are compulsory units that permit their members, or even demand of them, that they join other, religious, units as well. Athens and Rome expected an acknowledgment of the city gods, and in varying measure, participation in their cult. At the same time, citizens were left free to be initiated into one or more mystery cults, to which, often, as in Eleusis, non-citizens were admitted as well. A participation in, for instance, the church choir, or other group formations within the parishes is greeted and promoted by the churches. Exclusive membership in only one religious community is—against the tacit presumption of the religious literature—probably not the normal case, but, seen from the point of view of religious history, an exception especially to be met in the monotheistic religions.

themselves off from any of the technological or social novelties of modern industrial society. They drive no cars, use no electricity, and practice a strictly patriarchal division of roles between husband and wife. To their concern to divide themselves off from outside elements, there corresponds a stanch mutual solidarity of group members with one another. The building of a house—or, as here, a barn—is a group ritual, then, at which the group may appear on the scene. In his film, "Witness" (USA 1985), Peter Weir's congenial camera has captured the euphoria of this manner of common activity. (Hubert Mohr)

Compulsory religious associations included the Church of the high Middle Ages (state church); Islam in most Islamic countries (state religion), since a separation became impossible there (often also for the members of other permitted religions, e.g., for the protection of tax income); Japanese Buddhism with Shintô during the Tokugawa era; the cult of Asclepius in antiquity, since it was forbidden to practice the medical profession without membership in the cult; the condition of cleric in the Middle Ages; the ancient Roman Gentile cult; as well as finally, most tribal religions, since, here, the religious and the cultural societies more generally coincide, and a departure was possible only by way of leaving the tribe.

Compulsory associations and groups represent communities of solidarity, and they demand from their members a minimum of mutual respect and common behavior. In compulsory religious associations, the inner order, the division between the governing and the governed, the legitimacy of the government, and the prescribed way of life, of the individual, and so on, is generally founded in religion. It is not only in Europe that this has led to wars of religion, since the 'unconditional' claims of the various concepts of the saints, of God, and so on, have been contradictory, and have been irreconcilable. Naturally, purely secular interests also play a role here. Finally, if religion and society are understood in terms of a separation of state and church, then religion becomes a private matter. This was the case in Christendom. Many religions have difficulties with the separation of state and religion, the secular and the sacred.

Community of Law and Community of Salvation

4. In modern times, a distinction is made between the state, as a 'community of law,' and the churches (now only partially to be designated in terms of compulsory associations) as a 'community of salvation'; and the religious legitimization of the social order is withdrawn. While the community of law that is the state is essentially limited to the protection of life and property and the production of a framework for a peaceful coexistence, its citizens can seek in the religious communities the paths and beliefs that lead to salvation, and redemption, or whatever goal may be set before them. To be sure, it will scarcely be possible to realize a strict division, inasmuch as (1) the principles of the community of law do not end at the boundaries of the groups, and still less at those of the compulsory associations, and (2) religious axioms gain access to a determination of state behavior, in, for example, the principle of the social state, which also represents a secular reformulation of the Judeo-Christian commandment of love of neighbor.

Religious Groups

5. State religions, and other compulsory associations of religion, cannot, or do not wish to, satisfy all needs that are regarded as religious. After all, they seek to be universal, and to include all of their members. But a strict understanding of religious prescriptions cannot be established in the long term (see, e.g., Calvin in Geneva). Therefore, alongside these compulsory associations, communities form that are designated as religious groups. In tribal societies, there are sometimes secret cults and associations. In the ancient city-states, the mystery cults form; in the Christian Middle Ages, → orders, and other religious communities, arise within the churches, and the sects appear without (partly driven out). The basis of these special communities is volunteerism, as a rule, although membership in them is repeatedly tied up with privileges or non-membership with disadvantages. In the Middle Ages, membership in a sect meant social degradation, or, in some cases, even persecution. The formally voluntary can be partly determined by a material and social compulsion, so that the distinction as to whether what is at hand is a compulsory association, or merely a group, cannot always be unambiguously determined.

Membership and Group Boundaries

6. As a rule, one becomes a member of a compulsory religious association by birth; through entry or by conquest as a consequence of migrations or population exchanges; by compulsory conversion (Augustine: "Compel them to come in"); or by entry into associations of members of like occupational calling or social status. For a group, it is usually asserted in the literature that one must enter it (Weber and Troeltsch). However, this is the case only for the foundational phase, and then with the mission. There are groups, such as the Theosophical Society, that address only adults, and even renounce a 'socialization' of their children into the group. Celibate groups are constantly dependent on new recruitment (orders, communities of monks and nuns in Christianity and Buddhism). They expect thereby to be put in a position to be able to defend a traditional teaching and way of life by escaping the changes conditioned by the familiar everyday, with its demands, and to prevent a "dilution of the charisma on the model of that everyday [Veralltäglichung des Charisma]" (Weber), or an assimilation of special teaching to the social environment. All groups are more or less compelled to mark themselves off from other groups and the general compulsory association. Religious groups could be analyzed, in the sense of Niklas Luhmann,[3] as systems that are defined "through relative invariance of their boundaries from an environment." The inner/outer difference, holds Luhmann, leads to a characteristic structure by which the system enables the group to stay relatively invariable, in another kind of environment, vis-à-vis cases of alteration. However, for numerous religious groups, one will have to hold that they not only separate themselves from the outside, but compromise with the outside, as well, and cancel the boundaries between within and without. In order to maintain these separations, various paths are traversed—from a radical prohibition of all intercourse with the heterodox, food taboos, and intermarriage and trade limitations, to a different timing of festival and work from that of the generality, a special language for worship, different customs in clothing, and so on, to 'hairsplitting' in prayers, or in the respective teachings that it is transubstantiation, consubstantiation, or memorial that defines the Lord's Supper. Believers of the various confessions are often no longer even aware of these distinctions today, or, at all events, no longer understand them. There are also extreme groups that attempt to shape the whole of their members' lives, from their work, to their families, to their free time; and—as is frequently overlooked—there are persons who seek out such groups in order to receive a social endorsement for their belief or their views, and an orientation, which the greater Church cannot, can no longer, or is no longer willing to provide. In these cases, social contacts are frequently limited to the group, and this limits these persons' experiences. Further, in other conceptualizations and lifestyles these same contacts and experiences are demonized as the 'work of Satan,' so that caricatures develop. In these extreme groups, a social 'inner reality' forms, one endorsed by the group, so that members feel adequate in the inner relationship, but have considerable difficulties with the outer relationship (or in leaving the group.) Group boundaries can become boundaries with regard to truth and morality. In this case, structures of relationship readily form that are specific to each area (cf. Zinser/Schwarz/Remus 1997), and these structures go further than to acknowledge the modern privatization of religion—the separation of sacred and profane—merely in the distinction between public and private. Rather, they introduce it into the various areas of the life of individuals, as well. Now an integration of these areas, with their claims, is surrendered. To be sure, one must be careful not to ascribe the establishment of boundaries of truth and morality to all groups. Actually, they are only to be met with extreme groups, and this not only with religious, but also with political, ethnic, and sports groups, and one occasionally gathers this impression even of the 'scientific community' (see Deikman). Generally, the insight is probable that, today, only extreme religious groups are in a position and disposition to breach the premises of the moral and juridical community with a reference to the promised boons of salvation. Indeed, not many other groups attempt to rouse their members to battle against the juridical community at all, let alone, as certain distressing examples nonetheless show, to do so by civil war, murder, and collective suicide (as with the members of the Sun Temple, or the Jim Jones People's Temple in Guyana). When the eternal salvation of souls is at stake, however, the principles of the juridical community seem to turn inconsequential, and to have to 'pull back' (→ Fundamentalism). It is worthy of reflection, whether nonreligious groups too who make this kind of unconditional claim—indeed, who attempt to legitimate a breach with the moral and juridical community—ought not to be investigated from the viewpoints of religious studies.

Group Formation

7. In the literature of religious studies, the point of departure for the formation of religious groups is, as a rule, a 'religious virtuoso' as founder and creator, around whom pupils and disciples gather. However, a series of religious groups can be indicated for which such a founder cannot be claimed, or that regard a hero or god as founder. Furthermore, groups have formed through → migration, by which persons emigrate from a country having a state religion into a country structured otherwise in matters of religion, and must organize themselves as a group, without the need of a special founder, or religious specialist. There are, of course, religious groups that have one or more 'initiators,' but these need not necessarily be equipped with special gifts of grace (→ Charisma) or a special relationship to their gods. In this case, it is the capacity to organize persons in groups that is regarded as a charismatic gift.

Typology of Religious Groups

8. Up to the present, the point of departure for any typology of religious groups in religious studies and sociology has been the polarity between → 'church' and → 'sect.' This polarity is narrow and misleading, of course, since it takes its orientation from a model that has developed only in Christian history. It takes as the exemplar of all religious group-formations the relation, developed especially in the Middle Ages and early modern times, between a state church, and groups with deviant conceptualizations, the latter being shut out and persecuted. Into the center of the consideration then shifts the polarity between Church as 'general' and sect as 'special.' Sects are thereby distinguished by the measure of tension in which they stand to their social environment (Niebuhr 1960; B. R. Wilson 1970; Johnson 1971; Stark/Bainbridge 1985). But all religions can stand in greater or lesser measure of tension with their social environment. Since they distinguish what ought to be and what ought not to be, they can be stabilizing of government through their teaching, but they can also be critical vis-à-vis social conditions (→ Prophet). Whether this criticism becomes virulent and effective depends from respective societal and historical relations. For an analysis of religious group-formation and the forms of social organization of religion under the conditions of Western society, we may well avail ourselves of the following division, which takes as its criterion the social relations among religious specialists, members, and followers, as well as between the voluntary and the compelled.

(1) Audience religion: As they would at a concert, or before the television, participants comprise an audience that strikes a social relationship neither with leaders of the worship, nor with other participants.

(2) Clientele religion: This presupposes a relationship between the leader of the cult and its clients, but there arises no stable community with the other clients. When the suppliers of such cults present themselves in groups, they may represent a community of co-workers ('colleague community').

(3) Community religion: Here, personal relations develop between the religious specialist and the other members. These relationships have led to a local community, that can also maintain relations with other local communities.

(4) Bureaucratic religion: Here, above and beyond the individual parishes arises a trans-regional hierarchical organization that establishes a worship valid for all, as well as a doctrine. Only in community and bureaucratic religions does that cohesion subsist that Durkheim (1912) has explained as an essential characteristic of religion. Whether audience and clientele religions can offer the 'intellectual' convictions for worship, morality, and theology crucial for a religion is doubtful. However, both of these forms do correspond to what many perceive as their individual and religious requirements, and thereby they correspond to the modern relationships of individualization. A form of social organization, therefore, is not indispensable for the question of what a religion is, what sacred, and what profane. The distinction between sacred and secular, religion and non-religion, is first of all the classifying interpretation of a society or social group. It must be constantly maintained and defended, since otherwise it can continue to claim validity only as a memory. Evidently, there are mingled forms, since even a bureaucratic religion, for example in its sermons on radio and television, addresses an anonymous public, and an auricular confession represents a personal relationship between a priest and the believer who comes forward as client.[4]

Religious Conceptions and Group Structure

9. Up until now, only in individual cases has there been research been done on which consequences follow, for the social relationships and group structures of their followers, from particular religious conceptions, or what consequences for religious conceptions follow from the forms of social organization. Obviously there is a distinction between, for example, the conceptualization of the sacraments and the priesthood in a community religion, and in a bureaucratic religion. Bureaucratic and clientele religions are inclined to ascribe a charisma of office to priests, and to regard sacraments as means of grace that are conferred only by priests, while community religions try to circumvent a special religious qualification for the specialists, and regard the sacraments as communication with God and not as means of salvation. For notions of God, as well as for group formations, gender-specific differences are important that until now have scarcely been researched, at least not in their meaning for group formations and for religious conceptions and actions. Thus, there are cultic and priestly communities like that of the Vestals (see Cancik/Lindemeier), or the cult of the Bona Dea in ancient Rome, to which only women were admitted, or secret societies from which one of the genders is excluded.

10. Unlike, for example, experiences of physical pain, truths of faith are uncertain and doubtful for many persons. They have need of social endorsement by a group, then. In such a group, the structures of perception and interpretation of experiences and phenomena as well, are set forth to give adherents orientation and the certitude demanded by their religions, and to represent an assurance with respect to religious bestowals of meaning. For most persons, therefore, religious group-formations in one form or another, aside from purely inner-worldly works of social organization, are absolutely required for the certification of extra-worldly concepts.

1. For ready information, we may refer to Kehrer 1993.
2. Kehrer 1988a, 97; cf. Weber 1964, 37.
3. Luhmann 1972, 24.
4. Zinser 1997, chap. 7.

Literature

Cancik, H./Lindemeier, H., "Kultisches Privileg und gesellschaftliche Realität," in: Saeculum 41 (1990); Deikman, A. J., The Wrong Way Home, Boston 1990; Durkheim, É., The Elementary Forms of Religious Life, New York 1995 (French [1]1912), Johnson, B., "Church and Sect Revisited," in: Journal for the Scientific Study of Religion 10 (1971);

Kehrer, G., "Religiöse Gruppenbildung," in: Zinser, H. (ed.), Religionswissenschaft. Eine Einführung, Berlin 1988a, 96-113; Idem, Einführung in die Religionssoziologie, Darmstadt 1988b; Luhmann, N., Funktion und Folgen formaler Organisation, Berlin 1972; McGuire, Meredith B., Religion: The Social Context, Belmont [5]2002; Niebuhr, R., The Social Sources of Denominationalism, New York 1929; Stark, R./Bainbridge, W. S., The Future of Religion, Berkeley 1985; Troeltsch, E., The Social Teaching of the Christian Churches, New York 1960 (Ger. [1]1922); Weber, M., Wirtschaft und Gesellschaft, Cologne 1964 (Engl. as: Economy and Society: An Outline of Interpretive Sociology, New York 1968); Wilson, B. R., Religious Sects: A Sociological Study, London 1970; Zinser, H., Der Markt der Religionen, Munich 1997; Zinser, H./Schwarz, G./Remus, B., Psychologische Aspekte neuer Formen der Religiosität, Tübingen 1997.

→ Church, Cult, Fundamentalism, New Religions, Order/Brotherhoods, Priest/Priestess, Sect, Society, Specialists (religious)

Hartmut Zinser

Guilt

Category "Guilt"

1. The essential notes of the category of guilt are two. For one, 'guilt' evinces the person as the author of a delinquency to whom the consequences of his or her actions must be ascribed even beyond the concrete deed. For another, 'guilt' indicates the instances before which the person becomes guilty. Guilt stands the person before a court of justice—God, others, and one's own ego (→ Conscience)—before which his or her responsibility can be established and attributed for the consequences of an act or omission. This attribution is made only after an assessment of intent, and a measure against a concrete norm—a 'should,' in the form of → law, morality, and ordering.

Freedom to act and ascribable responsibility before some instance for the consequences of some action, are the two prerequisites for the modern, enlightened conception of the category of 'guilt.' Here a distinction is made between the religious dimensions of sin and guilt, between what is unethical in moral terms and what is unlawful in legal ones. The canon of modernity, with its Christian roots, clearly marks off the concept of guilt from the everyday religious conceptualization of a mythical interlacing of guilt, → fate, and doom, along with its intertwining of guilt, atonement, and punishment. The remarkable outcome of this boundary is the modern idea of human value. The latter sunders the direct connection of application of guilt, atonement, and punishment (→ Human Rights).

Freedom of the Will: Distinction between Guilt and Sin

2. The question of distinction and connection among the legal, ethical, and religious dimensions of guilt, and capacity for guilt, on the part of the person is addressed especially on the basis of the problem of the freedom of the will, i.e. of the relationship between freedom and determination (→ Determinism; Fatalism). For juridical, punitive law, the category of guilt must include freedom of the will (except in the special case of an inner incapacity for responsibility for one's deeds). This freedom must be presupposed in the person as part of the latter's 'self-responsibility' for the results of an act or omission. But the religious concept of → sin identifies the lack of freedom of the will as abiding together with the kernel of volitional freedom itself. This notion corresponds to the theological distinction between guilt and sin. In the perception of the Reformers, the religious denotation of 'sin' (peccatum radicale) bears on a subject's crises of orientation, isolated state, and loss of an ability adequately to respond, to 'answer,' that can be bound up with the possession and use of freedom of the personal will on the level of creaturely intercommunication—a matter of 'not being responsible.' By contrast, the concept of 'guilt' (peccatum actuale) concentrates on the external lapse vis-à-vis commands of morality, and on transgressions of norms of tradition and law.

Christian religion regards guilt and sin from the perspective of their quality as forgivable before God. In the process of God's judgment upon human beings' strayings and deviations, upon their incurring of guilt, the redeemer wins out over the judge (doctrine of justification).

Anti-Religious Theories of Demonstration of Guilt

3. Moralistic constrictions, and an ignorant confusion of guilt and sin in the ecclesial rhetoric of the proclamation of doctrine, as well as in ritual practice, pedagogy, and cure of souls, have of course considerably contributed to a particular attribute of the Christian piety of the everyday: its inability unconditionally and permanently to escape the notion of a vindictive God. Evidence includes the history of Christian 'culpabilization' of strangers (see Delumeau), of others, or of third parties, or of their exclusion as scapegoats in connection with crises of societal orientation. We may recall the history and semantics of → anti-Semitism. Thus, the nineteenth century marks the beginning of the anti-religious theories of a demonstration of culpability, and the resonance of these theories throughout society.

Friedrich → Nietzsche defines Christianity in terms of the deleterious operation of its 'guilt morality.' For Nietzsche, the imposition of the Christian 'maximal God' is coupled with the cold notion of owing this God debts that can never be paid—and thus of a maximal feeling of abasement and pathological guilt feelings (→ Psychopathology). Only the triumph of the God-less gospel ("God is dead") will promote human beings to a state of 'second innocence,' and help them to 'better health.' In the tradition of the theorem of the unmasking of guilt stands Sigmund → Freud. To be sure, the unmasking takes on a negative and passive connotation. According to Freud, the 'guilt feeling' must be taken as a pathological expression of an irresolvable conflict of ambivalence between a need for love and a lust for punishment, between Eros and the death drive. Freud knows the feeling of guilt in his deterministic view only as a form of pathological neurosis: cultural development is an aggression-charged institution of compulsion. Finally, a negative philosophy of history, psychoanalysis, and the neo-Marxist critique of capitalist theory, give life to the concept of guilt as an archaism, now no longer to be distinguished from the concept of fate and doom (Benjamin, Adorno).

Ironically, the neo-Marxist notion of guilt comes in contact with the concept of collective guilt, discussed as such in German postwar history (1945, 1989), which subsumes the person in a collective body, in a manner that ultimately imputes the deed of each individual as the deed of all. The concept of personal responsibility in a juridical and moral view is thus stipulated into nonexistence: the old religious concept of the 'guilt of original sin' is here exaggerated in a religiously blinded and profanely moral manner.

Rites of Exculpation

4. Rites of exculpation consist (1) in a liturgically ordered and usually sacramentally supported accomplishment of the acts of confession, penance, and remorse. Confession of guilt and entreaty of pardon, as well as the generation of moral conversion before God (privately) and the community (publicly), belong in this ritual association. To be sure, (2) the everyday ritually assured practices of self-justification, inculpation of others, and magical forms of self-masking, silence, and silencing are to be reckoned among the canon of rites of exculpation. In addition, there are (3) the symbolic acts of self-incrimination, self-humiliation, and gestures of humility. For the public area of the political, and the dramatization of the private, in the magnification of the mass-media resources of modernity, these rites play a role not to be underestimated. Finally, (4) the practices of cleanliness and order, as well as rituals of waste disposal in token of conversion of what is impure (clean/unclean), as well as the typology of rites of exculpation (5) form compensation and restitution by way of special deeds of equalization, as well as the practice of gift giving and exchange at special festive moments. Like all → rituals, rites of exculpation are open to instrumentalization and show an inward ambivalence.

Literature

Carroll, John, Guilt: The Grey Eminence behind Character, History, and Culture, London 1985; Delumeau, Jean, Le péché et la peur. La culpabilisation en Occident (XIIIe–XVIIIe siècles), Paris 1983; Dodds, Eric Robertson, The Greeks and the Irrational, Berkeley 1951; Eberhard, Wolfram, Guilt and Sin in Traditional China, Berkeley 1967; Ricoeur, Paul, The Symbolism of Evil, New York 1967; Idem, Fallible Man, New York 1986; Schabert, Tilo/Clemens, Detlev (eds.), Schuld, Munich 1999; Schwan, Gesine, Politik und Schuld, Frankfurt/M. 1997; Wurmser, Léon, The Mask of Shame, Baltimore 1981.

→ Conscience, Determinism, Ethics/Morals, Fatalism, Human Rights, Penance/Penitent Sin, Will (free)

Joachim von Soosten

Guru

1. Derived from the Sanskrit root for 'heavy,' 'mighty,' guru denotes an outstanding religious personality and teacher—originally one's natural → father, who undertook the religious education of his son, taught him parts of the Veda (→ Hinduism), and arranged his → rites of passage (saṃskāra). Soon, however, religious specialists undertook these duties as ācārya ('teacher') gurus, who instructed the sons of the upper three → castes (varṇa) in the Vedic literature, in religious and socially (ethically) correct comportment, as well as in profane subjects. Through fulfillment of the dharma (→ India; Hinduism), they were to be advanced to a state in which they might attain a more favorable rebirth, or indeed, the upward escape from the cycle of rebirths. Preferably (but not obligatorily), gurus come from the highest caste, that of the Brahmins. They are treated as disciples of the ancient seers (ṛṣi), who, according to the traditional conception, had seen the sacred knowledge (Veda) in a suprasensory way, or had received it from the gods. On the basis of their knowledge of the sacred texts and rituals, they are regarded not only as ideal religious teachers, but also as suited to social power and leadership generally.

Krishna devotees in Riga, Latvia, strew rose petals before a statue of their Bhaktivedanta guru Swami Prabhupad (1896–1977). A true-to-life wax image, cast after the death of their master, compensates his pupils for his bodily absence. The same figure, presented in many ISKCON (→ Hare Krishna) temples, is accorded divine reverence. In various centers it is placed exactly opposite the high altar with its statue of Krishna. (Benita von Behr)

2. Ideally, in the course of his life, a man should traverse four stages, of which the first is that of the Veda student (brahmacārī), followed by the stage of householder and head of a family. Afterwards, should he so desire, he may advance to the status of forest dweller, and finally transfer to that of the wandering ascetics (saṃnyāsi) who renounce the world. As a pupil, he is bound to his ācārya guru and his family by a vow of fidelity, lifelong, although he may change gurus with his → master's leave. In his youth dedication, he experiences a ritual 'rebirth' (→ Initiation) under the spiritual fatherhood of the guru, becoming 'twice-born' (dvija), and has access to the Vedic tradition. During his school years he ordinarily lives in the guru's house (for at least twelve years). The guru's words to his pupil at the ceremony of reception resemble those of the bridegroom to the bride at a wedding, just as the pupil's relationship to the guru is like that of a wife to her husband (who is also accounted her guru). Consequently, to the pupil's duties belong the performance of housework and other services that regularly fall to the wife. He must offer his master loyalty, unconditional obedience, and divine respect. At times he may even be his heir. Murder of the guru is equivalated with parricide, and sexual relations with the guru's wife is deemed incest. It is true that the guru must not require any monetary compensation for his instruction; however, it is altogether customary for the pupil to contribute labor to the economic basis of the guru's household, of which, after all, he is a member, and, upon completion of his education and training, to offer him a suitable and proportionate sign of his gratitude. When the pupil becomes a householder, in certain cases his son enters upon instruction with the same guru or his successor.

3. With the development of the mystical doctrine of the oneness of ātman (personal self) and brahman (universal self) in the Upanishads (some eight centuries BCE), and of the soteriology of the completed realization of this oneness, the already long-existing ascetic movement (śramaṇa) gained in popularity and currency. It entailed the distinction between the saṃnyāsi guru type from the other types of guru, the former a "charismatically endowed, soteriological figure of grace . . . to which a . . . relationship of obedience, love, and reverence was possible, indeed was shown to prevail, in that there was ultimately no room for the pupil's individuality."[1] A new dimension in the instance of authority eventuated through a newly appearing designation for the pupil as śiṣya (Sansk., 'one who is to be reared, to be instructed'). The ācārya guru, in principle, was still fallible, since, after all, he functioned as instructor in the profane sciences; but the saṃnyāsi guru, already 'delivered' (jīvanmukta) during his lifetime, and now identified with the Absolute, was infallible. By way of renunciation of the world, and ascetic discipline, he was supposed to have attained supra-sensory and occult powers, and could convey salvation to his pupil by his own power. The saṃnyāsi guru is free of all ties to caste and family, and can receive pupils of any extraction. Secular juridical decisions do not bind him. He lives in close community with his pupils, either apart from civilization in the life of an itinerant, or in retirement in an → ashram. Since the route to ultimate liberation is looked upon as very dangerous, the guru must have special didactic capacities at his disposition. Indeed, in order to lay open to his pupils the absolute truth, which is not conventionally communicable, he may even introduce unaccustomed means.

4. In the traditions of bhakti and tantra (→ Mysticism; Hinduism; Buddhism), the guru ultimately counts as avatāra (Sansk., 'descent'), i.e. as (partial) embodiment of the divinity (sad guru), and as such as equal to or even superior to the divinity, and identical with absolute truth and supreme meaning. "The guru is father, the guru is mother, the guru is the god Shiva. When Shiva waxes wroth, the guru is redeemer. But when the guru waxes wroth, there is no recourse."[2] True love and full surrender (on occasion, even corporeal) to the sad guru is regarded as capable of overcoming all shortcomings. Faith in a direct transmittal of power and salvation from the sad guru to the pupil plays a key role here. The guru is the potter who forms and re-creates his pupil.

Indian society is mightily fragmented through the caste system. It is especially the figure of the saṃnyāsi guru, and variations of the same figure, that plays a role in its reintegration not to be underestimated: after all, this institution transcends all ritual and social distinctions.

5. The concept of 'guruism' is a polemical concept, mostly applied to religious movements in the West that evince an exceptional master-pupil relationship, and which relate to Asia as the region of their origin. Thus, movements such as the Neo-Saṃnyāsi (→ Osho Movement), Ananda Marga, and → Hare Krishna are designated with this expression. At first, Hindu movements spread in the United States and Europe that had already been marked, for their part, by Western culture and philosophy in the colonial period (neo-Hinduism, Vivekananda). Even today they determine the image of Hinduism. Beginning in the late 1960s, however, guru-centered movements with popular elements reached the West from India as well, simultaneous with a growing discontent on the part of elements of the population with society and state (Cold War, Vietnam War, armament). Devotion to a guru is thought to be ultimately capable of effecting a societal change, above and beyond the transformation of one's own personhood.

1. Steinmann 1986, 75.
2. Kulārṇava tantra XII, 49; following Steinmann 1986, 100.

Literature

Cornille, Catherine, The Guru in Indian Catholicism: Ambiguity or Opportunity of Inculturation?, Louvain 1991; Hara, M., "Hindu Concepts of Teacher, Sanskrit guru and ācārya," in: Sanskrit and Indian Studies: Essays in Honour of Daniel H. H. Ingalls, Dordrecht 1980, 93-118; McMullen, Clarence O. (ed.), The Concept of Guru in Indian Religion, New Delhi 1982; Steinmann, R. M., Guru-Śiṣya-Sambandha. Das Meister-Schüler-Verhältnis im traditionellen und modernen Hinduismus, Stuttgart 1986.

→ Ashram, Buddhism, Hinduism, Indian Subcontinent, Master/Pupil

Christian von Somm

Hair

1. Regarded physiologically, hair is one of the derivatives of skin. Being without a nerve, it cannot directly communicate sensory impressions. Nevertheless, it is the material basis of the metaphorical description of experiences, in linguistic applications like 'hairsbreadth,' or even 'hairy [situation].' In its quality of being bound to the body, and yet separable from it, hair is everywhere to be found as a component of the symbolism of the body.

Coiffure as Characteristic of a Group

2. The various symbolical meanings communicated by 'headscarf' can in general be seen as examples of the embodiment of a conceptualization of values, with which the physical body is transformed into a 'social body,' and made the object of behavioral prescriptions in society.

Thus, the long, untrimmed hair of the Frankish kings was a symbolical expression of the sacred character ascribed to royalty, corresponding to the legitimization of rule by God's grace, and prepared through an extensive complex of regulations referring to the physical body of the one seated upon the throne.

As a component of the picture of the bodily presentation of religious specialists, hairstyles are found connected with ascetical ideals. Traditionally, Catholic monks wear the 'tonsure,' a bare, circular area at the crown of the head; members of Buddhist monastic orders shave off all of their hair; Orthodox priests and monks have beards and hair. The shaping of the hair as a means of expression of group membership and community formation frequently stands in a negative, delimiting relationship with that of surrounding groups, their values and symbolism. In the history of India, Sikhism as a salvation doctrine was distinguishable, even in the corporeal appearance of its followers, from already established world-renouncing yogi or Sannyasi brotherhoods, whose members either allow their hair to take a matted form, or shave it off. Sikh men associate their uncut hair (kesh) with strength and vitality; and, in conjunction with additional symbols, it articulates their identity as members of the 'brotherhood of the pure' (khalsa). In Judaism, men of the Orthodox current are distinguishable from Conservative and Reform Jews by their beards and ringlets (prohibition of shaving, Lev 19:27, Deut 14:1). The Rastafarians, who formed in opposition to racist oppression in the West Indies (especially Jamaica), symbolize their religious and ideological opposition to the oppressor ('Babylonians') with dreadlocks and beards, underscoring their African identity.

Hair in Ritual

3. In a framework of the rituals of marriage, initiation, and mourning, the cutting, shearing, and even tearing out of the hair of the head mark the transition from one societal state to another. Here, ritual scarfing can be exceptional, and the returning hair the symbol of the new socio-sexual status, as in the first haircut, which in Islam is part of the initiation of a newborn boy. But the new scarf can also be retained as a permanent status symbol, as in the case of the shorn heads of Orthodox Jewish wives.

The shaping of the hair in the context of rites of mourning can be just as varied. In India, the hair of the mourner is untended during the phase of grieving, while cutting the hair betokens the completion of that period, and thus emergence from temporary uncleanness. Brahmin widows alone, who are prohibited on ideological grounds from remarrying, keep their shorn heads in token of their permanent relatively unclean status. In purification rites connected with rites of passage (marriage, birth, burial), especially in India, rites of cleansing are encountered that include the washing of the hair (→ Purification/Hygiene/Bodily Grooming).

Communication with Gods and Saints

4. In communication with gods and saints, the body language of scarfing is a means by which believers bring their humility to expression, for example by covering the head in Judaism and Islam. Furthermore, the release of hair usually bound up, especially that of women, can be an expression of ecstatic states of → possession by and surrender to a god or saint.

Hair can symbolize a personal relationship between its wearer and the gods. Ecstatic female Hindu ascetics in Sri Lanka conceive their wild matted hair (jata) as a gift from the gods, through which they can share in the power (shakti) of the latter, and effect the bestowal of grace on others. Sacrifices of hair, as a return gift to a saint or to God, are to be found in a context of vows offered for male progeny in regions of India that have been influenced by Buddhism or Islam. If the wish is granted, the parents sacrifice the hair of their son's first haircutting, and thereby reinforce the relationship of all three to the saint or God.

As a component of reliquary cults, one encounters the veneration of the hair of saints. In Islam, the beard of the Prophet Muhammad, honored and sworn by, warrants a special truthfulness on the part of the person making the oath.

Women's Hair

5. It is especially in Judaism and Islam that women's hair symbolically connected with of the values of sexuality, intimacy, modesty or chastity, and honor. Corresponding to this ideology, it redounds to the honor of a husband, and to high regard for the wife, when the latter wears her hair covered (wig, headdress, → veil) in the presence of mature male relatives and guests. That women wear their hair covered was and is interpreted by Western feminism as a sign of her oppression, whereas that ideology demands that she take possession of her own body. Symbolically, feminist women have maintained their value with, among other things, closely cropped, or long and unbanded hair, in contradiction of the feminine image in patriarchal societies.

6. As a means of expressing the identity of its wearer, hair is interwoven with other tokens, whose meaning depends on the respective context and the wearer's intended self-presentation. The group a person belongs to, and the values he or she upholds—hippie, skinhead, punk, neo-Nazi—are not always determinable, even in an era of stylish haircuts, from hair alone.

Literature

Barrett, Leonard E., The Rastafarians: Sounds of Cultural Dissonance, Boston 1977; Derrett, Duncan J., "Religious Hair," in: Man 8 (1973), 100-103; Douglas, Mary, Purity and Danger: An Analysis of Concepts of Pollution and Taboo, London 1966; Eadem, Natural Symbols: Explorations in Cosmology, London 1970; Firth, Raymond, Symbols, Public and Private, London 1973; Hallpike, C. R., "Social Hair," in: Man 4 (1969), 254-264; Hershman, Paul, "Hair, Sex, and Dirt," in: Man 9 (1974), 274-298; Leach, Edmund, "Magical Hair," in: Middleton, John (ed.), Myth and Cosmos: Readings in Mythology and Symbolism, Austin 1967, 77-108; Maccracken, Grant D., Big Hair: A Journey into the Transformation of Self, Toronto 1995; Obeyesekere, Gananath, Medusa's Hair: An Essay on Personal Symbols and Religious Experience, Chicago 1981; Synnott, Anthony, The Body Social: Symbolism, Self, and Society, London 1993.

→ Body, Group, Magic, Sexuality, Veil

Claudia Naacke

Handicapped

1. Human life is always accompanied and endangered by the impairment of health. One speaks of a handicap rather than of an illness when the impairment cannot be overcome by therapeutic measures, and a person's life is permanently marked by it. In this sense, handicap is an umbrella concept for physical, mental, and spiritual impairments. The World Health Organization (WHO) distinguishes three levels on which a handicap affects a person's life: first, directly, as an organic damage (impairment), second, in the restriction of abilities (disability), and third, in social disadvantages in consequence (handicap).[1] From time immemorial, religion has had its share in the overcoming and/or control of the handicap, as well as in the social evaluation of the handicapped. The general reason for this may be that, in the handicap, people see or experience an enduring loss of capabilities and potential, and thus find themselves confronted altogether concretely and directly with life in its limitation and frailty. The stress of this confrontation has usually led to the religiously motivated exclusion of the handicapped. At the same time, religious traditions show that they are capable of protecting persons with handicaps.

The Handicap in Pre-Modern Societies

2. The distinction between illness and handicap is still relatively new, and is due to the growth of medical and psychological knowledge in the modern age. Generally, the two were not clearly distinguished, and handicap merely meant an especially conspicuous condition of illness. In societies in which religion stands in close connection with a mythical picture of the world, illness and handicap are as a rule interpreted as an indication that the victim has lost the gods' favor. The condition is seen as punishment for individual guilt or that of one's forebears. The handicapped are seen as unclean and impure, and therefore as having fallen from the divine order of things. Unless people wished to place themselves at risk as well, they had better avoid them. As a rule, this means exclusion from the social community: the handicapped become outsiders, 'others.'

In ancient Israel, as in many other religions, physical integrity or wholeness was demanded of → priests. "For no one who has a blemish shall draw near, one who is blind or lame, or one who has a mutilated face or a limb too long, or one who has a broken foot or a broken hand, or a hunchback, or a dwarf, or a man with a blemish in his eyes or an itching disease or scabs or crushed testicles" (Lev 21:21-20). Nor, according to Canon 1041.1 of Catholic church law, may persons having a permanent mental or psychological handicap be admitted to the priesthood. In the time of the New Testament, illness and handicap were regarded as the work of demons. Persons having psychological or mental handicaps have particularly been the subject of mythical interpretations. Beginning in the Middle Ages, Germanic folk belief, in tandem with Christian notions, led to mentally handicapped children being looked down upon as changelings: the devil was supposed to have exchanged them at birth. It is reported of Martin Luther that he counseled the drowning of a twelve-year-old mentally handicapped boy in Dessau because he regarded him as a changeling without a soul.[2] Despite all advances in medicine, religion continues to play a role in promoting respect for the handicapped: Lourdes receives some 5,000,000 pilgrims annually, among them 70,000 ill and handicapped who hope to be healed of their afflictions.

The Handicap in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries

3. In modernity, the handicapped are assimilated very ambivalently. On the one hand, a society of achievement, oriented to functionality, sports, and the ability to work, is confronted, in the physical, mental, and psychological handicap, with the fact that human life does not always abide by the 'norm'; this tension affords encouragement to the sidelining of handicapped persons. On the other hand, enlightenment with respect to causes of the handicap that have lain in the organism, or in socialization, has provided for a certain deliverance from mythical ideas. The development of methods of rehabilitation and political measures for social integration have been able to contribute considerably to the improvement of the environment and living conditions of handicapped persons. Here the diaconal organizations (→ Charitable Organizations), developing since the nineteenth century, have made contributions of great importance.

One of modern history's darkest chapters in behavior with retarded persons is the → 'euthanasia' (from Greek, 'good dead') of the time of → National Socialism. Some 100,000 persons, with, especially, mental handicaps, were the victims of Aktion 4, disparaged as 'lives unworthy of life.' Thus did the Nazis become the executants (and executioners) of the ideologies of nineteenth- and twentieth-century social Darwinism and eugenics, as well as the murderous expression of a modern belief in progress. Only since the 1980s has public debate on the human right to life and the protection of handicapped persons once more been strongly engaged. For one, the theses of Australian utilitarian bioethicist Peter Singer, and his position that, under special conditions, profoundly handicapped infants/fetuses should be put to death, have aroused considerable debate.[3] For another, the draft of a bioethics document of the European Council provides, within certain bounds, for experiments on persons incapable of consent. Now that genetic research has shown the possibilities of a pre-natal diagnosis of handicaps, the fear seems not ungrounded that the right to life of the handicapped versus the 'avoidability' of handicap will be more and more debated. Against this background, religious traditions that protect the right to life of the handicapped are once more growing in importance.

1. World Health Organization (WHO), International Classification of Impairments, Disabilities and Handicaps: A Manual of Classification Relating to the Consequences of Disease, Geneva 1980.
2. Luther, Martin, Werke: Kritische Gesamtausgabe. Tischreden, vol. 5, Weimar 1919, no. 5207.
3. Singer, Peter, Practical Ethics, Cambridge [2]1999.

Literature

Borsay, Anne, Disability and Social Policy in Britain since 1750: A History of Exclusion, Basingstoke 2005; Byrne, Peter, Philosophical and Ethical Problems in Mental Handicap, Basingstoke 2000; Hauerwas, Stanley, Suffering Presence: Theological Reflections on Medicine, the Mentally Handicapped, and the Church, Notre Dame 1986; Longmore, Paul K./Umansky, Lauri (eds.), The New Disability History: American Perspectives, New York 2001; Louhiala, Pekka, Preventing Intellectual Disability: Ethical Issues in Clinical Practice, Cambridge 2004; Marx, Tzvi, Halakha and Handicap: Jewish Law and Ethics on Disability, PhD thesis, Jerusalem/Amsterdam 1993; Müller, Klaus E., Der Krüppel. Ethnologia Passionis Humanae, Munich 1996; Noll, Steven/Trent, Jr., James W. (eds.), Mental Retardation in America: A Historical Reader, New York 2004; Parens, Erik/Asch, Adrienne (eds.): Prenatal Testing and Disability Rights, Washington 2000; Selway, Deborah A. (ed.), Disability, Religion and Health: Exploring the Spiritual Dimensions of Disability, London 1997; Smith, Bonnie G./Hutchinson, Beth (eds.), Gendering Disability, New Brunswick 2004; Szasz, Thomas, Liberation by Oppression: A Comparative Study of Slavery and Psychiatry, New Brunswick 2002; Wendell, Susan, The Rejected Body: Feminist Philosophical Reflections on Disability, New York 1996.

→ Bioethics, Body, Charitable Organizations, Ethics/Morals, Euthanasia/Assisted Suicide, Illness/Health

Hanno Gerke

Hare Krishna Movement (ISKCON)

1. A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami Prabhupāda inaugurated the Hare Krishna movement, which calls itself International Society for Krishna Consciousness. It belongs to the Vishnuite group Gauḍīya Vaiṣṇava Saṃpradāya ("Bengali Vishnuitic Tradition") that goes back to the Bengali Bhakti-saint Caitanya. In the sixteenth century the latter founded a Krishnaitic missionary movement whose way of salvation was the recitation (Sanskrit japa) and communal singing (Sanskrit saṃkīrtana) of the names of Krishna. Around 1850, this movement was reestablished in Bengal in the Gauḍīya Vaiṣṇava Māṭh ("Monastic Center for Bengali Vishnuism") of Bhaktivinoda Thakur (1838–1914), which eventually strove for a mission in the Western world. ISKCON members attract attention with their pouch, in which a prayer chain (mālā) is transported, and with their traditional Indian raiment: white to yellowish for men and multicolored saris for women. The men are shorn, except for a plait (śikhā) on the back of the head.

History

2. ISKCON's founder was born Abhay Charan De, in Calcutta in 1896, studied English, philosophy, and economics, and adopted a mercantile career. It was in 1922 that he first met his later guru Bhakti Siddhanta Sarasvati Thakura (1874–1937), son of Bhaktivinoda Thakura, and thereupon began to compose a commentary on the Bhagavadgita. Initiated in 1933, he received from his guru the task of carrying Krishna consciousness to the West. Still, he remained in India. In 1950 he withdrew from wife, children, and workplace, and devoted his life exclusively to preaching, and to the translation of the Vishnuite literature. In 1959 he pronounced a vow of celibacy, and adopted the Sannyasa condition of full renunciation of all that is of the world. In 1962, Prabhupāda published the first volume of his English translation and commentary on the Bhagavata-purāṇas, a principal work of Krishnaism. In 1966, at the age of 69, at the behest of his master he moved to America, without any possessions or means, to spread Krishna consciousness there. He found his first followers in New York, in the hippie milieu, to whom he offered a counter-model to 'materialistic Western society.' In the same year he founded ISKCON, with its first centers in New York and San Francisco. He also established the Bhaktivedanta Book Trust, intended for the distribution of all of his books and translations. Further centers in the United States and Europe, as well as a great temple in Vrindavan (1974) appeared, along with the world headquarters in Mayapur. As early as 1970, Prabhupāda founded the Governing Body Commission (GBC) to which he later entrusted the organizational functions of leadership. Then shortly before his death, he designated eleven of his followers as *dhīkṣa guru*s ('initiation gurus'), with the right to initiate new devotees. Prabhupāda died in 1977. Through his consistent example of a life according to his strict religion, he had moved thousands to follow him.

Schisms

Several divisions of ISKCON appeared, as, for example, that of American Kirtananda Swami Bhaktipada, or of German Hansaduta Dasa.

Despite these divisions the movement repeatedly enjoys moments of sustained growth. Since the opening of Eastern Europe, ISKCON has aroused great interest there. In the meantime, however, alongside the initiated members, there is a large surrounding field of laity, confessing to Krishna consciousness in varying degrees. If one includes these tendencies, the number of practitioners of Krishna consciousness today can be reckoned at 200,000 worldwide, in the care of a scant one hundred gurus.

Organization

ISKCON has (1) temples (nama hatta mandir), (2) preaching centers (nama hatta kendra), and (3) simple centers (nama hatta). Meanwhile, worldwide, there are 325 temples, restaurants, radio stations, and television series. ISKCON operates a Food for Life program through which free meals are distributed to the hungry in more than sixty countries. The Booktrust produces up to 4,000,000 volumes per year, of various titles. The largest project is the construction of a city, Mayapar City, near Mayapar, birthplace of Caitanya, in western Bengali, whose center will be a "Temple of the Vedic Planetarium." The GBC, meanwhile, has been transformed into a larger administrative apparatus, besides which, for various parts of the world, responsible representatives are in charge of eighteen 'ministries' (e.g., for finance, health, women, education, book distribution). In precise contrast to the early movement, the administration of ISKCON today is distinguished by transparency, openness, and democratic structures. For example, an explanation of the cases of child-abuse occurring toward the middle of the 1980s in the gurukulas has been energetically fostered.

Teaching

3. The directing doctrine, maintained according to Indian tradition and a strict Vishnuite mold, is a monotheism, expounded in a scholastic mode, as taught by Caitanya. Prabhupāda returned not only to the Bengalese text Caitanya-carita-amṛta ("Nectar of the Deeds of Caitanya"), but, especially, to the Bhagavadgita and the Bhagavata-purāna, both of which he ascribed to the Vedic literature. Philosophically, Caitanya belongs to the dualistic stamp of the Vedanta school, more exactly named the acintyabheda-abheda doctrine, the 'unthinkable dividedness and undividedness' of God and soul. But at the same time, the soul is also a part of the servant of God. It is not aware of this nature, however, because it identifies with the material body, and thus is submitted to the cycle of rebirths according to the laws of karma.

Ritual Practice and Manner of Life

4. By way of fully devoted service (bhakti) to the god Krishna, especially by the recitation of his name in a certain → mantra—mahāmantra, the "Great Mantra" ("Hare Krishna Hare Krishna Krishna Krishna Hare Hare, Hare Rama Hare Rama Rama Rama Hare Hare")—human beings can once more be delivered from this cycle. Other mantras are prescribed, as well as devotional songs (samkirtan), ritual veneration of the statues of the gods and of the spiritual master, the reading of Prabhupāda's books, and the four principles of the manner of life (pure vegetarianism, no sort of intoxicant—not even tea or coffee—no gambling, and no sexuality unless it serves procreation in marriage). All contemplation and aspiration is directed to Krishna. The mahāmantra is recited for hours, sankirtan is sung in the group in ecstatic wise and accompanied by dance, the rituals and prescriptions are followed, a detailed Hindu calendar of feasts is strictly observed. This strict practice of religion has occasioned the high respect of ISKCON, especially in India, where priests educated by ISKCON may perform the temple service even in Hindu temples of other orientations. Along with dedicated priests to perform the rituals, there are other specialists for many attendant activities, from cooks, musicians, and preachers, to Superintendent of the Temple.

Literature

Bryant, Edwin F./Ekstrand, Maria L. (eds.), The Hare Krishna Movement: The Post-charismatic Fate of a Religious Transplant, New York 2004; Goswami, Mukunda, Inside the Hare Krishna Movement: An Ancient Eastern Religious Tradition Comes of Age in the Western World, Badger 2001; Nye, Malory, Multiculturalism and Minority Religions in Britain: Krishna Consciousness, Religious Freedom and the Politics of Location, Richmond 2000.

→ Anti-Cult Movements, Guru, Hinduism, New Religions

Karl-Peter Gietz

Hasidism

Hasidism—a Jewish Awakening Movement

1. Hasidism, a mystical awakening movement in Judaism, arose in Eastern Europe around mid-eighteenth century. Since the → Shoa, it has maintained its centers in New York and Israel. Israel ben Elieser ("Ba'al Shem [Tov]," c. 1700–1760) is the founder of the movement, which was systematically organized by his successor Dov Ber (d. 1772), the Maggid ("Preacher") from Mesritsh, and propagated through emissaries. A variety of directions from the very outset, ordinarily named for their European cities of origin (e.g., Lubavitch in Byelorussia, or Bratslav in the Ukraine) came more and more under the leadership of a certain dynastically selected Rebbe (Yiddish, 'Rabbi') or Tzaddiq (lit., 'Righteous'; essentially, 'Holy'). As spiritual leader, intermediary between God and his community, miraculous helper, counselor, and judge, such a Rebbe at once formed around himself a social and cultural network, with schools and social institutions, and, in the diaspora of today, also saw to the disposition of kosher foodstuffs.

Today a part of Jewish Orthodoxy, in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries Hasidism closely questioned the received forms of Judaism, and settled them on new foundations. Therefore it was keenly persecuted from 1772 onward, yet at the beginning of the nineteenth century it was reconciled with its 'enemies' (mitnagdim) in view of what was felt to be a threat facing both sides, namely the Enlightenment and assimilation. Statistics from 1982 trace a growth from some 313,000 to at least 5 million members in pre-war Europe.

2. a) The Hasidic movement, portrayed so often in a folkloristic, romanticizing color—especially under the influence of Martin Buber—as a movement turned to the world and hallowing the everyday, was every bit of this. Granted, the Hasidic mysticism of oneness in Judaism popularized a reevaluation of the world, as it had previously been represented, even by medieval Platonizing philosophers, and especially through the → Kabbalah from the thirteenth century. More than anything else, however, it was an idealistically inclined worldview—to the point of → pantheism—according to which everything in the world is directed by the Divinity, and yet only a scintilla of the fullness of the Godhead remained, from which the human being must not decline.

The Ba'al Shem Tov

b) The founder of the movement, Ba'al Shem (Tov), "Master of the (Good) Name [i.e. of God]," which worked by magic, had adopted ancient traditions of alphabetical mysticism and understood the emergence of the world from the divine One as a linguistic event. For him, the Bible's divine word of creation was the self-unfurling of God through the alphabet, and Satmarer Hasidim arrive in New York with their rabbi, the Rebbe, in traditional holiday raiment and aprons of mazzo. Mazzos are thin loaves of unleavened wheat, rye, barley, and oat bread, eaten on Seder Evening, the first evening of the Feast of Passover. They recall the biblical departure of Israel from Egypt, when the people had no time to leaven their dough (Exod 12:34,39). (Hubert Mohr) the plenitude of God is concentrated in the first letters of the alphabet. The world is a comprehensive text, and the Hebrew names of things and persons their God-charged being. God's ubiquity in the world makes possible, and demands, the 'clinging to God,' the devequt, at every place and in every manner of activity. The Hasidim call it 'service to God in materiality.' The climax of devequt, meanwhile, described by the Ba'al Shem's successor as perfect mystical unification (Lat., unio mystica), has its place especially in the study of the Torah and in ecstatic prayer, at which the God-filled language is present in an undisguised manner. Devequt is the wellspring of Hasidic gladness, which must not be misunderstood as joy in the world, but, rather, seen as an 'earthly enjoyment in God' (→ Emotions/Feelings; Kabbalah; Mysticism).

c) However, the persevering devequt called for by the Tzaddiq is purely an elitist accomplishment, scarcely adapted to popularization. And yet the community-creating deed of charisma, called for by Hasidism, did reach the Ba'al Shem's most faithful pupil and intermediary, Jacob Josef of Polna'a (d. 1782), in the first published Hasidist work (1780) Toledot Ya'akov Yosef. According to him, the Hasidist community, comparable to Christian conceptualizations, is a mystical body, whose soul is the Tzaddiq, whose body the Hasidim. As with the human individual, where the soul alone possesses a likeness to devequt, so it is as well with the corpus mysticum of the community. The Rebbe generates for his community a mystical contact with the Godhead. As a member of the community body, the simple Hasid now enjoys an indirect unification with the Godhead, rendered accessible to him even without the traditionally required schooling in the Torah.

The Tzaddiq

3. The Hasidist Rebbe, or Tzaddiq, is Hasidism's key religious reference. He has joined manifold religious functions and types of the long Jewish tradition to himself, and thus corresponds to a multiplicity of human needs satisfied until now by various specialists. It is the task of the Ba'al Shem who assists in escaping earthly needs, to be a messianic leader of the soul, a prophet who, in the holy spirit, knows sins and ritual impurity. He is a preacher and revealer of mystical truths. An especially important additional function is intercession before the heavenly court, to which the Rebbe can undertake ecstatic ascensions at all times. The Hasidim have glorified the deeds and wonders of the Hasidic saints, the Tzaddiqim, in a great number of legends. These became familiar worldwide by way of the expressionistic existentialist reinterpretations of Martin Buber. They conveyed not Hasidic theology and mysticism, but faith in the wondrous succor of these 'righteous men,' together with the everyday problems and hopes—not peculiar to Hasidim—of Eastern European Jews.

New Societal Forms

4. The doctrines of Hasidism have generated an extensively new societal and religious scale of values, thereby occasioning a complete restructuring of Eastern European communities, which still exist today in New York, Israel, and Antwerp. Highest value was assigned no longer to schooling in the Torah but to ecstatic prayer, and especially membership in the Hasidic community, which was possible even for a member with scant education and simple profession. The celebration of feasts at the 'court' of the Rebbe ranked over their celebration in the domestic circle. Hasidism subdivided Jewish society according to numerous different loyalties to individual Tzaddiqim, some of whom did not even reside locally. The new Hasidic leadership has taken over functions of the local community authorities, and pretends to the regulation of simply all social and personal life. The Rebbe entreats for his society the blessing of heaven, by prayer and wonder, and the society supports him with material goods. Despite numerous activities of individual mysticism—to the point of a contemplative annihilation of the person, the ego, and the world—the community is at the center of Hasidic life; the community may take advantage of dance, tobacco and alcohol, and unbridled joy, to support the ecstasy of the soul, and thus also that of the Rebbe. The Hasidic group most active today is that of the Chabad-Lubavitcher, which has subscribed to the inner-Jewish mission. It is this group that presents publicly its high-tension messianic expectations.

Literature

Sources and Legends: Buber, Martin, Tales of the Hasidim, 2 vols., New York [8]1975–1977; Grözinger, Karl E. (ed./trans./comm.), Die Geschichten vom Ba'al Schem Tov: Schivche ha-Bescht, Wiesbaden 1997.

Secondary Literature: Dubnow, Simon, Geschichte des Chassidismus, Berlin 1931 (classic study); Grözinger, Karl E., "Jüdische Mystik. Eine Einführung in die Geisteswelt des Chassidismus," in: Ev. Akademie Baden (ed.), Der Chassidismus, Karlsruhe 1996, 26-51; Idel, Moshe, Hasidism: Between Ecstasy and Magic, Albany 1995; Mintz, Jerome R., Hasidic People, Cambridge 1992; Rosman, Moshe, Founder of Hasidism: A Quest for the Historical Ba'al Shem Tov, Berkeley 1996; Schindler, Pesach, Hasidic Responses to the Holocaust in the Light of Hasidic Thought, Hoboken 1990.

→ Diaspora, Judaism, Kabbalah, Mysticism, Shoah

Karl E. Grözinger

Heathen

Heathen are always the 'others': Muslims, freethinkers and atheists, cannibals—even Catholics or Protestants, as you prefer. 'Heathen' is a collective, 'exclusive' (excluding) concept: in the Hebrew Bible, the 'others' are the goyim (Gen 10:5, Isa 14:26); in the Greek New Testament, they are ta éthne ('the tribes'), or, as the part for the whole, hoi Héllenes ('the Greeks': John 7:35, Mark 7:26), the '(other) peoples,' those who do not belong to one's own (religious) community. 'Heathen,' then, is one of those collective appellations that sets up a 'we/they' distinction, so as to designate an 'out group,' and, as rule, to deprecate them vis-à-vis the 'in group.' 'Heathen,' the English equivalent of the Greek ethnikós ('belonging to a [foreign] people'), doubtless reflects the socio-religious relations of → late antiquity, separating as it does the (already Christianized) 'city dwellers' (Lat., urbani) from the 'rural dwellers' (Lat., pagani; → Paganism/Neopaganism). Thus the heathen are depicted as inhabitants of the flat lands, scarcely Christianized as yet, if at all. The conceit with which so many a city-dweller looked down on 'the ones from the country' made the appellation perfect for being generalized and whetted until it developed into a motto of Christian Europe across the board. Used polemically, it developed its danger when, for example, other-thinking and other-believing persons fell into the Inquisitorial search-and-destroy mission, or when the 'mission to the heathen' entered the service of colonial interests. Although it is still a favorite negative correlate for the Christian missionary task, positions and religious group-identities have nonetheless developed in the modern age—similarly to what has occurred with 'witch'—that actually lay claim to the word 'heathen' for their own role, their own self-image. Alain de Benoist's "Comment peut-on être pain" ("How to Be a Pagan"; Paris 1981) is a battle-slogan of the rightist critique of Christianity, just as it is of radical feminism.

→ Mission, Paganism/Neopaganism, Reception

Hubert Mohr

Heaven / Sky

Dimensions of the Concept

1. The conception of heaven, together with its possible antitheses (earth, hell) and overlaps (paradise, the beyond), belongs to the most important group of influential religious symbols in the history of ideas and piety. Adapted in depth by the folk culture, it permeates many religions, and is further developed even outside explicitly religious traditions. In the Judaeo-Christian tradition, this conception combines several dimensions of meaning.

(a) First of all, in terms of daily human experience of the world, even today heaven or the sky is an expanse reaching over the earth, the space marked off by sunrise and sunset, the air space in which clouds and winged animals move, the expanse lit by the stars. Supported by this obvious experience, early notions of cosmology and science managed to

The 'Delivery of the Decree of Pardon' is part of the Daoist ritual of the dead. A Confucian master of ceremonies takes over the funeral, while Daoists are concerned to ease the heavenly ascent for the three heavenly souls of the deceased (in addition there are seven earthly ones, according to their conceptions). The photograph was taken in Southern Taiwan. It shows a Daoist master with his disciples. They have climbed onto benches and stools around a raised table, in order to be closer to heaven. The ritual takes place in the open, so that communication is not impeded. The Decree of Pardon is seen as having been issued by the 'Chancellery of the Three Heavens,' overseen by the first 'Master of Heaven' and founder of the Daoist religion, Zhang Daoling. As an official in the service of the government of the universe, the Master takes delivery of the Document. Then it is entrusted to the 'Officer of Pardon' (a figure on the table) and sent to the lower world, to effectuate the deliverance of the deceased. The journeys on high and below are presented by one of the disciples in pantomime. Descending to the lower world, he springs backwards from the bench. (Kirsten Holzapfel) conceptualize the sky as a hemisphere ranged over the earth, with the stars mounted ('firmament') and the heavenly waters being above it; or as a platter standing on props.

(b) Attached to this conception of space, heaven or the sky is the place of emergence of the reality of inescapable natural, historical, and social forces. Human beings receive rain from it and regard themselves as in dependency upon the powers and forces of weather, as important natural conditions that affect the framework of their life.

(c) At the same time, heaven is the residence or place of the gods and highest beings. It is the region of the celestial court, with its various supernatural or angelic beings and powers. In the conception of the biblical scriptures, heaven is the throne of God. The fact that God dwells in heaven guarantees an action of ordering and coordinating, and an ultimately reliable interconnection, in this area of creation so inaccessible to human beings.

(d) Heaven or the sky as the place of the divine presence, or of God's dwelling, can be all but equated with God himself, as occurs for instance in a comparison of the transcendence of heaven with the transcendence of God. However, in Judaism, since the second century BCE, the word 'heaven' (or 'sky') has been used in order to avoid pronunciation of God's ineffable name. Against the idea of a sky with many gods, the Judaeo-Christian tradition insists that earth and heaven are creatures of God and parts of the world. The inaccessible heaven is of the same basic creatureliness as the accessible earth. Accordingly, Judaeo-Christian hope is in a new creating of earth and sky (1 Pet 3:22). These religious understandings lead to a model of a graduated transcendence, in which an absolute transcendency of the God of heaven and earth, inconceivable for humankind, is to be distinguished from a relative transcendency of God in heaven, that is, of the presence of God in the space of the created world that can be conceptualized. The notion of God as dwelling in heaven, then, can express at once his relative nearness, and his transcendence and distance (Jer 23:23-24).

(e) Heaven is often seen as the place of human life after death: the righteous—human beings living according to God's will—will be with God everlastingly. In the sense of an unambiguously positive counter-world, one delivered from ambiguities and suffering, heaven makes possible a happy life that infirmity and death can never remove. Here the conception of heaven overlaps that of paradise (McDonnell/Lang 2001), since the latter describes an original condition, now lost, of salvation and happiness to which, under certain conditions, the dead return (→ Garden/Paradise). In this connection, the conception of → hell takes form as a negative counter-world, set over against heaven, in which human beings are at a definitive distance from God. In many religious traditions, this paradise is partially accessible to selected pious people through someone or something that leads them to heaven, a journey to heaven through → visions, rapture (2 Cor 12:2ff.), or forms of ecstasy.

Conceptions of Heaven

2. In the writings of the Judaism of pre-Christian times (beginning in the second century BCE), the conception of heaven undergoes a powerful broadening. Heaven becomes the place of the just, a place consisting of various levels, of which the highest extends to God's very heaven (1 Enoch 16). Beginning in the third century BCE, a reverential avoidance of the use of the name of God has led to the substitution of the word 'heaven' (1 Macc 3:18). But at the same time, the designation of God with the concept of heaven has the consequence of blurring the sharp boundary between God and heaven as set forth in the thought of the creatureliness of heaven and earth.

Conceptions of God in Islam demonstrate a close proximity to those of the Judaeo-Christian tradition, with a radically sensuous conception of paradise, and the thought of judgment in the sense of a revealing of the deeds of human beings being set in the foreground. Although the Qur'an does not set it forth directly, the Garden of Paradise, into which the righteous may enter, is presented as divided into several levels or regions. The promise of a fulfillment and enhancement of earthly happiness in the regions of paradise is regarded in various sectors of folk piety as compensation for earthly renunciation and suffering (e.g. in war), although formal Islamic theology expounds and emphasizes the metaphorical character of the presentations.

The central interest in Chinese religious traditions is in a harmony between heaven and earth. Harmony in human concerns, and lawful behavior, lead to a harmony with heaven, whose forces are influenced by nature and culture at once. The cosmos is determined by heaven, and forces and events emerging from heaven, like earthquakes and floods, are understood as heaven's reactions to a failed behavior on the part of human beings, and especially to the 'wisdom' and actions of those responsible for the political domain. Events beyond the field of human beings' direct influence are ascribed to the will of heaven—which, as active principle of world order, and as the power that rules, reacts to the behavior of human beings with castigation and benediction.

Unless the rationality of the Judeo-Christian heaven-symbol is traced primarily in the aspects of the firmament determined by natural cosmology, it becomes clear that heaven is an early symbol of real universality, which comprehends indeterminable, unavailable, inapproachable, and non-manipulable areas of creation, whose forces determine and impregnate biological as well as cultural life in a sensory way (M. Welker, J. Moltmann). In the present understanding of the world, (a) in a 'modal logical' understanding of reality, it is clear that possibility, but, far more, (b) the future as a paradigm of transcendence, has captured, at least partially, the position or function of a heaven unavailable to displacement (J. Moltmann).

Receptions and Operational Behaviors of the Concept of Heaven

3. a) Iconography in Christian architecture: to this very day, the presentation of the 'spherical' (Gk., sphaira, 'sphere') presentation of a bounded, (solid) crystalline sea beyond the firmament is culturally significant. Through the centuries, the (usually blue) spherical form of the world, as attribute of Christ, becomes the attribute of government and rule. In the architecture of the West, with the adoption of ancient models, the cupola, the apse, and the vault become the portrait of the cosmos, and simultaneously the locus of the epiphany of celestial forms (Pantokrator [Gk., 'all-controlling' or '-governing' Christ], the Mother of God, etc.). The symbolism of the cosmos is also reflected in Gothic rose windows.

Criticism of Religion

b) Many forms of piety, taking their point of departure in one-sided interpretations of biblical propositions of heaven as the country of Christians (Phil 3:30) in the life to come, and as an everlasting dwelling (2 Cor 5:1), hosted the development of an individualistic thinking of compensation and consolation, to which the modern → criticism of religion reacted with the massive reproach of flight from the world. To this critique, heaven is a projection screen for human wishes (Ludwig Feuerbach). Here one sees the ambivalence of positive, heavenly, counter-worlds, out of which vital standards for a life orientation can be drawn, but which can also lead to an erosion of responsible activity.

Receptions in Popular Culture

c) The motif of heaven, with its antitheses (earth, hell) and overlaps (paradise, the next life), has undergone a multiplicity of processings in the artistic imagination over the centuries, especially in literature. Although the invocation of God in heaven is a secure component of the Christian Lord's Prayer, the meaning of heaven has been lost to popular Christian piety. Strikingly, however, with the withdrawal of the conception of heaven in current forms of piety, a persistently strong reception of the motif of heaven marches forward in the 'secular' audiovisual popular culture of the present. Here we may list, by way of example, its lyrical development with music groups like Queen ("Heaven for Everyone" [CD Made in Heaven, 1995]), Led Zeppelin ("Stairway to Heaven") or Dire Straits ("Ticket to Heaven" [CD On Every Street, 1991]), and artists like Belinda Carlisle ("Heaven is a Place on Earth"), Bob Dylan ("Knockin' on Heaven's Door" [LP Billy the Kid, 1973]), Tracy Chapman ("Heaven's Here on Earth" [CD New Beginning, 1995]), or Eric Clapton ("Tears in Heaven" [CD Unplugged, 1992]). In these vignettes of the motif of heaven, that concept designates a salvific and beatific, indeed beatifying, condition in close connection with the conception of paradise in a psychic, sexual, social, political, economic, or ecological outlook. This condition, of course, in a de facto adoption of the philosophical critique of religion, is being predicated of, or required for, earth itself. While in commercial advertising altogether simplified comparisons of happiness and heaven are dominant, there are differentiated adoptions and elaborations of the heaven motif in film, as, for example, in Wim Wenders's Himmel über Berlin (Ger.,

'Heaven over Berlin,' 1987; see photograph at → Angel), or In weiter Ferne, so nah (Ger., 'So far and yet so near,' 1993).

Literature

Himmelfarb, Martha, Ascent to Heaven in Jewish and Christian Apocalypses, New York/ Oxford 1993; Houtman, Cornelis, Der Himmel im Alten Testament. Israels Weltbild und Weltanschauung, Leiden 1993; Hughes, Robert, Heaven and Hell in Western Art, London 1968; McDonnel, Colleen/Lang, Bernhard, Heaven: A History, New Haven ²2001; McGrath, Alister E., A Brief History of Heaven, Malden 2003; Moltmann, Jürgen, God in Creation: A New Theology of Creation and the Spirit of God, Minneapolis 1993; Tober, Linda M./Lusby, F. Stanley, "Heaven and Hell," in: Encyclopedia of Religion 6, 237-243; Welker, Michael, Schöpfung und Wirklichkeit, Neukirchen-Vluyn 1995; Wright, J. Edward, The Early History of Heaven, New York 2000.

→ Angel, Garden/Paradise, Hell, Hereafter, Myth/Mythology

Günter Thomas

Hell

1. The word 'hell' (from Old English hel, in turn from helan, 'to cover,' 'to conceal') in Germanic languages denotes a 'hidden' realm of the dead. The corresponding words in romance languages mean, more precisely, a 'subterranean realm' (Lat., infernum, akin to Eng. 'infernal'; Fr., enfers). In the earliest traditions, the underworld is the region where all of the dead continue their existence—where earthly existence endures in reduced format (Heb., sheol; ancient Gk., hades [Homer]). Punishment and retribution are not yet the foremost connotations. A further basic conception of the hereafter in the worldviews of many peoples has been a neutral one, that of a 'second world': an actual world under the earth, conceived geographically, peopled by rational beings, and administered through institutions analogous to those of terrestrial cultures. This idea is at the root of the concept of a spatial intercourse between earth and underworld: through darksome valleys and beyond volcanoes, or across a river of the dead both worlds come together. Journeys and passages, as well as dreams, visions, and ecstatic trances, afford access to the underworld.

2. a) In religions whose moral systems are conceived individualistically, the underworld has the form of a sphere, in which dead people—or more precisely, the dead individually—are punished for their transgressions (Egypt, Orphic ideas in Greece, Jewish prophecy, Islam). Conversely, with the views of heaven and paradise the reward of attaining life is expressed. Christianity, especially, has developed an eminently negative conception of this element of the hereafter: a place in which penalties are undergone for unexpiated unrighteousness, a hell in the narrower sense of the word. In apocalypticism and the literature of monastic visions, the influence of penal law and popular belief on theology and pastoral ministry leads to an inflation of the awful. The everlasting castigations of the damned are the judgment of sin, which is offense against the infinite worth of God. In the Middle Ages, hell is distinguished from other regions of the afterlife, such

In Jean-Paul Sartre's drama Huis clos (Eng. as No Exit), hell comes off without physical torments. In a drawing room, furnished with three settees and a repulsive bronze casting, three deceased persons meet once more. Each has incurred guilt vis-à-vis the others, and now each is sleepless, under everlasting electric light, condemned to the other pair. Their conversation promptly betrays their weak points. Alliances switch, and by turns, the characters assume the role of victim. In this drama, atheist existentialist Sartre has conceptualized a modern hell, built on each character's personal decision. The purpose of their having been locked up together is determined by themselves: to impose psychic hellfire on one another. Open-eyed, they enter the diabolical game. "Hell," observes the character Garcin, "is other people." Even when the door suddenly opens, none of the three dares to leave. They will continue thus throughout all eternity. The photograph shows the first presentation of Huis clos at the Théâtre du Vieux Colombier, Paris, in 1944. (Kirsten Holzapfel) as purgatory with its temporal duration; the underworld is divided up, and the dead are ranged in categories and assigned to their places of punishment (eminently in Dante's Divine Comedy, 1311–1321).

b) This hereafter represents a mighty store of threat, conducive to the maintenance of social and political order, and to the success of the Christian mission. Post-mortal punishments are in correspondence to earthly transgressions, for whose retribution they lie in wait, composed after the law of retaliation. The kind and gravity of the offense are reflected in the proportionate severity and duration of the sanction. This repressive function of the graphically depicted pains of hell was accompanied by sadistic tendencies. In art and folklore, the identity of the denizens of hell is permanently shattered, through manifold species of agony. 'Intelligent fire' burns the damned without burning them up. Ghastly surroundings (stench of brimstone), like the terror of the everlasting satanic dismay wreaked by the devil and his demons, have no end. Retribution and deterrence in the spirit of penal law, moral edification, and religious conversion are important functions of this gigantic scenario of chastisement.

Belief in Hell: Modern Conceptions and Critique

3. Modern times have seen a pluralization, a recasting, and an extensive critique of hell, in both its cosmological and its religious sense.

a) Even the ancient church set forth the hell of the damned not only as a place, but also as a condition, free from local connotation. The conceptual distinction between hell as a punitive condition, on the one hand, and as a place of punishment, on the other, was widespread even in the Middle Ages. Such pathways of 'demythologization' were further traversed in the Reformation, especially in the presence of the question whether Christ must suffer the hell of God's wrath not only on the cross, but in the underworld as well.[1]

b) Through the influence of the philosophical → Enlightenment (Bayle, Diderot, Voltaire), and Christian currents like Pietism (J. W. Petersen), the old concept of hell and the idea of a cruelly avenging God who punished unto eternity were surrendered, as irreconcilable with a theology of the love, goodness, and mercy of God.

Concepts of Hell in Social Philosophy

c) The metaphorical use of the term 'hell,' however, delivered from religious indices, has a firm place as a negative topos of existence in the analysis of the modern age. At the hands of a Georges Minois, the concept of hell is subjected to an in-depth analysis at the hands of social philosophy, in function of the destructive tendencies of an absolutization of, on the one side, egoism, and on the other, altruism.[2] The existentialist philosophy of Jean-Paul Sartre interprets hell as the ineluctable relationship of one human being to another: "Hell is other people" (see photograph). In modern literature, philosophy, and art, as well as in film, 'hell' stands for the numberless needs of earthly life; for psychic chasms, alienation, illness, the excesses of power and sexuality, perversions and sadism.[3] On this level of meaning are also settled the 'trips to hell' of war and extreme adventure.[4]

The Christian Churches

d) In the large churches today, hell no longer plays a leading role. Theologically regarded, heaven and hell are bound up with the moral and religious earnestness of human behavior. 'Hell' means the possibility of ultimate distance from God and subjective failure, without positive contentions as to the locality of an underworld and its torments. However, hell as a subterranean reality belongs to those religious themes whose survival is assured in the ecclesial subculture.[5] Private revelations (→ Vision/Auditory Experience), for example in fundamentalist Catholic currents, afford richly detailed glimpses into a subterranean hell (e.g. the Marian cult of Fatima). Such considerations of hell, and of the eternity of its torments, are bound up with, for one, the masochistic spirituality of the suffering of atonement, and for another, aggressive threat and ideological propaganda against modernity's 'Babel of sin.' However, surveys show that faith in a hell in which human beings are punished after death is not reserved to a subculture: it increases in proportion to church allegiance, as indicated in the frequency of attendance at church service. Belief in hell is founded, as a rule, on a keen sense of justice, that will not reconcile itself with unrequited earthly injustice.

Cultural Satanism

e) The demise of the threat of hell opens the way for a mischievous appropriation: the devilish actor (or, in the sado-masochistic version, the helpless sacrifice) is played coquettishly, in a theatrical 'spectacle of hell.' In advertising and everyday culture, hells and devils like these are richly attested: in the motorcycle gang Hell's Angels, in rock music (Heavy Metal), or in sports (→ Satanism).

Concepts of Hell in Non-European Religions

4. Unlike the biblical hell, that of the Qur'an is very graphic and rich in imagery. Individual responsibility before the divine judgment is stressed unambiguously. But unlike the Christian hell, the Islamic one is without utter hopelessness and despair. God's mercy is basically open to the granting of a pardon at any time. In Hinduism, disparate concepts are handed down. These include subterranean hells, with torments portrayed in rich detail. Again, the idea of a wandering soul, and rebirth, means an experience in hell—ever and again to have to enter the hell of earthly suffering, rather than reaching nirvana. The sojourn in a terrestrial and subterranean hell is but a transient one, whose purpose is a purification of evil souls. In other Far Eastern religions, as well (Buddhism), the sojourn in a hell is fastened to the great cycle of rebirths, and does not have the Christian imprint of ultimacy.

1. Herzog 1997, 302-315.
2. Minois 1991.
3. Cf. Kuschel, Karl-Josef, in: Biesinger, Albert/Kessler, Michael (eds.), Himmel, Hölle, Fegefeuer, Tübingen 1996, 31-54; Pike 1997; Minois 1991.
4. E.g., Ebert, Wolfgang (ed.), Höllenfahrten. Forscher, Abenteurer und Besessene, Cologne 1998.
5. Cf. Vorgrimler 1993, 401-428.

Literature

Auffarth, Christoph, Irdische Wege und himmlischer Lohn. Kreuzzug, Jerusalem und Fegefeuer in religionswissenschaftlicher Perspektive, Göttingen 2002; Fox, Samuel J., Hell in Jewish Literature, Northbrook 1972; Gardner, Eileen (ed.), Visions of Heaven and Hell before Dante, New York 1989; Herzog, Markwart, "Descensus ad inferos": Eine religionsphilosophische Untersuchung der Motive und Interpretationen mit besonderer Berücksichtigung der monographischen Literatur seit dem 16. Jahrhundert, Frankfurt/M. 1997; Le Goff, Jacques, The Birth of Purgatory, London 1984; Minois, Georges, Histoire de l'enfer, Paris 1991; Owen, D. D. R., The Vision of Hell: Infernal Journeys in Medieval French Literature, Edinburgh 1970; Pike, David L., Passage Through Hell: Modernist Descents, Medieval Underworlds, Ithaka 1997; Vorgrimler, Herbert, Geschichte der Hölle, Munich 1993.

→ Angel, Demon/Demonology, Devil, Ethics/Morals, Heaven/Sky, Hereafter, Satanism

Markwart Herzog

Hereafter

A hereafter, in the raw sense of 'the other side,' necessarily corresponds to the fact that a boundary is traced when a dead person must be withdrawn from the world of the living, to be buried beyond a boundary, a stream, or a cemetery wall, in a special area. Here, in ambivalent reciprocity, are both the 'disposal of' the corpse, lest the living suffer the peril of contamination (→ Purification/Hygiene/Bodily Grooming), and the 'provision for' the departed in the life after death. But the conceptualization of a life after death also requires other images and spaces, to palliate the demands of this real event, and bestow plausibility on an existence beyond the moldering of the earth. The dead live in a counter-world: on an island ('of the blessed'), in a garden (paradise), in a secure city (Jerusalem), in a cave under the world, or in the sky (heaven). The living, at any rate, cannot experience these places. The hereafter extends the order of present; only very rarely does it reverse relationships. The castigation of the 'others' renders one's own reward sweeter still.

By limited analogy, and by escalation, the residence of the gods is conceived. In addition to the 'house of God' in the world below, there is the castle beyond, with its throne, music, festive meals, and countless servants. All of this subsists on a dominant mountain, or in heaven.

A systematic conception of 'the other' is applied, if the hereafter is in no way submitted to terrestrial conditions—if it is thought 'transcendently.' No anthropomorphic notions, no concrete and practical, everyday notions are used any longer; the speculative logic that obeys an inner systematics opens up a counter-world standing athwart it as an abstract norm. Then for the dead the hereafter is attainable only through a test, and thanks to 'grace' and the salvation of a divine judge.

→ Death and Dying, God/Gods/The Sacred, Heaven/Sky, Hell, Metaphysics, Spirits/Ghosts/Revenants

Christoph Auffarth

Heresy

The concept of heresy (Gk., haíresis, 'choice') originally denotes the opportunity of a selection to be made among various ancient philosophical schools. With the appearance of the Christian → Church and its orthodoxy, the word receives the polemical meaning of 'false teaching,' along with that of 'particular direction' or 'tack.' The struggle with the heresies (Arianism, Donatism, → Gnosticism) helped a Christianity in the process of formation, itself a particular direction of Judaism, to produce an inernal unity among its communities, and to bound itself off from similar religious groups or Greek philosophical directions (Neoplatonism). The imputation of heresy was also used, however, from the beginning, to suppress criticism of the ecclesiastical → hierarchy. Any contradiction of an acknowledged recognized dogma, and any attempt to take a position outside the clerical structure, was implacably persecuted as heresy, and punished with excommunication. But the continuous confrontation with heresies compelled Christianity to see to an exact fixing of its faith teachings, which contributed decisively to the production of → dogma and theology, and helped mold Western thought. Here, emphatically, the teachings of the heretics were not only deconstructed and abolished, but reshaped as well, adapted, and adopted.

The battle against the heresies always had a political and juridical dimension, as well. Heresy, it is true, is a Judaeo-Christian concept, but its equivalent is to be found in all of the great religions, to the extent that the latter cooperate with the power of the state, as in the Japanese Buddhism of the seventeenth century. With the unification of church and state in the late Roman Empire of the fourth century, heresies were persecuted from the secular side as well. Now it was possible to have delinquent heretical ecclesiastics physically liquidated at the hands of the state. Systematically and as a matter of principle, this operation was then practiced from the twelfth century onward by church and state, with assistance from the newly developed procedures of the Inquisition. The most powerful heresy of the Middle Ages, that of the Cathari in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, threatened the power and riches of the secularized clergy with its 'gnostically' based teaching of poverty and equality. The latter, however, called parts of the intra-Catholic poverty movement of the Franciscans and Dominicans to the fray. At the fiery stakes of the Inquisition, as well as in crusades, the Cathari, and many of the uninvolved, were murdered. In the theoretical confrontation with the 'heretics,' it was especially the Dominicans, such as Thomas Aquinas, who made outstanding contributions to the development of scientific thought, although there was much that was problematic as well (development of a demonology, upon which to base a construction of the → witch model).

That treatment of heresies was always partially dependent on the times, power structures, and societal relations, is to be seen in the modern age. In 1415, reformer Jan Hus was burned as a heretic; a hundred years later, there was no question of anything of the kind succeeding against → Luther. His heresy was successful, and became a church itself. The sequel to the → Reformation, then, was the collapse of a central authority of belief that could control heresies (→ Papacy). The concept of heresy widened by leaps and bounds, and lost its political meaning in society. With the unraveling of the church-state connection after the Thirty Years' War, secular penalties for heretics were rescinded. In the pluralistic society of today, it has been argued, there is even a 'heretical imperative' (P. Berger), since the individual must choose among the religions being offered.

In sum, the term 'heresy' is an emic category applied in religious discourses of identity. It is of no definitional use as an etic term for the academic study of religion.

Literature

Bailey, Michael D., Battling Demons: Witchcraft, Heresy, and Reform in the Late Middle Ages, University Park 2003; Berger, Peter L., The Heretical Imperative: Contemporary Possibilities of Religious Affirmation, Garden City 1980; Biller, Peter/Hudson, Anne (eds.), Heresy and Literacy, 1000–1530, Cambridge 1994; Borst, Arno, Die Katharer, Freiburg 1990; Bruschi, Caterina/Biller, Peter (eds.), Texts and the Repression of Medieval Heresy, Woodbridge 2003; Christie-Murry, David, A History of Heresy, Oxford 1989; Evans, G. R., A Brief History of Heresy, Malden 2003; George, Leonard, Crimes of Perception: An Encyclopedia of Heresies and Heretics, New York 1995; Lambert, Malcolm D., Medieval Heresy: Popular Movements from Bogomil to Hus, London 1977; Laursen, John Christian (ed.), Histories of Heresy in Early Modern Europe: For, Against, and Beyond Persecution and Toleration, New York 2002; Leff, Gordon, Heresy, Philosophy and Religion in the Medieval West, Aldershot 2002; Waite, Gary K., Heresy, Magic, and Witchcraft in Early Modern Europe, Basingstoke 2003.

→ Church, Demon/Demonology, Gnosticism, Hierarchy, Inquisition, Luther, Middle Ages, Reformation, Theology, Witch/Persecution of Witches

Nils Grübel

Hermeneutics

The expression "hermeneutics" (from Gk., hermeneuein, 'to translate,' 'to interpret') denotes the methods of interpretation of a text (→ Text/Textual Criticism) when seen as part of its exposition. Hermeneutics is of key importance especially for religion, when the latter is no longer temporally and locally embedded in the context in which a proposition or relation has found its Sitz im Leben. One way of 'translating' such a text into the present consists in expounding its 'deeper' sense, its meaning for times and places other than those of its original 'context.' With the sacred texts of the religions, this will typically mean their interpretation in a sense that will maintain their correctness throughout the ages. "Something can mean something different from that which it expresses literally" (allegory). By way of instrumental complementarity, historical-critical hermeneutics seeks to elucidate what the literal meaning of a text has been originally, for its own place and time. Only after this question has been answered can the text in question be 'trans-lated' to other temporal and local contexts.

In philosophy, hermeneutics has received a new meaning. Instead of being an ancillary science—one that seeks merely to decode languages and texts—it has become the prerequisite and aim of the very enterprise of 'understanding' its object (often in contrast to 'explanation').

→ Canon, Language, Literature, Science, Text/Textual Criticism, Theology, Translation, Writing

Christoph Auffarth

Hermetism / Hermeticism

The Term "Hermetism"

"Hermetism" is a term used today to describe the authors of Late Antique instructional texts which feature the personage of Hermes Trismegistus ("thrice-great Hermes") as instructor or interlocutor. In these texts, Hermes discusses and describes magical, astrological, alchemical, philosophical, and mystical ideas and practices. The variety of Hermetic subjects testifies to the absolute dominion of Hermes over every sort of learning: he was a personification of knowledge itself. As the Hermetic genre evolved, it came to take on an esoteric tone (→ Esotericism), from which the modern, occult-tinged reception of Hermetism and even our contemporary sense of the word 'hermetic' derives.

Hermetic Texts

Hermetic texts (commonly referred to as Hermetica) concerned with astrology and iatromathematics circulated as early as the first century BCE. Various Hermetica on other subjects, such as magic, alchemy, and the occult properties of natural objects continued to appear over the course of the next two centuries. While they were written in Greek, many most likely had an Egyptian provenance; the name Trismegistus, though Greek, was a redaction of an appellation ("great and great and great") originally applied to the Egyptian deity of knowledge, Thoth. In these early appearances Trismegistus regularly found the company of Egyptian deities, such as Isis and Horus, to discuss astrological and magical matters. While the various Hermetica contained Greek, Egyptian, and Persian learning, Trismegistus's identity was certainly that of a cultural hero of Hellenistic Egypt, which despised Greek, and later Roman, rule.

Middle Platonism

The first and second centuries CE saw renewed philosophical interest, long-dormant during centuries of dominance by Hellenistic schools, in the works of Plato, particularly the Timaeus. Thinkers such as Philo of Alexandria and Apuleius of Madaura concocted an admixture of Platonic and Stoic teaching commonly referred to as 'Middle Platonism.' Middle Platonists argued in favor of the transcendence of the first principle of the universe and its differentiation from a demiurge, who created the cosmos by means of a logos (Gk., "reason-principle"), found in and linking together all things. Like the Stoa, they believed that the cosmos—and everyone in it—was governed by a series of seven planetary beings, which in turn were ruled by heimarmenē (Gk., "fate"). The Middle Platonists were very interested in the subject of the soul and its relationship to God (the transcendent), the cosmos, the intermediary astro-principles or governing beings, contemplative life, and the logos, by which the essence of all things could be apprehended. With the teaching of Plotinus (third century) Middle Platonism was transformed into the more systematic Neoplatonic school.

The Second Wave of Hermetica

Sometime between the late first and early third centuries, as production of magical and especially alchemical Hermetica continued, a new genre of Hermetica emerged. It was almost exclusively concerned with Middle Platonic ideas: the soul, its composition, its descent from and ascent back to God through the seven planetary governors. A fundamental, accessible interrelationship existing between all things, natural and divine, remained a consistent theme: hence the famous Hermetic dictum, "as above, so below." Axiomatic in earlier magical Hermetica, it was now explained in terms of "sympathy," a Stoic term which also took root in Neoplatonic thought. Apart from this very general Middle Platonic discourse the content of this second wave of Hermetica cannot be summarized as a series of doctrines: they are disparate and often contradictory. Of course, there were many authors posing as Hermes, and they were not in agreement with one another on every issue. Another possibility is that the various teachings did form a single Hermetic path to wisdom, in which some doctrines were abandoned as one's spiritual development progressed. In this sense a Hermetic student could, at an early stage, discuss the glories of creation but eventually come to scorn them in favor of ascetic meditation on the transcendent.

This second wave of Hermetica also saw alterations in the Hermetic cast and pedagogy. Now there were two Hermes Trismegistuses, one of remote antiquity, another being his homonymous son. This Hermes had his own son, Tat. He conversed with a new deity, Agathos Daimon (Gk., "good demon"), and had a personal vision of Poimandres, a spirit that calls itself nous (Gk., "mind") and delivers to Hermes a revelatory cosmogonical myth and the mission to preach truth to the masses. Alongside typical philosophical discourse, he now employed an esoteric, initiatory pedagogy of secrecy, concealment, and revelation with his own interlocutors to stress the difficulty of the path to divinity and the inexpressibility of ultimate knowledge. He also employed rituals: liturgy and hymns (probably influenced by contemporary Egyptian Jewry), incense, the animation of statues, incantations, and silent contemplation.

Egyptian Platonism and Gnosticism

Hermes Trismegistus retained his Egyptian patriotism. He employed the apocalyptic genre to describe the destruction and revival of Egypt as Earth's spiritual nation and disparaged the Greek language for its inability to capture Egyptian meaning. No Hermetic document praises Greek wisdom, but, nonetheless, the new Hermetic teaching was clearly Platonic. Porphyry (third century), a Neoplatonist himself, recognized Hermetic teaching as Platonic. This combination of Middle/Neoplatonic ideas, initiatory pedagogy, and ritual practice was widespread in late antiquity, particularly among the late Neoplatonists and the Gnostics (→ Gnosticism). Indeed, one of the most important of the esoteric, ritualistic Hermetica, Discourse on the Eighth and Ninth, was discovered at Nag Hammadi amongst a plenitude of Gnostic treatises. It is likely that, just as there were small circles of devoted students who cohabited with a single Gnostic or Neoplatonic instructor, some groups studied Hermetica in the same manner.

Reception in Late Antiquity and the Middle Ages

In antiquity, the Hermetica were admired by Iamblichus (third/fourth century), the alchemist Zosimus (fourth century), Stobaeus (fifth century?), and the Christian Lactantius (fourth century), who argued that Hermes had been a contemporary of Moses. Augustine knew some Hermetica and disparaged them. They were compiled into collections (including the Corpus Hermeticum, which contains most of the later, Platonic Hermetica) in medieval Byzantium, where they were controversial and, most likely, partially destroyed for their overt pagan content. Psellos (tenth century), but apparently not Plethon (fourteenth–fifteenth century), read Hermetica. There are also very many Hermetic documents in Arabic from the medieval Islamic world which have of yet received little study, aside from those which were translated into Latin in the twelfth century. The latter includes the famous Asclepius (a fourth century Latin translation of the Greek Teleios Logos, "Perfect Discourse").

Hermetic Texts in the Renaissance and the Term "Hermeticism"

In the fifteenth century, the Corpus Hermeticum flowed from Byzantium to Italy, was translated into Latin by Marsilio Ficino, and achieved instant popularity. This newfound availability of Hermetica in Europe fertilized the already flourishing alchemical, astrological, and Platonic discourses of the Renaissance. Thinkers such as Ficino, Pico della Mirandola, Giordano Bruno, Ludovico Lazzarelli, and Robert Fludd all featured Hermes as a central progenitor of a philosophia perennis (Lat., "eternal wisdom"), which could be found in all great philosophies and religious traditions. They expounded the perennial philosophy as a response to the bloody religio-political conflicts of their time. Yet each was also a self-identified Christian, and their Hermes, like Lactantius's, presaged the Christian revelation. Hermes's contemporaenity with Moses was debunked by the great sixteenth-century philologist Isaac Casaubon, who identified the Corpus Hermeticum as a product of the centuries following Christ. Nonetheless, Hermetica continued to be read by enthusiasts of alchemy, astrology, and esoteric thought. This Renaissance reception of Hermetica, and its own reception amongst modern occult movements, is commonly referred to as "Hermeticism."

Literature

Copenhaver, Brian P., Hermetica: The Greek Corpus Hermeticum and the Latin Asclepius in a New English Translation with Notes and Commentary, Cambridge 1992; Festugière, A.-J., La Revelation d'Hermès Trismegiste, 4 vols., Paris 1949–1952; Fowden, Garth, The Egyptian Hermes, Oxford 1986; Mahè, J.-P., Hermès en Haute Égypte, Paris 1978–1982; Mulsow, Martin (ed.), Das Ende des Hermetismus: Historische Kritik und neue Naturphilosophie in der Spätrenaissance. Dokumentation und Analyse der Debatte um die Datierung der hermetischen Schriften von Genebrard bis Casaubon (1567–1614), Tübingen 2002; Nock, A. D./Festugière, A.-J., Corpus Hermeticum, 4 vols., Paris 1954–1960; van den Broek, Roelof/Hanegraaff, Wouter J. (eds.), Gnosis and Hermeticism From Antiquity to Modern Times, Albany 1998; van den Broek, Roelof/van Heertum, Cis (eds.), From Poimandres to Jacob Böhme: Gnosis, Hermetism and the Christian Tradition, Amsterdam 2000.

→ Antiquity, Astrology, Esotericism, Gnosticism, Magic, Platonism

Dylan Burns

Hero / Heroism

Leading Figure

1. A hero (Gk., heros, 'hero,' originally 'free man') is an individual who stands out from the crowd of ordinary persons by his corporeal or spiritual assets, and who provides a model for ethical orientation. The heroic charisma rests on extraordinary (or superhuman) traits, and it draws human beings into the spell of the hero's personality. The hero constitutes a type: thus, the stories of heroes' life and works follow similar patterns in different religions, and make real or fictitious persons into vehicles of the actions of heroic myth. Regarded socio-psychologically, the hero is a symbolic leading figure, and serves his venerators in terms of an identification with a common, ideal "I." With the assistance of rituals and symbols, those in awe of the hero reinforce the validity of the order for which he himself steps forward. Heroism forms a construct for the interpretation of human experiences, and offers a concept for the defeat of death. In a variety of manners, the cult of the hero is integrated into religions, but it also exists in the area of the profane. The modern yearning for secular heroes can be appraised as counter-model to an egalitarian, anonymous society. It shapes new rituals, for the cultic veneration of its → idols. The emphasis is on the individual, and his and her resources to move the world and to alter prevailing conditions. Through this emphasis, the heroic man of action became savior and vessel of hope, but also destroyer and image of terror. This development appeared especially clearly in the political ideologies of the twentieth century, which all inclined to the honoring of heroes of the campaign.

Antiquity

2. a) In Greek antiquity, the hero was a powerful deceased man of action, who inspired reverence, and was to be appeased through cult. A meritorious life was not required of the hero, who might even be involved in crime. In myth, he usually does battle with an adversary who, in a dualistic conception of the world (→ Dualism), embodies the source and essence of evil. The hero overcomes the adversary, and effects redemption and salvation. Other myths tell of a confrontation with the gods, as in the fall of → Prometheus, who contravenes the will of the gods by conveying fire to human beings. This rebellion is punished, and the original order reestablished. With narrative structures like these, myth produces → meaning, explains basic human experiences, and offers solutions to conflicts. In antiquity, not only special achievements (giver of laws and founder of cities), great piety, physical strength (Heracles, winner at the Olympic Games) and beauty, but also the extraordinary circumstances of his death, as well, or death in battle, might occasion his promotion to 'heroism.' From funeral rites and ancestor worship came the cult of heroes. The memorial of heroes was localized at the tomb; frequently a building arose there, or a → monument (heróon), providing worshipers with space to conduct cultic celebrations. In celebrations, the story of the hero was transmitted and propagated. Songs and dramas elevated his existence manifold, projected it into a mythical primitive time, and elucidated his being with divine descendancy. At the same time, they warned of the ambivalent power of the dead hero, which could bring blessing as well as curse. With the help of sacrifices, the dangerous dead person could be won as a mighty helper. Rituals of initiation would give his followers the ability to perform heroic deeds.

Middle Ages

b) In the Middle Ages, heroes and saints had comparable functions as figures of identification. They were honored as healers, wonderworkers, saviors, founders, and benefactors. The concept that had come down from ancient times, that one could win a blessed hereafter through selfless, pious, and virtuous behavior, was closely tied to the image of the hero, and had dominated heroism since the establishment of Christianity, as the → veneration of the saints and the hero cult influenced each other. A heroic death could now be interpreted not only as a sacrificial offering for one's own group, as it had been even in ancient republican Rome and its tradition of devotio (cf. P. Decius Mus, 340 BCE), but also as a profession of faith and belief (Gr., martyr, 'witness'; → Martyr). Now heroes gradually lost their disquieting, menacing ambivalence, and became the personified demonstration of community concepts of value. Under these premises, heroism could be the fruit of lifelong exertion, and still be condensed in a single moment of mighty deed, or of self-sacrifice for the cause of good. The sheen of its repute spurred devotees onward to emulation. In cult, they confessed the values incarnated in the hero, and gained strength for the conquest of their own lives.

Modern Age

c) The heroic ideals of modern times are composed of various strands of tradition, and combine profane and religious concepts. They reflect the search for a social force of formation whose common ethos will no longer be that of a single religious institution supplying it for all. Since the rediscovery of antiquity in the → Renaissance, the elevation of the ruler to the status of hero has received new impulse. Literary and artistic apotheoses of princes and kings on the model of Hercules legitimized existing relations of power. However, a transcendent Christian source for the heroic quality was renounced. Instead, mental discipline and the power of the rational will were brought front and center as the notes of the heroic individual. By antithesis, originality and naturalness earmarked the secular genius cult of the eighteenth century, with which the economically toughening middle class took its distance from the Baroque veneration of the ruler (→ Genius). Beginning with the Enlightenment, the fading power of old faith principles produced a yearning for new ideals. For a middle-class educated audience, honor paid to heroes replaced traditional religion, and enabled its followers to re-enchant the modern world.

Nineteenth Century: National Heroes

3. With Romanticism's new interest in myths, sagas, and legends, the mechanisms were in place for a transformation of historical persons into mythic heroes. But it was especially the process of the formation of nations that called for visible representatives of a political idea. No sooner was the veneration of the saints 'unmasked as superstition,' than the figure of the martyr returned as the profane sacrificial hero. Beginning with the French Revolution and the wars of liberation, the fallen soldier became the modern national saint. In the age of the bourgeousie, the hero embodied the resistance of the personal subject to extinction through anonymous structures and systems. The concept of the personal subject as a power in history functioned as a counter-image to his and her experience of self as the helpless object of a perilous social system. Nineteenth-century historicism, which saw world history as consisting in the deeds of great men, vehemently defended the idea of the hero against the concrete experience of the age itself, which was felt as unheroic and banal. After Thomas Carlyle's On Heroes, Hero-Worship, and the Heroic in History (1841), idealizing biographies were widely disseminated, and were utilized especially for the patriotic upbringing of male youth. Along with warlike monarchs and victorious generals, discoverers, artists, and poets were transfigured to cultural heroes. Their pictures adorned the public squares, and the middle-class elite honored the dates of their birth and death with expensive celebrations.

Twentieth Century

The heroism of revolution and emancipation has played a key role in the ideologies of nationalism, communism, and fascism. The leading figure in a worldview of military authoritarianism was the war hero, who symbolized manliness in its every aspect. The process of obliteration gained aesthetic glory, and was to be regarded as a cost-effective exchange for the loss of self-determination. → Marxism, as well, seized upon revolutionary heroism, and, invoking ancient motifs, reshaped it to an emolument of the rational, modern mass society. Vitalism, activism, and voluntarism were the notes of the socialist hero. His figure incarnated a social class, the proletariat, whose all-transforming deed of heroism was world revolution. As 'hero of labor' he found his place in the world of socialism. In the Weltanschauung of → National Socialism, the hero was above all the fighter and the victor, who had the task of wresting the survival or the hegemony of his people from the jaws of defeat. Here the stereotype of the Jew functioned as antithesis and adversary of the hero. The reason for the great danger of the Jewish enemy was that he was gradually killing off the heroic qualities of the Aryan by his skulking adulteration of the latter's blood. The only defense was the absolute maintenance of the purity of one's race, and the physical annihilation of all of the weak and 'unheroic.' In the 'Third Reich,' the glorification of Party members fallen in the struggle for power became a religious → veneration of persons, the object of an unexampled embellishment, and was employed by those in command to justify the unconditional subjugation demanded by the Germans. Without values to which to bind this heroic self-sacrifice, however, in the Second World War (if not before) the hero-ideal was exposed as self-destructive and deleterious of any meaning.

Heroes Today

4. Since the collapse of the hero-cults of National Socialism and Socialism, political heroism has become suspect to most democratic societies. The figure of the hero was maintained, after its de-politicizing, in the culture of light entertainment. Its current typology comprises more than the images of the ruler, knight, and warrior, or of the saint and martyr. In films, novels, or comics, the hero, mainly male, wrestles in behalf of culture, civilization, and progress, in the form of the adventurer, discoverer, conqueror, or scientist (→ Fantasy; Science Fiction), or as the musician, artist, or 'pop idol.' The vitality and physical strength of the sports hero engenders and models fantasies of omnipotence and the male image. With all of the criticism of heroism for the abuse with which it is accompanied, heroes do mount a standard of idealistic comportment, and keep readiness for selfless, courageous commitment alive and well.

Literature

Behrenbeck, Sabine, Der Kult um die toten Helden. Nationalsozialistische Mythen, Riten und Symbole 1923 bis 1945, Vierow 1996; Ben-Yehuda, Nachman, The Masada Myth: Collective Memory and Mythmaking in Israel, Madison 1995; Bongco, Mila, Reading Comics: Language, Culture, and the Concept of the Superhero in Comic Books, New York 2000; Campbell, Joseph, The Hero with a Thousand Faces, Princeton [2]1968; Eriksonas, Linas, National Heroes and National Identities: Scotland, Norway and Lithuania, Brussels 2004; Gebauer, Gunter (ed.), Körper- und Einbildungskraft. Inszenierungen des Helden im Sport, Berlin 1988; Gerritsen, Willem P./van Melle, Anthony G. (eds.), A Dictionary of Medieval Heroes: Characters in Medieval Narrative Traditions and Their Afterlife in Literature, Theatre and the Visual Arts, Woodbridge 1998; Hadas, Moses/Smith, Morton, Heroes and Gods: Spiritual Biographies in Antiquity, London 1965; Holt, Richard et al. (eds.), European Heroes: Myth, Identity, Sport, London 1996; Kerényi, Karl, The Heroes of the Greeks, London 1974; Lawrence, John Shelton/Jewett, Robert, The Myth of the American Superhero, Grand Rapids 2002; Rank, Otto, The Myth of the Birth of the Hero: A Psychological Exploration of Myth, Baltimore [2]2004; Reynolds, Richard, Super Heroes: A Modern Mythology, London 1992; Roberts, John W., From Trickster to Badman: The Black Folk Hero in Slavery and Freedom, Philadelphia 1989; Seal, Graham, Encyclopedia of Folk Heroes, Santa Barbara 2001.

→ Ancestors, Dualism, Fantasy (Genre of), Gender Stereotypes, Genius, Idol, Image/Iconoclasm, Martyr, Marxism, Meaning/Signification, Monument/Memorial Places, National Socialism, Prometheus, Renaissance, Veneration of Persons/Personality Cult, Veneration of the Saints

Sabine Behrenbeck

Hierarchy

Definition

1. Hierarchy (from Gk., hierá arché, 'sacred origin,' 'rule,' 'government,' 'order') is a fixed system of subordination and 'super-ordination,' a pyramidal order of rank, with a narrow apex and a broad base. Put simply, a hierarchy is a 'stepladder' of authority or command, whose lower instances are in organic contiguity with the higher. However, it need not always be a matter of hierarchies of power. 'Hierarchy' can also simply designate status. Grounds for differentiation within a hierarchy can be origin (as in the hierarchy of a nobility, or in the caste system), age, professional knowledge, 'seniority' of membership in a group, or achievement (as in a hierarchy of functionaries). In the cultural and political space of society, hierarchy is also a name for the totality of the bearers of a hierarchical order, and in a scholarly area it is applied as a criterion of order.

The Exemplar in the Beyond

2. The exemplar in the beyond: The concept of hierarchy was probably first introduced into theology by Denis the Areopagite (a pseudonym), at the turn of the sixth century, as a metaphysical classification. In his De Caelesti Hierarchia and De Ecclesiastica Hierarchia, he describes a system of 'heavenly hierarchy' in which God is supreme hierarch over his creation. Hierarchy is the principle of order that stabilizes the cosmos. God himself is the creator of this hierarchy. From this point, everything is subordinated, beginning with the angels; then come the clerics—as their image—and last, the laity. God's rule in the beyond (→ Theocracy), then, reaches earth itself, and founds the rule of clerics over the laity. These texts gained importance by way of Denis's translation at the hands of eighth-century John Scotus Eriugena. Besides being influenced by this Neo-Platonic picture, the Christian theology of the Middle Ages was shaped by the interpretation of the Aristotelian cosmology. An important example in literature is Dante Alighieri's (1265–1321) The Divine Comedy. This work deals with a journey through the three levels of life after death: inferno (fore-hell), purgatory (mount of purification), paradise. Beyond lie the edifices of heaven, with seven rotating skies, with their planets, and the celestial vault as the seat of the divinity and the highest saints. This image of the world, received from cosmology, indicates a clear ladder of levels, which in other systems is often less clear.

The Roman Catholic Church

3. In the Roman Catholic Church, 'hierarchy' denotes the totality of the clergy, as bearers of the 'power of ordination' (ordo) and the 'power of shepherding' (jurisdictio). Ordination as plenary power of the mediation of salvation forms the religious dimension, and jurisdiction by disposition over sanctions denotes the social dimension. The hierarchies flowing thence, and therewith the series of ranks, are seen as the image of the heavenly hierarchy developed in the Middle Ages. The Pope as Vicar of Christ holds the plenitude of the power of direction: thus, he stands above the hierarchy. In the hierarchy of office, he is followed by the college of bishops. By ordination, bishops, priests, and deacons are successively subordinate. The Protestant Reformers altered the bases of the hierarchy of the clergy, rejecting the doctrine of the divine institution of the sacerdotal condition, and opposed to it the foundation of the priesthood and equality of all of the faithful. The 'two steps' of clergy and laity remain, but now as a functional differentiation, not as a 'divinely instituted' ordering.

Societal Principle of Order

a) The Indian → castes (jati) are hereditary groups, determining status, fixing prescriptions for the division of distinct groups (as by marriage), and establishing the distribution of labor. The caste system is in no sense a purely linear order between the two extreme points of clean and unclean, which would thereby essentially structure the division of social membership. It is a complex system, in which hierarchy is the most important structural note. Hierarchy, here, is the conscious form of the relationship of the parts to the whole (Dumont).

b) Another example of a form of hierarchy is the structure of the family. The order of rank within a family is most often bound up with political and economic power, shows status, and expounds the rules of inheritance. In Hinduism, the status of woman is determined by marriage. It is important whether she is the husband's first or second wife, and whether she has been married before. The hierarchy of the sons follows the status of the wife.

Application in the Social Sciences

4. a) Only in the eighteenth century was the concept of hierarchy first applied to non-ecclesiastical organizations. Later, Max → Weber coined the same concept for the linguistic usage of the social sciences. He applies it in connection with forms of government and bureaucracy. Weber's point of departure consists of three ideal types of a government, distinguished from one another by way of their basis of legitimization. He regards charismatic and traditional rule or government as pre-rational, and legal government as rational, neutral, impersonal, and calculable. Weber designates bureaucracy as the purest form of legal rule. It consists of bureau chief, and staff of functionaries, with its membership divided by way of a hierarchy of office. In the super- and sub-ordination expressed here, the higher instances supervise the lower, while the reverse holds in the matter of complaints or summonses: an intervention from below to above is possible. It is generally assumed that membership in higher areas indicate a higher qualification. Criticism was leveled at a waning control over such a system, and at the fragile chance of an intervention that would be adequate to alter this state of affairs.

b) From a viewpoint of the social sciences, hierarchies have arisen historically. The individual is almost always at their mercy. However, this prominence results in compulsions to legitimization, which are then often explained in terms of religion. Today, in sociology and psychology, the structure of hierarchy is criticized. It is said to trammel sociological development and favor the abuse of authority. In theology, the classification of the faithful into clergy and laity is disputed, and the question enters into ecumenical discussion.

Literature

Carli, Linda/Eagle, Alice (eds.), Gender, Hierarchy, and Leadership, London 2002; Dumont, Louis M., A South Indian Subcaste: Social Organization and Religion of the Pramalai Kallar, Delhi 1986; Hetherington, N. S., Encyclopedia of Cosmology, New York 1993; Howe, Leo, Hinduism and Hierarchy in Bali, Oxford 2001; Marlow, Louise, Hierarchy and Egalitarianism in Islamic Thought, Cambridge 1997; Quinn, D. Michael,

The Mormon Hierarchy: Extensions of Power, Salt Lake City 1997; Tannenbaum, Arnold S., Hierarchy in Organizations, San Francisco 1974; Weber, Max, Economy and Society: An Outline of Interpretive Sociology, Berkeley 1978.

→ Caste, Church, Family/Kinship/Genealogy, Government/Rule/Politics/State, Theocracy

Kathinka Alexandrow

Hildegard of Bingen

1. Hildegard—primer of self-redemption, economic wonder of the factories of alternative health, figurehead of feminists, symbol of integration for a new Europe, comes to us at the turn of the millennium with her salutary guidance. Established for a scant twenty years now as one of the female quantities of the Middle Ages, Hildegard is enjoying a renaissance, standing as she does at the head of a virtual Hildegard community of the most varied interest groups, and inspiring a cultic practice in a wide field of popular culture. Medieval mystic, physician and medical writer, 'God's mouthpiece,' and revolutionary from the "Hildegard Land of Rhine-Hesse," Hildegard of Bingen stimulates great interest today on the part of 'New Agers,' feminists, nuns, scientists, and the faithful. Hildegard's canonization process has been under way since 1227.

Life

2. Tenth child of noble parents, Hildegard was born in 1098 in Bermersheim, near Alzey, in the vicinity of Bingen, and had her first vision at the age of five. Sometime between her fourteenth and seventeenth year, she was received into the Benedictine community of Disibodenberg Convent. It was only in 1150, however, that she founded her own convent on Mount Rupert.

In 1136, Hildegard became head of the monastic community that she led according to the 'divinely willed' principle of a distinction of classes: only noble women might be received. In 1141, she received the 'divine task' of recording her visions in writing, and contrived to have these recognized by Pope Eugene III, so that she might be absolved of the suspicion of moral temerity, and not be prevented from criticizing the grievances of the time in the name of God. Between 1158 and 1170, as interpreter of her times, she undertook four great journeys from Mount Rupert, to preach publicly advertised sermons to clergy and people. Hildegard's renown as a seer had then spread throughout Europe, and it brought her into epistolary contact with popes, bishops, emperors, kings, and scholars. In 1197, after a protracted illness, she died at the age of ninety-nine. Shortly after her death, according to the legends of the saints, her miracles had become so numerous that the Archbishop of Mainz personally visited her grave to forbid her to continue them.

Works

3. In her struggle for the recognition of her visions, Hildegard received a special place in the Church. This position exerted a strong influence on her work. For one thing, she was now provided, partly by way of her own feisty onslaughts, with sources for the spread of her reputation during her lifetime. For another, her visions authorized her personally to certify her own theological and philosophical works as God-given, and thus in no need of legitimization through the Bible or by theological authorities. Hildegard left a complex opus:

(a) Some three hundred letters afford an insight into the cultural and political background of the twelfth century, along with the philosophy of religion that prevailed in that age.

(b) Her trilogy of visions begins with Scivias (late Lat., "Know the Ways," 1151), and is geared to a spiritual readership. With Scivias, Hildegard aims at the moral and spiritual renewal of a spirituality that had become secularized, and attempts to show the clergy a path to redemption. There follows the Liber Vitae Meritorum (Lat., "Book of the Merits of Life"), and finally the Liber Divinorum Operum ("Book of the Divine Works") or Liber de Operatione Dei ("Book of the Works of God"), the 'works of God' being the world and the human being. The last-named contains the so-called "cosmos writing": creation consists of the mutually conditioning forces of God, the human being, and nature.

(c) The nature and medicinal writings. The Physica, or "Book of Nature" (categorizations of the phenomena of nature), and the medicinal work, Causae et Curae (Lat., "Causes and Cures") deal with the question of the condition and constitution of human beings, and their susceptibility to imperfection and diseases since the Fall. According to Hildegard, human beings can become healthy only if they live in harmony with God and nature. This work rests on a historical cosmogony of cure and healing, is powerfully permeated by contemporary folk medicine, and in the thirteenth century, after Hildegard's death, underwent a revision at the hands of physicians and philosophers. Then the work was one calculated to gain popular acclaim and implementation, and contained wholesale prescriptions that rendered Hildegard's recommended therapeutic methods not only vague, but dangerous.

(d) Unanimity prevails, however, in the assessment of her some eighty vocal compositions, along with the musical drama Ordo Virtutum (Lat., "Order of Virtues"): Hildegard's modern sensitivity to keys was a new phenomenon for her times, and has won her a unique place in the history of music.

Hildegard Today

4. Cookbooks like Hildegard's Dinkel macht die Seele froh (Ger., "Spelt Gladdens the Soul"), instructions on the Internet for bloodletting, and publications on her recommendations for poison remedies and the conquest of environmental diseases, gladden the hearts of representatives and organizers of alternative-health lifestyles—and enrage academic physicians, who can only shake their heads at Hildegard's dualistic concept of healing: all good is from God, all evil from Satan. Many another might wonder that the 'good morning' show on the radio seeks to solve the problems of globalization with Hildegard's warning against extravagance and immoderation. Others, again, are astonished that Hildegard's contemplative order in Bingen has become a center for tourism, which advertises spelt pillows for the elimination of snoring, motorcycle and bicycle tours 'in the footsteps of Hildegard,' and cure pavilions for women's seminars. The specially built "Hildegard Forum" offers, among other things, the opportunity for holistic spiritual experience as well as courses in cooking and baking. In addition, Hildegard's music occupies persons in interreligious dialogue between Christianity and Islam. The monastic rampart against the Hildegard spirit of the times seeks to restore the saint that has become so popular to her original image; however, feminist scientists have adopted Hildegard as woman and authoress in the area of music, literature, and religion. 'New Agers' flood the music market with a musical mix of Hildegard compositions and their computerized creations, using CDs, videocassettes, and written material on cosmic visions, in which Hildegard is ascribed great importance as a 'seeress for today.' Not to be forgotten are those whose relations to Hildegard are in view of their own concerns—and perhaps far from all of the operational hubbub around Hildegard—the believers who make pilgrimage to her grave and beseech her as their personal saint in everyday life.

Literature

Burnett, Charles/Dronke, Peter (eds.), Hildegard of Bingen: The Context of Her Thought and Art, London 1998; Flanagan, Sabina, Hildegard of Bingen, 1088–1179: A Visionary Life, London [2]1998; Newman, Barbara, Sister of Wisdom: St. Hildegard's Theology of the Feminine, Berkeley 1987; Idem (ed.), Voice of the Living Light: Hildegard of Bingen and Her World, Berkeley/Los Angeles 1998; Ruether, Rosemary Radford, Visionary Women: Three Medieval Mystics, Minneapolis 2002.

→ Asceticism, Eating/Nourishment, Illness/Health, Mysticism, Veneration of the Saints, Women's Movement/Spiritual Feminism

Annemarie Gronover

Hinduism

'Hinduism' as a Problematic Term

1. The concept of Hinduism, introduced by Western scholars only in recent times, stands for a whole complex of religious currents and social phenomena appearing on the Indian subcontinent, partly in very diverse historical, socioeconomic, and geographical conditions, at various times over the last two-and-one-half millennia. These currents have drawn, in a multiplicity of manners, on a common fund of tradition, so that crisp lines of demarcation cannot be drawn between them. At the same time, they can stand in complete contradiction. Alternatively, then, the term 'Hindu religions' has sometimes appeared as the preferred expression for several years now. In no case does the concept of Hinduism stand for one historically concrete religion as a closed system. Despite many common elements, the individual directions are distinct in essential points, as, for example, regarding the deity to be worshiped, the path to redemption, the sacred scriptures, the cult to be practiced. There are monotheistic, dualistic, and polytheistic directions, the deity may be conceptualized personally or impersonally, sacrifice may be vegetable or animal, priests may be Brahman or lower caste; and in some directions even belong to a caste of untouchables.

The denomination Hinduism basically rests on the misinterpretation of a traditional term. The word Hindu first appears as the Persian variant of the Sanskrit name Sindhu for the Indus river and for the land lying along its banks. In the plural, it designated the inhabitants of this land, the "Indians." To the Muslim government in the North of India, all were Daily ritual (pūjā) at the home shrine of a family in Old Bombay. A home shrine is to be found in nearly every Hindu household, frequently in a special devotional room, or in the kitchen, which is considered pure, and to which outsiders, as a rule, have no access. In this shrine, the family divinity, together with the gods and goddesses honored by individual family members, have their place as brass figures, accompanied by photographs of a guru or saint and the family ancestors. To begin, the believer—often an older family member, who still disposes of the corresponding knowledge and time—purifies him/herself by bathing. Then, with the help of → mantras, the place of ritual is purified, along with the needed implements and utensils, and the evil spirits are driven away. The gods are honored as guests, being washed, clothed, fed, and given gifts. At the climax of the ritual, a lamp is swung before the shine: in its fire the divinity resides, and the faithful receive it within themselves by holding the palms of their hands over the flames for an instant and then touching their eyes.

Hindus unless they were Muslims, Christians, Parsees (→ Zoroastrianism), or Jews—of course without the modern, religious connotation. Only the Europeans coming to India from the early sixteenth century onward, after the discovery of the sea route from Europe to India, used the name 'Hindu' to mean not Indians, but the members of the supposedly single → 'heathen' religion to which all Indians (other than Jews, Christians, Muslims, and Parsees) belonged. Then, from the eighteenth century on, the designation 'Hinduism' gradually gained currency as the name for this 'religion.' The perception that no conflicts seemed to prevail among the various religious currents as to which of them might be superior to another, encouraged the European notion that all Indians 'belonged to the same religion.' The further determination of the concept materialized toward the middle and end of the nineteenth century, with the adoption of the concept of a unified Indian religion in a context of the appearance of representatives of

A woman has prepared a kolam at the entrance to her home in Badami, in the South of India. Kolams (also called *Rangoli*s or *Alpana*s) are folk variants on mandalas, and are deemed to repel demonic powers, bestow blessing, and guarantee fertility. The adornment of home courts and walls with magical diagrams is a widespread practice in India, practiced exclusively by women and girls, and learned in the family. It consists in first scouring the clay and cow-dung ground, then sprinkling it with water and making it smooth, before it is strewn with ornaments of rice powder. Ordinarily, kolams are designed symmetrically and contain floral patterns. The wave designed here is ascribed special meaning and importance in India. As the area of transitus from 'private' to 'public' space, on the one hand it does require special care and protection, and on the other hand it is a sign of invitation and hospitality. (Benita von Behr) the burgeoning national independence movement. These latter welcomed the concept as the image of a 'national' identity, in the absence of any other such denotation predicable of a group of peoples of such frank cultural and ethnic variation. It was a matter, then, of a primarily political postulate of a unity among the Hindus. Accordingly, today's Hindu self-understanding is stamped in terminology and content by India's encounter with the West. A truly acceptable Indic equivalent for the concept Hinduism does not exist, but the Sanskrit concept of dharma is usually employed for 'religion,' and sanātana dharma ('eternal dharma') for 'Hinduism.'

Vedic Traditions

2. Concrete data as to the point in time of the appearance or the founding personalities of a given Hindu direction are available for only a paucity of instances. Rather, the production or formation of the Hindu religions is to be understood as a process, and one that spans centuries. It is not the purpose here to address speculations on the extent to which elements of a religion (unresearched even today) of the Indus Valley culture might also have appeared in later developments. The Vedic religion, named for its traditional poetry, the Vedas (derived from the Sanskrit root vid, 'to know') is one of the earliest extant sources of Hinduism. The attribute 'Vedic' or citations from the Vedas have often been used in the recent past to supply modern intellectual material with the authority of older texts. Factually the content of the Vedas plays no great role; but they have become a synonym for the absolute, unassailable truth. The three or four Vedas (Ṛgveda, Sāmaveda, Yajurveda, and the later included Atharvaveda) were the sacred texts of the Indo-European Aryans who migrated to India, in several waves, during the second millennium BCE. For centuries they were only handed down orally—they were not conceptualized as official proclamation for all, but as knowledge to be preserved (because dangerous when misused or falsely applied) for a few specialists. Consequently they reflect Vedic culture only in snippets. In keeping with the originally nomadic lifestyle of the Aryan tribes, Vedic religion knows no sacred images and no temples: places of sacrifice were prepared and then dismantled again. This feature explains the great importance of the spoken word—of the Vedic texts. The heart of Vedic ritual was sacrifice, or more precisely, the offering of soma or fire. (Soma was an intoxicating drink whose composition is still unknown today: some suppose that it was pressed from a consciousness-altering kind of fungus.) The idea of redemption is still as foreign to Vedic religion as are conceptualizations of karma and rebirth. A world beyond the present one was thought of as consisting of various skies or heavens. Vedic gods are beings who play a role in human life and with whom it is possible to communicate, as well as ritually manipulable forces of nature. Agni, God of Fire, of course plays an important role in the fire sacrifice, as a messenger. Indra is often seen as King of the Gods, analogous to Zeus. He bears traits both of a god of war and of a god of weather or thunder.

Brahmanism and the Reform Movements

3. In the course of time, the sacrifice developed into an independent power. Its success was no longer dependent upon the gods' good pleasure, but exclusively on the faultless performance of ritual actions, and the impeccable recitation of hymns by the priests. At the same time, it was no longer a means to the attainment of earthly advantages and goods, but an important prerequisite for the maintenance of the world (order)—and thereby a means of power in the hand of a small minority, the Brahmanic priests, after whom this period in Vedic religion (first half of the first millennium BCE) is called Brahmanism. It was, among other things, this concentration in the hands of the priesthood of religious power on the one hand, and economic and political power on the other, against which the ascetical reform movements of → Buddhism and Jainism were mounted. Thereby, it is true, they satisfied the requirements of the non-Brahman city classes, which were growing economically stronger around the middle of the first millennium BCE, but they also met the needs of secular rulers, and this capability was decisive for the measure of their success. To sacrificial ritualism, the Buddha opposed a rationalistic ethic, which enabled every person, in principle, independently of his or her class or background, and without the help of third parties, to reach redemption from of the cycle of births, which was regarded as basically painful.

Synthesis of Classical Hinduism

It speaks for the extraordinary popularity of Indian comics, which take their material from the rich mythology, narrative literature, and history of the subcontinent, that, since the end of the 1960s, they have appeared in over thirty languages and in editions of millions of copies. The strip shown here presents a scene from a Shivaite myth. The treatment of many Hindu myths is sectarian—that is, it is so constructed that a particular Hindu god counts as the highest. Frequently these myths are constructed according to a determinate schema: world and gods get into difficulties, from which precisely this highest god alone can deliver them. And so the gods gather to honor him and beg

4. The waxing influence of Buddhism and Jainism represented a massive threat to the priestly class, the Brahmans. It was met along a route for which Hinduism is still known today: that of the integration or monopolization—depending on how one evaluates the process—of foreign elements. In a unique synthesis, ascetical ideals as well as a variety of forms of religious practices of lower or non-Aryan classes of the population—that until then had been neglected, under protection of the authority of the Vedas and the privileges of the Brahman class—were included in a new picture of the world. To put it another way: the 'Great,' or Sanskrit Tradition (the tradition of the Sanskrit texts, of the educated upper classes, of the inter-regionally venerated deities) took in the 'Little Tradition' (the tradition of the lower classes of the population, the tradition of village and tribal deities of local importance). In practice, this meant that the local deities were now likewise venerated in the village shrine, and that, with the help of myths and legends, they were brought into connection with the Hindu gods. The local gods were identified with them, or (as in the case of Vishnu) regarded as his incarnations (avatara), or became one of his 'family members.' For the bearers of these traditions, who frequently stood outside the caste system, this development had the consequence that they now were likewise taken into this system. Thus the process of Sanskritization or Hinduization was a 'win/win situation': the preeminent position of the Brahmans, and their value system across the board, were not only maintained, but actually stabilized; for the new members of the community, on the other hand, the Brahmans' ascent was bound up with a considerable advance in prestige.

his help. The first frame shows (left to right) divine emissary Narada and gods Indra, four-headed Brahma, and Vishnu (with conch shell, lotus, and club). Shiva is on the right in the second frame, recognizable by his leopard skin, hair knots, and begging-bowl, as an ascetic or great yogi. This image is his classical manifestation, in which Shivaitic Sadhus often appear as well. Trident, crescent, and serpent necklace are likewise Shiva's symbols.

a) With this synthesis (in the first half of the first millennium CE) the enlargement of Hinduism began along many different routes. The literary sources that reflected these developments or their results are the two great Indic epics Mahābhārata and Rāmāyana—which stood in the tradition of the older bardic literature—together with the subsequent literature of the *Purāṇa*s. The Bhagavadgītā as part of the Mahābhārata reflects the beginnings of the veneration of Krishna. The Rāmāyana tells of Vishnu's incarnation as Rāma, and how the latter's quest for his abducted consort Sitā led him from Ayodhyā, throughout India, to Sri Lanka. The *Purāṇa*s (the Sanskrit purāṇa means 'old,' that is, 'old narrative') are a group of texts truly encyclopedic in character, whose most ancient manuscripts appeared toward the middle of the first millennium BCE. They deal with the most varied themes, mainly religious in nature (myths that include local legends, descriptions of rituals, philosophical and theological discussions and debates). The epics, as well as the *Purāṇa*s, in translations and adaptations, continue to be extremely popular today. They are widely distributed, and thus exert a great influence on broad circles of the population. The uninterrupted popularity of the ancient materials in India is evinced in their vast presence in modern media like film and television, as well as in comics. Each distinct Hindu religion, furthermore, possesses its own collections of holy scriptures and religious lyric (→ Tantra, Bhakti literature).

Vishnuism and Shivaism

b) The development of Hinduism was joined to the ascent of two gods especially: Vishnu and Shiva, revered in Vishnuism and Shivaism respectively (the two main currents of Hinduism) as the highest deities. Both main currents, however, are again divided up according to theological and regional viewpoints, in countless subgroups and sects, each with its own sacred scripture, cult, and tenets of belief.

Vishnu

Vishnu hosts a confluence of traits: traits of the Vedic sun god Vishnu, of the sun god Prajāpati, likewise Vedic—as well as of the hero emerging from North Indian warrior classes, Vāsudeva-Krishna, in the devotion of the image and temple cult of the non-Aryan population. Vishnu is first and foremost a royal, gracious god, revered by his devotees with 'loving devotion' (bhakti) and surrender. In the cosmic revolution of becoming and dissolution, Vishnu adopts the role of protector and preserver. When world order, human beings, and gods are endangered by evil powers, he intervenes in one of his incarnations (avatāra) to save them. Vishnu's most familiar *avatāra*s are Rāma, hero of the Rāmāyana, and Krishna, mentioned above, in whom various cults have fused in the course of the centuries—both reckoned today among the best-loved gods of the Hindu pantheon.

Shiva

By contrast, the origin of the god Shiva is to be sought mainly in pre-Aryan Dravidian traditions. Corresponding to his extraordinarily ambivalent nature, he is, on the one side, the life-negating god of the ascetics, and himself the mightiest ascetic. Shiva is the god of annihilation and destruction. Nevertheless, the liṅga, the phallus symbol, venerated by his devotees, interprets the god's powerful creative and regenerative aspect. Shiva combines all of the contrarieties of the contradictory phenomenal world. Unlike Vishnu, Shiva is a fear-inspiring god—he is reverenced in order to be appeased. In the view of many Shivaites, however, the images of destruction and annihilation are nothing but metaphors for the removal of obstacles on the way to salvation, to the redemptive knowledge of the oneness of all being in Shiva—the annihilation of ignorance and of the (false) consciousness of a multiplex world. As an ambivalent god, Shiva also possesses a feminine aspect, venerated as his shakti (energy), and incarnated in the mythology of his consort Parvati.

Shaktism—the Great Goddess

In some regions of India, however, as in Bengali, the goddess (devī) is herself revered as the supreme divinity. Here the pre-Aryan cult of the mother goddess was especially powerful. In these currents of Hinduism, the goddess alone is the ultimate cause of the creation, preservation, and annihilation of the world. Like Shiva, she is venerated both in her lovely, motherly aspects and in her cruel, wild or erotic forms. Accordingly, she is honored under an innumerable variety of names and shapes: black goddess Kali, riding on a lion, and demon-slaying Durgā are but two of them. The corresponding currents of Hinduism bear on Shaktism, but the goddess here is more than the mere shakti of a male god.

Classical Hinduism bears both polytheistic and monotheistic traits. Whether a Hindu honors Vishnu or Shiva, that god of her or his 'own' will be the sole and the highest, while others will belong to lower phenomenal forms (and nevertheless will be honored). This will be possible by way of a conceptualization of the gods in which God unfolds at various levels. At the top stands an impersonal Absolute, of which only negative predications can be made. Here is a reality not to be described, not to be known. It is this Absolute that manifests itself in various personal divinities, that create the world (Brahma), maintain it (Vishnu), and destroy it again (Shiva). In practice, however, followers of one god will attribute all three functions to him, and will grasp all other gods as standing under him, or as further manifestations of 'their' god. True, the notion of the One, the Absolute, plays no role in the religious everyday. However, it has the effect that most Hindus see no problem in acknowledging other religions as equally authentic paths to God.

Neo-Hinduism

5. Under pressure of a seven-century Islamic domination, and of the subsequent British colonial rule, there materialized among the various currents of Hinduism a sense of mutual belonging that, for the national movement of the mid-nineteenth century, was of all the greater political importance for the fact that neither a common language nor a unitary culture was managing to function as a national bond for all of India. Essential characteristics of this Neo-Hinduism, associated with the liberation movement and found especially among the urban upper classes, were to some extent inspired by Western ideas, and to some extent created in conscious demarcation from them. These included a quest for the proper roots of Hinduism, a return to its authentic traditions, and reforming attempts, often connected with social engagement, to renew it spiritually, cleansing it of its appearances of 'decadence' (burning of widows, caste system, superstition and idolatry). We may cite, as representative in this context, the Brahma Samāj (founded in 1828, under the leadership of Ram Mohan Roy), the Ārya Samāj (founded in 1875 by Dayānand Sarasvatī), and the Ramakrishna Mission (founded in 1897 by Vivekānanda).

Basic Propositions

6. In spite of the multiplicity of different currents within Hinduism, it is nevertheless possible to fix a series of leading concepts and basic propositions common to most Hindus.

A key concept is the idea of an order underlying the entire world, and human life: dharma. Frequently, the Western concept, 'religion,' is translated as dharma. However, dharma comprises very much more than religion according to the Western understanding. Dharma in the sense of 'law, right, duty, order' means that each being of this world is to behave in a way corresponding to its place in this world—that is, its social position or caste membership, its stage of life, and its gender. Theoretically, a male member of each of the three higher varṇa (→ Caste) traverses four stages of life: those of pupil, head of a family, forest dweller, and wandering, homeless Sannyasin. The dharma of a youth in formation is different from that of the father of a family, the dharma of a Brahman is distinct from that of a laborer, and that of a husband from that of his wife.

Another important foundation of the contexts of Hindu belief is the concept of the cyclical becoming and dissolution of the entire world of phenomena. There is no first creation, and no final annihilation. Even the human being lives more than one life: after a person's death, a part of him or her—what that is, is the object of a wide spectrum of opinions—is reborn in another life. Whether, in this next life, one is rich or poor, healthy or sick, the member of a high or low caste, depends on the karman inherited from the life that has gone before. The word karman is derived from a verbal root for 'to do,' 'to act,' and karman is related to one's actions, one's behavior, in the preceding life. The concept of karman, then, on the one hand, explains and justifies the inequality of persons, and on the other, shows that while the outward conditions of a life are indeed posited in advance, that life, within these bounds, can nevertheless be freely shaped, and that individuals must assume personal responsibility for their actions and their consequences. However, the highest goal is definitive redemption from the cycle of births.

In general, 'redemption' is understood as the entry of the individual soul (ātman) into the highest reality (brahman). Even this understanding, however, is subject to various conceptions. Redemption is possible in three ways, often in combination: the way of activity and the active life (karma-mārga denotes both ritual actions and daily conduct in the world according to one's own dharma: although—as Krishna describes it in the Bhagavadgītā—without selfish purposes); the way of knowledge (jñāna-mārga: knowledge of the ultimate unity behind the seeming multiplicity of the world, as well as the unity of the individual soul and the supreme Absolute through yoga and meditation); and the way of divine love (bhakti-mārga: trusting surrender to the God, who, for his part, comes in grace to meet the one who serves him unconditionally).

7. In Hinduism's religious practice, the Vedic fire sacrifice was replaced by pūjā (ceremonial veneration of a divine image; see ill.) and bhakti. A pūjā may be celebrated by an individual or by a family, and may take place before the home altar or in the temple. There is no community ritual service, but the common singing of bhajans (praises of God), or public readings of sacred texts, are widespread practices. The key object of a visit to a temple is darśana—the 'glance' of the deity, experienced as salvific.

Just as in other religions, the transition among distinct components in the → life cycle of a person is ritually observed. The three most important of the some forty 'sacraments' (samskāra, lit., 'presentation,' 'perfection') today are the → initiation, the marriage rite, and the funeral ceremony. Initiation marks the beginning of 'religious' formation: these days, the memorization of a single verse of the gāyatrī-mantra to the sun is frequently accounted as doing justice to the latter. Through initiation, the maturing youth of the three higher castes become full-fledged members of the community, and receive the sacred cord. (Often, the bestowal of the cord is merely a formal component of the next stage, marriage.) Girls are theoretically permitted to undergo initiation, with modifications, but it is unusual for them to do so. The rites of the dead, too, are ascribed great importance: from the lighting of the pyre by the eldest son, to the regular ancestor sacrifices in the form of the scattering of small rice balls or the sprinkling of water.

The Hindu festal calendar is traditionally calculated according to the cycle of the moon. Some feasts are observed in all of India, but generally they are local feasts celebrated in a particular temple, or, on the countryside, festivals of the agricultural year. The spring festival Holi (full moon of February/March) is celebrated throughout the country with unrestrained merriment, and a sea of colored paints thrown at one another by the revelers. As with the European Carnival, social restraints are regarded as suspended for the day. Of course, some connect this feast with Krishna's slaying of a female demon, others with Vishnu's rescue of a pious demon child from his cruel father. In August/September, the birthdays of Krishna and the elephant-headed god Ganesha are observed, and in September/October, in Bengali, a ten-day festival is celebrated in honor of goddess Durga's victory over the buffalo demon, while in Maharastra (in the West of Central India), Rāma's defeat of demon king Rivana is commemorated. Otherwise worthy of note are Divali, the festival of light (October/November), and Shiva's most important feast day, Shivaratri (February/March).

Pilgrimages

The pilgrimage is a further aspect of religious life important for many Hindus. The terminus of such a pilgrimage is often a river, the mouth of a river, or a spring (→ Water). Bathing at these places works a ritual purification, while at the same time being connected with a redeeming 'translation' over the stream of ignorance or the ocean of existences. But temples, at times built on the peaks of mountains, or sacred cities such as → Benares, are also places of pilgrimage. On a pilgrimage, through contact with a place in which divine forces operate more strongly than elsewhere, merit is gained, a vow is fulfilled, or the betterment of one's life circumstances is expected, in this life and the next. One of the greatest pilgrimage events in the world is the Great Kumbha Mela, at which, every twelve years (e.g., 1989, 2001, etc.), millions of pilgrims meet in Allahabad at the confluence of the Ganges and the Yamuna.

Religious Authorities

8. Just as Hinduism knows not only one God, not only one theology, so neither is there a central authority, nor any canon of sacred scripture, that would be binding for all Hindus. The immediate points of reference are the home shrine or the village temple. The priest living at the latter need not always be a Brahman (e.g., in Southern India). But there are certainly religious leaders, → gurus, whose renown spreads throughout the country, as well as religious teachers' disciples who hold an authentic office. Ambivalent characteristics attach to the attention paid to the ascetics who have fled the world and therefore live outside societal norms as *samnyāsin, yogi*s, bābā, or sādhu). They are highly honored for their spiritual powers, but the force of their curses is feared.

Systems of Signs and Symbols

9. Matching the multiplicity of the Hindu worlds of the gods or theological systems is the system of signs and symbols, the concrete presentation of the Sacred. In temples, whose architecture is reflected in the Hindu conception of the structure of the cosmos, gods are honored who manifest themselves in divine images. Anyone familiar with the language of Hindu iconography reads, in the attitude of body (āsana) and hand gestures (mūdrā) of the sculptures, in the attributes (clothing, adornment, weapons, jewelry, weapons, musical instruments, riding mount), the name and character of the deity being presented as if in a book. The multiplicity of heads, and the respective multiplicity of arms of many presentations, symbolize the gods' extraordinary, superhuman capacities, while at the same time presenting the most varied aspects of the divinity. From pre-Aryan times, the aniconic reverence of the phallus (liṅga) and vulva (yoni) that has been retained in stone pillars, or as excavations of stone, has today come into the cult of Shiva and his shakti. But the divine can also be manifested in geometric symbols (*yantra*s) or syllables (→ *mantra*s). The adherence of believers themselves to one or another direction of Hinduism can to some extent be recognized by particular signs. Shivaites wear a star sign consisting of three horizontal lines (tripuṇḍra), as well as, occasionally, a necklace (mala) of the dried fruit of a tree sacred to Shiva (elaeocarpus ganitus roxb.). Vishnuites, on the other hand, are recognizable by a vertical star sign (ūrdhrapuṇḍra).

Social Lifestyles

10. Hinduism comprises not only religious, but also social lifestyles. The social status of the individual in this system is determined by his or her birth within a particular → caste (jāti). The distinct castes are indeed strictly separated from one another by certain injunctions of purity, and hierarchically structured; however, they are also closely connected in symbiotic, normally interdependent relationships (division of labor, professional and trade groups). Under conditions of relations in large modern cities, of course, for example in public transportation, a strict separation of castes cannot always be practiced today.

Reception in the West

11. The phenomenon of Hinduism has been received in very contrasting ways in the West over the course of the last century, and under altogether different conditions. The main variations can be reduced to functions of three contexts: colonial rule, science, and Christian mission. Nineteenth-century Indologists sought after common roots of European and Indian civilization. Thus, demonizing depictions of barbaric customs like those of widow-burning or animal sacrifice, or of a caste system that resisted any enlightenment, came face to face with a romantic yearning for a life in harmony with the forces of nature. → Vegetarianism, and the Vedantic philosophy of the Absolute, stimulated ever more critical opposition to the prevailing Christian background. Toward the end of the century, Hindu intellectual material spread, especially thanks to the Theosophical Society, whose founder Helena Petrovna Blavatsky lived in India from 1879 onward (→ Theosophical/Anthroposophical Society). A synthesis of Western and Indian philosophy and spirituality was the goal of Aurobindo Ghose (Sri Aurobindo, 1872–1950). Auroville, founded in 1968 in the vicinity of Pondicherry (Tamil Nadu), is still a point of attraction for the followers of his teachings. Since the end of the 1950s, it is not only social dropouts who are drawn by the bonus of exoticism, and by an animated, sensuous spirituality experienced as holistic. Others, as well, turn to the teachings and Hinduism's charismatic personalities, and apply the elements of its practical exercise and symbolical language in their own lives (e.g., yoga, meditation, bhakti, → tantra, traditional Indian garb, → mantras). Among the great organizations active throughout the world are Maharishi Mahesh Yogi's Transcendental Meditation, Swami Prabhupada Bhaktivedanta's → Hare Krishna movement, and the Neo-Sannyas movement of Bhagwan Rajneesh (→ Osho Movement). In India itself, numerous ashrams and meditation centers constitute points of attraction for interested Westerners. But to what extent do the offerings of the seminars or workshops of these centers still correspond, or even intend to correspond, to actual Hindu traditions? What do persons interested in an alternative spirituality and lifestyle actually find here? Esoteric circles work with concepts like karma, cakra, centers of energy in the human body, or tantra, often completely wrenched from context and interpreted as need be. There are also many persons, however, who, without feeling any attraction to Hinduism whatever, prefer → yoga exercises to unhealthy sports, are enthusiastic about a workshop for Mandala painting, and the like. These elements of Hindu practice have become a part of everyday Western culture.

Literature

Primary Sources: Bhagavad-Gītā, with a commentary based on the original sources by R. C. Zaehner, London 1973; Mahabharata, trans. by William Buck, Delhi 2000; The Rāmāyana of Vālmīiki: An Epic of Ancient India, Princeton 1996; Rigveda: A Vedic Reader for Students, trans. by Arthur A. Macdonell, Madras 1965.

Secondary Literature: Babb, Lawrence A., Redemptive Encounters: Three Modern Styles in the Hindu Tradition, Delhi 1987; Bergunder, Michael, "Contested Past: Anti-Brahmanical and Hindu Nationalist Reconstructions of Indian Prehistory," in: Historiographia Linguistica 31/1 (2004), 59-104; Biardeau, Madeleine, Hinduism: The Anthropology of a Civilization, Delhi 1989; Chakrabarti, Dilip K., Colonial Indology: Sociopolitics of the Ancient Indian Past, New Delhi 1997; Chaturvedi, Vinayak, Mapping Subaltern Studies and the Postcolonial, London/New York 2000; Dalmia, Vasudha/von Stietencron, Heinrich (eds.), Representing Hinduism: The Construction of Religious Traditions and National Identity, New Delhi 1995; Dirks, Nicholas B., Castes of Mind: Colonialism and the Making of Modern India, Princeton 2001; Elst, Koenraad, Decolonizing the Hindu Mind: Ideological Development of Hindu Revivalism, New Delhi 2001; Forbes, Geraldine, Women in Modern India, Cambridge 1999; Fuller, C. F., The Camphor Flame: Popular Hinduism, Princeton 1992; Gonda, Jan, Change and Continuity in Indian Religion, The Hague 1965; Idem (ed.), A History of Indian Literature, Wiesbaden 1973–1987; Hawley, John S./Wulff, Donna M. (eds.), Devī: Goddesses of India, Berkeley 1996; Klostermaier, Klaus K., A Survey of Hinduism, Albany [2]1994; Larson, Gerald James, India's Agony of Religion, Albany 1995; Michaels, Axel, Hinduism: Past and Present, Princeton 2004; Smith, David, Hinduism and Modernity, Malden 2003; Sontheimer, Günter D./Kulke, Hermann (eds.), Hinduism Reconsidered, New Delhi 1991; Zaehner, R. C., Hinduism, London 1962.

→ Ashram, Buddha, Buddhism, Caste, Colonialism, Gandhi, Guru, Hare Krishna Movement (ISKCON), Indian Subcontinent, Mantra, Orientalism/Exotism, Osho Movement, Religion, Sadhu, Tantra, Yoga

Sylvia Stapelfeldt

History

Happenings and Histories

1. The word 'history' is a translation of the Greek historía (basic meaning: 'gaining of information,' 'investigation,' 'narration'). Toward the turn of the eighteenth/nineteenth centuries, this word developed into the latinized form históría. Between the 'happenings' and (hi-)story, however, four fields of meaning can be distinguished: (1) History means past events, connections or structures, how they change in the temporal succession of their human world and environment, and the history of collective groupings (such as nations, societies, families, religious groups), structures (such as cities, roads and routes, institutions, individuals, mentalities), as well as nature (natural history), or humanity (universal history). Here the collective singular (history) can denote the course of the world, in its totality, from its beginning to its end. The facticity, of 'historical' processes and developments indicated with this conceptual field, however, Geschichte an sich, (Ger., 'history per se'), is itself interpreted linguistically. In principle, past events and their connections are remembered and interpreted against the horizon of whatever 'present' prevails—whence the second field of meaning, inseparable from the first: (2) Interpretations of history and its course transpire in language, usually written, and attempt to order the past and thereby to lend it a concrete sense with reference to the present. The spectrum stretches from genealogies (also orally transmitted), that is, from the literary traditions of the succession of generations, government, or gods, to the special (ancient to modern) history books dealing with temporally and spatially bounded series of events, to the modern, scientific historiography of distinct object areas (such as nations, generations, families, art, religion) or epochs (such as Greek history, history of the Middle Ages, of modernity, universal history). In the linguistic forming of the past as history, various interests and evaluations play a role: thus, the legitimization of current relations, or the justification of behavior bearing on the future. (3) Since, beginning in modern times, the writing of history has been done with scientific pretensions, there is a question of the third field of meaning: history as scientific discipline. The historical sciences, practiced by way of empirical analysis, are linguistically and chronologically dependent. Further, their behavior with the sources transmitted is necessarily selective, and, to some extent, evaluative. As a result, these sciences are faced with the problem of doing justice to the totality of the course of history. In this state of things in the nineteenth century, especially in Germany, a debate over 'historicism' materialized with respect to the sciences of history, consisting of a discussion on the historicization of all knowledge and on the relativization of values. (4) In connection with the debate on historicism, and with the more recent discussion in the historical sciences regarding the pluralization and literarization of historical knowledge, the everyday use of the plural, 'histories,' in the sense of stories, acquires a scientific relevance of its own. If history is accessible only in 'histories,' in the sense of narratives and accounts, in that case, rather than making a scientific claim, stories of the past can only make a literary one. There is also, in this connection, the postmodern language about the end of history, which more or less consciously receives a legacy of religious history (→ Apocalypse; End/Eschaton).

An important role is played, in the interpretation of the past, by the process of a regulated work of memory, and by the production of various achievements of recall in terms of culture, as well as, therewith, in terms of the foundation of religions (→ Memory).

New Time/New History

2. a) If National Socialism is dealt with here as a phenomenon in religious history, then an open, neutral understanding of religion is presupposed. However, the transfer of religious themes and language to the socially differentiated area of politics shows, with particular clarity, history's function as bestower of meaning, doubtless characteristic of modern → European history of religion. Religious language and metaphors are used, and a religious claim is raised, in order to ground people and 'race' historically, and to espouse a society-establishing function. Alfred Rosenberg (1893–1946), one of the main ideologues of the National Socialist Weltanschauung, notably ordered the 'movement' into the history of religion, along with adopting a religious vocabulary, such as 'myth,' the symbolism of 'light,' and 'kingdom.' → National Socialism itself then became a phenomenon of religious history. History adopts an important function of legitimization, and determination of conduct. Rosenberg constructed a new world history, extending from the Nordic race with its primordial homeland of → Atlantis to a racist world revolution through National Socialism and a 'new time,' a new age. He legitimized the shaping of the present and future through a reconstruction of the primitive age, and of the development of the Nordic race, by way of religious history, from India to the Persians, Greeks, Romans, and Teutons. History became a race history, whose special note was the religious antagonism between the primitive Nordic race, representing light and purity, and the Jewish Gegenrasse, 'counter-race,' standing for darkness and chaos. The goal, according to Rosenberg, is the reconstitution of the pure, primordial solar 'myth of the twentieth century.' By promoting the present to the status of 'new time,' he binds primordial time and eschatological time together in a totalitarian meaning of history. This image of history was celebrated through literature, film, exhibits, commemoratives, dedications, and memorial events, and thus transmitted to the public consciousness and established. Rosenberg held that historicism relativized values, and that at the same time it solved the problem, in that it set a race and a people over history. He thought that a parallel lay in Marxist political movements. → Political religions were both a legacy, and an undertaking in competition with the Christian claim on the interpretation of world and history.

After Auschwitz

b) In the second half of the twentieth century, then, the Holocaust (→ Shoah)—the terrible effect and consequence of this construction of history—broached the question once more of a possible conferral of meaning by history, and reinforced its urgency: 'Auschwitz' raises weighty problems of interpretation for Christian theologians, Jewish interpretations of history, and the methods of historiography. This has led to a crisis in the experience of history.

Untouched by all of this, a few contemporary religious communities—sometimes associated with modern → Esotericism and → New Age religion—also argue from meaning-bestowing interpretations of the course of history. According to this construction, it is ages and epochs themselves that have led to the interpretations of history mounted by these religions. An academic basis in history, and an appeal to Christian and non-Christian religious concepts alike, are cited as having made scholarly religious history available in the first place.

Progress and Decadence

3. a) Past and future cause every known religion a problem of coherent interpretation of the world, together with the problem of a conferral of meaning on the part of activity in the world. How can the past be preserved, what will the future bring? Neither dimension of history can be concluded otherwise than from the standpoint of the respective present coming between. They are not open to conclusion from any a priori quality of their own: they are indeterminate, and interpretable. Accordingly, understanding and activity can be motivated and legitimized both from a prestige of origin, or from significant recalled events, as well as from a paradisiac utopia shifted to the future as a counter-world to the present. The course of history thereby receives an evaluation as ascent or descent, and the beginning and end of history are evaluated differently from one another. The models to be maintained divide and evaluate the past as well, this is true, but they usually provide the human being, in the present, with an orientation whose point of departure is in the awaited future (the historian Reinhart Koselleck called this the 'horizon of expectation' [Erwartungshorizont] that is in accordance or in conflict with the 'space of experience' [Erfahrungsraum]): the course of world ages or epoch can lead either to an extinction of the world, or to a new paradise. This course can be interpreted as a dramatic succession of segments, or else as a continuous course of progress or decay.

Cultural → memory, Mnemosyne, on the other hand, is time that has passed since the occurrence of memorable events, referred to the past, and ordered or structured for use of these events for the present. It produces tradition, founds social and political unity, determines the → calendar, and renders possible an → orientation in the present, all by determining history in terms of the present. The meaningful occurrences of history are remembered through the media of language and image, and thus are ritually reiterable.

Cyclical and Linear Concepts of History

b) This arrangement of memory shows that, in the presence of history's constitution and meaning, cyclical and linear concepts of the course of history can play an important and reciprocally complementary role. An attempt has been made to maintain a foundational difference of cultures and religions on the basis of these two categories. Recognition of this contradiction between societies with a linear understanding of → time and societies with a cyclical understanding of time, has led to an evaluative opposition of history on the one side, and myth, nature, and cosmos on the other. If this difference is itself understood historically, and used for an interpretation of the course of history, then the notion arises that it is a characteristic feature of history to detach itself from cultures with a mythically determined cyclical understanding of time. However, this interpretation of the historical development of myth to history is itself indebted to a linear understanding of history. The same typology is applied to a criticism of the Christian understanding of time, and of nineteenth-century confidence in progress. Thus, → Nietzsche appeals to a simplified, partly imagined antiquity, in order to ground, against historicism and Christianity, his doctrine of the eternal return. This criticism of the primacy of history is continued by historian of religion Mircea → Eliade, this time with an appeal to an imagined cosmic religiousness of cultures called 'archaic.' The thought categories 'linear versus cyclical' express more about historians' image of the world than about the objects of their investigation.

Return of Myth

c) The 'return' of myth in post-modernity introduces a new normative component, one in contradiction with the linear, Judeo-Christian understanding of history: the end of the great narratives brings with it an upward evaluation of mythic forms—plural, now—of dealing with history; the claim of one history is contradicted, and the multiplicity of histories is promoted to leading principle of legitimization, polymythy as → polytheism.

In the presence of the linguistic shaping of the different orders of history, metaphors play a role that should not be underestimated: with the help of metaphors, the course, the order, and the subordinate meaning of history can be put into illustrative connections that will be easy to grasp. Now, whether they come from the realm of nature (history as organic growth, epochs as change of seasons, history as current or as circulation), technology (history as a construction or as a chain), or human culture (history as theater), they reduce the complexity of the course of history, make history enunciable, and "slake a need for meaning that grows out of the wish for the oneness of the world."[1]

Salvation History Secularized

4. a) Today's understanding of history stands in a complex tradition of the history of ideas, coming from ancient Eastern, Judeo-Christian, and Greek sources. Christianity interprets history from the Christ event, and forms the concept of a salvation history, which ranges from creation to the Last Judgment. This background, and the opposition of this concept to competing concepts in the environment of late antiquity, led to a number of conceptions of history, distinct from one another, but to which the teleology of history in a final judgment is common in various ways. Against the Christ-centered, biblical interpretation and dating of history, Voltaire (1694–1778) could show Chinese chronicles, just discovered, and thus call for another, universal history. Instead of salvation history, he demanded, there must first be a philosophy of history. Beginning with the → Enlightenment, the concept of 'history' in the singular appeared, and established the modern, European variant of a unitary course of history as universal human history. A metaphorics of epoch, however, cyclic theories, and visions of progress and an end of time, continue in their roles even today. The unity of the course of history also formed the premise of the idealist philosophy of history, which was still marked by Christianity, and which experienced its high point in Hegel's speculation on history.

Historicism

b) Historicism, and the understanding of history proposed by Nietzsche and Jacob Burckhardt (1818–1897), led to a dismissal of the philosophy of history. Through historicism, the view of the history of religions arose, and, at first, there was an effort to justify Christendom on grounds of religious history; but Burckhardt and Nietzsche projected a counter-image of history, based on antiquity and aimed against Christianity and modern times. The unification, secularization, and de-Christianization of an understanding of history that emerged from the Enlightenment, along with the simultaneous production of variously accentuated ideologies of progress, indicated for Karl Löwith (1897–1973) a secularization of world history, and its release from the context of a Christian salvific event. History gradually becomes a meaning-conferring system with its own foundation, and it is emancipated from the given frameworks of the religious interpretation of a Christian understanding of time; and, the other way around, itself becomes the frame of meaning for religion. This reversal occurred in the wake of the debate on historicism that was conducted at the beginning of the twentieth century, in which the issue was the reification of all knowledge and the accompanying relativization of values: under the influence of a gradual de-Christianization of society among scholars like Max → Weber and Ernst Troeltsch (1865–1923), an interest in religion and religious history was oriented to the problems of the present. This development ascended to the status of a scholars' religion, in which education, person, and the subject of religion were ascribed a key value.[2] Religious history plays a role here, inasmuch as it promotes life options for judging the painful experiences of modernity; through the reception of foreign and past forms of religion, the sources were prepared for an alternative religion among scholars.

Scientifically unbolted history itself became the reservoir for bestowals of meaning of the newly arising religious and political movements of modernity and post-modernity. In the very shaping of the everyday, one relies on the competency for meaningful life lying ready in the history of religions.

Extra-European Cultures

5. The perception and interpretation of history is not a European peculiarity, but occurs in various ways in all cultures and religions. However, the emergence of an academic historiography, of an interpretational framework of history, with the consequence of a historicization of all values and the loss of a monopoly on the meaning of history, so that a pluralization of the interpretations of time and history became a societal consensus—this development is specific to → European history of religion, and extremely closely bound up with the history of European expansion and subsequent globalization.

In Islam, the → Qur'an is the document of a universally valid revelation, which had the consequence that history between the act of creation and the last judgment spans, and to a consequence becomes a series of, non-reiterable events. In this case as well, we have a pretension to a universal history, which pretension is already grounded on the history of religions: Muhammad stands as last in the series of prophets, and seals antecedent religious history. In the Islamic world, nevertheless, there was a universal historiography, as well as different eschatologically aimed movements. Only under the influence of a European historiography, with its orientation toward nations, does a regionalization of the historical conferral of meaning occur here as well: the vehicle of history is no longer the Islamic community, but the various nations.

China looks back on a rich, differentiated tradition of historical bestowal of meaning, in which an appeal to historical events forms a key argument. The criterion of history's course is the harmony of the cosmic model and its societal copy. This congruity was the measure of the success or failure of a government or a dynasty. Epochs, cycles, linear development, and rise and fall are the categories of interpretation. Against this background, China formed a meaningful 'annalistic' and historiographical tradition, and understood the history of China as world history. Despite an asserted meaninglessness of history, from the Indian area we have a large number of written testimonials: biographies of rulers, genealogies in the form of hymns of praise, and, from the Buddhist area, Sri Lanka's chronicles and traditions of the biography of the Buddha, as well as further development in function of the acts of councils. There are, besides, in the Indian religions—as in the further development of Buddhism in China, Tibet, and Japan—doctrines of world ages and eschatology that often enough bring out the aspect of fall as well as rise in the development of history.

The recent discussion in anthropology shows that the question of the 'timelessness' and absence of history among non-writing cultures is rather the conclusion of European schemata, and prevents a differentiated conceptual grasp of the variety prevailing in an ethnic consciousness of history. For the moment, ethnic groups come under a pressure of rivalry that they cannot escape spatially, and the security of the identity of any of the groups requires a claim to the most ancient origin, and to unbroken continuity (→ Tradition). In other words, that security requires the application of history as argument. History becomes indispensable, in its function as knowledge of the origin of one's own group.

The expansion of Europe entailed not only a colonialization of the world, but also the propagation of a specifically European way of interpreting the world, with its essential appeal to history (→ Colonialism; Orientalism/Exotism). Outside of Europe, the scientific investigation of history developed its own traditions of scholarship, as for instance that of research into the Buddhist history of Japan.

History of Religion

6. With reference to the four cited fields of history, a distinction must be made between (1) the factual course of history of religion, or history in itself, and (2) the religious interpretations it undergoes. History of religions, having become an independent discipline at the end of the nineteenth century, (3) now attempts, in demarcation from philosophy of religion and from theology, to create an interpretation to constitute an alternative to those the religions themselves construct of their own past. Not only is their questioning a product of the European history of religion, but they also come into competition with historical interpretations of the religions in the present, and their reconstructions and investigations again influence the course of religious history. Religions are increasingly articulated with an appeal to their scientific status, and the sciences replace religious interpretations of history, even, occasionally, raising a 'religious' claim themselves (materialism, evolutionism). The quest for a conferral of meaning, on grounds of the experiences of the twentieth century (world wars, Auschwitz, nihilism, historicism), on a history more often experienced as meaningless, is then itself compelled to argue historically, in case it inclines more to the dismissal of history. This trend is shown, for example, in the work of Mircea → Eliade. For him, historicism is the premise of an unbiased investigation of the extra-European religions; and yet, on religious grounds, he rejects it, as an expression of the human being's profane, 'simply historical,' being-in-the-world. In his religious theory, he dared the venture of reconciling cosmic religiousness with history, ascribing to the symbols of the cosmos (moon, water, stone) an inner tendency toward historical development. The cosmic ontology he propagated remains designated a 'fall into history.' This example shows that modern historiography of religion can be part of religious history, and religious history the object of a grip on history on the part of academic historiography. On the other side, it shows that only a part of the historical achievements of orientation are available to historiography of religion in modern, splintered society.

1. Demandt 1978, 450.
2. Murrmann-Kahl 1992, 481-491.

Literature

Assmann, Jan, Das kulturelle Gedächtnis: Schrift, Erinnerung und politische Identität in frühen Hochkulturen; Cook, Albert, History/Writing: The Theory and Practice of History in Antiquity and in Modern Times, Cambridge 1988; Demandt, Alexander, Metaphern für Geschichte. Sprachbilder und Gleichnisse im historisch-politischen Denken, Munich 1978; Dirlik, Arif et al. (eds.), History after the Three Worlds: Post-Eurocentric Historiographies, Lanham 2000; Eliade, Mircea, Cosmos and History: The Myth of the Eternal Return, New York 1959 (French [1]1949); Funkenstein, Amos, Perceptions of Jewish History, Berkeley 1993; Johnson, Richard (ed.), Making Histories: Studies in History-Writing and Politics, London 1982; Koselleck, Reinart, Future's Past: On the Semantics of Historical Time, Cambridge 1985; Idem, The Practice of Conceptual History: Timing History, Spacing Concepts, Stanford 2002; Löwith, Karl, Meaning in History: The Theological Implications of the Philosophy of History, Chicago 1949; Murrmann-Kahl, Michael, Die entzauberte Heilsgeschichte. Der Historismus erobert die Theologie 1880–1920, Gütersloh 1992; Oelmüller, Willi et al. (eds.), Diskurs: Geschichte, Paderborn 1980; Peisl, Anton/Mohler, Armin (eds.), Die Zeit, Munich 1983; Rigney, Ann, Imperfect Histories: The Elusive Past and the Legacy of Romantic Historicism, Ithaca 2001; Seldon, Anthony (ed.), Contemporary History: Practice and Method, Oxford 1988; Stuchtey, Benedikt/Fuchs, Eckhardt (eds.), Writing World History, 1800–2000, Oxford 2003; Wittkau, Annette, Historismus. Zur Geschichte des Begriffs und des Problems, Göttingen [2]1994.

→ Academic Study of Religion, Memory, Time

Jürgen Mohn

Holocaust

The term 'holocaust' was proposed at the beginning of the 1960s by Elie Wiesel, who himself was nearly killed at Auschwitz. This term was intended to designate the unspeakable murder of six million European Jews, whose destruction was bureaucratically organized and industrially executed. Although the term originated in America, it has become current in Europe especially through the American media.

The Greek word holókaustos is a translation of a term from the Hebrew Bible meaning 'wholly burned' or 'burnt offering' and describing the type of sacrifice in which an animal is completely made over to God by burning (Cf. Lev 1:3). The complete destruction of the sacrifice distinguishes it from other types of sacrifice in which not only God, but also the people making or administering the sacrifice receive part of the animal, as when some of the meat is eaten. Thus the term was considered appropriate in Jewish discussion of the Holocaust and the religious and cultural confrontation with atrocities like Auschwitz; it was to invest religious meaning and value in the experience of the Jewish people while reflecting the extremity of destruction experienced. The term also served to preserve the suffering of Jewish individuals from being remembered as mere victimization by characterising their deaths as a sacrifice and therefore something handed over to God.

However, Elie Wiesel has since retracted his original suggestion of the term 'holocaust' as an appropriate designation for the destruction of six million Jews in connection with the Second World War. He considers its association with worship too ambiguous. It is therefore more common, especially within the Jewish community, to use the term → Shoah, meaning 'catastrophe' in Hebrew.

→ Shoah

Christoph Auffarth

Holy

The word 'holy,' or 'sacred,' denotes an area completely bounded off from the everyday ('profane'), and simply never to be available to the human being. Accordingly, special rules are in force for dealing with sacred objects, buildings, and persons.

A type of theory of the Holy attributes the latter to other quantities, for example, sociologically to society (Durkheim), or to aggression (Girard) in anthropological sociology. On the other hand, the Holy can be conceived as a category of its own, incapable of reduction, as in the phenomenology of religion of Rudolf Otto, who thought to recognize, in the dimensions of feeling—and in the tremendum ('terrible,' 'frightening,' 'fearsome') and fascinosum ('fascinating,' 'enchanting,' 'captivating')—the essence of the religious experience. Subsequently, Mircea → Eliade developed a morphology of the appearances of the Holy, and diagnosed a decline in the occurrence of such 'hierophanies' in modern society.

Criticism of both conceptions have been raised, against both their anti-religious and religious implications: in the reduction of, as well as in their analysis in terms of, the phenomenology of religion, the Holy is understood ontologically as a special realm of reality, a category sui generis, and thereby it can be seen as the impersonal legacy of the Christian God. By contrast, through the use of a functional approach, the relation between Holy and the profane can be reconstituted in the individual historical case: by no means does the application of the concept of 'holy' in the scriptures or rituals of the various religions present a unitary condition, as was suggested by the conception of the Holy as a key concept of religious studies.

Literature

Ballard, Steven, Rudolf Otto and the Synthesis of the Rational and the Non-Rational in the Idea of the Holy: Some Encounters in Theory and Practice, Frankfurt/M. etc. 2000; Colpe, Carsten (ed.), Die Diskussion um das Heilige, Darmstadt 1977; Girard, René, Violence and the Sacred, Baltimore 1977 (French original [1]1972); McCutcheon, Russell T., Manufacturing Religion: The Discourse on Sui Generis Religion and the Politics of Nostalgia, New York/Oxford 1997; Otto, Rudolf, The Idea of the Holy, Oxford 1924 (German original [1]1917); Raphael, Melissa, Rudolf Otto and the Concept of Holiness, Oxford 1997.

→ Eliade, God/Gods/The Sacred, Metaphysics, Religion

Ansgar Jödicke

Holy War

The concept of the holy war is customarily associated with the thought of a war whose basis or justification is religious in a special way. The connection between 'holy war' and 'holy struggle' was coined by poets of the time of the wars of liberation against Napoleon, especially Ernst Moritz Arndt (1769–1860). The fact that, after the Enlightenment and the Revolution of 1789, war is presented as holy, rests not on the fact that it was (only) then that the church appealed to war, but on the fact that, gradually, the nation was exalted on religious grounds. Edmund Burke connects this process with the idea, of short-lived (1815–1830) virulence, of the war of intervention. True, it is a widespread notion that war becomes connected with special religious rituals and assertions. But a special type, 'holy war,' can not be distinguished from normal war, not even in biblical Israel or the ancient East: all wars, without differentiation, were waged—in the understanding of warriors and historians—by the supreme God himself (for instance, the 'Yahweh war'). The holy war (hierós pólemos) in classical Greece designates an altogether determinate construct, namely the (punitive) war, formally to be determined as such, and contrived and waged by an alliance of states, for the protection of the sanctuary of Delphi, and thus can offer no basis for construction of the modern concept. The holy war is only a special instance of the → Jihad in Islam. Nor does 'holy war' match up with applications of determinate features of European 'wars of religion' (see also → War). As a propagandistic or polemical term, especially since the two Gulf Wars, 'holy war' should be avoided today as a historical or systematic concept.

Literature

Colpe, Carsten, Der "heilige Krieg". Benennung und Wirklichkeit, Begründung und Widerstreit, Hanstein 1994; Mosse, George L., The Nationalization of the Masses: Political Smybolism and Mass Movements in Germany from the Napoleonic Wars Through the Third Reich, New York 1975; Sa-Moon Kang, Divine War in the Old Testament and in the Ancient Near East, Berlin/New York 1989.

→ Conflict/Violence, Hero/Heroism, Jihad, War/Armed Forces

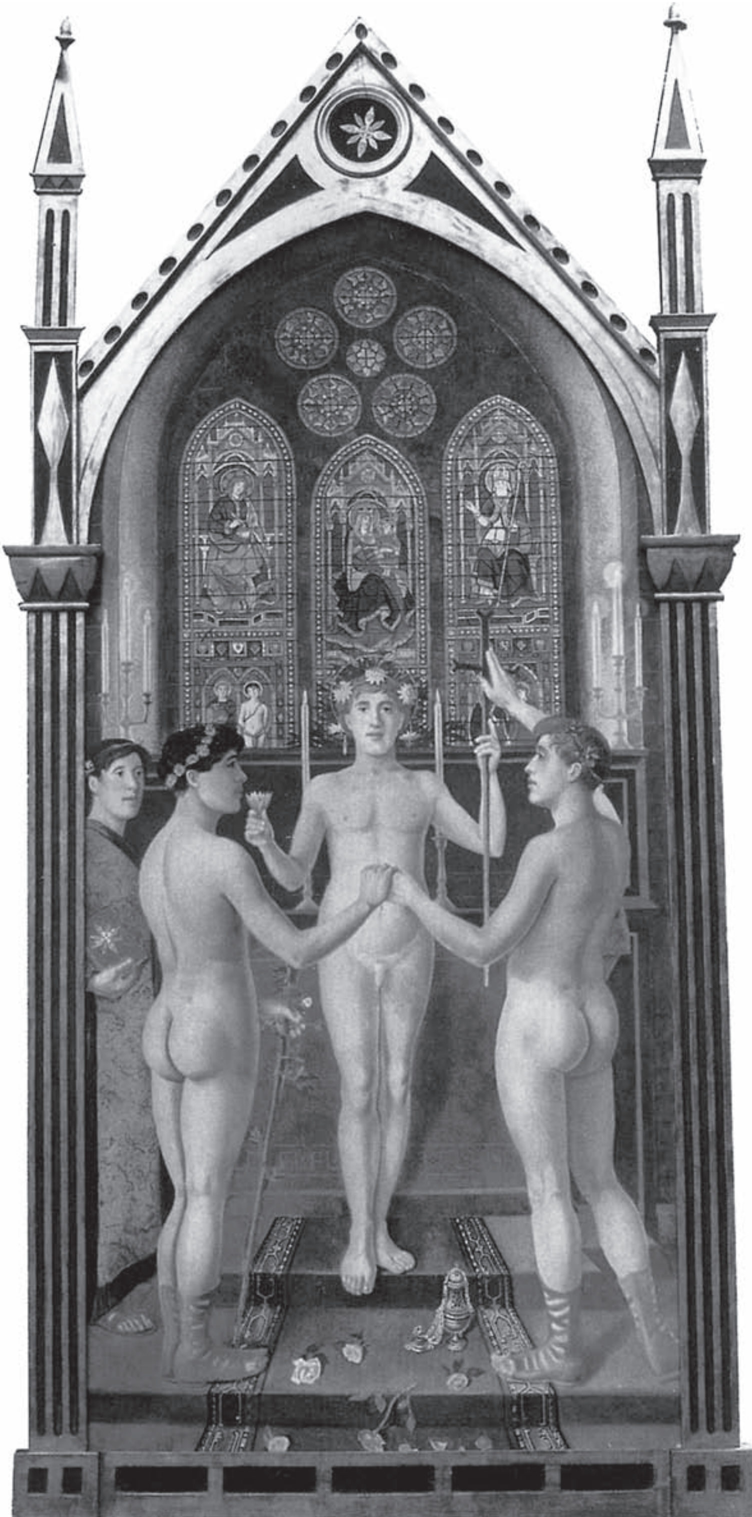
Jörg Rüpke

Homosexuality / Homoeroticism

Homosexuality—sexual acts between two persons of the same sex—is found today all over the world, in a multiplicity of societies, and is also historically attested for many cultures. The sources give information principally on male homosexuality.



Religious Rejection of Homosexual Activity: the Judeo-Christian Tradition

1. The stance regarding homosexual conduct is very different in different cultures and religions. In many religious traditions, homosexual behavior is subjected to a negative appraisal, as, for example, in the Judeo-Christian tradition. In the Hebrew Bible, male homosexual practice ranks among the worst of sexual transgressions, and is punishable by death (Lev 20:13). It is traditionally held to be the ground of the destruction of Sodom (Gen 19:5-8), from which we have the denomination sodomy (a reading, however, which is historically highly debatable). The Apostle Paul endorses this denunciation in the New Testament (1 Cor 6:9-10; 1 Tim 1:9-10), and includes in its object sexual relations among women (Rom 1:26-27). Some of the Church Fathers, for instance → Augustine, saw homosexual conduct as sinful, just as Paul had. Meanwhile, they condemned all sexual practice (even heterosexual) as sinful that was not ordered to procreation. In the Middle Ages, however, homosexual activity (just as other sexual practices defined as 'unnatural') became, in church law, a deviation from church doctrine—and thereby heresy. Supported by church law, civil law declared homosexuality a capital offense, as in ancient Israel, and thus punishable by death. The attitude of the Protestant churches toward homosexuality was no less hostile than in Catholicism.

Worldwide, the number of cultures in which homosexuality is approved is large: an anthropological study concluded that, in sixty-four percent of the cultures investigated, homosexual practice was culturally approved at least for many members of that society (Ford/Beach 1965). Frequently, but not always, this approval is rooted in religious concepts, as well. There is no simple explanation why, in some cultures, homosexual practice is sanctioned, and even institutionalized, and in others is condemned. Homosexual practice in institutionalized form was found traditionally in many Indian cultures of North and South America, in parts of Asia and Africa, and in cultures of the Pacific Ocean. In other extra-European cultures, on the other hand, homosexuality encountered public rejection, as in the Aztec Empire of Mexico (c. 1400–1521) and in the Empire of the Incas in Peru (c. 1220–1535).

Where homosexual practice finds culturally acknowledged expression, and is secured even in the area of religion or religious magic, this sanction occurs essentially in three ways or patterns:

a) In many military societies, → ritual, age-structured homosexual acts between an adult and a pubertal male partner mark the latter's transition to manhood ('initiatory pederasty'). The best-known example is doubtless that of ancient Greece. Age-structured homosexuality was also traditionally very widespread in Melanesia (→ South Sea/Australia). There, ritualized homosexual acts served to introduce sperm, and thereby substance, into the younger partners. Through the introduction of the male substance, the young man was liberated from the world of women and incorporated into the military life of adult men. The fact of such relationships also precipitated mythic representations: thus, ancient Greek Zeus, Father of the Gods, becomes altogether personally enamored of Ganymede, a mortal youth, whom he abducts to Mount Olympus and makes his cupbearer. Comparable erotic-educational relations in institutional and culturally approved form were practiced between women and young girls. The school of poetess Sappho (c. 617–560 BCE) on the island of Lesbos—under the protective rule of Aphrodite, Goddess of Love—is an example.

'Clarism' was the private religion of painter and writer Elisàr von Kuppfer (1872–1942) and his life partner philosopher Eduard von Meyer. The two propagated the vision of a 'clearworld,' populated exclusively by beautiful, naked young men and butterflies, not only in their programmatic writings, but also in a construction in sacred architecture, the Sanctuarium artis Elisarion, (Lat., "Elysian Sanctuary of Art") in Locarno-Minusio (1927–1939). Kupffer himself expressed favorite men in a monumental cycle of frescos and in oil painting. His painting, "The New Disciple" (in Ital., Il Nuovo Seguace, 291 × 141 cm including frame, tempera on wood) depicts a homoerotic initiation in a medieval Christian atmosphere: in an altar space, before a Gothic window wall, the initiand (right) swears on the (ritual) sword. A kind of backwards-facing utopia, it is an audacious blend of 'churchliness' with naked, 'pagan' corporality. The painting originally occupied a place in the great rotunda that housed the central sanctuary, and thus is a sacred image in the strict sense. (Hubert Mohr)

b) The second form of culturally approved and religiously legitimated homosexual behavior is formed by sex-role exchanges: men take on (usually for life) the role and garb of a woman (or the reverse), and enter sexual relations with the same biological sex. An example would be the Berdaches or 'two-spirits' of North American Indian cultures. Here the sex role exchange often ensues upon the behest of a deity or other supernatural being, often during puberty, in connection with the quest for a vision. Berdaches or 'two-spirits' are regarded as a kind of third sex, uniting male and female within themselves. On these grounds, and not infrequently, special religious roles fell to them. In many Indian cultures, two-sexed deities were found as well—supernatural exemplars of the terrestrial Berdaches or 'two-spirits.'

c) The third kind of culturally approved, institutionalized homosexual relationship is tied to certain social roles, and is also ordinarily accompanied by a sex change. Such a social role is often that of the shaman, who changes his sex at the behest of his spirit-helper. He dons women's clothes, and enters sexual relations, at times even marriages, with men. His sex-role change expresses a special spiritual strength. A special role accompanying homosexual conduct is also that of the *hijra*s in India and Pakistan. They consecrate themselves to goddess Bahuchara Mata, dress in women's clothing, gather alms, and are hired to appear at weddings, births, and other festive occasions.

Religion(s) and Homosexuality Today

2. The relation between churches and homosexuality is still problematic today. The same holds true for Orthodox and Conservative Judaism. The Jewish religion was never 'anti-sex,' it is true, nor is it so today. But, as we have seen, the Hebrew Bible, on which Orthodox Jewish rules rest, condemns homosexual conduct. For Orthodox women and men, admission of their homosexuality can mean exclusion from their community—no longer physical death, as in ancient Israel, but social 'death.' As in many Christian religious communities, however, the Reform movement in Judaism has adopted a more liberal attitude toward homosexual men and women in recent decades. Against a background of general homosexual emancipation, several lesbian-gay Jewish communities have been founded in the United States, with their own synagogues, as Beth Simkhat Torah in New York and Sha'ar Zavav in San Francisco (→ California). We observe a trend toward liberalization in many Christian religious communities as well, especially among Protestants. Homosexual Christians and Jews have formed communities of interest worldwide, and are working toward a recognition of their living communities. In the United States, meanwhile, rabbis bless homosexual relations, or even marriages between lesbians or gays. The subject of lesbian and gay marriages is still controversial, however, in the churches.

Homosexual emancipation, at the century's turn, and reflection on a humanistic ethics that emphasizes human rights and a respect for, and integration of, 'outsiders,' is often a privilege of the Western world. In a framework of the colonialization and Christianization of the so-called 'Third World,' homosexuality was often cruelly persecuted. In many places, then, ritualized homosexuality (as in Melanesia), third sexes, and the cultures and religions that respected homosexual behavior in society, no longer exist.

Literature

Adams, Rachel/Savran, David (eds.), The Masculinity Studies Reader, Malden 2002; Blackwood, Evelyn (ed.), The Many Faces of Homosexuality: Anthropological Approaches to Homosexual Behavior, New York 1986; Dover, Kenneth J., Greek Homosexuality, Cambridge 1978; Dynes, Wayne R. (ed.), Encyclopedia of Homosexuality, Chicago 1990; Ford, Clellan S./Beach, Frank A., Patterns of Sexual Behaviour, London 1965; Greenberg, David F., The Construction of Homosexuality, Chicago 1988; Jacobs, Sue-Ellen et al. (eds.), Two-Spirit People: Native American Gender Identity, Sexuality, and Spirituality, Urbana 1977; Kripal, Jeffrey J., Roads of Excess, Palaces of Wisdom: Eroticism and Reflexivity in the Study of Mysticism, Chicago 2001; Lang, Sabine, Men as Women, Women as Men: changing Gender in Native American Cultures, Austin 1998; Morton, Donald (ed.), The Material Queer: A LesBiGay Cultural Studies Reader, Boulder 1996; Nanda, Serena, Neither Man Nor Woman: The Hijra of India, Belmond 1990; Nardi, Peter M./Schneider, Beth E. (eds.), Social Perspectives in Lesbian and Gay Studies: A Reader, London 1998; Robertson, Jennifer (ed.), Same-Sex Cultures and Sexualities: An Anthropological Reader, Malden 2005; Roscoe, Will: "Priests of the Goddess: Gender Transgression in Ancient Religion," in: History of Religions 35/3 (1996), 195-230; Sherman, Suzanne (ed.), Lesbian and Gay Marriage: Private Commitments, Public Ceremonies, Philadelphia 1992; Summers, Claude J. (ed.), The Gay and Lesbian Literary Heritage: A Reader's Companion to the Writers and Their Works, from Antiquity to the Present, New York 1995; Westheimer, Ruth/Mark, Jonathan, Heavenly Sex: Sexuality in the Jewish Tradition, New York 1995.

→ Eroticism, Gender Stereotypes, Heresy, Prostitution, Rites of Passage, Sexuality, Shamanism

Sabine Lang

House / Home

Private Domain

1. a) Doubtless there is no society, however simple it be, without some kind of 'housing.' The form of the house is dependent on such factors as climate, environment, societal form (nomadic or sedentary), and social position. In Western societies, the house is the place at which many spend most of the day. The house is the territory of the individual's or family's private sphere. Other rules can prevail there than in public. The erection of the house is a copy of one's own self, and any changes or additions will suit the taste of the people living there. This development is rather new: economic conditions make it possible for Westerners to separate their home from their workplace; and they have the money to furnish it with more than minimal appointments.

The Home Orders Life

b) Considered historically, this situation is exceptional, since until around 1800 the ordering principle of life was the home, not the family. Those living under one roof—parents and children, grandmother and grandfather, unmarried brothers and sisters, occasionally maids and servant—lived in a relationship with one another, and were under the authority of the father of the house, or, more rarely, that of the mother. In many developing countries, circumstances are entirely different from those in Western industrialized countries. Nearly all cultures, however, agree that the dwelling is the primary social environment, especially in those cases where there is no separation between residence and workplace. Up until the Industrial Revolution, this held even for European culture, and still holds today for farmers and shopkeepers. The predicate 'private' cannot be casually applied to pre-modern living cultures.

Bond of the Generations

c) In many cultures, not only the living, but also dead relatives inhabit the home. Thus, in ancient Mesopotamia, it was customary to bury the dead in the house, a usage formerly maintained in parts of South America, Africa, and Oceania, as it still is occasionally today. In this case, the dwelling is the place of the bond between the generations. The ancestors also receive their 'fare,' the sacrifice. In the Netherlands today, it is still permitted to preserve the ashes of the deceased in the home; however, this is a different situation since, in European culture, there is no veneration of the dead, and the urn that holds the ashes has a meaning more emotional than religious or ritual.

Copy of the Cosmos

2. a) Beyond the function of protected bedroom, dining room, and workroom, the home can be a microcosmic image of the universe. Thus, some cultures, namely in the Arctic regions of Europe and North America, an architecture is used in which the house is built around a central pole. This pole corresponds to the cosmic world-tree, which is the midpoint of the world and holds it up. We often find this concept with Shamanic cultures. At the same time, this pole is the most sacred part of the house, at the foot of which sacrifice is offered to the gods. The relationship between house

The utopian communities of the Shakers, of whom the first came from England to North America in 1774 under the charismatic leadership of Ann Lee, let their ideals flow into their architecture. A plain, simple lifestyle, order, cleanliness, and harmony were to be promoted through a corresponding environment, which would include their buildings. The dwelling house of the Center Family commune in South Union, Kentucky, was built in 1824, at the high point of the movement. Its components are aligned in strict symmetry. Corresponding to their celibate standard, two separate staircases lead from the community dining room up to the brothers' and the sisters' and world image is more complicated with the Atoni of the Indonesian island of Timor. Their positioning and partition rest on their cosmological classification. The most important of the binary oppositions of which this classification consists is the male—female. This opposition, with the contrasts attaching thereto, such as inner—outer, west—east, and left—right, recurs in the partitioning of the house, with its division between areas for the men and those for the women, and with the naming of the different parts. These examples make clear that the dwelling can be a copy of the respective cosmology.

b) The house also forms a separation between inner and outer world, between the safe world of the inside and the dangerous one on the outside. Accordingly, in many cultures, the house must be protected from evil influences, which sometimes begins as early as a construction sacrifice. In earlier cultures, the victim could be a human being, especially in the building of a city or a palace. In the Hebrew Bible, this is alluded to in Jos 6:26 and 1 Kings 16:34, in reference to the founding of Jericho. More usually, animals are sacrificed. Frequently, sacrifices are also found in a context of moving into a new house. For example, with some Siberian cultures, dogs are sacrificed, one for each corner of the house. Until recently, rites for the dedication of a house were still in use in Western Europe as well. For instance, in Catholic regions, a priest would bless a new house by sprinkling it with holy water. Although this practice is almost never done today, it is still logical and conceivable, since the fact remains that the erection of a new sphere of intimacy is seen psychologically as a kind of act of creation, with a sacred character. The openings of the house must be protected against unfamiliar powers—altogether especially, the door; hence the usage according to which a horseshoe is nailed over a door for 'good luck.' A crueler custom consisted of nailing a living owl to the peak of a farmhouse roof in order to repulse the Evil One. Even today, many cultures have statues of gods or house spirits watching at the door. These sometimes receive sacrifices.

bedrooms, each with four or five beds. To maintain separation by gender, separate entrances, or at least two sets of outdoor stairs, were laid out, as well. The sisters and brothers of the United Society of Believers in Christ's Second Coming met only at house assemblies and at table. The principle of the separate stairways turned out to be disadvantageous for the Shakers: only the community of Sabbathday Lake, Maine, survives, with a handful of members. (Kerstin Holzapfel)

Worship at Home

c) Sacred places are frequently to be found in the home itself. With the Greeks, Romans, and according to the Indian Vedas, the hearth or fireplace was sacred, and not only the architectural, but the cultic center of the house as well. The Greek word for hearth, hestia (taken further in the Latin vesta), is also the name of the goddess of the hearth. The high importance ascribed to the hearth in Greece is shown by its name mesomphalos, 'central navel.' As Delphi was the mesomphalos of the world, so the hearth was the mesomphalos of the home. Here again we see an analogy between cosmology and home. The stranger at the hearth must not be harmed, and the head of the house was responsible for his safety. Indeed, this constraint occurs with many peoples: no violence may be practiced within the house. The Teutons, for whom the hearth was likewise a sacred place, also practiced this custom of 'house peace.' In India, fire was, and to a certain extent is, the bond between human beings and gods. The word for fire, Agni, was also the name for the God of Fire.

Literature

Becher, Ursula A., Geschichte des modernen Lebensstils. Essen, Wohnen, Freizeit, Reisen, Munich 1990; Krafeld-Daugherty, M., Wohnen im Alten Orient. Eine Untersuchung zur Verwendung von Räumen in Altorientalischen Wohnhäusern, Münster 1994; Moore, Jr., Barrington, Privacy: Studies in Social and Cultural History, Armonk 1984; Schulte-Nordholt, H. G., The Political System of the Atoni of Timor, Den Haag 1970; von Aarburg, Hans-Peter/Oester, Kathrin (eds.), Wohnen. Zur Dialektik von Intimität und Öffentlichkeit, Freiburg 1990; von Dülmen, Richard, Kultur und Alltag in der frühen Neuzeit I: Das Haus und seine Menschen, Munich 1990.

→ Architecture (Sacred), Cosmogony/Cosmology, Family/Kinship/Genealogy, Garden/Paradise

Leo Tepper

Humanism

There are various nuances to the term 'humanism' which arise out of its diverse uses throughout European history. The Renaissance has often been characterized as the age of humanism because of its fascination with and idealization of human achievement in the literature, philosophy, and art of antiquity, which were then being re-discovered. As an ideological continuation of this trend, humanism came to signify a belief in the value and dignity of the human being and an optimistic image of humanity and its potential. In religious terms, this view often included a criticism of Christian teachings about humanity as basically sinful and in need of redemption. In education, humanism, with its conviction that human beings were destined for knowledge of the good, the true, and the beautiful, motivated the founding of higher secondary schools dedicated especially to the humanities, i.e. to academic disciplines that diverged from the traditional emphasis on Christian theology and concerned themselves with 'human' endeavors such as art, literature, and philosophy. These disciplines also gained greater attention in university education.

→ Renaissance, Text/Textual Criticism

Christoph Auffarth

Human Rights

1. The purpose of human rights is to win political and juridical acknowledgment, and to afford effective protection, in a specifically modern manner, of the dignity and liberty of every human being.

An example from recent times: In July 1998, Ruholla Rohani, a member of → Baha'i, was executed in the Islamic Republic of Iran. Over the preceding years, several members of the post-Islamic religious community of Baha'i had been sentenced to death in Iran on grounds of apostasy from Islam. It is not only members of religious minorities who currently suffer repression in Iran. That country's victims of the violation of human rights include authors critical of religion, and conservative Shiite clergy not in accord with the concrete instrumentality of Shiite Islam as the religion of the state.

The Street of the Rights of Man, of French artist Dani Karavan, standing before the Germanic National Museum in Nuremberg, is one of the most successful attempts yet undertaken to raise a monument to human rights. Twenty-seven pillars, two head-plates, and a tree each represent (in a different language) an Article of the 1948 United Nations Declaration on Human Rights. In connection with the art, the city of Nuremberg established the International Nuremberg Human Rights Prize, awarded biennially. The attempt to escape with this commitment the old encumbrance of the Third Reich (the Reichsparteitag, Imperial Party Conference), which still weighs on Nuremberg's image, was only partly successful: when Karl Diehl, former chief of the armament factory in the city of Nuremberg, was named an honorary citizen of the city in 1997, Karavan announced that he would have the Street dismantled again, unless Diehl, who had used forced labor in his company, were to see fit to publish an avowal of his complicity. (Benita von Behr)

2. From a systematic viewpoint, human rights can be understood in terms of three characteristics in association: (a) standards of rights that (b) make claim to a universal validity, inasmuch as they ought to be to the advantage of every human being, and that (c) in content, aim at the establishment of equal freedom, or equal participation in rights, in which the dignity of the human being finds acknowledgment and recognition.

a) Human rights are first of all a category of legal rights. Their claim to validity is not limited to a humanitarian appeal, but finds shape in institutions and procedures of legal rights that have been produced or developed on a national, a regional or popular, and an international level. In the modern constitutional state, human rights are established partly as basic rights available to vindication, which, as one reads in the Basic Law of the Federal Republic of Germany, bind "legislation, power of enforcement, and administration of justice" as immediately valid rights (Basic Law, art. 1, parag. 3). The most successful example of the normative formulation of human rights on a regional or popular basis is the European Convention on Human Rights, which appeared in 1950 in a framework of the European Council, and has been in force since 1953. The European Convention on Human Rights provides persons living in the region of its member states with the opportunity to demand their rights before the European Court of Justice for Human Rights in Strasbourg. Comparable (although far less efficient) regional popular human rights conventions also exist in the Americas and in Africa. The initial move toward the establishing of human rights standards in a framework of the United Nations consisted in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, of 10 December 1948. Although the first effect of the Universal Declaration is only that of a political declaration of will without immediate juridical force, its symbolic importance as the first catalogue of human rights valid worldwide is scarcely to be overestimated. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights subsequently generated a number of international human rights conventions that have force in the popular law of the participating states, including the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, and the International Covenant on Economic, Social, and Cultural Rights (both 1966). As there is as yet no international court of justice for human rights, the supervision of the conventions falls to specially erected independent commissions, whose authority of implementation, to be sure, is not sufficient.

The character of human rights as legal rights imposes limitations on their normative claim. An indication of these limitations is important precisely in terms of the inter-religious or intercultural debates, although observations continue to be expressed to the effect that human rights are portrayed as a modern, global 'humanitarian religion,' calculated to repress or even replace traditional religions or cultures. If human rights are understood as standards of political rights, such observations can be discounted. Human rights make no attempt to substantiate comprehensive claims in terms of religion or worldview. They offer no answers to existential questions regarding the meaning of human life and death; they make no pronouncements on the human being's position vis-à-vis the divine or in the cosmos as a whole. Nor do human rights contain any comprehensive ethical instructions on the correct lifestyle of individuals and communities, nor do they offer any symbols and rituals with which persons can assure one another their respect and solidarity above the level of rights. In a word: not even in terms of their normative claim, whose content is so explicitly limited, and which is concentrated at the level of law, can modern thinking on human rights threaten any immediate competition to religions and Weltanschauungen, or even to forms of ethos that find themselves cast in religious terms.

Claim to Universal Validity

b) The claim to universal validity is contained in the very concept of human rights, which, unlike traditional laws, or even modern citizens' rights, do not comport any particular characteristics, but are supposed to be valid for the human being absolutely. In the Preamble to the 1948 Universal Declaration of Human Rights, we read that human rights are "a common standard of achievement for all peoples and all nations." Under the influence of the declaration of the United Nations, the German Basic Law commits itself "to inviolable and inalienable human rights as a basis of every human community, of peace and justice in the world" (Basic Law, art. 1, parag. 2).

On grounds of their claim to universal validity, human rights present a structural affinity especially to those religions that likewise see themselves as universalistic, for example, Christianity, Islam, or the Baha'i religion. From this affinity, a religiously motivated engagement in favor of human rights can result; but there can also be resistances and reservations, especially when human rights are understood as being in contradiction to or in competition with a given proclamation in terms of religion or religious ethics.

Rights of Equality

c) Human rights, as likewise follows from their very concept, are valid for every human being equally, and thus are rights of equality. Equality of human rights does not, of course, mean uniformity, but equal liberty and freedom, and not only in equal personal or private freedom, but also in cooperation of equal right in the interests of the community, especially the political community. The orientation of human rights in terms of content, therefore, can be sketched in the famous triad of the French Revolution, 'liberty, equality, fraternity' (replacing the concept of 'fraternity,' today, with that of 'solidarity' or 'participation'). Although human rights form no comprehensive ethic (let alone a comprehensive religion or worldview), but only standards in political rights, they have their normative focus in the idea of human dignity and value, which, in the words of the German Basic Law, is to be respected and protected as unassailable by the state (Basic Law, art. 1, parag. 1), and consequently is antecedent to any state supervention. The complex connection of liberty, equality, and 'fraternity' on the one hand, and the attachment of law to the dignity of the human being, finds formal expression in Article 1 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights: "All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed with reason and conscience and should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood." Since the idea of human dignity lies at the basis of various religious or philosophical traditions, the possibility of an inter-religious or intercultural 'overlapping consensus' (John Rawls) exists, permitting a religious acknowledgment and positive assessment of human rights. The fact remains, of course, that a connection of human rights with a claim to equal freedom and participation in terms of political rights represents a relatively recent achievement, and religious communities frequently receive that connection with skepticism, if not indeed with open opposition. The recognition of human rights by religious communities can only succeed, then, when accompanied by a readiness for internal criticism and, if need be, reform, together with a willingness to communicate openly with the outside world.

The Idea of Human Dignity

3. The normative idea, underlying human rights, of the inviolable value of every human being finds expression in the Judeo-Christian tradition through the concept that human beings—and indeed man and woman as such—have been created after the image of God (Gen 1:26-27). To spill human blood, then, ranks in the Hebrew Bible as a capital transgression (Gen 9:6). The special place of the human being in creation is underscored in Ps 8 ("You have made them a little lower than God," v. 5a). The redemption proclaimed in the New Testament through Jesus Christ leads to the leveling of ethnic and social differences: Paul says, "There is no longer Jew or Greek, there is no longer slave or free, there is no longer male and female; for all of you are one in Christ Jesus" (Gal 3:28). Analogous conceptualizations of the value and essential equality of all persons are also found in authors such as Marcus Aurelius, who praises the thinking mind or spirit of the human being: "And thou forgettest how strong is the kinship between man and mankind, for it is a community not of corpuscles, or seed or blood, but of intelligence. And thou forgettest this too, that each man's intelligence is God and has emanated from Him."[1] However, the idea of the dignity of the human being is not traditionally accompanied by the demand for equality of political rights, or of human rights available to vindication. Slavery itself, in the Biblical context, is not called in question as a matter of principle. When Paul sends runaway slave Onesimus back to his master, he does insist with the latter that he receive the fugitive in the Christian spirit of sibling love (Philem 16), and renounce the castigation that was then customary. But for the rest, Paul recommends that each abide in his or her own status (1 Cor 7:20-21).

Middle Ages

In the hierarchical concept of order prevailing in the Middle Ages, egalitarian human rights simply have no place. Even equality of human rights repeatedly takes a back seat to a hierarchy of dignitates that corresponded to the ladder of social status. Not even the Magna Carta of 1215, or similar medieval treaties of governance, can be regarded as forerunners of modern catalogues of human rights. True, the Magna Carta shares with modern human rights its demand for a legal taming of political governance; however, such limitation is meant as an instrument for the security of traditional privileges, and thus stands in conceptual contradiction to the human-rights idea of equality.

Reformation

Even the Reformation provides no direct lane to human rights. The Reformers' championed freedom of belief has its theological meaning as the verso and consequence of the Evangelical theology of grace, and involves no program of political rights for the establishment of a universal freedom of religion. Analogously, the priesthood of all believers, which indeed marks a theological breakthrough with respect to medieval conceptualizations of hierarchy, is not however accompanied directly by demands for emancipation in terms of political rights. Demands for political liberty and equality are first heard only with certain radical offshoots of the Reformation, whom Ernst Troeltsch has defined as 'stepchildren of the Reformation,' including the 'sects' and free-church movements. In the mid-seventeenth century, in the radical Protestant wing of the troops led by Oliver Cromwell in the English Civil War, demands arose for the first time for freedom of belief, freedom of the press, and universal men's suffrage—all, it is true, initially without effect.

Enlightenment

Toward the end of the seventeenth century, John Locke formulated his liberal theory of the state, marked by both Christian and Enlightenment natural-law motifs, which reduced the legitimacy of state government to a dependence on respect for inalienable rights—life, liberty, and property; in case of massive violation of these basic rights, Locke held, violent opposition is legitimate. A scant one hundred years later, Locke's theory of the state, which had been aimed principally against instances of the arrogance of sovereignty by the royal executive, was the object of appeal by American settlers in their struggle against the tutelage of the London parliament. After an appeal to the English common law tradition became impossible with the turn to the struggle for independence, the Americans, in the spirit of Locke's version of the law of nature, argued that "all human beings are created equal; that they have been endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that to these belong life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that, for the assurance of these rights, governments have been established, that derive their rightful power from the consent of the governed." Perhaps even more important than these famous lines from the Declaration of Independence of 4 July 1776 are the catalogues of rights that, beginning with the Virginia Bill of Rights (of 12 June 1776) were published on the state level, and to an extent took immediate legal effect. In the State of Massachusetts, the juridical demand for his basic rights by a slave in the year 1783 led to the abolition of slavery (which was impossible on the national level before the end of the American Civil War in 1865).

United States

Nineteenth Century

American experiments with human rights also play a role in the development of the French Declaration of Human and Civil Rights of 26 August 1789. Supported in its initial phase by broad sectors of the Catholic clergy, the French Revolution very quickly came into confrontation with the Catholic Church on the level of a cultural struggle. This had effects on a European (not only Catholic) church reception of human rights, in the presence of a nineteenth-century association of these latter with antichurch, if not indeed antireligious, radicalism, and of their consequent collision with skepticism and resistance. Official Catholic repudiation culminated in the Syllabus Errorum of Pope Pius IX in 1864, in which the freedom of religion and opinion was determinedly rejected. It is deserving of note that it was the labor movement's demand for social rights that made possible the gradual defeat of a Catholic repudiation of human rights, a defeat first acknowledged by the social encyclicals of Leo XIII at the end of the nineteenth century (Rerum Novarum, 1891).

Twentieth Century

Worldwide experiences of injustice in the twentieth century—world wars, state totalitarianism, ethnic murder at the hands of the National Socialists—led after the Second World War to the reception of human rights into international law, symbolized particularly in the 1948 Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Accompanying the same, a new appraisal of human rights appeared among the Christian churches. The founding assembly of the Ecumenical Council of Churches in Amsterdam in 1948 came out in favor of a 'responsible society,' in which viewpoints marked by a consideration of human rights were to have key importance. In this same direction, the World Union of Lutheran and Reformed churches in the 1970s issued a number of declarations on human rights. Official recognition of human rights and religious freedom by the Catholic Church came with the encyclical Pacem in Terris (1963), and especially with the declaration Dignitatis Humanae (1965) of the Second Vatican Council.

A look back on the historical development of human rights in Europe leads to two systematic insights that are also important for the interreligious or intercultural dialogue. Human rights do not belong self-evidently to the heritage of the Christian religion: they have arisen in the breakdowns of modernity, and this—lest one succumb to a unilateral ideology of progress—partly as an answer to specific injustices in modern society. Secondly, however, human rights demonstrate an inner affinity for Christianity's human claim; a defense of the underlying idea of the defense of human rights, that of the inviolable dignity of the human being, has always been a key concern of the Christian churches. A Christian commitment to human rights is therefore possible and meaningful, provided that it does not lead to an exclusivistic appeal to a religious or cultural heritage, such as an appropriation of human rights in a canon of exclusively Christian values.

Extra-Occidental Traditions

4. An acknowledgment of the dignity of the person is not an exclusively Judeo-Christian insight. It enjoys a purchase in various religions or cultures—for example in the Confucian ideal of humanity (ren), in the Buddhist positive appraisal of the human being's capacity for self-transcendence, or in the Qur'anic distinction of the human being as God's vicar and steward (khalifa) on earth. A Project on Religion and Human Rights executed in America comes to the conclusion that "there are elements in practically all religious traditions that promote peace, tolerance, freedom of conscience, dignity, and equality of persons, along with social justice."[2] Approaches to the acknowledgment of a spiritual home for human rights in non-Western religions and cultures are therefore definitely at hand. Nevertheless, it is to be conceded that the association of human dignity with political rights of equality in freedom and participation represents a specifically modern achievement; nor, in the West as in extra-occidental religions and cultures, can this association become effective without openness to criticism and reform.

Islam

A brief look at the intra-Islamic human rights debate, in which a multiplicity of views are currently represented, will be instructive. Positions range from a unilateral Islamization of human rights, to more or less explicit demands for reform, to positive theological appraisals of a secular thinking vis-à-vis human rights in the spirit of Islamic monotheism. In the center of most Islamic positions is an acknowledgment of the dignity of human beings. Their privileged place as God's stewards on earth (sura 2:30) is underscored in the Qur'an through the notion that the angels themselves are to fall down before Adam at God's behest (2:34). Elsewhere we read that God has honored the 'children of Adam' (17:70). Sura 2:256 is frequently cited: "There is no compulsion in religion." True, it is problematic when the conclusion is drawn from these and other Qur'anic loci that there is a specifically Qur'anic conception of human rights, as not infrequently occurs. In this fashion, the normative peculiarity of modern human rights—as standards for the guarantee of political rights of equal liberty and participation, in a universalistic perspective—threatens to disappear from view. And in fact, meanwhile, there are now several (enacted, if not legally binding) Islamic declarations on human rights, in which—in unmistakable contradiction with the human rights norms of the United Nations—the Islamic Sharia functions as a basis of human rights. The most familiar examples up until now are the Universal Islamic Declaration of Human Rights of the Islamic Council for Europe of 1981, and the Declaration of Human Rights in Islam of 1990, the latter accepted by the foreign ministers of the Organization of the Islamic Conference in 1990 in Cairo. Through the association of elements of human rights with those of Islamic rights, the critical claim of human rights is largely lost. Indeed, we read in Article 24 of the Cairo Declaration: "All rights and liberties cited in this Declaration are subordinate to the Islamic Sharia." The consequences of this approach are particularly clear in the areas of religious freedom and the gender relationship, in which traditional privileges take precedence over equal human rights. Unlike conservative attempts to harmonize human rights and the Sharia, liberal Muslims like Mohamed Talbi, Said al-Ashmawi, Abdullahi An-Na'im, or Nasr Hamid Abu Zaid call for a critical reevaluation of the Sharia, and for a consideration of modern viewpoints on human rights. Recommendations for reform occasionally reach a (partial or full) de-juridicizing of the Sharia, which word is said to mean not actually 'law' or 'right,' but 'path' or 'guideline.' The Sharia should therefore be understood not primarily as a right coercible by the state, but as an ethical/spiritual orientation, whose leading principles—human dignity, liberty of conscience, solidarity—are to be regarded as compatible with the modern call for human rights. In the conviction of female Islamic women's rights lawyers like Riffat Hassan, strict Islamic monotheism dictates the overthrow of religiously grounded claims of tutelage, and is the foundation of the struggle for universal equal rights. One-sided rule of human beings by human beings is illegitimate in Islam, say these thinkers, and, now cashiered religiously, becomes out-and-out an act of blasphemy.[3] Some Muslim intellectuals use similar arguments for recognition of secular law as well. Any form of theocratic government is an instrumentalization of the divine Name, and is to be battled as blasphemy, wrote Egyptian Ali Abd-ar-Raziq as early as 1925.[4]

The intra-Islamic debate on human rights demonstrates that thinking on human rights is also developing its effects in 'extra-occidental' religions or cultures, and not only as the reception of Western approaches, but also as a reevaluation of the actual sources of the traditions of these religions or cultures. If it is possible for human beings of distinct religious orientations to re-cognize, so to speak, humane motifs of their own tradition in modern human rights, then this process can foster the development of a universal consciousness of human rights—presuming, of course, that unilateral religious or cultural 'heritage claims' to the idea of human rights are definitively sidelined.

Human Rights and Religion

5. Human rights are more than the common denominator of all basic values represented in the various religions or cultures. They validate a universal, and yet independently modern, claim to liberty and equality that can instead conflict with authoritarian elements in the religious traditions. Thus, an acknowledgment of human rights on the part of religious communities presupposes a readiness for self-criticism and reform. Only in the presence of a such an attitude can the humane claim of human rights—concentrated in a recognition of the inviolable dignity of each human being—be perceived as an opportunity for a (new) opening up of a potential for the meaning of freedom in the religious traditions, and at the same time for religious belief as a motive for engagement in human rights. An emphasis on the quality of human rights as something modern, moreover, does not mean the propagation of an ideology of progress at the hands of a mission civilisatrice at the cost of religious tradition and diversity. Not only is the claim of human rights a priori limited in its content by target—the area of political rights. More importantly, human rights take their reference from concrete experiences of their denial in acts of injustice, and this especially in the universal experiences of injustice of the twentieth century, addressed by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights as 'barbarous acts.' It is in light of the sacrifice of human rights in terms of its violations, that commitment to human rights finds its determination and its obligation. And it is in light of that sacrifice that claims on a cultural or religious legacy of the idea of human rights are just as insolvent as the old overstatement of the civilizing mission of the age of modernity.

1. Aurelius, Marcus Aurelius, The Communings with Himself. Revised Text and Translation into English by C. R. Haines, Cambridge 1987, 335.
2. Kelsay/Twiss 1994, 116.
3. Hassan, Riffat, "On Human Rights and the Qur'anic Perspective," in: Swidler 1982, 51-65.
4. Abd-ar-Raziq, Ali, "L'Islam et les bases du pouvoir," in two parts, in: Revue des Études Islamiques 7 (1933), 353-91; 8 (1934), 163-222.

Literature

An-Na'im, Abdullahi Ahmed, Toward an Islamic Reformation: Civil Liberties, Human Rights, and International Law, New York 1990; Bayefsky, Anne F., The UN Human Rights Treaty System: Universality at the Crossroads, The Hague 2001; Berg, Manfred/Geyer, Martin H. (eds.), Two Cultures of Rights: The Quest for Inclusion and Participation in Modern America and Germany, Cambridge 2002; Berting, Jan (ed.), Human Rights in a Pluralist World: Individuals and Collectivities, Westport 1990; Bielefeldt, Heiner, "'Western' versus 'Islamic' Human Rights Conceptions: A Critique of Cultural Essentialism in the Discussion on Human Rights," in: Political Theory 28 (2000), 90-121; Brems, Eva, Human Rights: Universality and Diversity, The Hague 2001; Donelly, Jack, International Human Rights, Boulder [2]1998; Edge, Peter/Harvey, Graham (eds.), Law and Religion in Contemporary Society: Communities, Individualism, and the State, Aldershot 2000; Goodman, Lenn E., Judaism, Human Rights, and Human Values, New York 1998; Hill, Mark (ed.), Religious Liberty and Human Rights, Cardiff 2002; Kelsey, John/Twiss, Summer B. (eds.), Religion and Human Rights, New York 1994; Laqueur, Walter/Rubin, Barry (eds.), The Human Rights Reader, New York [4]1996; Sajó, András (ed.), Human Rights with Modesty: The Problem of Universalism, Leiden 2004; Stone, Richard, Textbook on Civil Liberties and Human Rights, Oxford [4]2002; Swidler, Arlene (ed.), Human Rights in Religious Traditions, New York 1982; Twiss, Summer B./Kelsay, John, Religion and International Human Rights, Boulder 1998.

→ Bioethics, Constitution, Enlightenment, Ethics/Morals, Freedom of Religion, Law

Heiner Bielefeldt

Human Sacrifice

1. Under 'human sacrifice' is understood the killing of a human being—or the use of human blood, flesh, bones—as a cultic offering or → sacrifice, that is, a sacrifice for ritual purposes. The concept of human sacrifice merely denotes the material of the sacrifice more exactly: the intent and external form of sacrificial procedures can be very different. Common to them is the meaning of the renunciation or alienation of the sacrificial material. As a ritual act, (human) sacrifice is usually part of a larger ritual complex, underlain by the most diverse conceptualizations and purposes, the latter imbedded, in turn, in culturally varying worldviews and systems of belief. A unitary theory of sacrifice has been unavailable until now; thus, the attempt to classify human sacrifice takes its orientation in the varying behavior in, and materials of, the sacrifice, as in sacrifices of immersion or drowning, of imprisonment in construction, of burnt offerings, bloody and unbloody sacrifices, partial sacrifices and destruction sacrifices. On the other hand, typological divisions emphasize the intentions of those offering the sacrifices, in categories such as impetratory sacrifice, thanksgiving sacrifice, sacrifice of atonement.

The Sources

2. Archaeological testimonials can provide evidence or indications of human sacrifice; however, a site thought to be that of a construction sacrifice could instead be a domestic burial, or a find interpreted as human sacrifice could be only the remains of a slaying. What is decisive are the contexts of the find that show a sacrificial procedure. Skull worship as the trophy cult of the Munduruku or the shrunken heads of Jivaro should be distinguished from human sacrifices. Likewise, there need be no human sacrifice involved when human skulls or bones are used for the production of cultic objects, as with skull mugs or rattles in tantric Buddhism.

Nor are pictorial representations unquestionable. Are they a symbolization of actions of the gods, or the presentation of a real slaying of a human being? Are they simply a pictorial testimonial of an occurrence in war, or do they represent the ceremonial sacrifice of a human being?

Functions—Consecutive Death

3. Human sacrifices as consecutive sacrifices that follow the death of someone else are usually thanksgiving and satisfaction sacrifices for ancestors, as we find, for example, in the Bronze Age Chinese Shang dynasty. They are performed as widow sacrifices, or are collective burials. Functionaries, wives, or servants of rulers were slain, often together with horses and household utensils, and buried in the grave of their departed lord. The idea behind this usage was the belief in survival in the → beyond, for which the dead should receive the same amenities as they have had in their lifetime.

Fertility Rites

The performance of human sacrifices, in order to make life possible, regenerate the fruitfulness of the earth—birth in death, then—is the key theme of fertility rites. The Phoenicians sacrificed to Baal—the proverbial 'Moloch' (from the Semitic Malk, 'king'; cf. Hebr. melekh)—the firstborn of families of the upper class, and buried them in their own burial places (tophet), a custom adopted by the Carthaginians. The Aztecs sacrificed a female slave to maize goddess Cinteotl; until mid-nineteenth century, the Khond in Southern India sacrificed slaves to earth goddess Tari Pennu, tore the sacrifices apart, and used the pieces of flesh to 'fertilize' the fields.

Aztecs and Incas

4. It is disputed whether the Aztecs practiced institutionalized human sacrifice, consuming the victim's flesh (→ Cannibalism), as shown in their own picture writing and as suggested both in archaeological finds and the testimony of the Conquistadors. Textual critics hold these written testimonials to be unreliable (P. Hassler). The cultural materialistic grounding of the practice in a protein deficiency (M. Harris, M. Harner) is likewise in question. In a comparative cultural analysis of the Aztecs and Incas, Thomas Barthel showed the political and socioeconomic context of the human sacrifices that were offered: while the Incas sacrificed only a small number of children as tribute from the provinces to the mountain deities in unbloody sacrifices (of which the most cruel involved victims, usually children, drugged and exposed, and left to lie at the snow line and freeze to death), the victims of the Aztec sacrifices were usually adult prisoners of war and slaves. One system of gratification that depended on prisoners of war, sacrificed on the part of professional warriors, led to the continual expansion of military campaigns, in which the defeated became the victims of the sacrificial ceremonies. In sharp competition to the warriors stood the less highly respected merchants, whose sacrificial victims, slaves, represented a lower order of human sacrifice. The dynamics of the competition for prestige on the part of these two groups had the effect of 'automatically' swelling the number of human sacrifices. The mythic foundation of these sacrifices is in the Aztec → cosmogony, which centered around a concern for the revitalization of the sun: that heavenly body was to be 'nourished' by the blood and hearts of sacrificial victims.

Human Sacrifice in Saga and Myth

5. Human sacrifice is to be found in saga and myth as well. Greek mythology relates the Athenian sacrifice of young men and women as tribute to the Cretan King Minos (myth of the Minotaur, which devoured these young persons); Agamemnon's sacrifice, or intended sacrifice, of his daughter Iphigenia in Aulis for the appeasement of Artemis; and the mad frenzy of Hercules, causing him to sacrifice his wife and children as his enemies.

The myth of the Indonesian Wemale recounts of moon maiden Rabie Hainuwele that she was killed and hacked to pieces, and that the parts of her corpse were buried: from her remains have sprung the nut plants from which human beings take their nourishment. German cultural morphology (especially A. E. Jensen) used this myth to formulate a broad worldview centered around the currently dominant nut plant among farming societies: in rite, the human being is conceived as replicating a primordial event, and thereby renewing it, while the prevailing 'Dema deity' becomes the life-giver through her death. Human beings have embodied this divinity in ritual, and her death in human sacrifice is the condition for the growth of nut plants. However, this long-influential interpretation continues to be ascribed value today first and foremost for its historical interest.

Human Sacrifice as Self-Offering

6. One dimension of meaning in the concept of (human) sacrifice is that of passive suffering (Lat., victima). Christianity holds the prototypal self-sacrifice (sacrifice of atonement) of Jesus. It was preceded by the Israelitic transformation of the human sacrifice into an animal sacrifice (vicarious sacrifice); the Hebrew Bible reports that Abraham sacrificed a ram instead of his son Isaac (Gen 22). Although it was precisely Christianity that had spiritualized the bloody sacrifice in the ritual of the Last supper, early Christians had to face the accusation that they sacrificed actual human beings. They were reproached with using the blood of non-Christian children in their divine service—an accusation that, some time later, would be turned against the Jews, in the Christian legend of Jewish ritual murder (→ Anti-Semitism).

Human self-offering can also be expected as an ethical requirement demanded by the community. An extreme exaggeration of this concept was the object of political instrumentalization in the National Socialist sacrificial mythology, which called for a selfless commitment to the Fatherland to the point of self-sacrifice on the battlefield. This self-sacrifice made war heroes of the fallen (→ Hero/Heroism; National Socialism).

The reflections of H. M. Gutman and K.-P. Jörns interpret the 'traffic sacrifice' as the return of the cultic sacrifice in daily life, a phenomenon to be regarded as the human sacrifice of modern society. Archaic relations among human beings are said to resurface when the driver, as hunter, brings the victim down to death. In atonement, at the moment of any collision, drivers offer their lives in sacrificial reparation.

Literature

Barthel, Thomas, "Aspekte der rituellen Tötung in Altamerika," in: von Stietencron, Heinrich (ed.), Angst und Gewalt. Ihre Präsenz und ihre Bewältigung in den Religionen, Düsseldorf 1979, 157-170; Benson, Elizabeth P./Cook, Anita G. (eds.), Ritual Sacrifice in Ancient Peru, Austin 2001; Carrasco, Davíd, City of Sacrifice: The Aztec Empire and the Role of Violence in Civilization, Boston 1999; Davies, Nigel, Human Sacrifice: In History and Today, London 1981; Green, Alberto R. W., The Role of Human Sacrifice in the Ancient Near East, Missoula 1975; Green, Miranda Aldhouse, Dying for the Gods: Human Sacrifice in Iron Age and Roman Europe, Stroud 2001; Gutmann, Hans-Martin, Die tödlichen Spiele der Erwachsenen. Moderne Opfermythen in Religion, Politik und Kultur, Freiburg 1995; Harner, Michael, "The Ecological Basis for Aztec Sacrifice," in: American Ethnologist 4 (1977), 117-135; Harris, Marvin, Cannibals and Kings: The Origins of Cultures, New York 1977; Hassler, Peter, Menschenopfer bei den Azteken? Eine quellen- und ideologiekritische Studie, Bern etc. 1992; Jörns, Klaus-Peter, Krieg auf unseren Straßen. Die Menschenopfer der automobilen Gesellschaft, Gütersloh 1992; Mizruchi, Susan L., The Science of Sacrifice: American Literature and Modern Social Theory, Princeton 1998; Tierney, Patrick, The Highest Altar: The Story of Human Sacrifice, New York 1989.

→ Cannibalism, Sacrifice, Violence

Sabine Hensel

Icon

Icons (Greek, eíkon, 'image') are the sacred images of the Eastern Churches. Since the Byzantine image controversy (which began around 726 under Emperor Leo III and lasted, through various reversals, until 843 under Empress Theodora), the icon has stood at the center of Eastern Christian theological and artistic effort. The laborious defeat of currents of opposition to and even destruction of images ('iconoclasm') had the consequence that the creation of icons in the Eastern church was subjected to strict regulations; these still prevail today, and have prevented a free religious artistic development like that of Western Europe. In order to be considered an icon, an image must (1) "be understood as an image intended for a context of worship, and have the character of the sacred," (2) "reflect the recognized dogma of the Eastern Church," (3) "correspond to the canon of iconography represented in the Eastern Church," and (4) "be produced according to defined rules and consecrated according to a certain rite" (H. Fischer). This system of control is supplemented by a system of nomenclature: each type of image has a proper name. There are some eight to nine thousand types of images, of which seven to eight thousand are of pictures of the saints and four hundred are various styles of presentation of the Mother of God. Within each image type, as well, each figure must be verbally inscribed on grounds of theological determinability; images not inscribed are liturgically invalid, and thus not icons.

On the one side, icons have a liturgical function, and in Orthodoxy and the other Eastern Churches have their place especially on the iconostasis, an 'image wall,' which divides the altar space from the nave of the church. At the same time, they play an important role in everyday religion: in the houses of Eastern Christian believers, there is always an icon corner. Guests greet this first, before turning toward the hosts. Each of the faithful has a personal icon, that of the patron saint whose name she or he has received at baptism. In many regions of Eastern Europe, curtains are even hung before the icon, making it possible to conceal the image when there is 'something it should not see.'

Greek Orthodox monks preparing icons. Their work is strictly governed by rules, which are set down in particular painting manuals (in Gk., hermeneía, items for [enabling] interpretation'). It begins with the creation of a background, on cloth that has been glued onto (usually) a wooden tablet. Then comes the sketch, in which outlines and divisions are traced according to a model or pattern. Before the actual painting is done, the layers of gold are imposed—in this case, as provided in the rule, reserved for background, auras (here, halos), and parts of the garment of the Christ. The colors are applied 'from shadow to light'—first the darkest (readily visible in the left background), then the brighter, as appropriate for the elements of the picture. After the 'chrysography' (application of gold embellishment), and drying (lasting perhaps a year), the icon receives its protective varnish, the secret of each school. Formerly, or indeed as shown here, during the act of painting, the theologically indispensable inscription is applied. The motif in the foreground shows Mary, in an attitude of prayer (orant); on her lap, Christ, painted after the 'Emmanuel' (Isa 7:14) style of image, the preexistent logos: as an 'elderly child' (H. Fischer), beardless, with a high forehead. (Hubert Mohr)

Literature

Belting, Hans, Likeness and Presence: A History of the Image before the Era of Art, Chicago 1994; Parry, Keneth, Depicting the Word: Byzantine Iconophile Thought of the Eighth and Ninth Centuries, Leiden 1996; Tarasov, Oleg, Icon and Devotion: Sacred Spaces in Imperial Russia, London 2002.

→ Art/Aesthetics, Image/Iconoclasm, Materiality

Hubert Mohr

Identity

The concept of identity derives from the philosophical tradition, in which it represents most especially a logical predicate. Thus, a subject can be attributed the predicate of identity when, in various perspectives and states of affairs, it can be identified always as the same subject. Two subjects (x and y) are identical, then, in virtue of the principle of (non)contradiction, when all qualities of x also pertain to y ($x = y$). In today's linguistic usage, identity has mainly become a concept of psychology and the social sciences: there it is used principally in the sense of a 'self-image,' 'character,' or 'personality constitution,' or else of a 'balance between the internal and the external,' through processes of identification among individuals and groups. Psychologically, identification denotes an assimilation of the self-image and object images, in which the objects with which one 'identifies' can be persons, groups, ideas, symbols, myths, representatives, or institutions (churches, and so on). The identification process functions reciprocally, consisting of an active component ('identify oneself with . . .') and a passive one ('be identified by'). When the result of this process is seen as an essential part, or even the core, of the ego, the impression can arise of a collectively shared ego, experienced in a 'we-feeling.' But inasmuch as individuals can never, even in Saint Peter's Square in Rome, become really 'identical' with one another, identity is merely a goal-fiction of assimilation. The individual lives in and for this fiction: it can entail a condition of feeling-determined consciousness, in which differences from other persons are screened out in favor of the fantasy of identification. The difference is transferred to the other individuals and collectivities (nations, strangers, persons of other beliefs, 'heathen'), thereby conferring on them the function of a negative reflection.

In addition, collective identity has become a modern confessional formula, through which individuals profess membership in a collectivity—an ethnic group, a nation, or regional, cultural, or religious communities. Precisely in this perspective, identity has become a central, problematic symbol of → political religion. Here the phenomenon is all the more powerful to the extent that the collective identity is projected not only upon the living, but also upon the dead (→ heroes, soldiers, → martyrs) and unborn of the collectivity that is visualized as 'identical.' The hardening of myths of identity is not only a questionable manner of 'attaching' a religious wish or desire, but can become a serious hindrance to changes in the composition and order of a collectivity. To the extent that the collectivity bestowing the identity in question is a substitute for or complement of the shaken ground of the 'individual soul,' a potential can be created that calls for the defense of the supposed substance of the collective identity ('soul of the collectivity') by every means, against 'threats,' both within and from without.

Literature

De Levita, David J., The Concept of Identity, Paris 1965; Erikson, Erik H., Identity, Youth and Crisis, New York 1968; Hermans, Hubert J. M./Kempen, Harry J. G., The Dialogical Self: Meaning as Movement, San Diego 1993; McAdams, Dan P., The Stories We Live By: Personal Myths and the Making of the Self, New York 1993; Rae, Heather, State Identities and the Homogenisation of Peoples, Cambridge 2002.

→ Ancestors, Biography/Autobiography, Collective Representations, Fantasy, Feelings/Emotions, Idol, Minorities, Monument/Memorial Places, Origin, Psyche, Psychoanalysis, Time

Peter Berghoff

Ideology

In the seventeenth century, in the wake of the → Enlightenment, and from the wish for a knowledge of reality delivered from various phantoms and illusions, Francis Bacon drafted his doctrine of idols (Lat., idolum, 'specter,' 'idol'; from Gk., eídolon, 'image'; → Idol), a classification of avoidable prejudices. 'Ideologue' (Fr., idéologue, from Lat., idea, '[ideal] image') was used in the latter half of the eighteenth century to indicate French Enlightenment thinkers like A. L. C. Destutt de Tracy (1754–1836) and E. B. de Condillac (1714–1780), who, in hope of attaining to an undeceived insight into, not least of all, the societal origins of religion, were working toward a purely sensory theory of knowledge. It was Napoleon Bonaparte who, appraising their teaching as corrupting of tradition and subversive, bestowed on the expression 'ideologue' the pejorative connotation that it has retained down to our own day. With Karl Marx, the reproach of ideology became a central topos of his criticism of bourgeois consciousness and its subordinate phenomenon, religion (as 'opium of the people'). The undertaking of a criticism of ideology (especially with Friedrich → Nietzsche, in Marxist tradition, and in the Frankfurt school), finally, regards every thought: it should be tested against a potentially one-sided social standpoint, a conditioning by interests, or a dislodged historical connection. It is justifiable to question whether the designation 'ideology' is not first and foremost applied with a view to the rejection of theories and positions that fail to correspond to one's own views.

→ Criticism of Religion, Meaning/Signification, Political Religion

Georg Hartmann

Idol

The meaning of the Greek word eídolon is 'image,' 'shadow,' or 'phantom,' or also, in a narrow sense, 'sacred image.' In Greco-Latin ecclesiastical language, the concept attaches to the 'image of the gods of the pagans,' a 'false god.' In this sense, it denotes polemically an object or person shown an extravagant, immoderate reverence, or 'deified.' In a neutral sense, 'idol' can also designate the material picture of a deity. In this meaning, it plays an eminent role in all cultures, whether as canonized iconography, as spiritualized → fetish, or as a concrete physical image and representation. The idol is therefore also always an attempt to render the transcendent content of belief, including myths, rites and rituals, an object of experience: the divinity is condensed in the (idealized) picture, and the human being reverences or venerates the picture. Precisely for this reason, the idol has always been regarded as a potential threat to religions; after all, the idol humanizes religion. The pictures of the gods render the latter like unto human beings—and not the other way around, as many religions would like to require. Several religions therefore proscribe images (for example, Islam). On the other hand, idolatry is also possible for a purposeful and directed reinforcement of religious relations (e.g., veneration of images of the saints, popular piety).

This contradiction is the nutritive source of the ambivalent value of the idol today. On the one side, an idol concretizes the idealized projection of the venerable object: it becomes a copy of individual or collective yearnings and ideals. The process is observable in examples such as the veneration of 'Lady Di,' euphoric partisanship with "Jesus Christ Superstar" or 'Che Guevara,' or phenomena of collective veneration of a 'soccer star god' by fans in a stadium. On the other hand, the idol itself gains a concrete (practical) meaning, inasmuch as it is 'emancipated' from its devotees. The idol constitutes norms of relationship, and of fashionable trends, whose acknowledgment permits the original devotees to become a uniform social group.

Literature

Belting, Hans, Likeness and Presence: History of the Image before the Era of Art, Chicago 1997; Camille, Michael, The Gothic Idol: Ideology and Image-Making in Medieval Art, Cambridge 1989; Speck, Paul, Ich bin's nicht. Kaiser Konstantin ist es gewesen. Die Legenden vom Einfluß des Teufels, des Juden und des Moslems auf den Ikonoklasmus, Bonn 1990; Stock, Alex, Keine Kunst. Aspekte der Bildtheologie, Paderborn 1996.

→ Cult, Image/Iconoclasm, Veneration of Persons/Personality Cult

Elke Sophie Frohn and H.-Georg Lützenkirchen

Illness / Health

Illness as a Social Construct

1. 'Illness' denotes actual or perceived disturbances of the body, mind, or soul, accompanied by hardship, pain, alterations of body or mind, and a transformed perception of self and the environment. Illness and health are not, however, only bodily and mental facts; they are also social constructs. Which bodily or mental alterations are interpreted as illness, the origins of illness, and how illness is to be healed, all depend on the conceptions of a given society and historical era. Healing from any evil (bad harvest, misfortune), including illness, is a central concern among the religions; thus, a religious worldview plays an important role in interpreting and dealing with illness.

Explanatory Models for Illness

2. Along with heart disease and AIDS, cancer is one of the most feared diseases of the modern age, as modern medicine long had no appropriate treatment for it. At the end of the 1970s, Mars, a book by a terminal cancer patient from Switzerland, attracted worldwide attention. The author, Fritz Zorn, attributes the onset of his cancer to psychic disturbances resulting from his childhood and education, with their hostility toward life, body, and sexuality. He deems the spark for his raging cancer cells to have been his suppressed emotions, wishes, and desires, and thus he counters the materialistically organic explanations and therapies of modern medicine. Zorn's view had been stimulated and facilitated by the psychoanalytic and psychosomatic models that had appeared in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, which ascribe an important role in disease manifestations to the influence of mind on body.

One may see from this example how social notions mark views on the causes and treatment of disease. It is also an example of the current popular trend in Western societies to include the psyche in the matter of the cause and treatment of illness more readily than does modern medicine, with its franker orientation toward the diseases of individual organs. In the wake of this reorientation, religious and occult interpretations of sickness likewise acquire additional importance. Many persons, mistrusting the practices of school medicine, turn to spiritual healing, East Asian methods of healing, and other alternative methods of cure, all frequently underlain by a religious worldview.

In the past, as well as in non-industrialized societies, one can find approaches to illness in terms of emotional or mental disturbances. Still, most of the prevailing conceptions ascribe illness to bodily causes, or else to disturbances that in today's view would be designated as social or religious. Very roughly, we may range the models of explanation for disease as materialistic, biological, religious, and worldview-oriented. Dietetic prescriptions (→ Eating/Nourishment), herbal medicine, and medicine based on the natural sciences, are grounded on materialistic biological suppositions: they can also be grounded in religion. The interpretations of illness as 'divine chastisement,' or as the consequence of negative influences on the part of the spirits of ancestors, for instance, are proper to religious models for illness. These notions are frequently designated 'magical' (→ Magic), 'supernatural,' 'non-empirical,' or 'irrational.' These concepts are often negatively charged, however, and hazy: along with the conceptions that they designate—logically inserted into experience, in its respective contexts—they are based on

Legend has it that it was in the mountain forest of Sorte (Venezuela) that goddess Maria Lionza once overcame an anaconda in combat. Now a girl suffering from muscular atrophy, accompanied by her parents, meets with a medium there for a healing ceremony. The new Maria Lionza cult, a movement very popular in Venezuela, began during the time between the two World Wars. The Marialionzistas, who regard themselves as Catholics, believe in a Christian God as director of the world; and between him and human beings come mediating spirits, along with their leader Maria Lionza. The latter, plus Indian spirit Guaicaripuro and African spirit Negro Felipe, make up the 'three powers' (tres potencias). The spirits are impetratory partners in the problems of human beings: they counsel, assist, and heal during this ceremony of velación (Span., 'watch'; lit., 'candle ceremony'): there the spirits manifest themselves in the persons lying on the ground, who are rapt by the mediums into a state of trance and possession. At the healing ceremony, in which candles, flowers, perfumes, the music of drums, and singing are incorporated, a medium traces a diagram on the ground with talc, and the patient is laid at midpoint. Medical instruments lie ready for ritual employment. The medium in the photograph, just being possessed by a Viking spirit, will treat the child, over the course of the some one-hour-long ceremony, with a needle in the spinal area—the 'pretend operation' representing a treatment on a spiritual level. An assistant versed in religion (banco), in the foreground, watches over the progress of the ritual and the actions of the entranced medium. (Benita von Behr) a system of salvation. In modern times, worldviews as well determine how illness is dealt with, as in the Life Reform Movement (→ Ascona/Monte Verità), or in the → New Age.

Early Traditions

3. a) Today, extant mummies, papyri, and mural inscriptions supply us with information on the Egyptian conceptualizations of illness. Egyptian medical therapy knew the application of medicines and herbs for the treatment of symptoms. However, illness and healing were also understood as god-given phenomena. Among the divinities invoked in therapeutic interests were Re, sun god and creator, and Thot, god of knowledge, to the latter of whom were attributed special powers for the healing of injured eyes. In the view of ancient Babylonians as well, somatic and religious explanations for illness existed in tandem.

On the foundation of ancient Vedic medicine, there developed in India, from about 500 BCE to 500 CE, a conceptual structure known as ayurveda, 'knowledge of long life.' According to Ayurveda, illness resulted from an imbalance of air, gall, and phlegm; equilibrium could be restored with the help of medicines prepared from herbs, minerals, and earths. The → yoga tradition explains illness as the correlate of a deficiency in the balance of the mind, or spirit, and recommends mental concentration and purification for the acquisition or receipt of this balance. Chinese concepts propose illness as one of the disturbances of the relationship between human being and cosmic order, or as a disturbance of the flow of the energy of life, ki. Here is the basis, for one, of fundamental determinations for the maintenance of health in terms of one's being and behavior. For another, comprehensive doctrines are developed on movement, nutrition, and breathing for the prevention and healing of disease.

The Greek physician Hippocrates (460–375 BCE) developed the humoral pathology (teaching on fluids). He did not base illness on religious factors, but grounded his explanations and therapies on observation. Health is the consequence of an equilibrium of the bodily fluids, a balance to be attained or maintained through surgical intervention, diet, and a moderate lifestyle. Galen of Pergamum (130–200 CE) further developed this teaching.

b) The humoral doctrine remained the central notion of the materialistic biological explanation and therapy of illness into the Europe of the modern age. However, the pronouncements of the early medieval Church Fathers, and the multiplicity of religious models of explication, show that the humoral doctrine alone cannot satisfy the need for explanation or for an alleviating therapy.

Christianity

In the Hebrew Bible, the author of disease is God, who sends it to persons as a chastisement for their sins. Healing, too, comes from God, and materializes with the help of confessions of sins, penance, and prayer. The views of the Church Fathers and of early Christianity endorse the same attitude. Body and illness, to the perceptions of Tertullian (second century), are God-given; Christian faith makes healing possible. Ambrose (d. 397) insists that sickness represents a way to spiritual purification and refinement: furthermore, illness is the pathway of Christian compassion. This perspective is the foundation of Christianity's monastic tradition of receiving and caring for the sick (→ Hildegard of Bingen). In the Middle Ages, monasteries assumed the care of the sick, and created the new establishment of the hospital (→ Charitable Organizations). Luther emphasized the doctrine of original sin, in consequence of which, he held, human beings' doom, including their disease, had come with their expulsion from paradise.

These notions and opinions satisfied Christian theoreticians' need to explain disease and defend its plausibility in the Christian worldview. However, they also availed themselves of the omnipresent, existential experience of sickness to reinforce their own Christian truth. Infectious diseases, and the great plagues of the fourteenth century, daily placed the sudden fate of death before people's eyes.

Feelings of fear, insecurity, and helplessness in the face of disease multiplied both the apparent causes of the latter, and the means undertaken for its prevention. → Pilgrimages and vows to saints were understood as appeals to divine grace to bring healing and understanding. In the medieval conception, sickness could result from fear and terror, from jealousy, from the → evil eye, from the negative influence of strangers, Jews, demons, or witches, or from the stars and planets (→ Astrology). Consultations of soothsayers, and the wearing of → amulets and medicinal stones, were supposed to defend and assist persons in the face of these threats (→ Miracles). Sexual love itself could drive a person frantic and insane. Experiences of nausea and disgust, as well as the fear of the plague, could kill.

Since Descartes (1596–1650) and the Enlightenment, the origin of disease has been sought in the causal role of organic material factors. Modern medicine concentrates on the healing of individual organs. In reaction to what seemed the one-sided direction of modern medicine, there developed, in the eighteenth and nineteenth century, the doctrines of macrobiotics, homeopathy, and water and nature healing. The end of the nineteenth century saw the confluence of the nature healing and the broad current of the Life Reform Movement, which propagated, among other things, anti-alcoholism, exercise, nudity, and vegetarianism as alternative healing concepts. The notions of this movement were soon normative: to eat or breathe according to desire or whim became inadequate, as the content of health became an obligation in view of the functioning of the body.

Non-Industrialized and Tribal Societies

4. Non-industrialized and tribal societies dispose of a rich store of knowledge concerning the symptoms and treatment of diseases with medicines of herbs or minerals. However, along with materialistic explanations for sickness, these societies know a plenitude of religious ones, as well. The Kallawaya of the Andes look on illness as the result of an imbalance in giving and taking between human beings and the gods. An expiatory sacrifice can restore this equilibrium. Disease is regarded as a disturbance of complicated rules determining relations between human beings and their environment. The sacrificial gift reinforces consciousness of this order, and offers the sufferer an opportunity to be reconciled with it. The rituals of healing the sick, by which, for example, free souls are recovered, or malicious demons are expelled (→ Possession), usually take place publicly. With the Sami of the Kola Peninsula in Northern Russia, all members of a group are expressly convoked before the shaman undertakes his journey to the beyond to heal a disease. With the African Zande (Sudan, Zaïre) as well, the public takes part in séances in which the healer determines who it is that is to be made responsible for the sorcery or witchery that is interpreted as having caused the sufferer to fall ill. Shamans and healers perform a dance or other ritual action at these public appearances, wherewith they strengthen their healing powers. Their appearance on the scene, their extraordinary clothing, their healing tools, are all for the purpose of convincing both the sufferer and the community of the medicinal effect of their actions. They may lead the sufferer into an expanded or extraordinary state of consciousness. This state may produce relaxation, repose, or emotional stimuli connected with healing. Through the participation of the entire group, the sufferer becomes reintegrated into the community, besides. With the Zande, the healer often diagnoses social tensions as the trigger for the sorcery that is producing the illness; among the Gusto of the Ivory Coast the soothsayer also includes family and social relations in the quest for the causes of an illness. Circumstances that are disturbing or stressful for the community are regarded as critical for the onset of a disease. Here the consideration may be a jealous neighbor, a not yet married son, or a lost kettle. The therapy aims to remove these tensions and restore social equilibrium (→ Catharsis). Thus, traditional healing procedures frequently deal with psychic disturbances, or presentations of organic disease with accompanying emotional symptoms. With the Minahasa in Indonesia, sickness is interpreted as a result of negative influences on the part of the souls of ancestors. In a trance session, the healer shares exact instructions for the treatment of the illness. She or he pronounces which plants must be picked by which person, in which circumstances, for instance under the full moon, and how they must be prepared. These prescriptions provide sufferers and the community with practical and concrete directions for treatment of the disease, and offer them the opportunity of taking active measures against it.

The examples show that traditional ways of healing treat both organic, and social and religious causes of disease. The ascription of illnesses to the will of the gods, or to the activity of the spirits, explains them, and weaves them into the worldviews at hand. The sufferer, whose self-image and perception of the environment has been changed by the disease, is presented with a way back into the everyday, and into integration. This explanation, the convincing ritual presented, and the manifold prescriptions for a cure, serve to strengthen belief, hope, and confidence, and to mobilize the powers of self-healing. Since sickness is laid to the account of a violation of taboo, to a dissolute life, or to contravention of the norms of the group, ritual procedures with the disease also serve the maintenance of social order. In societies whose survival depends on the smooth-running cooperation of their members, the reinforcement of this order, and reconciliation with it on the part of the sufferer, obviously produce healing powers.

Recovery by Purification

Even in highly industrialized Japan, culturally marked concepts still determine procedures with disease today. It is regarded as a result of filth, uncleanness, or negative influences that originate from without, as for example from strangers, including foreigners. On this basis, Japanese take off their shoes when entering a home, and hygiene prescribes a daily bath. Feeling fresh and clean betokens a healthy feeling of well-being. Hygienic notions not only offer a concept for dealing with disease, but also structure the interpretation of the self and the environment into an inner and an outer element. With disease-inducing uncleanness, according to the Japanese view, not only a hot bath helps, but rituals of expulsion and purification are introduced, especially in the → 'new religions,' for a restoration of health.

In moxibustion, a curative procedure practiced in China and Japan, medicinal herbs are burned on the acupuncture sites on the skin. Here the unusually close contact between the patient and the healer is felt as consoling or pleasant. Moxibustion further permits the patient to demonstrate attention to, concern for, sympathy for, and active support of persons. In this fashion, dealing with disease can solve social and psychic conflicts in a nonverbal way. Independently of the power of the burning herbs, curative forces emerge from the special inter-human relation struck between patient and healer.

Illness in Modern Societies

5. In modern industrialized societies as well, the determination of sickness and health fulfills important ordering and normative functions. The development of psychology has led to the classification of persons with serious psychic disturbances as mentally or emotionally ill, whereas in the past they would have been classified as 'evil,' 'possessed by the devil,' or criminal. The possibility that there is such a thing as → evil neither can nor should be acknowledged, as people now believe in the healing power of modern science. A fixation on the generation of healthy persons obscures questions about the existential meaning of sickness and disease.

The application of macro-technological apparatus, an alienation between physician and patient, and the commercialization of the medical arts have the consequence that the sick lose their trust in the effectiveness of methods of healing that had played such a significant role in the healing process in the past. Modern medicine is also criticized for being so exclusively absorbed in the materialistic organic grounds of disease that it is rendered impotent when it comes to answering the question of 'why,' the question of deeper causes. Since the Enlightenment, traditional Christian churches have thrown in their lot more emphatically with a faith in accordance with understanding. Thereby they rob themselves of the performative aspect, faith as experienced, as in common rites of healing or in rituals of expulsion, and neglect the task of healing the sick.

Alternative Methods of Healing

6. In reaction, the healing movement developed. This label includes the Pentecostal movement, methods of healing coming from traditional healing practices in countries of the 'Third World' (→ Voodoo), and faith healing. In many new religious movements as well, an important part falls to the need for the healing of the sick. In numerous 'new religions' of Japan, healing is sought with the help of 'cleansing of the heart.' Certain new religious movements fully or partially reject modern medicine, such as Jehovah's Witnesses, who decline blood transfusions, or Japanese mahikari, which renounces the application of medicines. Many new religious movements do their missionizing and advertising with the guarantee that they can heal diseases, as they have recognized that this is a way of meeting basic religious expectations. Just as modern persons seek sensible explanations and therapies for diseases, they turn in addition to alternative methods of healing.

The healing arts of → Hildegard of Bingen, Chinese and Tibetan Medicine, and Ayurveda, as well as therapies based on Bach Flower Essences, breathing, and crystals, have been in high demand since the 1990s. Healers who promise health through shamanic séances, rebirth, homeopathy, anthroposophical medicine, or astrological analysis supplement the offer. A historical survey shows that medicinal plurality has determined disease therapy in the past, as well, and that it is still to be found among many peoples today. However, the survey also makes it clear that aspects of group dynamics, as well as of the social and the religious, support the therapeutic effect of the most varied practices of healing. With world cultures and religions being plundered for health recipes, these aspects neither are nor can be taken into much consideration. They are nontransferable, inasmuch as their effects are tied to obligatory and comprehensive worldviews and social relationships that differ from those of modern industrial society. However, traditional methods of healing do indicate a peculiarity of modern therapeutics: the process of healing has slipped the public arena, and has been privatized. In the struggle with disease, the individual is no longer supported by the community. The community power of religious concepts of the spirits of ancestors, or taboo, or a sacred cosmic order, has been irretrievably shattered in modern times. It is to be doubted, then, that alternative methods of healing based on religious interpretations of reality can develop their efficacy in Western societies.

Privatization of Healing

Discovery of New Diseases

In modernity, the vacuum of individualization and → disenchantment is being filled by the discovery of new diseases. In the past, the phases of puberty or pregnancy were accompanied by rites of passage. By explaining misplacement of teeth, or pregnancy, as disease, medical care and control may itself assume the guidance of these phases of passage. Even the → New Age movement discovers new diseases, first and foremost the 'deformation of body and soul,' and this diagnosis can be regarded as an expression of the massive social criticism offered by New Age adherents. However, the plethora of therapies that New Age religion has itself developed aim extensively at the development and improvement of the self. To that extent, New Age ideas demonstrate how, by postulating disease, persons are thrown back on themselves, and societal and social contradictions can be obscured.

The attitude with which persons of modern industrial society demand the instantaneous satisfaction of their consumerism, as if it were the most obvious thing in the world, extends to the demand for healing and health as well. People often neglect the meaning of illness as a sign from our bodies that, even if, in our modern understanding, our existence is no longer God-given, it is finite nonetheless.

Literature

Aronowitz, Robert A., Making Sense of Illness: Science, Society, and Disease, Cambridge 1998; Douglas, Mary, Purity and Danger: An Analysis of Concepts of Pollution and Taboo, London 1966; Evans-Pritchard, E. E., Witchcraft, Oracles, and Magic Among the Azande, Oxford 1937; Fuller, Robert C., Alternative Medicine and American Religious Life, New York 1989; Gilman, Sander L., Disease and Representation: Images of Illness from Madness to AIDS, Ithaca 1988; Hunter, Kathryn Montgomery, Doctor's Stories: The Narrative Structure of Medical Knowledge, Princeton 1991; Lachmund, Jens/Stollberg, Gunnar (eds.), The Social Construction of Illness: Illness and Medical Knowledge in Past and Present, Stuttgart 1992; Lorber, Judith/Moore, Lisa Jean, Gender and the Social Construction of Illness, Walnut Creek [2]2002; Marty, Martin E./Vaux, Kenneth L. (eds.), Health/Medicine and the Faith Traditions: An Inquiry into Religion and Medicine, Philadelphia 1982; Mattingly, Cheryl/Garro, Linda C. (eds.), Narrative and the Cultural Construction of Illness and Healing, Berkeley 2000; Ohnuki-Tierney, Emiko, Illness and Culture in Contemporary Japan: An Anthropological View, Cambridge 1984; Thomas, Keith, Religion and the Decline of Magic, New York 1971; Wenegrat, Brant, Theater of Disorder: Patients, Doctors, and the Construction of Illness, New York 2001.

→ Amulet, Ascona/Monte Verità, Drinking/Drink, Eating/Nourishment, Evil Eye, Hildegard of Bingen, New Age, Shamanism, Taboo, Voodoo, Yoga

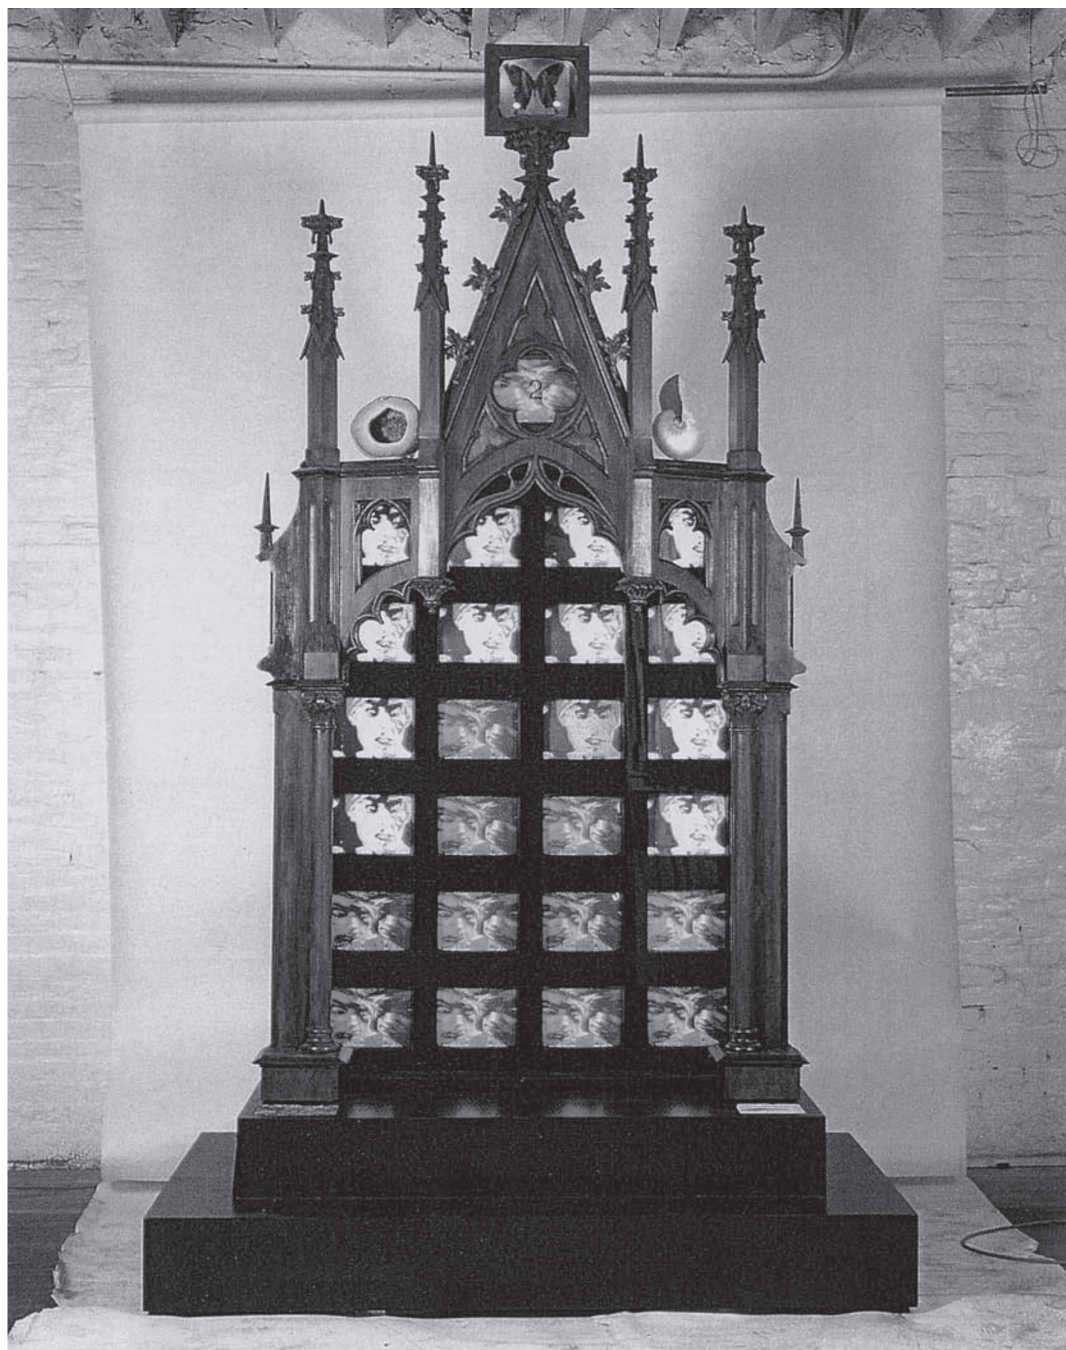
Inken Prohl

Image / Iconoclasm



Definitions

1. 'Image,' or 'picture,' in its broadest meaning is any presentation that—unlike the concept—presupposes and addresses sensory → perception and experience. In current speech, what is designated is first and foremost the visual presentation of things on a surface; in this perspective, the concept of the speech image is itself to be understood as imagery. Etymologically, 'picture' is from the Latin pictura, which in turn comes from pictus, 'painted.' 'Image' is derived from the Latin root imag-, 'image,' 'copy'; it is related to our Latin-derived 'emulate.' In semiotics, 'picture' is defined as a special form of the 'sign,' and designated as an 'icon.' Its character as sign rests not on convention or tradition, as does that of → 'symbol,' but on visually perceptible similarity to that which it designates. This similarity is also the meaning content of the most important Latin synonym, cited above, imag-. It is precisely the religious picture or image, however, that is not to be restricted to the function of a sign or indication, since religious practice tends to identify the image of a god with the god. A more helpful concept would be that of embodiment, which is especially appropriate in sculpture, but also in the form of the painted picture.

With some reservations, a pro-image attitude can be associated with polytheistic religions, with their pronounced and distinct mythology, and an anti-image attitude to monotheistic, especially the prophetical and scriptural religions (→ Judaism; Islam). Within Christianity, the conflict over the appraisal of the image has repeatedly materialized, as image controversy and assault on the image (iconoclasm).

Functions of Images

Images serve for the representation of religious content. They may present as an occurrence that has been transmitted and handed down as myth, saga, or legend: their function then is predominantly illustrative or didactic. Here belongs the cycle of images that was valued in the Christian churches as the Biblia pauperum ("Bible of the Poor," or illiterate). The key thing for religious practice, however, is the image of a god or saint, isolated from the oral context—in the Christian tradition, especially as images of Mary. The sacred narratives transmitted are still awakened in the viewer. The image nonetheless tends to function not as illustration, but as personal incarnation or embodiment in and for individual devotion (devotional image), as well as, especially, in community worship. The cultic image is brought sacrifices; it is anointed, bathed, attired, kissed, given gifts, borne in processions, dealt with as a real person. Conversely, personal activity, in the sense of wonderworking, is expected of the sacred image. It heals, punishes, wards off dangers, and impedes robbery and injury. Sacred images are generally venerated in certain → places, and are nevertheless regularly connected to a trans-regionally venerated deity or saint. The authenticity of the incarnation or embodiment can emphasized by way of bodily relics, or vouched for by legends that connect the image with an authorized portrait. Thus, Luke the Evangelist is presented in legend as a painter, who has handed down the actual appearance of Mary. Especially, in the tradition of the Eastern Churches, the so-called acheiropoiete (Gk., '[image] not made by [human] hand') are prized, or, in the West, personified as vera icon (Lat., 'true image'). The images referred to Saint Veronica go back not to a single painter, but to direct 'body-impressions' of Christ, and have permanently preserved the image of Christ.

Nam June Paik, My Faust—Channel 2 (1989), Carl Solway Gallery, Cincinnati, Ohio
Material: butterfly, a 25-"quasar" 10-in. monitor, 2 Sony laser disc players, quartz geode, two fossil slabs, nautilus mussels. Antique wood frame: 266 × 127 × 81 cm.; wood pedestal: 61, 173, 122 cm. Through the frame, multiplied video images, with a Neo-Gothic-altar-like set of furniture, the artist shifts the reception of the image media ironically into the vicinity of religious image-worship. (Rolf Engelbart)

On the occasion of his canonization in 1987, the photographic likeness of Saint Giuseppe Moscati (d. 1927) hangs over his grave in the Church of Il Gesù Nuovo in Naples. Without hesitation the veneration of a saint makes use of photography for a modern icon. The artistic value of the picture is not high; what 'counts' is the authenticity, guaranteed by technology, of its replication of the vera icon (Lat., 'true image'—a copy of the face of Christ).

European Christian Tradition

2. The Christian European tradition of the religious image was influenced by a tension between two propensities, that of pro-image Greco-Roman cultural traditions on the one hand, and the Biblical prohibition on the other. Many instances of early Christian martyrdom were due to a refusal to collaborate in veneration of the imperial image, which was connected to veneration of the Emperor himself, and which ran counter to the exclusive claim of the biblical God. Even a representational image of the biblical God as incarnate in Christ, however, at first fell under the prohibition. The gradual relaxation of the latter may be connected with the fact that, as a result of its development into the religion of the state, Christianity, from the fourth century onward, surrendered its formally exclusive status, and simply replaced the polytheistic cults across the board. Thus, the various forms of the veneration of Mary annexed the earlier cults of the mother deities. Instead of the kinds of statues that had been discredited through the older sculptures of the deities, images were at first limited to painted icons (Gk., eikón, 'picture'). In keeping with the prohibition of images, and against the openly admitted effectiveness of the image of a god in pagan antiquity, the fact that the image was of human creation was most effectively downplayed. Instead, its authenticity was supported by legends of an origin in apostolic times. The theological discussion of images in the ancient Church appeals to the Incarnation, God's becoming visible in Jesus Christ. It uses a terminology that comes from Plato, by whom sensibly perceptible things were classified as copies of the 'ideas,' the 'original' images (→ Platonism). This argumentation could be adduced both in justification of the veneration of images and for challenging them. Theological positions can generally be questioned in terms of their economic and political backgrounds.

The Image Controversy

In the oscillating Byzantine image controversy of the eighth and ninth centuries, what seems to have been important to the emperors, who were opposed to the images, is the reinforcement of imperial central power. In 787, the pro-image Second Council of Nicaea decreed that images might indeed be paid reverence, provided that it was not adoration; reverence of the copy was supposed to lead ultimately to reverence of the original image. In the Middle Ages, this ruling became the minimum consensus, which made it possible for the West to develop painting, and altar and cathedral sculpture, and for the → Orthodox Churches of the East to celebrate a liturgy of → icons. The same council, in its acts, decreed the priority of the doctrinal position of the Church on the production of images, assigning to painters its mere execution. This position changed only toward the end of the Middle Ages, when artistic production was gradually attributed an intrinsic value, and painting, including the representation of perspective, was shifted from the sphere of the artisans into proximity with the scholarly development of a worldview. New genres of image emerged, no longer attached to the sacred image and biblical history, and allotted not a cultic or liturgical interest, but an intellectual and aesthetic one.

In parallel to this revaluation of the production of images as a creative activity, the movements of the Reformation once more produced iconoclasm. In Lutheran Protestantism, a tolerant attitude toward religious images won the day; owing to the demise of the veneration of the saints, however, it was restricted to illustrative didactic functions. With more consistency, reformed Protestantism banned all images, and even religious symbols like the cross, from the space maintained for divine services. The Catholic Counter-Reformation appealed defensively to the formulations of the Second Council of Nicaea, and integrated traditional popular images of religious inspiration into the large-scale artistic program of the Baroque. Since the Renaissance, the successful production and reception of images has generally been conducted no longer under the aspect of cult and religion, predominantly, but under that of → art. A renewed paradigm-shift has occurred since the nineteenth century with the invention of photography and its corollary developments, film, television, and video. In the present, the religious and the artistic image are equally caught up in the process of a general visualization of communication.

Judaism

3. The Biblical prohibition of images (Exod 20:4-5) is a component of the proclamation of the Covenant, conveyed to the people of Israel by Moses. Correspondingly, the Biblical history of Israel is impregnated with that people's demarcation and separation from surrounding religions, with their bestial or anthropomorphic figures. But even the presentation of an image of God was regarded as a transgression of the Covenant. In the Ark of the Covenant, and later in the temple of Jerusalem, instead of a statue of God, the tables of the Law protected the Covenant. Their place is occupied in the synagogues by the scrolls of the Torah. This arrangement means not only a rejection of the image, but a positive indication that the divine service is performed as the doing of God's word—a thought that, in its social dimension, was repeatedly seized upon by Christian groupings who were critical of the image. Vis-à-vis images in general, the position of Judaism is just as strongly differentiated as it is with Christian confessions. Decoration in image is to be found not only in the Ark of the Covenant and the Temple, but also in synagogues from antiquity (see the famous paintings in the Dura Europos Synagogue) until modern times. The participation of Jewish artists in modern art—one may think of Marc Chagall, Chaim Soutine, Mark Rothko, or Barnet Newman—is just as unquestionable as is the validity of the prohibition of the presentation of an image of God in Judaism.

The Image in Modern Art

4. The critical position toward images that the Bible articulates currently has less of a parallel in religion than it does, in a certain sense, in art. True, under the increasing pressure of the visual communications media, Protestant confessions especially, sometimes rather helplessly, attempt to organize divine service and instruction more attractively through an application of the media of image. Nevertheless, in modern art, not only the divisions of genre in painting that have developed since the Renaissance, the claim of similarity with a given object, and the conventions of perspective in the reproduction of space have become questionable; the very concept of image is critically thematized, or even denied, through a radical abstraction and an art of object, of action, and of concept.

Art in the present is not so much the apposite instance for the production of images; rather, it would be designated as a critical school of meanings for the reception of the image in the age of the media. One of its ambitions is to make known the religious quality of the messages visualized in the media; another is to thematize the ever more cultic phenomenal forms of its own reception. At the extreme, this tendency means the rejection or obfuscation of the image by the artist—something rather of an 'internal' iconoclasm.

Literature

Barasch, Moshe, Icon: Studies in the History of an Idea, New York 1992; Belting, Hans, Likeness and Presence: A History of the Image before the Era of Art, Chicago 1994; Besançon, Alain, The Forbidden Image: An Intellectual History of Iconoclasm, Chicago 2000; Bryer, Anthony/Herrin, Judith (eds.), Iconoclasm, Birmingham 1977; Gombrich, Ernst H., Symbolic Images: Studies in the Art of the Renaissance, London 1972; Krüger, Klaus/Nova, Alessandro (eds.), Imagination und Wirklichkeit: Zum Verhältnis von mentalen und realen Bildern in der frühen Neuzeit, Mainz 2000; Mitchell, W. J. T., Iconology: Image, Text, Ideology, Chicago 1986; Idem, Picture Theory, Chicago 1994; Nodine, Calvin F./Fisher, Dennis F. (eds.), Perception and Pictorial Representation, New York 1979.

→ Art/Aesthetics, Perception, Vision/Auditory Experience

Rolf Engelbart

Immortality

1. ‘Immortality’ denotes an eternal duration of life, an existence without end and death. Principally, it counts as a characteristic of God or the gods, and constitutes one of the most important differences between their existence and that of human beings,[1] who are therefore called ‘mortals.’ However, there are various approaches and transitions. The gods can die—only after a very long life, granted—as they, too (e.g. in certain Eastern religions), are caught in the chain of rebirths (samsara). In addition, most religions celebrate extraordinary persons, who are snatched away at their death and—like Hercules—deified, in an ‘apotheosis.’ Human immortality is duration beyond death, and requires that the latter not have occurred, or have been overcome, and existence to have been transformed: rebirth or resurrection. Human immortality is usually connected with the supposition of a soul.

History of Religions in General

2. In most societies, the first concern in a case of death is a ritually correct → funeral or burial. Only when the ceremonies of transition have been executed for the dead, and they have been ascribed their new status, is solidarity of the survivors ensured, and the group protected against the potential hostility of the dead.[2] They will now join the society of their ancestors, live in heaven, or in or under the earth, and need not wander as ghosts or baneful spirits. Thus, Moses will sleep with his fathers (Deut 31:16), and Abraham, old and weary of life, be gathered to his (Gen 25:8). Individual immortality as such plays no role; the dead live on in their families, tribe, or people. One keeps mindful of one’s death, or succumbs to forgetfulness, and dies for good and all. The scriptural religions definitively modify this basic notion of tribal and traditional societies.

Greece

3. Specific religions: a) The ancient high cultures—for which Greece is taken here as prototypical—know only a shadowy, dreamlike existence in the underworld for the overwhelming majority of their dead (Odyssey, 11, 207-208). There they find a country without a return, terrible and hideous, repulsive to the very gods (Iliad, 20, 65). It is true, a → hero can gain immortality by the renown of his deeds. Although he is remembered in epic and song, however, still he leads a joyless life in the underworld. Achilles had rather toil as a drudge on earth than rule as lord of the dead (Odyssey, 11, 488-491). Only some few, like Menelaus, are rapt to Elysion—a kind of isle of paradise (Odyssey 4, 561). A change occurs (sixth to fifth centuries BCE) with the → Mysteries, over which Demeter and Dionysus preside. These assure the initiate, the mystai, of a blessed life in the beyond (→ Hereafter), independently of origin and regardless of previous behavior (Burkert). Perhaps Plato owes his considerations on the immortality of the soul—especially in the Phaedo and the Phaedrus—to mystery traditions and the 'Orphics,' although he concurs with them, and as a philosopher, seeks to transcend them.

Egypt

b) Pharaonic → Egypt is a case apart. Immortality is a privilege of kings, and ensures the survival of the kingdom. After the fall of the Old Kingdom (end of the third century BCE), it is gradually democratized, and begins to include the group of the courtiers and administrators. Tombs and rites—like → mummification, and inscription in the Book of the Dead—make for immortality's 'outer stabilization,'[3] inasmuch as the dead now live in memory. As for the 'inner,' the dead must first win immortality themselves, before a Court of the Dead. Here their hearts are weighed. If they are found in balance with Ma'at, justice, then the dead shall live; otherwise the dead-eater, a composite monster, devours them.

Judaism

c) Abraham lives on, for he is to become a great people (Gen 12:2, etc.). By contrast, individual immortality is attested in Judaism only from Hellenism onward (Dan 12:2, 2 Macc 7), doubtless even occasioned by cases of martyrdom. It is inherited by the Western religions, although it is not based on the majority of the Hebrew Bible conceptions. All details aside, Paul's conviction prevails: "The last enemy to be destroyed is death" (1 Cor 15:26; cf. Rev 20:14). While Paul still regards new life after death as newly created by God ('new creation,' kainé ktísis), Christianity receives the immortality of the individual soul according to Plato's conceptualization, through Tertullian (c. 200 CE). The soul is immortal, and the resurrection of the flesh is awaited for the end of the ages. After a judgment in the afterlife, a twin destiny awaits the dead—every one according to his or her deeds or faith or predestination or promise—redemption or reprobation, a blessed life or eternal torment. In Catholicism, besides → heaven and → hell, purgatory is added, as a possible interim state of purification.

Christianity

Hinduism/Buddhism

d) Models of immortality in Hinduism and Buddhism receive their orientation from the concept of an annihilation of mutability. Both religions are familiar with the concept of rebirth (and re-death). Hindu teaching on rebirth takes its point of departure in an individual soul, that—in certain circumstances, after a long sojourn in an interim realm—enters another body. Buddhism has it that the conditions for later lives are posited in earlier ones, without the continuity of a traveling 'soul.' The crucial factor here is karma, the sum of one's good and evil deeds, which determines where rebirth is to arise; the same notion occurs in Hinduism. The ultimate goal is not to be reborn again, since each new birth also entails one's suffering and eventual death. Hindu conceptualizations of immortality include the ascent of each soul's individual atman, or earthly personhood, into the impersonal, highest principle Brahman. The goal of the Buddhist salvific path is the 'deathless' (in Pali, amata) nirvana.

Modern Age

4. Hans Jonas has established that "the person of today is not inclined to the thought of immortality."[4] Sigmund Freud judges oppositely that, "in the unconscious, each of us is convinced of [our own] immortality."[5] But the contradiction is only apparent: it is only that, now that the answers of religion have been discarded, and science and technology have made their own impression, a hope in immortality has become privatized. The visible side, here, is a cult of youthfulness, practiced in recreation, trends, and sports. More recently, cloning has aroused a hope of immortality through reduplication.

1. Epic of Gilgamesh, 10, 3, 1-5.
2. Gladigow, Burkhard, "Naturae Deus Humanae Mortis," in: Stephenson, Gunther (ed.), Leben und Tod in den Religionen, Darmstadt 1980, 119-134.
3. Assmann 1991.
4. Jonas 1963, 44.
5. Freud 1960, 341.

Literature

Assmann, Jan, "Schrift, Tod und Identität," in: Idem, Stein und Zeit, Munich 1991, 169-199; Benecke, Mark, The Dream of Eternal Life: Biomedicine, Aging, and Immortality, New York 2002; Budge, Ernest A. Th. W. (trans.), The Book of the Dead, London ²1953; Burkert, Walter, Greek Religion: Archaic and Classical, Oxford 1985; Edwards, Paul (ed.), Immortality, New York 1992; Freud, Sigmund, "Zeitgemäßes über Krieg und Tod," in: Gesammelte Werke 10, Frankfurt/M. 1960, 323-355; Hornung, Erik et al. (eds.), Auferstehung und Unsterblichkeit, Munich 1993; Jonas, Hans, "Unsterblichkeit und heutige Existenz," in: Idem, Zwischen Nichts und Ewigkeit, Göttingen 1963, 44-62.

→ Bioethics, Death and Dying, Funeral/Burial, Gnosticism, God/Gods/The Sacred, Hero/Heroism, Mysteries, Reincarnation, Soul

Martin Treml

Indian Subcontinent

Well over a billion people, of various languages and cultures, live together on the Indian subcontinent. Cohabitation of cultures and religions is astonishingly peaceful, and conflicts are the exception. It is not only religious groups as such that jostle one another, Hindus crowding against Muslims, Sikhs, and Tamils; confrontations cut through the religions themselves, as, for instance, in Hinduism, when nationalists see India's identity as embodied in religion, while liberal forces set their sites on the federal and democratic structures of the Indian constitution. There are rifts between the parallel states established after the Second World War.

Veda

1. Vedic religion and Hinduism: Today's → Hinduism has been transmitted from the Vedic age (c. 1500–500 BCE). Priests (Brahmans) created the sacred scriptures of the Veda. From 500 BCE onward, religious reform

AFGHANISTAN
C H I N A Ladakh
Zanskar
JAMMU AND KASHMIR
HIMAL PRADESH
Exile of Fourteenth Dalai Lama Dharamsala
Kailash
Badshahee Mosque: 17th cent., one of the largest mosques in the world
Lahore
Amritsar
Golden Temple
Gangotri
Source of the Ganga
Svayambhunath Stupa and Bodnath Stupa
PUNJAB
Traditional Ashrams Maharishi Mashesh Yogi Ashram (Transcendental Meditation); Divine Life Society Rishikesh
Hardwar
PAKISTAN
HARYANA
Temple of Shiva, Lord of the Animals
ARUNACHAL PRADESH
New Delhi
Birthplace of the Buddha
Krishna Cult ISKCON (Hare Krishna)
Mathura
Vrindavan UTTAR Ganga
Kathmandu Lumbini
Ayodhya
Pasupatinath
SIKKIM
BHUTAN
Babri Mosque or (asserted) Temple of Rama NEPAL ASSAM
NAGALAND
Only temple of Brahma in India
Pushkar
Kusinara
Cremation of the Buddha PRADESH
MEGHALAYA
RAJASTHAN
Benares
Most sacred place in India
Thatta
Mount Abu Allahabad
Ganga
BANGLADESH
MANIPUR
Tombs of Muslim Rulers 14th–16th cent.
Bodh Gayat
Enlightenment of the Buddha
TRIPURA
MIZORAM
Ujjain
MADHYA PRADESH
GUJARAT BIHAR
WEST BENGAL
Calcutta
Dakshineshwar Kali Temple (Ramakrishna)
MYANMAR
ORISSA
Jagannath Temple; Ratha Yatra, largest chariot festival in India
Pura
MAHARASHTRA
Nasik
Bombay Poona
Osho Ashram
ANDRA PRADESH
GOA
KARNATAKA
Puttaparthi
Prasanthi Nilayam Ashram (Satya Sai Baba)
Sravana Belgola
Statue of the Gommateshvara/Bahubali
Kanchipuram
Temple installation (Shiva, Vishnu, Parvati, and others)
Pondicherry
Chidambaram
Shiva Temple
Sri Aurobindo Ashram; Auroville
KERALA
TAMIL NADU
SRI LANKA
Rameswaram
Shiva Temple
Anuradhapura
Stupas from the second century BCE
Kandy
Tooth relic of the Buddha
Adam's Peak
F.D.2005
INDIAN SUBCONTINENT
Sacred Topography
Sacred Mountain
Hindu
Buddhist Islamic
Christian
Jain
Sikh
Kumbhamela Bathing Festival (quadrennially, in each of the four cities by turns)
New Religious Movements
Religious Minorities
Hindus
Buddhists
Parsi
Christians
Jains
Sikhs
Tribal Religions
Predominant Religious Membership
Hindus
Muslims
Buddhists
Boundaries
State Boundaries
Provincial Boundaries
0 500
1000 km

A secular party mounted this campaign slogan in New Delhi in 1985. It failed to have adequate effect, however: in 1998 a Hindu nationalist party came to power (with the largest plurality since 1996) for the first time since the establishment of the state, with Atal Behari of the Bharatiya Janata Party at the head of the government.

movements such as Buddhism and Jainism arose. The founders of these religions, the Buddha and Mahavira, found their disciples in the sectors of the population that Brahmans accorded a share in cult and salvation only inadequately if at all. After the fall of the first Indian Empire, created by the Emperor Ashoka (268–233 BCE), who confessed Buddhism, India stood under the influence of neighboring peoples for nigh on half a millennium. The Brahmans, meanwhile, maintained their traditions, interpreting and integrating the new cultural elements in their own sense. Beginning in the third century BCE, out of the synthesis between Brahmanic conceptions and local forms of belief, what is called 'Hinduism' arose. Hindu religions appearing then had little still in common with Vedic religiosity.

Islam

2. Islam in India: a) The absence of Indian political unity facilitated the incursion of Muslim conquerors from Afghanistan and central Asia. These achieved only temporary successes, however, and it was not until 1206 CE that the first Sultanate of Delhi was founded. In the sixteenth century, Mongols conquered, and once more an Islamic ruling house, this time a Turco-Mongol one, prevailed. The Delhi Sultanate had become enfeebled, and the new Islamic rule held nearly the whole of India in subjugation until the end of the seventeenth century.

With a severe administration in place, and by privileging certain castes, as well as administrative officials, the Mongols were able to maintain their predominance over a long period of time. In the hundred years spanning reigns of Emperors Akbar (1556–1605), Jahangir (1605–1627), and Shah Jahan (1627–1658), the Mongolian Empire celebrated its heyday. It was Shah Jahan who ordered the production of India's most famous architectural installation, the Taj Mahal in Agra.

Due to the new rulers' strict monotheism, and their rigorous rejection of the caste system, there was no fusion of Hinduism with Islam, as there had been in other cases. Hinduism and Islam coexisted, although individuals were obliged to convert. While Akbar attempted to initiate conciliatory conversations between the religions, they were without result.

Halting in front of a house, a Jain monk accepts an invitation to a meal. Circling him thrice, believers utter the formula, "Come, enter! Food and drink here are pure!" Thereby they indicate to him that the nourishment to be provided has been prepared without animal products, and that the drinking water has been boiled. For Jains, the principle of not harming other living beings (ahimsa) is key. The wandering ascetic carries a fan, with which, lest he injure any insects, he cleans his place before sitting. He belongs to the Digambara Jains, that of the 'clothed in air,' and lives altogether naked, on the model of founder Mahavira. The 'white clothed,' on the other hand, and Jain nuns, wear white garments. Indian ascetics, who, like this Jain, renounce home, family, possessions, sexual intercourse, and sense pleasures, do live apart from society; but they adopt the social role of spiritual counselors, and provide their benefactors with an opportunity for good works as they go about their begging rounds. (Kirsten Holzapfel)

Attempts to erect Islam into a religion of the majority by the destruction of temples, forced marriages, and the application of violence, failed. Nor had such measures been motivated exclusively by religion; rather they served mostly to implement political interests.

The foundation of a double state, an Islamic Pakistan and an India determined by Hinduism, renders Indian coexistence difficult. By way of the conversion of, especially, lower castes to Islam, the number of Muslims has increased so radically that India today, after Indonesia, is the largest Islamic country in the world. Cultural exchange occasioned the influence of personalities like poet-saints Kabir (1440–1518) and Nanak (1469–1539), who sought to fuse Islamic and Hindu standpoints. Their teachings were influenced by the Bhakti movement and Sufism. Nanak and Kabir rejected the caste system, but retained reverence of the gurus and the doctrine of rebirth.

Sikhs

b) Nanak became the founder of the Sikh religion. Like Islam, Nanak represented the view, also prevailing in Islam, that there was but one God, of whom no image might be made. He called his followers Sikhs ('pupils'). The Gurus, Nanak's successors, gave the new religion its definitive form. Under the fifth Guru, Arjun (1581–1606), the central sanctuary of the Sikhs, the Golden Temple, was erected in Amritsar, and the sayings of Nanak, Kabir, and other saints were compiled in the Adi Granth ("Primitive Book"). The tenth and last Guru was Govind Singh (1675–1708), who led the Sikhs in their successful struggle with the Mongols. Since his time, the Sikhs have institutionalized themselves as a khalsa ('brotherhood'). All male Sikhs have Singh, 'Lion,' as their forename, intended as an indication of their readiness to defend the faith.

Syncretistic reformers like Kabir and Nanak represented only marginal phenomena, and at no point in time can an Islamization of India be said to have occurred. The majority of Hindus either entered into an understanding with the Mongol rulers, or else attached themselves more firmly to the traditions of Hinduism. This entrenchment was accompanied by a glorification of the past, such as that later taken up by the Hindu nationalists. The rule of the Moguls came to an end in the eighteenth century. The last Grand Mogul, Aurangzeb (1658–1707) did extend the area of his authority once more, but finally failed due to self-made problems within his administration.

British Colony

3. Age of colonialism, and Neo-Hinduism: The interests of the English in India were at first purely economic. A more extensive engagement was occasioned by French territorial claims that threatened English trade supremacy. Between mid-eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, the English annexed all strategically important parts of India. The East India Company, founded in 1600, which controlled all of England's Asian commerce, had been succumbing to various elements of flawed planning, and came to the brink of ruin; it was dissolved in 1858, when the English Crown assumed direct rule over India.

In terms of the history of religion, special significance attaches to the introduction of the English language and British education. Now Europe's traditionally Christian culture began to impregnate India. Beginning in the 1830s, Indian intellectuals sought to reinterpret their own Hindu tradition in terms of European concepts and values, producing the phenomenon of Neo-Hinduism. The latter adopted the aim of 'modernizing' Hinduism, by purging it of 'superstition,' 'exaggerated ritualism' (→ Image/Iconoclasm), 'idolatry,' and the caste system. In a renewed Hinduism of this sort, the opportunity was seen to meet the challenge of Europe's cultural hegemony, and to strengthen India's sense of nation. Neo-Hinduism found scant echo among the broad population, but had a great effect on the image of India in the West.

4. Hindu nationalism: Even before India and Pakistan became independent in 1947, Hindus and Muslims had had their differences. During the process of division, some million persons died, and even afterwards tensions often erupted in violence, especially, and most recently, in 1992 in Ayodhya (→ Conflict/Violence). In that city, the great Babri Mosque had stood since 1528.

Destruction of a Mosque

Although there had been no center of the veneration of Rama in Ayodhya before the construction of the mosque there, in the mind of Hindu nationalists this is precisely the birthplace of the god Rama. On 6 December 1992, the strife escalated, and a large crowd destroyed the mosque; thousands were killed in street fighting. The unrest was not a spontaneous reaction on the part of emotionalized Hindus, however; rather it was the result of political agitation. In a kind of mythologic self-staging, political representatives appealed to ideals impregnated with religion, especially the acts of god-king Rama, which they ranked as an exemplar, and on this based their purpose of a Hinduization of India (hindutva).

Hindu chauvinistic movements consciously draw on the spirit of religious communality that typifies India, and identify Indian culture with Hinduism. In addition, they play the various caste interests against one another, although the caste system is more a reflection of social inequalities than it is their cause. Even the lowest castes observe ritual differences of rank, and they are in solidarity with their own group, although not with the totality of the disadvantaged.

The Non-Hindu Religions

5. Of the Indian population, 81.3% are Hindus, 11% are Muslims (8% Sunni, 3% Shiite), 2.4% are Christians, 1.1% Sikhs, 0.5 Jains, and 0.7% Buddhists. There are also small communities and villages with tribal religions; and there are Jews, Parsees, and others.

a) There remain only a few, usually small, Buddhist communities. Great importance, however, attaches to places of pilgrimage that mark the Buddha's stations of life: Bodh-Gaya, Benares, and Kushinara. Passing over other movements, one may cite the mass movement led by Bhimrao Ramji Ambedkar (1891–1986). An untouchable himself, Ambedkar wished to improve the lot of the lower classes through a conversion to Buddhism. Several million untouchables answered his call, but, after his death, the neo-Buddhist movement stagnated, as the Indian state denied the casteless, with their conversion, their constitutionally guaranteed rights to reserved education and positions of employment.

b) Approximately half of the some twenty million Indian Christians are former casteless. The area of their greatest extension is in southern India, where, according to legend, the Apostle Thomas worked. With European merchants, representatives of various Christian confessions also came to India, but their mission was always under the disadvantage that it was that of the colonial rulers, and so it was always only relatively successful. The Christian presence was visible less in matters of religion than through schools and hospitals.

c) With the more than 100 million Indian Muslims, a particular variant of Islam has developed, one strongly influenced by Hinduism. One of the points of conflict lies in the contradiction between Indian law and the application of the Sharia. In 1986, after the Supreme Court had sentenced a Muslim to make support payments to his wife, from whom he had 'divorced' himself in his old age, protests arose, since the decision contradicted the determinations of the Sharia. To prevent a loss of votes, the congressional government then exempted the Muslim population from Indian secular family law. Since the victory of the National Parties in 1998, a similar concession in the future is unlikely.

d) Jainism, whose teaching on many points can be compared with Buddhism, places special emphasis on the prohibition of killing even the smallest of living beings. Thus, Jains wear a mouth covering, lest they unintentionally swallow insects. Jainism exercised its greatest spiritual and political influence between the fifth and eleventh centuries. Jains live preponderantly in Gujarat and Rajasthan, and are often merchants and wholesalers or retailers, since other activities, farming, for example, can easily involve the killing of small living things.

e) Seventy percent of the worldwide 100,000 members of the Parsees live in India (→ Zoroastrianism), and of these, seventy percent, again, live in Bombay. Their settling in India harks back to their flight from repression by Persian Muslims in the eighth century. They appeared quite early on the economic scene, and today they belong to the most well-to-do population group in India. The main problem for the Indian Parsees is in their continuously diminishing membership, owing to their emigration and low population growth.

f) At the beginning of the nineteenth century, the Sikhs maintained their own state in the Punjab, and after Indian independence mounted claims to autonomy once more. With their demand for a Sikh nation, to be called 'Khalistan,' their separatist attitudes began to intensify in the 1980s. Confrontations with the Indian central government culminated in 1984 in the storming of the Golden Temple in Amritsar, in which militant Sikhs had sequestered themselves. Hundreds of persons died in the assault, and in the same year Indira Gandhi fell victim to an assassination at the hands of her Sikh bodyguards. This event again resulted in numerous acts of retaliation against Sikhs. In the meantime, support for the militant wing of the Sikh community has dwindled.

g) Preponderantly in central and northeastern India, some seventy million members of tribal religions (persons called adivasi) live in some six hundred different tribes. From time immemorial, they have been driven into areas of retreat, and many have given up their own religions and attached themselves to Hinduism, Christianity, or Islam. Despite certain halfhearted measures on the part of the government, the adivasi remain disadvantaged in the areas of education and employment. Depletion of raw materials and construction of dam sites further limit their living space, and compel them to resettle.

Neighboring Countries

6. After the Second World War, national states formed from the British colonial area of the Indian subcontinent. Religious differences were some of the main grounds for the boundaries between them. Tensions have had strong impact on politics until today, not only in India's relationship with its neighbors Pakistan and Sri Lanka, but also in the face of the giants China and the Soviet Union.

a) Pakistan: Nearly one hundred percent of the population of Pakistan is Muslim, of which ninety percent belong to the Sunnite belief. Besides the second strongest Muslim group, that of the Shiites, there are also Christian, Buddhist, and Hindu minorities. Tensions between Sunnites and Shiites have grown in recent years: with numerous terrorist attacks on both sides. The Islamic reform community Ahmadiyya Muslim Jamaat, founded in 1889, is unrecognized by the state. It is exposed to strong reprisals owing to the claim of its founder to be a prophet of Allah.

b) Bangladesh: After military intervention on the part of India, former East Pakistan became independent in 1971, under the name of Bangladesh. As in the one-time motherland, Islam is the state religion, with 87% of the population being predominantly Sunnites. The largest minority religion is Hinduism, with 12% of the population. The more than twenty-year-long conflict with the guerrilla movement Shanti Bahini was resolved with a peace accord in 1997. The guerillas had been fighting for the interests of the Buddhist tribes in the Southeast of the country, now accorded greater rights subsequently to the peace agreement. Now, quite the other way around, the some 300,000 Muslims in Bangladesh feel threatened. Although settled in the region by the government, they are now to surrender their areas once more.

c) Nepal: With 89.5% percent of the population, the concentration of Hindus is stronger in Nepal than in India. The two countries are closely tied traditionally, although the relationship is not altogether unproblematic. The 5.3% minority of Nepalese Buddhists live in the land of the birth of their founder, who was born in Lumbini. In the Kathmandu Valley, a special form of Buddhism has developed, characterized by the influence of Shivaite and tantric elements, as well as by the adoption of numerous Hindu deities. The Muslim population make up 2.7% of the whole; Christians are represented by 50,000 believers.

d) Sri Lanka: In Sri Lanka, the population is divided into 69.1% Buddhists, 15.5% Hindus, 7.6% Muslims, and 6.9% Catholics. Buddhism, introduced from India in the third century BCE, was very closely knitted with the ruling class from the start. As in Burma, so also in Sri Lanka, Theravada Buddhism was the dominant force, and this remained the case after independence and the introduction of democracy in 1947. The distinction into politically active village monks and ascetic forest monks is characteristic. The former are often reproached with too great an involvement in the world, while the latter are seen as suitably realizing the monastic ideal. Once a year, then, the laity make a pilgrimage to one of the six hundred forest monks, to offer an expression of their reverence for them. As the Tamil minority felt repressed by the Singhalese majority, war broke out in 1983 between government troops and the LTTE (Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam). Tamils demand a state of their own in Sri Lanka, and although the battles have already cost several dozen thousand lives, all peace initiatives have failed up until now.

Literature

Barrow, Ian J., Making History, Drawing Territory: British Mapping in India, c. 1756–1905, New Delhi/Oxford 2003; Bhardwaj, Surinder Mohan, Hindu Places of Pilgrimage in India: A Study in Cultural Geography, Berkeley 1973; Brown, Judith M., Modern India: The Origins of an Asian Democracy, New Delhi/Oxford 1985; Grewal, J. S., The State and Society in Medieval India, New Delhi/Oxford 2004; Halbfass, Wilhelm, India and Europe: An Essay in Understanding, Albany 1988; Hendersen, Carol E., Culture and Customs of India, Westport 2002; Keay, John, India: A History, New York 2000; Lamotte, Etienne, History of Indian Buddhism, Louvain 1988; Mandelbaum, David, Society in India, 2 vols., Berkeley 1970; Richards, John F., The Mughal Empire, Cambridge 1993; Thapar, Romila, The Penguin History of Early India: From the Origins to AD 1300, London 2003.

→ Buddhism, Caste, Colonialism, Gandhi, Hinduism, Islam, Zoroastrianism

Thomas Schweer

Indian Subcontinent: Time Chart

Era 1: Pre-Vedic Era (until c. 1500 BCE)

c. 6000 BCE	Settlements in Baluchistan	Finds in the Neolithic Age (stone weapons, painted and unpainted clay vessels) attest to cattle-raising and soil cultivation.
c. 2500–1500	Indus Culture: Flourishing Moment and Late Phase	In the industrial (Harappa, Mohenjo-Daro) and in other regions (Punjab and

		Gujarat), a culture around several cities, to some extent thickly settled (up to 40,000 inhabitants), with a developed infrastructure (irrigation and canals, streets; houses of 'standardized' bricks or tiles, norms for volume and weight. The (unitary) script of this civilization has not yet been decoded. Thus, it can only be conjectured that terracotta and pictographic seal script from this time denote deities ("Proto-Shiva," "mother goddesses," etc.).
Era 2: Vedic time (c. 1500–500 BCE) since c. 1500	Immigration of the Aryans	In the pantheon of the Arya (self-designation, "the noble," "the hospitable") are combined phenomena of nature, moral principles, and good and evil powers—almost always divinized, and unconnected with divine images or temples. In religious life, sacrifice and spell occupy an important place.
c. 10th cent.	The Rigveda Collection is almost completed. On the Field of Kuru, the Battle of the Bharatas	The era takes its name from the four Vedas (Rigveda, Samaveda, Yajurveda, Atharvaveda), the most ancient religious texts of India, at first transmitted orally. The tribes of Vedic India battle for predominance. One of the battles is later developed in literature, in the Mahabharata epic.

9th–7th cent.	Sacrificial research as independent. The doctrine of Karma and rebirth	Brahmin priests claim the highest position in the varna system. In the more ancient *Upanishad*s, a monism surfaces. It is expressed in terms of a nature philosophy, in whose framework the concept of the identity of the universe with the individual soul plays an important role (Brahman-atman teaching).
Era 3: Ascetical reform movements. Theistic developments (c. 500 BCE to 300 CE)
5th/4th cent.	Jainist and Buddhist monastic orders. Rational focus on the present life. Redemption through knowledge	Mahavira (c. 500) and the Buddha (566–486 or 5th/4th cent.), both of the Kshatriya (Warrior) caste, found monastic movements, that, by way of avoiding the world, and by powerlessness, seek to attain liberation of the self. The materialists (nastikas) turn against the sacrificial system. Beginning of the development of the dualistic systems Samkhya and → Yoga.
from c. 300 BCE	Establishment of the pantheon	Formation of the Hindu pantheon of Vedic Brahmanic deities, and deities of local cults. Composition of the Ramayana and the Mahabharata (with Bhagavadgita).

3rd cent. BCE	Flourishing moment of the Maurya Empire	Under Akosha (268–233 BCE), the Empire of the Mauryas (founded by Candragupta c. 320) attains dimensions nearly coextensive with those of India itself. It accomplishes this expansion by incorporating broad regions of Southern India. Political promotion of Buddhism, missionary activity in Southern India and Sri Lanka.
c. 200 BCE–300 CE	Syncretistic cultures in the North and Northwest	Greeks, Scythians, Kushanas, Parthians: Iranian and Hellenistic influences. The latter begin with Alexander the Great's (327–325 BCE) campaign, and are promoted with the foundation of an Indo-Greek Empire by Demetrios (182 BCE). Greco-Buddhist synthesis in the "Gandhara culture."
c. 100 BCE	Theistic developments	Vishnu, Shiva, and their phenomenal forms gain increasing importance.
Era 4: Classical Hinduism: Flourishing moment and late phase (c. 300–850 CE)
320–497	Era of the flourishing of religion, literature, and art in the Gupta Empire	Science and handiwork, as well, are alive throughout almost all of India. In the late Gupta era, the first Hindu Temples appear (Aihole, Deogarh). Fixed ceremonies of veneration develop (divine service: puja).

6^{th}–9^{th} CE	Regional Empires	In Northern India, in the realm of Harsha of Kanauji (606–642 CE), the first appearance or Shaktism (Devi-Mahatmya). In the South, Pallavas, Chalukyas, and Rashtrakutas promote Shivaism.
after 600	Beginning of the bhakti movement in Southern India	Veneration characterized by devotionalism is originally addressed to local deities, and later are referred to Vishnu or Shiva. A few centuries later, the movement embraces all of Northern India.
c. 700	Shankara	According to tradition, influential philosopher and itinerant ascetic Shankara founds important monastic centers throughout India. Of his literary works, the most important are the commentaries on the Upanishads, the Bhagavadgita, and the Brahman sutras. These are purely monistic (advaitavedanta). In later centuries, they were invoked politically (e.g., in the Vijayanagara Realm, in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, in order to unite the Hindus in the struggle against the Muslims).

7th–9th cent.	The Parsees in India	In the flight from Islam (Arab rule since 642 CE), in several waves, Zoroastrians abandon Iran and settle in today's Federal State of Gujarat.
Era 5: Echoes of the classical time. Islam in India. Religious communities (c. 850–1850)
998–1027	Mahmud of Ghazni in Northern India	As early as 712, Arabs occupy the Southern Sindh, and gradually move up the river, in the valley of the Indus. The great Islamic onslaughts, however, follow, over the Indian Northwest. Afghani field commander Mahmud of Ghazni alone leads seventeen campaigns into Northern India. Destruction of important temple installations, including Mathura, Kanauj, and the Somnath Temple.
1000–1300	Scholastic syntheses of the Vishnuites and Shivaites	Buddhism vanishes from India (not, however, from other parts of the subcontinent: Sri Lanka, Nepal, Bhutan). Beginning in the ninth century, however, Shivaism flourishes in Southern India (under the Cholas), in Central India (under the Paramaras and Chandellas), and in Kashmir. Representatives: Abhinavagupta (around 1000, Kashmirian Shivaism), Shrikantha (around 1150, tradition: Shaivasiddhanta), etc. The Vishnuite tradition, as well, is further developed: Ramanuja (1056–1137, Vishishtadvaita), Madhva (1199–1278, Dvaitavedanta), etc.

from 1192/1206	Northern India under Muslim government. Beginning of the Sufi influence	In the Battle of Tarain (1192), Mahmud of Ghur defeats the Rajputi under Prthviraja. In 1206, Qutb-ud-Din Aibak founds the Sultanate of Delhi.
15th–17th cent.	New thrusts in the veneration of Rama and Krishna. Islamic and Hindu syncretism. The Sikhs	The ascetical monastic order of the Ramanandi, still important today, goes back to Ramananda (c. 1200–1270), devotee of Rama. Important teachers from this period are: Vallabha (1479–1531; Religious community: Vallabhacaris) and Caitanya (1486–1533, Gaudyas). Attempts at a reconciliation of between Islam and Hinduism by Kabir (1440–1518, Kabirpanthis). Guru Nanak (1469–1539) founds the religious community of the Sikhs.
1526–1858	The Mogul Empire	The Sultanate of Delhi is followed by the Mogul period.

		The most important Mogul Emperor, Akbar (1556–1605), strives for a synthesis of the religions (Din-i-Ilahi). Under Emperor Aurangzeb (1658–1707) the Empire reaches its greatest extent.
Era 6: From colony to republic. Modern Hinduism (1858 to today)
1857/58	The Great Uprising. The end of the Mogul Empire. India becomes part of the British Empire	Revolt of Indian soldiers of the British Indian army (Great Mutiny), 1857. The trigger is the breach of a religious taboo: the new muskets seemed to have been smeared with beef fat. The East India Company (founded in 1600) is dissolved in 1858, and the British Crown assumes direct rule. Queen Victoria is called Empress of India from 1877.
19th cent.	Emergence of Neo-Hindu Reform Movements	For years, Christian missioners protested the burning alive of widows, the caste system, veneration of the images of gods, etc., and the protests are incorporated in the teaching of various religious movements. The Brahma Samaj (founded 1828) appeals to the Upanishads (monism), and the politically active Arya Samaj (from 1875) to the religion of the Veda. Both movements come out in favor of social reforms.

1869–1948	Mahatma → Gandhi	The social reformer and leader of the Indian independence movement has become the figure of Indian national identification.
14th/15th August 1947	Partition and independence	Pakistan (August 14) and India (August 15) become independent. Beginning of the Kashmir conflict.
from 1960s	Missionizing Neo-Hindu movements with consequences in the West	Maharishi Mahesh Yogi (Transcendental Meditation), Satya Sai Baba (Satya Sai Association), Rajneesh/→ Osho (Sannyassins), Guru Maharaj Ji (Divine Light Mission), Bhaktivedanta Swami Prabhupada (ISKCON = → Hare Krishna Movement).
from 1980s	Reinforcement of militant currents on the Indian subcontinent	Since 1983, sanguinary battle for separation by the Tamil in Northern Sri Lanka (Tamil Tigers), Sikh fundamentalism in the Punjab (Akali Dal), storming of the Golden Temple of Amritsar and other Sikh temples, in June 1964. October 1984: Sikh bodyguards murder Indira Gandhi. Hindu fundamentalism on the move: December 6, 1992, demolition of the Babri Mosque in Ayodhya. Hindu nationalistic party BJP in charge of government since 1998.

Festal Calendar

Feasts in Hinduism (selection)

Explanations/Clarifications:

Throughout India, the dates of most festivals are calculated according to the lunar calendar, although in various regions (Tamil Nadu, Bengal, Kerala) it is the solar calendar that is in everyday use. The outer ring of the diagram presents the purnimanta system, used in broad parts of Northern India, in which the months are measured from full moon to full moon. The inner ring shows the amanta system, that has the months beginning with the new moon. It covers especially a large part of Southern India, as well as Maharashtra, Gujarat, and Nepal. In the middle ring, for a general orientation, the months of the Gregorian calendar are indicated—movable in respect of the Indian feasts. The month is divided into a “dark” (krishnapaksha, moon wanes) half and a “bright” (shuklapaksha, waxing moon) half. The year, as well, has a “light” and a “dark” phase, uttarayana or dakshinayana, between winter and summer, or between the summer (July 14) and winter (January 14) equinoxes. The seasons are presented in the inner ring. In each part of India in which the lunar calendar is in use, the year begins on the day of the new moon before the spring equinox (April 14). The unbroken lines designate festivals celebrated throughout India. Lines that stand for preponderantly Northern Indian feasts are drawn inside, and contrariwise: Southern Indian feasts have broken lines in the outer ring.

The feasts in the diagram (clockwise):

New Year, the day of the last new moon before the spring equinox (in the year 2000, April 5).

The Ninth of Rama (Ramanavani, on the ninth day of the bright half of the month of Caitra): in temples of Rama and Vishnu, Rama's birthday is celebrated.

The Guru's Full Moon (Gurupurnima, Ashada, 15, bright): veneration of the Guru.

The Fifth of the Serpent (Nagapancami, Shravana, 5, bright): the Nagas (serpentine divinities) are reverenced.

The Binding of the Guardian Band (Rakshabandhana, Shravana, 15, bright): sisters bind their brothers' wrists with a colored cord, to protect them from evil spirits.

The Eighth of the Birth of Krishna (Krishnajanmashtani, Bhadrapada, 8, dark, Purnimanta): in temples of Krishna, the latter's birthday is celebrated.

The Fourth of Ganesha (Ganeshacaturthi, Bhadrapada, 4, bright): veneration of Ganesha in his temples and shrines.

Onam (Onam, Bhadrapada, 12-15, bright): harvest festival, veneration of mythical ruler Mahabali in Kerala.

The Nine Nights of Durga (Navaratri, Ashvina, 1-9, bright): the goddesses Durga, Gauri, and the group of the Ashtamatrikas (eight female deities) are venerated.

The Tenth of the Victory (Vijayadashami/Dashahra, Ashvina, 10, bright): celebration of the victory of goddess Durga over demon Mahisha with the buffalo head.

Divali (Dipavali/Divali, Karttika, 15, dark, Purnimanta): Festival of Lamps: oil lamps are lighted; goddess Lakshmi is venerated.

The Sixth of Skanda (Skandashashthi, Karttika, 6, bright): birthday of god Skanda/Karttrikeya (also Murukan; son of Shiva).

Pongal (13-16 January): Harvest Thanksgiving Festival, veneration of the Sun (Tamil Nadu).

The Fifth of Spring (Vasantapancami, Magha, 5, bright): veneration of Sarasvati, goddess of the arts and sciences and river goddess.

The Great Night of Shiva (Mahashivaratri, Phalguna, 14, dark, Purnimanta): veneration of Shiva, with fasting and nightly watching at his temples.

Holi (Holi, Caitra, 1, dark, Purnimanta): Festival of Colors, veneration of Vishnu, Krishna, and Radha; visits of friends and relatives.

Other festivals (selection)

The Nine Nights of Durga (II Spring Durgapuja) (Navaratri, Caitra, 1-9, bright): Durga, Gauri, and the Ashtamatrikas are venerated.

Spring Equinox (Meshasamkranti, 14, April): ritual bath.

Dormition of Vishnu (Harishayani, Ashadha, 11, bright): veneration of Vishnu; fasting. Beginning of four-month period unfavorable for weddings.

Play of Rama (Ramlila, Ashvina): performance of the Ramayana.

Birthday of Hanuman (Hanumanjayanti, Karttika, 14, dark, Purnimanta): Hanuman, the god in the form of a monkey, is venerated in his temples.

Awakening of Vishnu (Prabodhini, Karttika, 11, bright): veneration of Vishnu; fasting.

Winter Solstice (Makarasamkranti, 14, January): ritual bath.

Important feasts of other religious communities (selection)

Birthday of the Buddha (Vaishakha, 15, bright); Birthday of Mahavira (Caitra, 13, bright); Birthday of Zarathustra (Khordad Sal, 6th of the Parsi month of Farvardin, August/September); Birthday of Guru Nanak (October/November); Christmas; Muharram (August/September)

State holidays

Republic Day (January 26); Independence Day (August 15); Gandhi's Birthday (October 2)

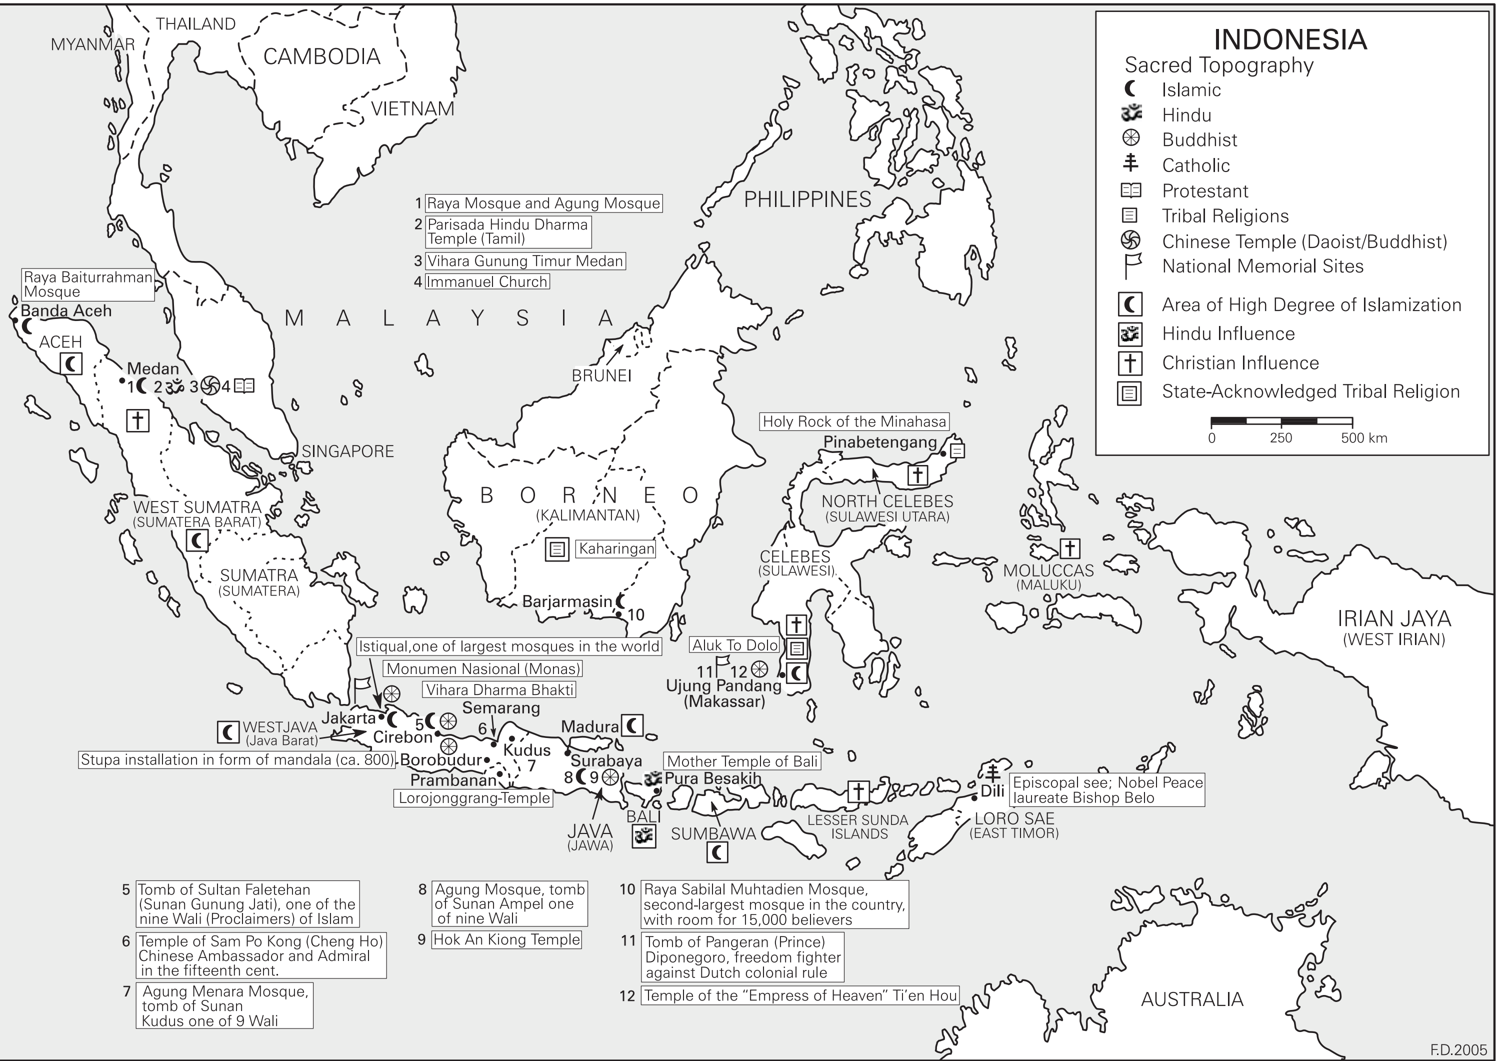
István Keul



Indonesia

One Religion, 300 Cultures

1. The Indonesian archipelago comprises more than 13,000 islands, and forms two bridges: between the Asian mainland and the Australian continent, and between the Indian and Pacific Oceans. Of the more than 190 million persons who make the Republic of Indonesia the state with the fourth-largest population in the world, a scant ninety percent profess Islam: thus, more Muslims live in Indonesia than in any other nation in the world. This observation draws attention, however, to the truly predominant heterogeneity of the country: more than three hundred ethnic groups can be identified, each with its own cultural identity; and, in the same archipelago, more than two hundred fifty languages are spoken.[1] Many Indonesians, illiterate hunters and gatherers, are semi-nomadic, and roam all about the relatively sparsely settled interior of Borneo (Kalimantan). Others work in the large city of the most densely populated island, Java, at the computers of international corporations. The tribal religions of Indonesia, each corresponding to a different culture, have come in contact, in the course of history, not only with Islam, but also with other world religions. This engaged processes of reciprocal influence, all of which are to be observed in multiple forms down to the present day.

Trade and World Religions

2. The islands along the traditional trade routes between southern and eastern Asia came under Indian influence as early as the fourth century. The Hindu-Indonesian age culminated in the Javaistic-Hindu Majapahit Empire (1293–1525), whose area of influence stretched, at one time or another, over the great Sunda islands Sumatra (Sumatera), Java, Borneo, and Celebes (Sulawesi). Beginning in the thirteenth century with the extension of the spice trade, Arab, Indian, and Persian merchants imported a form of Islam that had already adopted Indian and Persian elements, and that now spread further, especially from Java to Eastern Indonesia. The transition to Islam enabled persons to take their distance from the rigid hierarchy of Hindu society, and ensure themselves the support of the Muslim traffickers who controlled the trade routes. Regions with a high degree of Islamization are today the Aceh, called the 'porch of Mecca,' West Sumatra

INDONESIA
Sacred Topography
Islamic
Hindu
Buddhist Catholic Protestant
Tribal Religions
Chinese Temple (Daoist/Buddhist)
National Memorial Sites
Area of High Degree of Islamization
Hindu Influence
Christian Influence
State-Acknowledged Tribal Religion 0 250
500 km MYANMAR
THAILAND
CAMBODIA
VIETNAM
PHILIPPINES
M A L A Y S I A Raya Baiturrahman Mosque
Banda Aceh
ACEH
Medan
1 2 3 4
BRUNEI
SINGAPORE
B O R N E O
(KALIMANTAN) Kaharingan
Barjarmasin
10
WEST SUMATRA
(SUMATERA BARAT)
SUMATRA
(SUMATERA)
Holy Rock of the Minahasa
Pinabetengang
NORTH CELEBES
(SULAWESI UTARA)
CELEBES
(SULAWESI)
MOLUCCAS
(MALUKU)
IRIAN JAYA
(WEST IRIAN)
Istiqual,one of largest mosques in the world
Monumen Nasional (Monas)
Vihara Dharma Bhakti
Aluk To Dolo
11 12
Ujung Pandang
(Makassar) Semarang
Jakarta
5 6
WESTJAVA
(Java Barat)
Cirebon
Kudus
7 Madura
Stupa installation in form of mandala (ca. 800)
Borobudur
Prambanan
Lorojonggrang-Temple
Surabaya
8 9
Mother Temple of Bali
Pura Besakih
BALI
JAVA
(JAWA)
SUMBAWA
LESSER SUNDA ISLANDS
Dili
Episcopal see; Nobel Peace laureate Bishop Belo
LORO SAE
(EAST TIMOR)
1 Raya Mosque and Agung Mosque
2 Parisada Hindu Dharma Temple (Tamil)
3 Vihara Gunung Timur Medan
4 Immanuel Church
5 Tomb of Sultan Faletehan (Sunan Gunung Jati), one of the nine Wali (Proclaimers) of Islam
6 Temple of Sam Po Kong (Cheng Ho) Chinese Ambassador and Admiral in the fifteenth cent.
7 Agung Menara Mosque, tomb of Sunan Kudus one of 9 Wali
8 Agung Mosque, tomb of Sunan Ampel one of nine Wali
9 Hok An Kiong Temple
10 Raya Sabilal Muhtadien Mosque, second-largest mosque in the country, with room for 15,000 believers
11 Tomb of Pangeran (Prince) Diponegoro, freedom fighter against Dutch colonial rule 12 Temple of the "Empress of Heaven" Ti'en Hou AUSTRALIA
F.D.2005

(Sumatera Bara), West Java (Jawa Barat), Madura, Makassar (Sulawesi Selatan), and Sumbawa. The Christian mission originated in the sixteenth century, at the hands of the Portuguese, to be continued by the Dutch. It was limited, however, to regions in which Islam was feebly represented, if at all, or else to legs of land that were important in military terms or for trade policy, in the Moluccas (Maluku), in North Celebes (Sulawesi Utara), and on the little Sunda islands (Nusa Tenggara). During the Dutch colonial period, conversion to Christianity was at the same time an identification with the power elite, so that Muslims have called Christianity the 'Dutch Religion' (agama Belanda).

"Unity through Faith in the One Supreme God"

3. The independence of the Republic of Indonesia was proclaimed on 17 August 1945. The establishment of a common national consciousness has never been particularly free of problems since then. "Unity in Multiplicity" (in Javanese, bhinneka tunggal ika), as the inscription reads on the Indonesian state coat of arms, is supposed to be achieved especially through the required acknowledgment of the pancasila—designated, incidentally, as the state religion. Involved here are five principles formulated in the Preamble of the Constitution: humanity, national unity, democracy, social justice, and, especially, 'faith in the one supreme God' (ketuhanan yang maha esa). All religions that are monotheistic in this sense, and in addition are based on a written revelation and rising above ethnic bounds, are designated by the concept, taken from the Sanskrit, of agama, and are promoted by the state. The individual may indeed make a free selection among them, but must join one of them. Thus, 'atheism' is unlawful in Indonesia. While Islam, Christianity, Hinduism, and Buddhism are classed as agama, members of the uncodified 'tribal religions' are said to be 'persons not yet having a religion' (orang belum beragama).

Since 1965, Indonesia has been ruled by a militarily regime in whose eyes any deviating position is a threat, and is a position more than likely to be persecuted most harshly. This attitude led to massive human rights violations, especially in Aceh, as well as in West Irian (Irian Jay), only annexed in 1976, and in East Timor (Loro Sae)—violations that aroused scarcely any notice in the West. Islamic organizations have meanwhile voiced protests, raising them especially in presidential elections, and have become the victims of military excesses. The government's strategy is to check Islam as a political power, while, at the same time, recognizing it as a religion along with Hinduism, Christianity, and Buddhism. Thus, legal terminology was altered in favor of Islam in several ways, and in 1992 the then President of the Republic returned from a pilgrimage to Mecca as Haji Muhammad Suharto.[2]

Local Traditions

4. With their spread in Indonesia, the world religions are respectively marked, decisively, by the local traditions already at hand. For example, on Java, the large group of nominal Muslims (abangan) continues to maintain a strong orientation to their Hindu-Buddhist legacy from pre-Islamic times, while the little group of the santri strictly observes Muslim rules and rituals. East Indonesians reinterpret Christian concepts in terms of their tribal religious traditions (adat).[3] In that sense, prognoses of the imminent demise of the tribal religions have not been verified. Not only does adat, however, determine the view and understanding of agama, but, conversely, agama influences the conceptions of adat. Thus, the members of various ethnic groups have subjected their respective erstwhile 'tribal religions' to a systematizing new definition, in order to ensure it official recognition as agama.[4] Here the traditional element is objectified in a selective reference, and created anew after the exemplar of the 'foreign' element. The coveted recognition was granted in 1969, in the South of Celebes, with Alak To Dolo, and in 1980, in central Borneo, with Kaharingan. Neither, however, enjoys equal status with the other religions, but is observed and practiced only as instances of subclasses of Hinduism.[5]

5. The reciprocal influences of both adat and agama on Islam and Christianity has the effect that the individual religions of Indonesia tend to evince very different forms from region to region, each according to its respective cultural and historical background. While many Indonesians see Islam or Christianity, on the one side, and adat on the other, as irreconcilable contradictions, in the South of Sumatra, for example, Islamic usages are regarded as part of adat, or adat usages as part of Islam.[6] Differences and oppositions can thereby stand in operative contiguity even in the distinct religions. For example, the Minangkabau of West Sumatra (Sumatera Barat) profess Islam almost exclusively, but maintain traditional rules of kinship according to which certain rights of possession and use lie in the hands of women, and their further legacy materializes only through the female line.[7] In East Indonesia, convinced Catholic village dwellers, after having attended church on Sunday, can even seek out their traditional cultic center in order to offer sacrifice to the particular spiritual entities of their tradition.[8]

This simultaneity of the various, this unification of contradictions, emerges as typically Indonesian. It is also available in the fact that pancasila, on the one hand, sketches a secular state, with equal and simultaneous treatment of the great religions, but, on the other hand, excludes atheism. Official religious statistics, to be sure, ascribe the members of the various ethnic groups wholesale to one or other confession of faith, and thereby conceal the heterogeneity actually prevailing in Indonesia.

1. Stöhr 1976, 3.
2. Pampus, Karl Heinz, "Islam in der Diaspora. Anmerkungen zu Südostasien," in: Rotter, Gernot (ed.), Die Welten des Islam. Neunundzwanzig Vorschläge, das Unvertraute zu verstehen, Frankfurt/M. 1994, 145-158, pp. 154-156.
3. Kohl, Karl-Heinz, "Ein verlorener Gegenstand? Zur Widerstandsfähigkeit autochthoner Religionen gegenüber dem Vordringen der Weltreligionen," in: Zinser, Hartmut (ed.), Religionswissenschaft: eine Einführung, Berlin 1988, 252-273.
4. Cf. Atkinson 1983.
5. Pampus 1994 (see note 2), 157.
6. Kipp/Rogers 1987, 4; 13.
7. Pampus 1994 (see note 2), 146.
8. Kohl 1988 (see note 3), 258.

Literature

Atkonson, Jane, "Religions in Dialogue: The Construction of an Indonesian Minority Religion," in: American Ethnologist 10/4 (1983), 684-696; Cribb, Robert/Kahin, Audrey, Historical Dictionary of Indonesia, Lanham ^{2}2004; Geertz, Clifford, Islam Observed, Chicago 1968; Kipp, Rita/Rogers, Susan (eds.), Indonesian Religions in Transition, Tucson 1987; Ricklefs, M. C., A History of Modern Indonesia: C. 1300 to the Present, London 1981; Stöhr, Waldemar, Die altindonesischen Religionen, Leiden 1976.

→ Islam, Monotheism, Tourism

Holger Jebens

Industrial Society

Concepts and Contexts

1. Since the Second World War, the concept of the industrial society has become a broadly accepted earmark of that technologically and economically highly developed society that has replaced the primarily agricultural and laboring 'pre-industrial' society in North America and Europe, just as, increasingly, in the countries of the 'Third World' as well. The denomination indicates, first and foremost, the dominant importance of the industrial method of production. In this method, a technical organization of the factory prevails, along with the further development of 'manufacturing,' in factories, with the introduction of machinery, with a clear division of labor, with intensive application of capital, with mass production, and with the use of predominantly unskilled workers. In the stricter sense, it characterizes, among other things, a mode of production that relies on 'coal and steel,' and thus on the exploitation of fossil energies and heavy industry (metal work, iron smelting). In addition, it frequently serves as an umbrella concept for the 'modern' type of society, produced by the industrial revolution ('industrialization'), and marked by the appearance and utilization of the factory system, with all of the resulting changes in the overall economy and society. The conceptual connotations comprise a bundle of typical processes and structures such as: industrial → progress as the basis of economic growth (with an attendant rise of the standard of living, increased holiday time, well-being of the masses, consumer dynamics); the rise of centers of concentration in large cities (urbanization); differentiation of function-specific societal areas or subsystems of societal areas; bureaucratization; dismantling of state-assured social security; skyrocketing opportunities for mobility and communication (railroad and auto traffic, telephone, radio, mass media, new media); accelerated social changes; growing social and political formation; extensive division between paid employment and family life; broadening of training, and specialization in trades and professions; modernized lifestyle; changes in population processes (migration to near and far destinations, lower birth rate, longer life expectancy). In this society, a secular system of values and norms has prevailed, in which the determining factors for thought and behavior are a consistent rationality, innovation, (market) competition, achievement, and success, as the principal values guaranteeing dynamic progress. Industrialization—despite cyclical and structural crises (world economic crisis beginning in 1929)—gained considerable success in remedying mass poverty and unemployment, but bound up with that achievement (and soon sharply criticized) were human (social) problems and (generally noticed only in recent times) ecological risks.

Theories and theorems on the industrial society feature various emphases of perspective, and different conceptual definitions. An attachment of the overall society to a single, technologically determined employment process remains problematic. Marxist theoreticians reject it, as concealing the class structures of a highly developed capitalistic society, which are to be overcome.

Genesis

2. The 'industrial revolution' that began in England around 1760, then 'took off,' comprehensively and rapidly, in a period of 'big spurts' (in Great Britain about 1820, in Germany about 1850). Such comprehensive generalizations are nonetheless at least relativized by more recent interpretations of this 'revolution.' These emphasize temporal and regional differences in the transition to an industrial society, for example on the part of advances in nutrition and health that are independent of industry. To an extent, industrial society has been divided into periods up to the present—with phases of accelerated alterations—that followed four 'industrial revolutions' as successive basic innovations adopted worldwide: accordingly, present society is imprinted with the 'revolution in communication' (basis: digitalized electronics), which is presently—with the turn of the millennium—entering the fifth industrial revolution (basis: innovations in biochemistry and gene technology). For the present, often a societal type is being adopted that developed in the decades after 1950—with cover-concepts like 'service society,' 'postindustrial,' 'postmodern society,' or—with Ulrich Beck's emphasis on the individualization of social inequality and on 'reflexive modernization'—'risk society.'

Religion between For and Against

3. Often Janus-headed, religions seem to present a complex mix of opposition and acceptance of certain processes and structures within and vis-à-vis industrial society. Internally, a wide antithesis between a 'fundamentalist' reference and 'progressive' eruption is at hand, rendered more acute by the threat of an erosion of traditional religiosity. In the religions first affected in West and Central Europe or the United States, approaches to a solution were exercised by anticipation:

- Since the second half of the eighteenth century, Protestantism aimed at a re-Christianization through awakening movements, with English Methodism even reaching the industrial proletariat.
- In Roman → Catholicism, a discussion of the 'social question' emerged (papal encyclicals), along with outbreaks of a liberal Catholicism. This development overlapped, however, with 'ultramontanization' (a shield against Enlightenment thinking and, especially in family and sexual ethics, against a modern lifestyle, with a revitalized piety under papal direction).
- 'Christian factories' sprang up and, in the late nineteenth century, a Christian trade union was formed, on an ecumenical model (first interconfessional trade-union congress, in Mainz in 1899).
- A broad spectrum of social and political education took shape, most notably a special ministry to large cities or industry, which produced new organizations and specialized groups: the → Salvation Army, or, in Germany, the 'Interior Mission'—later Caritas—undertaking a global approach to → Charitable Organizations.
- After the Second World War, conservative and socialistic Christian theories of state and society converged in the ecumenical consensus of a 'social market economy.'

4. The non-Christian religions have likewise developed specific mixtures of acceptance and reservation concerning certain elements of industrial progress, the reservations bearing especially on an exclusively earthly belief in reason and on a modern lifestyle. New Japanese religions can be regarded as a model for an extensive affinity for material values.

5. For the thoroughgoing critics of industrial society, as well as the disadvantaged and needy of the same, the religions win specific meaning. On the one hand, religions offer mental security in a salvation community that relativizes earthly hardships and injustices, and on the other, they organize material relief for the underprivileged (foundations: taxes, various institutionalizations).

Literature

Aron, Raymond, The Industrial Society: Three Essays on Ideology and Development, London 1967; Badham, Richard J., Theories of Industrial Society, London 1986; Casey, Catherine, Work, Self, and Society: After Industrialism, London 1995; Klöckler, Michael/Tworuschka, Udo (eds.), Ethik der Religionen—Lehre und Leben, 5 vols., Munich 1984–1986; Kumar, Krishan, From Post-Industrial to Post-Modern Society: New Theories of the Contemporary World, Oxford 1995.

→ Economy, European History of Religion, Media, Modernity/Modern Age, Postmodernity, Work

Michael Klöcker

Initiation

Concept

1. The word 'initiation' derives from the Latin initium, 'entry,' which also denotes 'introduction' or, precisely, 'initiation.' With the Romans, initia became a term for participation in Mysteries (→ Antiquity). The concept generally denominates a series of ritual acts, behavioral precepts, and instructions, 'staging' and creation of a radical transformation of the social and religious status of an individual or group (→ Ritual). It can refer to such varied forms as collective initiation into an age group, initiation into so-called totem groups, secret societies, mysteries, or fraternities, or even the qualification and installation of a religious specialist such as a shaman, magician, prophet, or healer. Arnold van Gennep coined (1909) the expression, still in use today, of 'rites of passage,' for the structural ritual schemata corresponding to initiation into the successive stages of the life cycle, such as birth, puberty, matrimony, or illness and death—or even for social alterations, for example the creation of a chieftain. In these, the individual symbolically abandons an ordered space, undertaking a phase of transition to a new one. The dangers and ambivalences of the exchange govern the rituals. In his systematic study, van Gennep argued that there is a three-phase structure in rituals of passage generally, which can be applied—with different stresses—globally and to altogether different rites: (1) rites of separation, (2) threshold or transformation rites, and (3) rites of incorporation.

2. In traditional societies, the initiation (usually collective) of youth is of special significance. It denotes not only their integration, and an 'orderly switch' of generations, but also the distribution and stabilization of power. During the initiation, youth receive a systematic introduction into the foundational mythic traditions, the ritual activity patterns, and

After a nine-year pause, the Bamileke, of Bafoussam in Cameroon, took up the tradition of initiation once more. The Chief of Bafoussam, who in 1975 had to give up a career as a soccer player in order to guide the destinies of his home region, was opposed to the local traditions. Under him, initiations died out in 1975, to be intensively resumed only in 1984, in order, among other things, to strengthen the social cohesion of the Bamileke, who live in large numbers in distant cities of the country or even in the United States. In the picture, a group of first initiands are seen (with headdress of medicine leaves). Higher initiates (with ginger plants in their hands) lead them, to afford them spiritual protection against bush spirits and other dangers. Initiations take place every two years and comprise nine ceremonies for different age groups, which stretch from December to March. The first initiands are, as a rule, nine or ten years old. In view of such a long interruption, however, older youth took part in this initiation, as well. Families sometimes travel long distances to their home region to celebrate the initiation festival there. (Benita von Behr)

In Vajrayana Buddhism, initiations are of great importance, as they empower initiands to undertake a particular contemplative practice. In 1985, Khyentse Rimpoche gathered this group of lamas in a tent on the property of the exiled Tibetan monastic college of Shechen in Nepal. The initiation runs through various phases, in which the lamas, under direction, meditate and visualize, in order thereupon to step forward to the master to be blessed. Khyentse Rimpoche now touches them with various ritual objects, or, as shown here, sprinkles them with a few drops of moisture from a ceremonial vase adorned with peacock feathers. (Benita von Behr)

the secret knowledge, of their ethnic group. Further, neophytes (from Gk., "new plant," "sprout," and thus also "initiands," "novices") experience a group solidarity (communitas) that is important for the cohesion of the community as a whole. To this purpose, initiands are frequently separated very early, and for a great length of time, from the world of their mothers and sisters. The social 'production of maleness' (Godelier) is the business of men alone. There the novices must master multiple tests of courage, with trials of their mastery of fear that often include traumatic experiences, all ritually staged as passage through death and rebirth. Ritual acts also include the marking of the body, as by painting, tattooing, 'scarification' ('inslitting') and haircutting, as well as painful operations such as nosebleeds, tooth extraction, and → circumcision. For example, as anthropologist and scholar of religion Hartmut Zinser has discovered in his research with the Central Australian tribes of the Aranda, the boy is first 'smoked': that is, he must expose himself to smoke over a heap of foliage that has been set afire. Then the men bite him in the scalp, creating wounds that thereafter will be borne as trophies, and symbols of maturity. The third phase of the initiation consists in circumcision. The fourth, the phase in which the youth first becomes an actual man, is the 'subincision': the urethra is slit, from the base of the penis to the glans. In some Australian societies, pubertal male children were thereafter compelled to perform what was formally regarded as their first sex act.

The integration of the new generation serves two purposes: the reproduction of the ethnic group as a whole, and the assurance that there will be men and women capable of procreation. Girls are frequently initiated individually, in rites and ceremonies most often bearing on menarche.

Their initiation is likewise concerned with the ritual production of gender identity, as also with preparation for marriage, gender-specific work, and future pregnancy. Recent field studies, usually conducted by female researchers, have shown that the ceremonies of female initiation are just as complex as are those of the male. Besides the aspect of compulsion, and the reproduction to which it is ordered, there are the drive and power wishes of the upcoming generation, according to received forms and ancestral models. There is also a theatrical and performative dimension (masks, obscenity). At times, an element of fear is involved.

Theories

3. The systematic investigation and research of rituals of initiation began around 1900, when so much comparative material from all parts of the earth became available to researchers. The extent to which European interpretation of rituals was propelled by subjectivity in the form of yearnings and fears is shown by the enthusiastic reception of a 1902 study, Männerbünde und Altersklassen ("Associations of Men and Age Classes") of ethnologist Heinrich Schurtz. This author develops the thesis that the 'omnipresent' institution of associations of men is the vehicle par excellence in the history of gender, of culture. In the footsteps of Bronislaw Malinowski, modern anthropology has concentrated predominantly on the social function of the initiation rituals. This function is said to lie especially in the reproduction of social stability and solidarity. For phenomenologist of religion Mircea → Eliade—as for his predecessor, cultural morphologist A. E Jensen—the special meaning of the rituals of initiation is that of a staging of 'death and rebirth.' The initiation process rehearses the cosmologic deeds of heroic ancestors, as they were accomplished in illo tempore (Lat., 'in those [ancient] times'). Following Freud's theory of the 'Oedipus complex,' the psychoanalytic interpretation of initiation was that circumcision, especially, was a ritual generation of 'castration fear' and a dramatization of the conflict of the generations. Recent ethno-psychoanalytic research, instead, concentrates on the connection between power and sexual or birth jealousy. In the most recent studies conducted in cultural anthropology on the social production of maleness as 'gender identity,' these approaches have been broadened, and in part supplemented in terms of a Western perspective of comparison.

4. Rituals of initiation, or ceremonies resembling rituals of initiation, for the reception of youth into religious communities, have been and are celebrated not in 'tribal religions' alone, but in the so-called world religions, as well. In manifold transformations, and frequently in disconnection from their erstwhile social and religious meaning, fragments of ritual also exist in modern society, as in holidays and sporting events (for instance, in bungee jumping).

5. In cultural studies, the newly kindled interest in rituals has led to a rediscovery of the efforts of English social anthropologist Victor Turner. Turner further develops van Gennep's approach, concentrating on the experience of communitas, and on the 'play space' of the 'threshold phase.' He regards the status of initiands—of the 'betwixt and between,' of 'border-crossers' vis-à-vis the normal—as unbolting the space of creative renewal and reflection without which no society can subsist and prosper.

Literature

Bettelheim, Bruno, Symbolic Wounds: Puberty Rites and the Envious Male, London 1955; Eliade, Mircea, Rites and Symbols of Initiation: The Mysteries of Birth and Rebirth, New York 1965; Gilmore, David D., Manhood in the Making: Cultural Concepts of Masculinity, New Haven 1990; Mead, Margaret, Male and Female: A Study of the Sexes in a Changing World, New York 1949; Turner, Victor, The Ritual Process: Structure and Anti-Structure, Chicago 1969; van Gennep, Arnold, The Rites of Passage, London 1960 (French [1]1909).

→ Ancestors, Baptism, Body, Dance, Death and Dying, Group, Holy, Life Cycle, Ritual, Sacrifice, Symbol/Sign/Gesture

Ulrike Brunotte

Inquisition

The term 'Inquisition' (Lat., inquisitio, 'investigation'), denotes (1) a rational and reasonable juridical process in ecclesiastical law developed in the course of the thirteenth century, (2) an ecclesiastical office for the combating of → heresy, existing from 1231 to 1965, and (3) a symbol of religious or state intolerance and repression of dissidents and outsiders in a society.

The Inquisition Process

1. The inquisition process was conceived by Pope Innocent III, between 1198 and 1213, as a new form of disciplinary procedure against clerics. A material argument, officially introduced, was now required in the process of the 'Inzicht' (from Frankish, inzihten, 'accuse'), which had come down from the early Middle Ages, and which had been initiated on the basis of 'ill repute.' Unlike the process of accusation—which required a complaint formally submitted to the judge as an accusation of wrongdoing—now, upon receipt of evidence and interrogation of witnesses, the judge could independently initiate the inquisition process, as an official crime, in case of a public or private denunciation. Conceptually, the process of inquisition represented a certain formal progress in the creation of rational means for the conduct of evidence and the pronouncement of a verdict, in place of formerly received irrational and unreasonable bases of judicial finding, such as an enthusiasm for purification, a judgment of God ('ordeal'), or private litigation. On the other hand, after 1252 a special juridical ordering was developed; the most significant mises à point of the so-called summary heretic process were:

- Withholding of the denunciator's identity from the accused;
- Admissibility of transgressors, excommunicated persons, and so on, as witnesses;
- Restrictive rules for legal advocates in court;
- Application, according to determinate rules, of torture for the purpose of obtaining confessions, on grounds of the categorization of heresy as 'public injury' and 'injury of the divine majesty,' according to Roman law;
- In case of a relapse, or recalcitrance, on the part of the transgressor, immediate commission of the latter to the secular arm of government.

2. From 1231 onward, Pope Gregory X and his successors implemented the newly created procedural form, with more precise directives in place for the combating of heresy, which up until then had been in the hands of the episcopal court. In the thirteenth century, it was the Cathari of southern France, especially, whom the new form and directives concerned, as in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries the Waldenses, Beguines, Hussites, and → witches. Inquisitors delegated by the Pope were independent, as well as under episcopal delegation or oversight. They frequently came from the Dominican or Franciscan orders. At first, Inquisitors worked individually, but from 1252 onward at the latest, with the bull Ad Extirpanda of Pope Innocent IV, an office (Officium Inquisitionis), and individual commissions as special courts, were established for the prosecution of the effort against heretics. In case of a death sentence, the secular court system was responsible for its execution. Usually, however, the sentences handed down by the Inquisitors stipulated only penance or imprisonment. The heretics' goods were confiscated, and later generations could also be made civilly responsible. Thus, there was room in the process of heresy for numerous abuses and violations of procedure. Inquisition manuals, such as the Directorium Inquisitorum (1376) of the Inquisitor General of Aragon, Nikolaus Eymerich, evince the wish for systematization, and norms of application of inquisitorial activity. Along with the widening of the concept of an inquisition into heresy, and other offenses, like → apostasy, → magic, and sorcery, the inquisitorial phenomenon overflowed into areas that no longer had to do with matters of belief: political trials, of the Templars (1307/12) and → Joan of Arc (1431), crimes of murder, popular uprisings, conflicts of the mendicant orders with the parochial clergy and with the cities, were all subjected to appropriate application. The heresy inquisitors of the late Middle Ages, usually professors of theology, contributed to the spread of the stereotypes of a → demonology being practiced by heretics who were in league with the devil, and in their anti-heretical preaching occasioning a widespread fear of the → devil among the population.

Modern Developments

In the fifteenth century, the Inquisition fell, especially in Germany and France. In Italy, Spain, and Portugal, however, as well as in their possessions abroad, it not only continued to exist, but actually reached its climax. The best-known example of a state inquisition is that of Spain, where inquisition existed from 1478 to 1834, pronouncing its last death sentence in 1781. At the end of the fifteenth century, the Spanish inquisition became the instrument for the persecution of converted Jews ('Marranos'/'Conversos') and Muslims ('Conversos'). State and church staged the executions in pompous, public 'dramas of death,' and a demonstrative 'act of faith' (Lat., actus fidei; Span., auto da fé), with processions and presentation of the heretics. In the sixteenth century, in the wake of the Counter-Reformation, the inquisition was reformed: Paul III's bull Licet ab Initio was followed by the imposition of the central direction of the papal inquisition by Rome, administered through a supreme judicial office, the Santo Offizio (Ital., "Holy Office"). The most important document to be issued by this tribunal, which was composed of six cardinals and which was in existence from 1559 through 1965, was the "Roman Index of Forbidden Books" (Index Librorum Prohibitorum). As the institutional extension of the Roman Inquisition, aiming at the proclamation of the gospel and correct doctrine, the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith was set up in 1965, under its first Prefect, Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger. On 22 January 1998, the Roman Congregation of the Faith opened free access to the archives of the Inquisition for its store of acts up until 1903.

Owing to a massive loss of documentary sources, especially during the Napoleonic era, the entire number of the judicial processes of the Inquisition in Europe and abroad cannot be estimated. An old catalogue of the Spanish Inquisition, the collection of the relaciones de causas (Span., 'reports of cases'), presents, between 1540 and 1700, some 100,000 cases. Especially well known are the trials for false belief of Jan Hus (1415), Girolamo Savonarola (1497/98), Giordano Bruno (1592–1600)—all three of whom were burned alive at the stake—and Galileo Galilei (1632/33), who recanted and survived.

Myth of the Inquisition

3. The myth of the 'Inquisition' is one of the widespread clichés bearing on the 'Dark Ages.' Since the debates of the Enlightenment over tolerance and toleration, 'Inquisition' has stood for torture chambers and burnings at the stake, offers sanguinary scenarios for Colportage novels and horror films, and is a central point of accusation in the criticism of Christianity and the Church. The distorted presentations of Inquisitor Bernard Gui (c. 1261–1331) in Umberto Eco's novel, The Name of the Rose (1980) and in the film of the same name by Jean-Jacques Annaud (1985) are well known. In Dostoevsky's short story, "The Grand Inquisitor," from his novel The Brothers Karamazov, the figure of the Inquisitor who imprisons Christ and confesses himself to be the Anti-Christ, is used for sharp critiques of Western European Christianity, and of the Roman Church as the incarnation of secular, worldly power. The existence of an Inquisition-like instance is scarcely limited to the Roman Church, any more than an absolute claim to truth and religious intolerance is limited to → Christianity or totalitarian regimes. One recalls the persecution of Communists by McCarthyism in the United States, 1950–1954. But an evaluation of the Inquisition as a precursor of modern totalitarianism, the administrative machinery of the Gestapo, and the KGB, is at least problematic. On grounds of the difference prevailing between those terms with regard to historical conditions of derivation and construction, a distinct terminology should be selected, yet without belying what is comparable—a repressive subjection of dissidents, be they religious, social, or political. Phenomena resembling the inquisition are to be found in other world religions, as well: even institutionally, Islam threatens apostasy with capital punishment, and knows a scrutinium (Lat., 'scrutiny') of the faith of a person or group. The Minha, or 'inquisition,' from the era of Caliph al-Ma'mun (ninth century), is well known. Applicability of the terminology is just as disputed here as it is in an evaluation of the Hindu caste system as an expression of socio-religious intolerance.

Historical research has turned to a more sober appraisal of the Inquisition, without attempting to belie the amount of human suffering bound up with it. The administrative machinery and the element of spying and informing utilized by the Inquisition, indeed presents an effective instrument of overall social control and discipline, of which European princes readily availed themselves. In principle, anyone could become a victim of the Inquisition, in the late Middle Ages or in early modern times, as the → witch trials show. But secular courts also, and principally, conducted witch trials. The potential efficacy of an examination of heretics by the Inquisition was a question of power, since the heretic's social reference system was of decisive importance for the fact, the nature, and the conditions of a penalty to be imposed. The heterodox and outsiders of society could thus more easily become victims. The fundamental idea of the Inquisition, the violent defense of all that was regarded as religious truth in the view of the Church, has been subjected to abundant criticism in modern times. Galileo's rehabilitation in 1992 and the Pope's mea culpa in 2000 show the new will within the Catholic Church to face the transgressions of the past, including the lawful murders of the Inquisition.

Literature

Sources: van der Vekene, Emil, Bibliotheca bibliographica historiae sanctae Inquisitionis, 3 vols., Vaduz 1982–1992.

Secondary Literature: Elliott, Dyan, Proving Woman: Female Spirituality and Inquisitional Culture in the Later Middle Ages, Princeton 2004; Henningsen, Gustav/Tedeschi, John (eds.), The Inquisition in Early Modern Europe: Studies on Sources and Methods, Dekalb 1986; Kamen, Henry, The Spanish Inquisition: A Historical Revision, New Haven 1997; Netanyahu, B., The Origins of the Inquisition in Fifteenth-Century Spain, New York [2]2001; Peters, Edward, Inquisition, New York 1988; Roth, Cecil, The Spanish Inquisition, New York 1964; Wendehorst, Stephan (ed.), The Roman Inquisition, the Index and the Jews: Contexts, Sources and Perspectives, Leiden 2004.

→ Apostasy, Christianity, Fear/Dread, Heresy, Law, Tolerance, Truth/Dogma, Witch/Persecution of Witches

Werner Tschacher

Insanity

'Insanity' and 'Delusion'

1. The term 'insanity' no longer exists in recent international systems of psychiatric classification. There is, on the other hand, the concept of delusion, which can occur either (a) as a functional illusory disturbance ('paranoia'), or (b) with diseases of the schizophrenic group, and further, (c) as an organic illusory disturbance occurring with illnesses of the brain (tumor, inflammation of the brain), or (d) as an induced psychotic disturbance through the ingestion of psychotropic substances (e.g., after taking LSD or mescaline). Forms of delusory experience can express themselves, first, as a relational delusion (a persecution, love, or jealousy illusion), or, second, as illusory perceptions in the form of hallucinations (synaesthesia, deceptive perceptions). In the latter case, hallucinations can take place through any of the senses. The term 'delusory experience' should be reserved to a state of development when a child has passed the magical and mystical stage of preschool and kindergarten, i.e. when a commonly experienced reality has won dominance over childishly fantasized 'parareality.' An 'induced delusory disturbance' occurs when other, usually dependent persons take over such delusory conceptualizations (e.g., folie à deux, folie en famille—Fr., 'pair insanity,' 'family insanity').

Illusory Conditions in Religions

2. Deranged, illusory conditions and modes of experience are found in the area of religion as ecstatic feelings of exaltation, as experiences of revelation, as experiences of oneness in religious 'joy psychoses,' or in psychotic conditions with religious delusory content. But ecstatic moments and conditions of rapture also belong to normal human existence, in the sense of 'peak experiences,' extraordinary 'experiences of heights and depths.'

Drug-induced 'consciousness broadening' can lead to terrifying pseudo-hallucinations ('bad trips'), to negative post-acoustical conditions recurring later ('flashbacks'), or on occasion, to a persistent drug-induced psychosis. In → shamanism, through trance-induction (e.g. through the ingestion of hallucinogens, through dance or music) the shaman's perception is altered, as she or he surrenders to a journey of the soul partly attended with extra-corporeal experiences, with the feeling of 'being out of oneself,' in order to attain a restructuring or transformation of the patient, or to find the solution of a social conflict. Divine delusion was rendered perceptible to the senses in Greek mythology, for example, in the Erinyes. As (female) avengers of outrageous crimes and murders, these figures embody the destructive potential of conditions of human exception. 'Madness' (in Gr., manía) is to be equated partially with 'trance,' more precisely with 'possession' (Gr., enthousiasmós). It is to be distinguished from today's psychiatric concept of mania, which denotes an exalted mood with an exaggerated impulse to activity.

Mass Delusory Phenomena

3. Mass delusory phenomena belong in the area of social psychology (→ Masses). Here it is a matter of 'ideological' or 'socio-mythical' distortions of perception, which can actually lead to a loss of reality. It has existed in both the religious and the political areas of past and present: along with the children's crusades, the → witch and racial crazes (→ Race/Racism) are the most striking ones of the past. A loss of the reality of stereotyped or ideologized perception should be distinguished from mass suggestion, which affects persons in closed groups, and entices them to aggressive (pogrom) or even self-destructive activity. In such cases, a disastrous catalyzing function is often exercised by religious leaders who go on a journey to death with their followers in a kind of expanded → suicide journey. The mass suicide of Jim Jones's People's Temple sect in Guyana or the incidents around the "Heaven's Gate" community are examples of this kind of latter-day 'sectarian' catastrophes having the character of mass delusion.

→ Enthusiasm, Intoxication/Drugs/Hallucinogens, Perception, Psyche, Psychopathology, Suicide, Trance, Vision/Auditory Experiences

Gunther Klosinski

Intellectual Religion

1. Intellectuals are customarily deemed to be advocates of a rationalistic, enlightened, and secular understanding of the world, and consequently the sheerest imaginable contrast to the religious person. However, aside from the fact that members of educated classes have at all times been (co-) formers of religious thought and the corresponding practice (→ priests, monks, clergy, theologians, highly educated laity), there have also always existed religious concepts that have been specially drafted, believed, and rationally attested by educated persons.

History

2. Discourse upon specific intellectual religions, however, has been appropriate only since the appearance of the modern concept of an intellectual, in the Dreyfus affair of 1898,[1] or with the socio-historically relevant emergence of modern intellectuals who had outgrown the traditional educated middle class. Max → Weber's sociology of religion has given intellectuals, for the first time, a high rating, systematic as well as historical, in the genesis of the most important of the religions. On the other hand, Weber encountered the new religions of his contemporaries at the turn of the century with skepticism. In his ongoing examination of them, and their precise conjuncture with an educated class, he held impotence and de-politicization to be the essential requirements of these modern forms of an intellectual religiosity of redemption. This judgment did not go without refutation—Ernst Troeltsch and Georg Simmel judged otherwise. However, Weber's critique of the modern religious intellectual affords criteria for the diagnosis of contemporary intellectual religion down to our day.[2]

It is the so-called → New Age religion, an overall concept for an immensity of religious artifacts, imports, and syncretisms of religious, aesthetic, and scholarly traditions, that can bring Weber's theses upon a 'specifically intellectualistic need for salvation' to fruition. As a rule, Weber alleges these 'needs' to be a matter of redemption from inner need, a question of the overall bestowal of the meaning of life, in societal connections as well as in those of 'cosmic nature' (→ Meaning/Signification). The systematic devaluation of classical fields of politics, which devaluation can be observed in an abundance of new religious discourse, seems to confirm Weber's reflections on the connection of religious romanticism, political powerlessness, and social frustration.

Forms and Notes of Intellectual Religion: Mysticism, 'Gnosis,' and Exoticism

3. Concentration and reflection are foundational intellectual techniques of work. Directed upon religion, they envisage enlightenment and cognition— → mysticism and → gnosticism. A renaissance of mysticism, and a (neo)-gnosis—even before 1900, preferred forms of intellectual religiosity—are therefore components even of today's religious discourse, with its special affinity for intellectual problems and life situations: they permit extremely individualistic religious experiences and encounters, the auto-sacralization of educated individuals, and the recoding of educative experiences to religious ones. The mix of primordially religious and scientific patterns of interpretation can stand as the signature of intellectual religion then, for example in the Freigeistige Bewegung (Ger., 'free spirit movement'),[3] just as in today's New Age. Here the paradox arises that a criticism of rationality and progress are assured of their place in terms of cultural criticism, in the dress of strictly scientific arguments or new faith convictions, overflowing with a scientific discourse whose understanding presupposes a relatively high degree of formation (cf. Rudolf Steiner's Anthroposophy; Fritjof Capra's Tao of Physics).

Intellectual drafts of meaning are oftentimes characterized by a specific inner as well as outer exoticism. Traditions styled as the autochthonous popular piety of a particular cultural circle are just as eagerly amalgamated as any random kind of tribal religion—or what passes for one. Hard ethnological cognitions, stores of knowledge in religious studies, and pure artifacts, in the presence of numerous adaptations of so-called primitive religions that enjoy great preference on the market of new religions, are mingled to the point of being indistinguishable.

Intellectual longing for redemption from (one's own) intellectuality, that frequent companion of intellectual discourse, is expressed with an emphasis on corporeally emotional, 'unsublimated,' religious experiences. An affinity to experiences of the irrational (Ludwig Klage's Der Geist als Widersacher der Seele, 1929–1933; Ger., "The Spirit as Adversary of the Soul") is highly salient in the turn to ritual and cult as primary forms of religion—to the neglect of reason and language ('logocentrism') in favor of myth and → 'experience.' In cultural circles scored by Christianity, the otherwise highly heterogeneous new religious concepts as a rule incorporate their anti-Christian, ecclesiophobic thrust, thus exerting pressure in the direction of a paganization of one's own religious convictions (→ Paganism/Neopaganism).[4] Criticism of priests and theologians of established religions can be packaged by dissident intellectuals in a self-promotion to the condition of shaman, prophet, or → guru, while corresponding exemplars are usually sought and found in extra-European, non-Christian religions (→ Reception). The spiritual testimonials of the figures of intellectual founders (classic cases: Helena Petrovna Blavatsky for Theosophy, Rudolf Steiner for Anthroposophy; → Theosophical/Anthroposophical Society) can themselves assume the status of sacred scripture, and the fundamental figures themselves can enjoy extensive cultic veneration, which immunizes them against any form of rationalistic criticism.

Media

4. All programmatic criticism of rationality notwithstanding, intellectual religion is a book religion, in a particular sense. Without a well-developed, highly pluralized book and newspaper market, the new religious syncretisms, like the outlines of → private religion, would find neither producers nor adepts. Books and/or newspapers can become the core of the formation of community, circle, and association—the customary social forms precisely of intellectual religions (circle of the "Cosmics," c. 1895–1903; Stefan George circle, 1903–1933; "Princeton gnosis" of the 1970s). Religious consecration can be produced by lectures—if not indeed by the invitations of the culture of free time and adult education (seminars, workshops). The abundance and variety of offers of market-mediated bestowal of meaning reinforces the lack of orientation on the part of the seekers of meaning, relativizes certitudes once acquired, and leads to the compulsive need of an ongoing reassurance in respect of the self and the new. The economically conditioned innovation drive of the media culture encourages and reinforces this kind of search-for-meaning movement.

1. Storch, Benita, "Der Fall Dreyfus in Deutschland," in: Puschner, Uwe/Schmitz, Walter/Ulbricht, Justus H. (eds.), Handbuch zur "Völkischen Bewegung" 1871–1918, Munich 1996, 464-481.
2. Kippenberg, Hans G., chap. 2, "Intellektualismus in den Erlösungsreligionen," in: Idem, Die vorderasiatischen Erlösungsreligionen in ihrem Zusammenhang mit der antiken Stadtherrschaft, Frankfurt/M. 1991, 61-84.
3. Simon-Ritz, Frank, Die Organisation einer Weltanschauung. Die freigeistige Bewegung im Wilhelminischen Deutschland, Gütersloh 1997.
4. Von Schnurbein, Stefanie, Religion als Kulturkritik. Neugermanisches Heidentum im 20. Jahrhundert, Heidelberg 1992.

Literature

Antes, Peter/Pahnke, Donate (eds.), Die Religion von Oberschichten. Religion—Profession—Intellektualismus, Marburg 1989; Bassler, Moritz/Châtellier, Hildegard (eds.), Mystique, mysticisme et modernité en Allemagne autour de 1900/Mystik, Mystizismus und Moderne in Deutschland um 1900, Strasburg 1998; Collini, Stefan et al. (eds.), History, Religion, and Culture: British Intellectual History, 1750–1950, Cambridge 2000; Hübinger, Gangolf/Mommsen, Wolfgang J. (eds.), Intellektuelle im Deutschen Kaiserreich, Frankfurt/M. 1993; Lacey, Michael J. (ed.), Religion and Twentieth-Century American Intellectual Life, Cambridge 1989; Read, Christopher, Religion, Revolution, and the Russian Intelligentsia, 1900–1912, Totowa 1979; Shils, Eduard, "Intellectuals," in: Encyclopedia of Religion 7 (1987), 259-263; Williamson, George S., The Longing for Myth in Germany: Religion and Aesthetic Culture from Romanticism to Nietzsche, Chicago 2004.

→ Book, Esotericism, Gnosticism, Mysticism, New Age, Private Religion, Science, Weber

Justus H. Ulbricht

Interest

Market Economy / Solidarity

1. 'Interest' (from Lat., interesse, 'be between'—here, the 'difference' between two amounts of money) is profit from a loan, that is, from the deposit of monetary capital for a determinate time. With the emergence of a united currency market, the legitimacy of the charging of interest is scarcely discussed any longer; but the demand that the interest owed by the countries of the so-called Third World be condoned in a 'Jubilee Year 2000' harks back to an ancient religious demand in Judaism, Christianity, and Islam. In the foreground of considerations upon interest, up until the eighteenth century there stood the question of its ethical or moral justification. Especially on the side of the Church, strict elementary principles were maintained when it came to the taking of interest. In the Middle Ages, the Church imposed a prohibition on interest-taking, with an appeal to the Bible. The reason was that, in the economic relations of the time, unjustified profit could not be legally prohibited, so that what was being imposed is a prohibition of usury. However, with the gradual development of a money economy, and state control of the same, the taking of interest came to be regarded even by the Church as legally reconcilable.

Interest Theory and Interest Policy

2. With the development of the money → economy, the foundation of the bank of issue (→ Money), and the growing control of interest by interest and credit policy, economists and other thinkers (Tugot, Ricardo, Senior, Marx, Bohm-Bawerk, Keynes, etc.) developed theories that sought to explain the emergence and amount of interest. There is no universally valid theory of interest. Interest and credit policy, whose most important agent is the central bank of issue, by influencing money and credit volume, attempts to control overall economic goals, such as stabilization of price levels, full employment, extra-economic balance, and adequate growth. The interest policy of the credit institution establishes the rates of interest for deposit, its own debit prescriptions, and credits. Since the liberalization of interest in 1967, there have been no maximum interest rates established by the state. The amount of interest, like any other price, depends on supply and demand, such as on the extent of savings, and the liquidity of the overall economy, and, on the demand side, on the expected earning power of capital. The monetary interest-theories emerging under the influence of J. M. Keynes[1] stress the dependence of interest on the amount of money at hand, and on the psychological need for liquidity on the part of the person handling an economy.

Judaism and Christianity

3. The Babylonians and Assyrians employed a developed system of interest payments on loans. The Jews were allowed to charge foreigners interest, as the latter themselves did—not, however, fellow Jews. In Greek and Roman antiquity, philosophers and statesmen, as representatives of the landed upper class (Plato, Aristotle, Cato, Seneca), spoke out against the charging of interest. However, legal proscriptions of interest taking could not be maintained. In later Roman imperial times, laws established maximum rates of interest (for example, with Diocletian and Constantine, twelve percent per annum), but could of course not effectively hinder the taking of unlawful interest. Witness ancient Christian literature, with its insistent warnings against the taking of interest, which it based on the Bible (Ps 14:5, Ezek 18:7ff., Luke 6:34). The First Council of Nicea (325) forbade all clerics to charge interest, as a sin against justice and mutual Christian love, and, in Carolingian times, the laity were similarly enjoined. Christian exporters, such as the Lombards, circumvented the prohibition of interest-taking, which had a growing effect on credit systems. Jews were not affected by the canonical prohibition. Inasmuch as church councils prohibited them from, among other things, inheriting land, farming, and numerous skilled occupations, they developed into magnates of the money system. Many anti-Semitic pogroms were unleashed by delinquent debtors. The 'Jewish usurer' was a stereotype of late ancient, medieval, and modern history, as of course throughout a National Socialist criticism of capitalism.

While, in the Middle Ages, credit largely concerned consumers—that is, loans served immediate use—loans from mid-sixteenth century onward were more and more applied as productive credit, that is, as income-producing capital. State law fixed the interest rate at five percent, and usury could be contained. The Church reacted to altered conditions by rescinding the ecclesiastical prohibition against taking interest. According to Catholic ecclesiastical law (since 1917; Codex Juris Canonici [Lat., "Code of Canon Law"], canon 1543), lawful interest-taking is permitted. Among the Reformers, Calvin permitted the taking of interest for production credit, while Luther provided for cooperative banks.

Islam

4. The Qur'an (sura 2:275) pronounces an express prohibition against interest-taking (prohibition of riba): "Those who charge interest will [at some future time] stand forth not otherwise than one who is seized by Satan. This [their punishment] therefore will be to say: 'Keeping shop and lending at interest are one and the same.'" In Mecca at the time of the Prophet, it was customary to double the sum of money (or kind) owed, along with the interest, when it could not be paid at the term of its falling due. Muhammad contrasted this with the good work of almsgiving. In Islamic history, the lending of interest along with the principal was the usage despite its prohibition, and various expositions of law (hiyal) were available for its justification, such as an approval of the empty formality of purchase. As in Christian Europe, the prohibition of taking interest favored the specialization of minorities in the banking business (as of the Jews in Morocco, the Greeks in Egypt, Hindu merchants in southern Asia). The tasks of religious foundations were often disputed out of capital interest. At present, conservative circles, for example in Pakistan, once more voice the demand for a banking prohibition; cooperative models, however, are an acceptable alternative.

1. Keynes, John Maynard, The General Theory of Employment, Interest and Money, London 1936.

Literature

LeGoff, Jacques, Your Money Or Your Life: Economy and Religion in the Middle Ages, New York 1988; Hardiman, David, Feeding the Baniya: Peasants and Usurers in Western India, New Delhi/Oxford 1996; Jones, Norman, God and the Moneylenders: Usury and the Law in Early Modern England, Oxford 1989; Kerridge, Eric, Usury, Interest, and the Reformation, Aldershot 2002; Little, Lester K., Religious Poverty and the Profit Economy in Medieval Europe, London 1978; Lutz, Friedrich A., The Theory of Interest, Dordrecht 1967; Shatzmiller, Joseph, Shylock Reconsidered: Jews, Moneylending, and Medieval Society, Berkeley 1989; Vogel, Frank E./Hayes, III, Samuel L., Islamic Law and Finance: Religion, Risk, and Return, The Hague 1998; Weber, Max, The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism, London 1991 ([1]1930).

→ Anti-Semitism, Capitalism, Charitable Organizations, Economy, Exchange/Gift, Money

Karin Kathöfer

Intoxication / Drugs / Hallucinogens

1. For millennia, human beings have applied the effect of various materials, primarily of vegetable origin, to their central nervous systems with varying intent: to alleviate pain, to intensify sensory perception, to calm or stimulate themselves, to invoke visions, or to have euphoric and spiritual experiences. The special physiological effect of this sort of 'intoxicant' results from the fact that it impacts certain mechanisms of the human brain: these materials often work on the sleeping-waking system, activate, impede, or concur with biochemical transmitters (e.g., neurotransmitters such as dopamine, noradrenalin, serotonin, endorphins) that are also activated with withdrawal of stimulation, with rhythmic, repeated stimulation, with over-stimulation, with sexual stimulation, and with pain. They vary widely in their addictive potential: for example, heroin demonstrates an extremely high potential for addiction, while LSD demonstrates none.

In many cultures, intoxicants are an elementary component of religious practice. The purpose of their cultic employment is to enable the user to undergo what is referred to as a direct divine experience, or to discover the highest reality, which is often identified with the intoxicant. The feeling of self-transcendence, in which the sense of the ego is lost, and which can go as far as the experience of death, can—depending on the religious environment—be experienced as spiritual purification or

Intoxicating Vegetable Drugs

Popular Name	Botanical Name	Active Component	Ingestion	Origin	Age	Purpose
Alcohol (wine, beer, etc.)	Vitis vinifera etc.	ethanol	Drinking	Mosaic Israel, Babylon, Egypt, Greece, Rome, Christianity (symbolic)	4000 BCE	Fertility, initiation, blood of Jesus
Alraun	Madragora officinarum	scopalamine, etc.	extract	Egypt, Greece, Middle Europe	1500 BCE	Healing, love potion
Ayahuasca (yagé, caapi)	Banisteriopsis caapi, B. inebrans, B. rusbyana, Psychotria viridis	harmaline (MAO-hamperer) and tryptamine, etc. DMT	extract	Orinoco, Amazonia, Ecuador, Colombia	in writing: 19th century	Purification, experience of the myths, initiation, contact with ancestors, prophecy, healing
Coca (coca mama)	Erythroxylon coca	cocaine, etc.	chewing, smoking	Andes	2500 BCE; in writing: 15th century	Sacrificial offering, oracle, medicine, means of narcotizing
Cohoba (yopo, vilca, parica)	Anadenanthera peregrina, A. colubrina, Piptadenia peregrina	DMT, bufotenine, β-carboline, etc.	sniffing	Northern Amazonia, Orinoko, Northern Argentina, Haiti	in writing: 15th century	Sharpening of the senses (hunting, war), prophecy
Datura (thorn apple, toloache, 'North Star flower')	Datura stramonium etc.	scopolamine, hyoscyamin, atropine, etc.	smoking, tea	India, China, Africa, Mexico, Central Europe	1000 CE	Narcotizing, influencing of nature, initiation
Deadly nightshade (belladonna)	Atropa belladonna	atropine, hyosciamine, hyoscine, etc.	tea	Europe, Mesopotamia		Healing, love potion
Eboka (iboga)	Tabernanthe iboga	ibogain	extract	West Central Africa	in writing: 19th century	Initiation, contact with ancestors
Epena	Virola species	DMT, 5-meo-DMT, etc.	sniffing	Western Amazonia, Orinoko	in writing: 20th century	Flight of the soul

Popular Name	Botanical Name	Active Component	Ingestion	Origin	Age	Purpose
Floripondio (Trees of the evil eagle, toa)	Brugmansia species	scopolamine, etc.	tea	Andes, Western Amazonia	in writing: 16th century	Healing, prophecy, initiation, protective spell
Fly agaric	Amanita muscaria	Muscimol, muscarine, ibotic acid, etc.	eating	→ Northern Eurasia, North America, Central Europe	4000 BCE	Shamanism, flight of the soul, healing
Hemp (bhang, marihuana, ganja, hash-ish, charras)	Cannabis indica, Cannabis sativa	THC (tetra-hydro-cannabinol), etc.	eating, drinking, smoking	Egypt, India, China, Arabia, Africa, Jamaica	medical: 16th century BCE; ritual (India): 800 BCE	Healing, song, study of sacred writings
Henbane	Hyoscyamus niger	hycoscyamin, scopolamine, etc.	drinking, salve, smoking	Egypt, Greece, Central Europe	1500 BCE	Healing, love potion, oracle
Jurema (ajuca)	Mimosa hostilis	DMT, etc.	extract, drinking	Eastern Brazil		War; ceremonial
Kava	Piper methysticum	kavaine, etc.	extract	Polynesia	18th century	Group ritual
Ololiuqui ('virgin seed,' 'snake bindweed')	Ipomea vio-lacea, Rivea corymbosa, Turbina corymbosa	lysergic acid, etc.	extract	Mexico	in writing: 16th century	Healing, prophecy
Opium (meconium, laudanum, tshandu, poppy)	Papaver somniferum	morphine, codeine, papaverine, etc.		Assyria, Sumer, Egypt, Greece, Arabia, India, China	2500 BCE	Healing, narcotizing, intoxication
Peyote (cactus)	Lophophora williamsii	mescaline, etc.	eating of whole cacti	Mexico (Hui-chol), Native American Church (North America)	Icono-graphy: 1000 BCE; in writing: 16th century	Pilgrimage to the origin, confession, healing, liturgical thanksgiv-ing and impetration
Psilocybe mushrooms (teonanacatl, 'divine meat')	Psilocybe species, Panaeolus sphinctrinus, Stropharia cubensis	psilocybine, psilocine	eating	Mexico, Cen-tral America, United States	Icono-graphy: 1000 BCE; in writing: 15th century	Healing, prophecy, invocation of the forces of nature

Popular Name	Botanical Name	Active Component	Ingestion	Origin	Age	Purpose
San Pedro (cactus)	Trichocereus species	mescaline, etc.	tea	Andes (Ecuador, Bolivia, Peru)	Iconography: 1500 BCE	Pilgrimage to the origin, flight of souls
Tobacco	Nicotiana species	nicotine	smoking sniffing massaging	America	in writing: 16th century	Healing, sacrificial offering, oracle, group ritual, visions rebirth. In many cultures it is only the priest or shaman who ingests the intoxicant, while in others it is the entire community (peyote cult). Many writers see intoxicants as a prerequisite for the emergence of religion and other cultural achievements (G. R. Wasson); others perceive them as a sign of decadence (M. → Eliade).

History

2. The use of intoxicants can be traced back to prehistory and antiquity. The very earliest sources suggest the use of poppy and cannabis. The Bible notes the intoxicating effect of alcohol and of intoxicants such as mandrake. A book of ancient Indian songs from the Ṛg Veda (c. 1500 BCE; → Hinduism) is dedicated to Soma (Sanskrit, 'Pressed Drink'), honored as a god. It describes the production of the homonymous, as yet not unambiguously identified, intoxicating drink and its inspiring effect on the Vedic poets. In ancient Iranian Zoroastrianism, we find haoma, the linguistic, and doubtless also material, equivalent of soma.

Three intoxicants have special importance and meaning for the religious history of Europe and Asia: alcohol, opium, and cannabis/hashish.

a) Alcohol: Beer manufacture is attested in Egypt as early as the fourth millennium BCE. In ancient Greece, the god Dionysus, in Rome Bacchus, are honored in fertility rites with the excessive use of wine. To be sure, intoxicants can be employed for other purposes than intoxication, which is evidenced by the example of Christianity: there, at the → Lord's Supper, wine is drunk. With the Reformed Churches, it is a symbol of the blood of Christ, while in Catholicism it is transformed, according to the doctrine of the transubstantiation, into blood (→ Drinking/Drink).

b) Opium poppy: The narcoticizing and euphoric effect of opium was known in Egypt and Sumer. The ancient Greek goddess Demeter is frequently pictured with poppies and cereals: her gift, among others, was to bestow relief from anxiety. In the Mysteries of Eleusis, dedicated to her, participants consumed the drink kykéon, which may have contained ergot as an intoxicant.[1]

Excessive use of opium was very widespread among the upper class of imperial Rome. In the seventh century CE, Arab merchants brought opium to India and China. Its employment as an intoxicant is first attested in China in the twelfth century. Like most intoxicants, opium and the alkaloid mineral mixture han-shi were used for exclusively secular enjoyment. Here

China played a special role. From the sixteenth century onward, opium was supplied to China through Portugal and England. At the beginning of the sixteenth century, in the form of the alcoholic solution laudanum, the medic Paracelsus introduced it again into Europe's medicine, where it has since served as an intoxicant as well. In the opium wars (1840–1842), England compelled China to lift trade limitations on opium, and addiction to that substance in China grew by leaps and bounds.

c) Cannabis: Cannabis was employed in cult practices as an intoxicant, at least as early as 800 BCE in India. In the eleventh century, its religiously motivated use is attested in Islamic territories, and in the Shiite sect of the batiniya (from this group the term 'assassin' derives, initially meaning 'hashish user'), where adherents took it in order to glimpse the paradise reached through death in Holy War. In India, down to our own day, Cannabis, principally in the form of the drink bhang, is ingested at many religious festivals, such as Shivaratri, Durga Puja, and Holi. The plant is regarded as sacred. It is smoked by many Indian ascetics in a precisely defined ritual as a sacrifice to the god Shiva, with a chillum, a special conical pipe, often set with pictures of Shiva or his son Ganesha (→ Sadhu). This cult finds a few followers in Western industrial nations. As 'Lord of the Flora,' Shiva is often represented with a datura blossom (Sans., dhattura) in his hair. In → Tantra, as well, the ingestion of intoxicating substances is important. Laborers from India and Central Africa brought cannabis to Jamaica, where the Rastafarian movement began in the nineteenth century, later to spread worldwide through reggae music. The Rastafarian ritual is modeled on the Christian Eucharistic celebration.

Indigenous Cultures

3. The religious use of intoxicants is demonstrable in many indigenous cultures (see table). The ritual employment in Polynesia of the mildly intoxicating drink kava was first described in the eighteenth century. A century later, the ritual use of the Central African iboga bush as a rite of initiation in the Bwiti cult is mentioned in writing. But both cults are certainly older than these testimonials.

Peyote Cult

One of the few instances of a religiously motivated, indigenous use of drugs that has survived mission and Westernization is the Peyote religion of the Huichole and other tribes of Mexico. It spread through North America in the nineteenth century, and there led to the establishment of the Native American Church (NAC), a confluence of various Indian peyote churches. The NAC and other non-Indian groups may legally ingest the cactus in a framework of divine service (→ North America [Traditional Religions]). In the Brazil of the early twentieth century, numerous legally recognized communities formed around the use of ayahuasca, such as Uniao de Vegetal, Barquinha, and Santo Daime. They appeared in the wake of so-called caoutchouc smoking in the region of the Amazon, spread in adapted forms in Brazilian cities, and then in the United States and Western Europe.

Ritual Drug Use in Western Modernity

4. Christian Europe and its product, today's Western hegemonial culture, possess their own 'drug profile,' as does any other culture. In terms of that profile, alcoholic products (beer, wine, whisky) have been socially acceptable since antiquity, and coffee and tea, as well as tobacco, since the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. New intoxicants often entered the West with soldiers, who used them in an attempt to make the horror of war bearable. Thus, Napoleon's soldiers brought cannabis smoking from Egypt to Europe. On similar grounds, GIs during the Vietnam War often used heroin, became addicted to it, and subsequently contributed to its spread in the United States. But the 'artistic avant-garde' also used intoxicants: in mid-nineteenth century, poets like Thomas de Quincey first described their intoxicated experiences. Arthur Rimbaud, Paul Verlaine, and Charles Baudelaire founded the Club de hashishins in fin-de-siècle Paris. Since the mid-nineteenth century, pharmacists have isolated morphine and numerous other botanical alkaloids such as cocaine and mescaline, or, as with heroin (originally used as a cough syrup), MDMA (3,4 methylendioxy-N-methylamphetamine, known as Ecstasy or Adam), and LSD (lysergic acid diethylamide), synthetically converted drugs from vegetable material. Albert Hofmann discovered LSD and its psychedelic effect in 1943 in his search for a pain suppressant. Hofmann then analyzed and synthesized the content of the Mexican 'magic mushroom' psilocybe mexicana, whose effectiveness he was able to confirm through Mexican shaman Maria Sabina. Hallucinogens like LSD were introduced in various forms of psychotherapy, as by Hanscarl Leuner (psycholytic therapy), Abram Hoffer and Humphrey Osmond (psychedelic therapy), Stanislav Grof (transpersonal psychotherapy), and Claudio Naranjo (gestalt therapy). Religious 'peak experiences' moved many alcoholics away from their addiction. Hoffer and Osmond coined the word 'hallucinogen' for various materials that evoked illusionary mistakes and misjudgments, in an exchange of letters with Aldous Huxley, who made a literary description of his experiences with mescaline at this time. The first counter-cultural experiments with intoxicants were described by beatnik poets like Jack Kerouac and William Burroughs, but also by Ken Kesey, founder of the hippie commune Merry Pranksters. In the 1960s, LSD spread in the youth culture of the Western industrial nations. Its best-known advocate was California psychology professor and 'dropout' Timothy Leary, who along with colleagues composed a psychedelic version of the "Tibetan Book of the Dead" (bardo thödol). They saw in LSD a way to enlightenment, whose "High Priest" (the title of his autobiography) Leary named himself. At the end of the 1960s, the use of hallucinogens was forced underground by restrictive policies, where it flourished once more (→ Esalen Institute). An example here was the success of the cult novels of Carlos Castaneda, in which he claimed to describe his apprenticeship with Mexican shamans and ritual peyote use. In various milieus (hippies, technoscene, → New Age, Snowboarder), cannabis, psilocybe mushroom, LSD, and ecstasy are ingested in various rituals, into which elements of indigenous cultures are partially integrated.

Abstinence, Drug Prohibition and Opposition

5. In the European late Middle Ages and early modern times, in a framework of the Inquisition, experts in herbal medicine such as 'wise women' were persecuted and burned. Mandrake, thorn apple, deadly nightshade, and mushroom were among the herbs that they used. These plants probably found application as well in the form of legendary 'witch salves,' as used in fertility rituals such as those practiced on Walpurgis Night.[2] The German beer purification regulation was established in order to check and control the abundance of mushroom and other psychoactive substances.

Some religions practice prohibition. Buddhism forbade all intoxicants, while in Islam fermented products were prohibited (above a certain degree of fermentation), but cannabis products tolerated. The prohibition of alcohol in the United States was introduced and maintained by a puritanical Christianity (→ Salvation Army). In India as well, there was a religiously (Hindu) motivated prohibition of alcohol, from 1977 to 1980. In both cases, a flourishing black market and numerous instances of fusel alcohol poisoning were the result.

In the industrial nations, numerous new problems have arisen, owing to criminalization and commercialization, through a technological concentration of active materials, as well as through the partial collapse of traditional mechanisms of social control. Integrated into the traditional context, consumption of intoxicants tends to stabilize society, while intoxicants that were introduced in the course of → colonialism in extra-European countries (opium in China, alcohol with the American Indians or Australian → Aborigines), on the other hand have proved extremely destructive, as they are only partially metabolized in some human systems, and social rules for their consumption are lacking. In various societies, as in the Native American Church, however, the widespread occurrence of alcoholism has strikingly abated since the introduction of hallucinogen rituals.

1. According to the—disputed—theory of Wasson, Hofmann, and Ruck.
2. Cf. Duerr 1985.

Literature

Sources: Castaneda, Carlos, The Teachings of Don Juan: A Yaqui Way of Knowledge, Berkeley 1968; Hofmann, Albert, LSD My Problem Child: Reflections on Sacred Drugs, Mysticism, and Science, Los Angeles 1983; Huxley, Aldous, The Doors of Perception, London 1957; Leary, Timothy/Alpert, Richard/Metzner, Ralph, The Tibetan Book of the Dead: A Psychedelic Version, New York 1964; Leary, Timothy, Flashbacks: An Autobiography, London 1983; McKenna, Terence, True Hallucinations, San Francisco 1993.

Secondary Literature: Abramson, Harold (ed.), The Use of LSD in Psychotherapy and Alcoholism, New York 1967; Duerr, Hans Peter, Dreamtime: Concerning the Boundary between Wilderness and Civilization, Oxford 1985; du Toit, Brian M. (ed.), Drugs, Rituals and Altered States of Consciousness, Rotterdam 1977; Eliade, Mircea, Shamanism: Archaic Techniques of Ecstasy, Princeton 1972; Fuller, Robert C., Stairways to Heaven, Boulder 2000; Furst, Peter, Hallucinogens and Culture, Los Angeles 1976; Grof, Stanislav, LSD Psychotherapy, Pomona 1980; Harner, Michael J., Hallucinogens and Shamanism, London/Oxford 1978; Rätsch, Christian, Enzyklopädie der psychoaktiven Pflanzen—Botanik, Ethnopharmakologie und Anwendung, Stuttgart 1998; Reichel-Dolmatoff, Gerardo, The Shaman and the Jaguar: A Study of Narcotic Drugs among the Indians of Colombia, Philadelphia 1975; Smith, Huston, Cleansing the Doors of Perception: The Religious Significance of Entheogenic Plants and Chemicals, New York 2000; Völger, Gisela (ed.), Rausch und Realität. Drogen im Kulturvergleich, 2 vols., Cologne 1981; Szasz, Thomas, Ceremonial Chemistry, New York 1974; Wasson, Gordon Richard, "The Hallucinogenic Mushrooms of Mexico," in: Transactions of the New York Academy of Sciences, New York 1968; Wasson, Gordon Richard/Hofmann, Albert/Ruck, Carl A. P., The Road to Eleusis: Unveiling the Secret of the Myteries, New York 1978.

→ Drinking/Drink, Esalen Institute, Perception, Illness/Health, Mysticism, New Age, North America (Traditional Religions), Sadhu, Shamanism, Vision/Auditory Experience, Witch/Persecution of Witches

Peter Gietz and Dierk Tietze

Intuition

Ever since ancient times, 'intuition' (from the Latin intueri, 'look at,' 'consider') has denoted mental gaze and objective inspiration—the immediate, holistic knowledge or experience of things and facts, by contrast with mediated, discursive knowledge. Considered psychologically, 'intuition' means the spontaneous grasp of the connections of reality. 'Brainstorming,' for example, represents a procedure for the stimulation of creative thinking.

It is through intuition, according to (1) Plato, that we come to know or experience the ultimate 'Ideas' by which sensible things exist, according to (2) Aristotle and John Locke that we come to know or experience indemonstrable and evident 'first' principles or propositions, and according to (3) the classic rationalists that we come to know or experience ideas as inborn. (4) Goethe speaks of "a revelation developing from out of the inner human being." (5) Kant distinguishes the discursive clarity gained through the formation of concepts from that gained through contemplation or direct consideration. (6) With the German idealists (Schelling, Fichte, Schopenhauer), intuition plays its central, methodic role as 'intellectual contemplation.' In non-rationalistic philosophies (philosophy of life, H. Bergson), intuition leads to that which cannot be grasped scientifically.

→ Enthusiasm, Mysticism, Revelation, Psyche, Vision/Auditory Experience

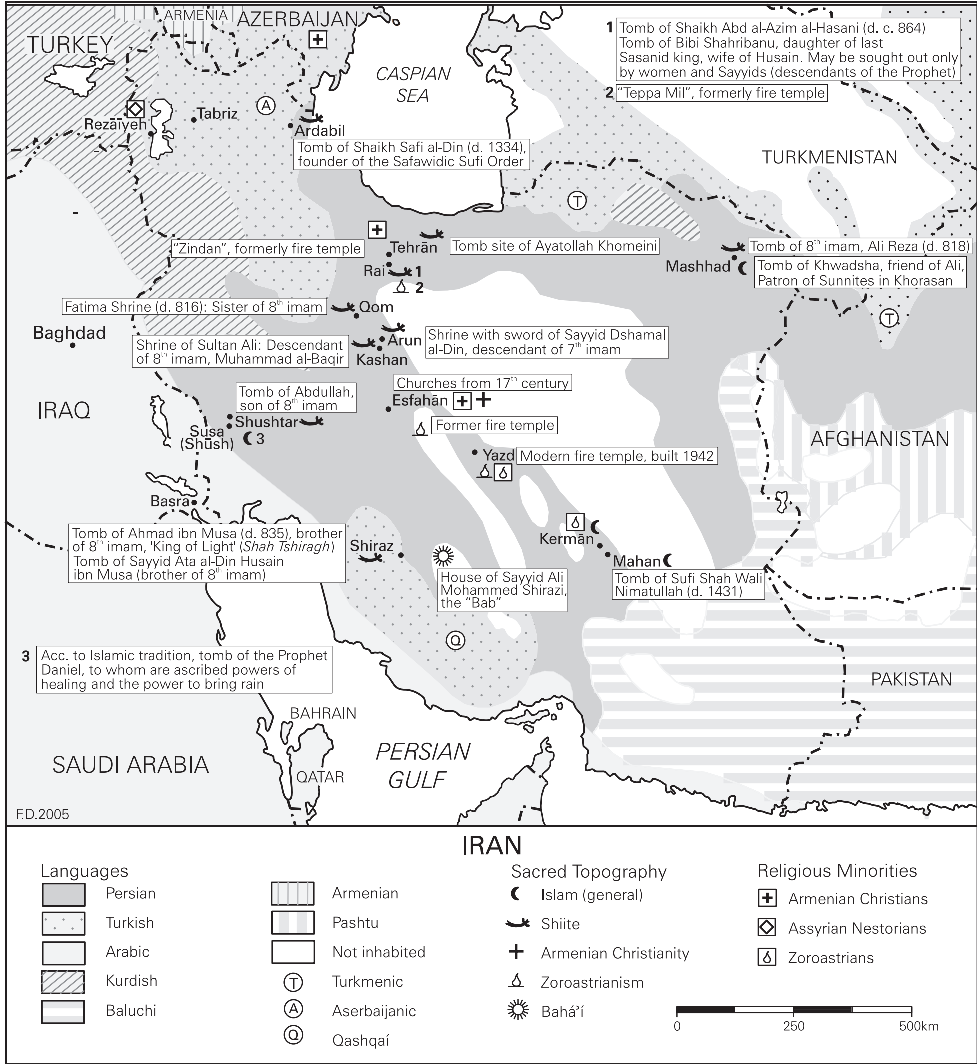
Michael Bäumer

Iran

In pre-Islamic times, Iran was a center of → Zoroastrianism. Since the early sixteenth century, it has a special place from a religious viewpoint, since here, unlike the Turkish, Uzbekish, and Indian neighboring states, the Shia has become the religion of the state. Iran's recent history offers an interesting example of Islam's political potential. The 1979 Islamic Revolution, and the subsequent state systems that were formed, reflect the influential role of the clergy (→ Khomeini) as opponent or representative of state power.



Pre-Islamic Times and Islamization

1. Iran's topography features a high plateau, which stretches into today's Afghanistan, and is bordered on the north and south by the Elbors and Zagro mountain ranges. Here the trade routes between Central Asia, India, Mesopotamia, and Anatolia cross (→ Silk Route). In the wastelands in the East and Southeast of the country, urban settlements have developed only along the historic trade routes. The most important settled areas appeared in the extensive oases of the plateau regions. In the eleventh century BCE, Indo-European tribes came to populate these regions. The name 'Iran' derives from the ancient Persian aryānām, '[land] of the Aryans.' The name 'Persian,' influenced by the Greek, referred to Fars, the southern province of this country, that was the seat of the Persian dynasties of the Achamenids (550–320 BCE) and Sasanids (224–651 CE). The latter promoted Zoroastrianism to the status of state religion. The Battle of Nehawand (642 CE) introduced Arab rule, and thus the Islamization of the cities along the trade routes. There were, however, important Zoroastrian enclaves in the country, especially in Fars and Kirman. Official statistics place 20,000 Zoroastrians in Iran. In order to escape persecution, other Zoroastrians, beginning in 717, emigrated to India, where they became known as Parsi.

Sunna and Shia

2. Between the ninth and thirteenth centuries, Iran produced a great number of Arab-speaking Sunnite jurists. In the early sixteenth century, however,

The Betty Mahmoody story was symptomatic of the profound insecurity of the Western world in the 1980s and 1990s, vis-à-vis Islam’s new emergence and politicization. The new phenomenon had had its point of departure in the Islamic Revolution. Hers is the personal tragic story of an American-Iranian marriage in which a struggle over the common child of the pair emerged in cultural conflict. The husband’s family in Teheran held the mother and daughter, until at last they fled under adventurous circumstances. The story became one of the clichés of a fanatical Islam and a premodern ‘Orient.’ The story is an instructive example of how ‘human interest stories’ can be politicized and optimally marketed: the original report of Mme Mahmoody’s Not without My Daughter (USA 1987, co-author William Hoffer) came into the shadow of Ayatollah Khomeini’s → fatwa against Salman Rushdie and the Gulf War 1991, and became a sensational success. By the end of 1990, in German-speaking regions alone, nearly 3,000,000 copies, in some 30 editions, had been published. Hollywood then shot just as successful a film, with Sally Fields in the leading role (USA, 1991; dir. Brian Gilbert), from which the scene of the couple’s arrival in Iran is remarkable: the aunt of the family clan, as we read in the 1991 book-to-film (author: Berndt Schulz), extends “a package with the obligatory head-covering for Betty.” The Ayatollah Khomeini looms ominously from the wall in the background. (Hubert Mohr) the Shia was promoted to state religion, and long impregnated spiritual and cultural life. It stresses the right of the family of the Prophet → Muhammad to religious and political leadership in the Muslim faith community. The designation ‘Shia’ is derived from the Arabic Shiat ‘Ali, ‘party of Ali.’ Unlike the Sunnites, the Shiites are of the conviction that the succession to Muhammad rightfully belonged not to the first three caliphs, but to Muhammad’s cousin and son-in-law Ali ibn Abi Talib and his descendants. Ali inherited this office, it is true, in 656, after the violent death of the first caliph, Ottoman (‘Uṯmān); however, he himself fell victim to an assault in 661. Ali’s death and the subsequent martyrdom of his son Husain, in the Battle of Kerbela (Iraq) in the year 680, compose central points of Shiite belief and piety.

In the Shiite conviction, leadership in all questions of belief lies with the Imams (Arab., imām, ‘leader’). Through their descendancy from Ali and Fatima, daughter of the Prophet, they are infallible and sinless, and have access to the secret knowledge that Muhammad transmitted to Ali alone. Iranian Shiites are known as ‘Twelver Shiites,’ as they acknowledge twelve Imams, of whom eleven died a violent death, and the twelfth, Muhammad al-Muntazar (Arab., ‘the Awaited’), has, according to Shiite doctrine, been living in hiding since 873; he will manifest himself, on the day of the Last Judgment, as Mahdi (Arab., ‘the rightly led’). Beginning in the ninth century, Qom, in Iran’s Northwest, was an important center of the Twelver Shiites. From 953 to 1055, the Shiite dynasty of the Buyids ruled the Iranian upper class. Subsequent dynasties, however, came forward once more as protective lords of the Sunna, so that the Shiites still formed a minority in the population. This situation changed with the rise of the Safawid dynasty (1501–1722), whose founder Ishmael I drew his battle strength from a Sufi order, and yet, after his accession, elevated the Shia to the status of state religion.

Ismailis

The Ismailis represent a splinter group within the Shia, which split off over the question of who was the lawful successor of the sixth Imam. Thus they are also known as 'Sevener Shiites.' The Ismailis appeared in the late ninth century, as a secret revolutionary movement. From 1090 to 1257, there existed an Ismaili state, in Alamut in the Elbors mountain range in Pakistan. Currently, several million Ismailis live in Iran, Afghanistan, Pakistan, India, and Syria. They regard their religious superior as the forty-ninth Imam. He bears the title of Agha Khan, bestowed on his originally Iranian family in 1817.

The Shia as State Religion: Historical Development

3. Shiite doctrine is characterized by a critical attitude toward secular rule, even when its representatives profess Shiism. This attitude is occasioned by the absence of the twelfth Imam, by virtue of which all subsequent state systems or structures are denied the right to existence. A further important element of the Shiite worldview is the martyrdom of Imam Husain, which renders opposition to oppressive regimes a duty. On grounds of the concealment of the twelfth Imam, a special role falls to the ulama, the 'learned,' as transmitters and guardians of imamic teaching. Unlike their Sunnite colleagues, the most qualified and justified among them enjoy the right of ijtihād, the 'effort': they are authorized to make an independent legal pronouncement (→ Fatwa). A scholar thus enabled is called a mujtahid. In Iran the Shiite Ulama have advanced to the condition of 'spirituals' (rūhānīyūn), who are distinguished from the rest of the faithful even by their → clothing.

With recognition of the Shia as the state religion, the Ulama's nominal claim to govern has gained great political weight. One perceives this fact in the debate over whether the power of the twelfth Imam falls to a mujtahid or to a king of right origin. The Safawidic kings, for their part, sought legitimacy with a reference to their averred descent from the seventh imam, Musa al-Kazim. The Qadshar dynasty (1779–1925) was unable to appeal to such an illustrious provenance, and its rule is remembered for its open conflict with the Ulama. The stumbling block was the government's first attempt to centralize the state system, and to curtail traditional Islamic jurisdiction. Just as suspect in the eyes of the clergy was the readiness of the royal house to accord the Europeans generous concessions in the name of modernization. In 1873, the Ulamas of Teheran introduced the successful protest against the Reuter concession, which had afforded industrialist Julius Reuter a monopoly in railroad construction, mining, and lumber. Just so, the Ulama played an important role in the initial phase of the constitutional revolution of 1905–1906. In 1963, under the leadership of Ayatollah Khomeini, the Ulama opposed the modernization policy of Mohammad Reza Shah (1941–1979), and along with the planned land reform, criticized his autocratic regime's close connection with the United States. From 1971 on, from his Iraqi and French exile, Khomeini directed the Islamic Revolution, which put an end to the Pahlavi regime on 16 January 1979.

Shiite Piety

4. The popular forms of Shiite piety can be traced back to the tenth century. The tombs of Ali and Husain, in the Iraqi cities Nadshaf and Kerbela, are important places of Shiite pilgrimage. However, even before these regions fell to Sunnite control, the Safawid kings cultivated, as centers of pilgrimage, Qom, and the eastern Iranian city of Mashhad, burial places of revered Imam Ali Reza (d. 818). Along with the Prophet and the Twelve Imams, Fatima, daughter of the Prophet and spouse of Ali, is an important object of folk veneration. Among these 'Fourteen Infallibles,' she is ascribed an important role as advocate on the Last Day. After the fulfillment of a vow, gatherings are held, especially by women, at which, in the name of Fatima, they spread out a sufra, a 'tablecloth,' and invite others to a simple meal.

Like the Sunnites, the Shiites celebrate 'īd al-Fiṭr, the Festival of the Breaking of the Fast, at the end of the fasting month of Ramadan. An important Shiite festival is the īd-i Ghadīr Khumm, which recalls the investiture of Ali as Muhammad's successor at the pool of Khumm. The solemnities surrounding the martyrdom of Imam Husain form the high point of the liturgical year. They are held on the first ten days of the Islamic lunar year, Muharram. At this time, passion plays (ta'iya, 'manifestations of grief') are presented, which recall the various stages of the hostile siege of Husain and his companions. The solemnities for the day of Husain's death on the tenth day of Muharran ('ašūra) begin on the eve of that day with processions, which are organized in every neighborhood. Men tread through the streets with burning candles, chant litanies, beat their breasts rhythmically, as do the onlookers, or whip their backs with small chains (→ Penance/Penitent). Formerly, saber bearers, in white burial cloths, beat their heads bloody at the moment of the Imam's death. In the 1970s, these Muharram processions became mass demonstrations against the power of the state. In 1978, on the ninth and tenth of Muharram (December 10 and 11), despite curfew and martial law, more than a million demonstrators gathered at Freedom Place in Teheran, making the decisive contribution to the success of the Islamic Revolution.

5. For the religious minority of the → Baha'i, the establishment of the Islamic Republic had negative effects. While the 1979 fundamental law officially recognized Christians, Jews, and Zoroastrians, Baha'i were systematically persecuted. For women, the veil that had been a symbolic gesture against the Shah's regime, now became part of a rigid dress code. Women's education and areas of employment were curtailed, and the marriageable age was reduced from eighteen to thirteen. In 1986, however, partly on grounds of a new population policy, women gained admittance once more to courses of study in the technologies, medicine, and law. The new marriage law ranks as one of the most progressive in the Middle East. Political life is characterized by a confrontation between the wing representing radical Islam and advocates of a 'civil' society. The occupation of the American Embassy in Teheran from 1979 to 1981, and the Rushdie affair in February of 1989 led to tensions between Iran and the Western world.

Literature

Arjomand, Said Amir, The Shadow of God and the Hidden Imam: Religion, Political Order, and Societal Change in Shi'ite Iran from the Beginning to 1890, Chicago 1984; Babayan, Kathryn, Mystics, Monarchs, and Messiahs: Cultural Landscapes of Early Modern Iran, Cambridge 2002; Boyle, John Andrew et al. (eds.), The Cambridge History of Iran, 8 vols., Cambridge 1968–1991; Corbin, Henry, The Voyage and the Messenger, Berkeley 1998; Daniel, Elton L., The History of Iran, Westport 2001; Foltz, Richard C., Spirituality in the Land of the Noble: How Iran Shaped the World's Religions, Oxford 2004; Katouzian, Homa, Iranian History and Politics: The Dialectic of State and Society, London 2003; Lorentz, John H., Historical Dictionary of Iran, Lanham 1995; Tavakoli-Targhi, Mohamad, Refashioning Iran: Orientalism, Occidentalism, and Historiography, Basingstoke 2001.

→ Islam, Khomeini, Muhammad, Silk Route

Christine Nölle

Islam

The word Islam means, in Arabic, 'devotion/surrender' (to God), 'submission' (to God). Generally joined to the definite article (al-Islām), it has come to be the self- and foreign designation for the totality and socio-cultural community of the individuals, peoples, and states that see their origin and close comradeship based on devotion to the revelation of the Prophet → Muhammad (570–632). Consequently, the devotees are called 'Muslims,' i.e. 'People who surrender to God.' The designation 'Mohammedans' is to be avoided: Muslims feel it to be an unjustified display of the person of Muhammad, and hence blasphemous. The name 'Musulman' (Pers., mosalman; French, Musulman) is passé, and today has a sarcastic or ironic connotation.

Foundations and Early History

1. The history of Islam is intimately bound up with the history of the → Qur'an (Arab., 'reading'). At the center stands Muhammad, son of a merchant, the 'one sent by God,' who, in the year 613, in the Western Arabian trading city of Mecca, first reported his divine inspirations to his nearest kin. For twenty-two years, until his death, these visitations continued, and they were recorded and memorialized by his followers. Their collection and redaction in an organized book, with 114 'suras' (Arab., sūra, 'chapter'), is only the work of the subsequent generation. Because of the expulsion of the first 'Muslims' from Mecca to the nearby oasis of Yatrib in 622, the latter eventually came to be called 'the City' (al-Madīna, 'Medina').

In the Qur'an, Muhammad calls for submission to the proclamation of the 'one, just, and merciful God.' As a counter-sketch to the polytheistic religion and tribally organized society of Arabia, God's justice guarantees the equality of all those who distinguish themselves by faith in him. The surety of the salvation promise to the Muslims lies in their establishment of the divine order. The basic source of its origin and survival is the revelation of Muhammad, last of the prophets and therefore their 'Seal.' After him, then, there will be no further revelation. In his 'utterances of life' (sunna), his words and deeds, the divine proclamation is perfected. The Qur'an and Sunna are the two primary sources of the 'religion of God.' From them, one can recognize to which rules human beings are subjected in their relation to God and to their fellows, and by which 'way' (sharī'a) they can do justice both to their rights and to the duties arising thence.

Era of Expansion and of the Caliphate

2. Even during the Prophet's lifetime, Muslim expeditions (ġazwa) were dispatched—to the north to the very confines of the Byzantine Empire, to the east into the Sassanid region of the Euphrates. The unification of the Arab tribes, pursued by Muhammad with great political skill, suffered a 'setback' after his death. However, the introduction of a 'representative' (Arab., ḫalīfa, caliph) of the Prophet prevented the collapse of the movement, and laid the cornerstone for the organizational principle of the Islamic state now being born. As 'commanding officer,' the Caliph embodied the supreme religious and military authority.

This packaging of religious motivation with military organization released an immense expansive power. Over a mere ten years, in a number of waves of conquest (632–642), Arab troops succeeded in basically reshaping the political geography of the Near East. Eastern Rome was driven back to Asia Minor, the Persian Kingdom of the Sassanids was destroyed. In the Arabian Islamic peoples' historical view of themselves, this century of conquest developed into the 'Golden Age' of Islam, the age of a timeless frame of reference for all succeeding reformist and revitalist movements.

By way of their triumph in two civil wars, the first four caliphs' system based on subjugation and the distribution of booty was reshaped into a theocratic Islamic central empire. The First Civil War (556–561) ended with the success of the dynastic principle of the caliphate as over that of the 'caliphate of election.' The victorious party of the Umayyads ('Omayyads,' 661–750), and all succeeding dynasties, regulated succession in the caliphate by direct inheritance. From the supporting 'party' (shi'a), which had championed a candidate from the family of 'Ali, cousin and son-in-law of the Prophet, finally emerged the belief orientation of the 'Shiites,' the members of the Shia (→ Iran; Khomeini). The Second Civil War (680–692) transformed the empire of the caliphs into a central state. Mecca and Medina, both once key spiritual and administrative points, were relegated to the periphery. The erection of the Dome of the Rock in Jerusalem was not only a programmatic symbol of the Islamic claim to be the continuation and fulfillment of the Abrahamitic religion(s), but also a reference to the shifting Islamic concentration of power. The 'Abbasidic Revolution' of 750 introduced the transformation of the central imperial order into one based on regional states, and altered the religio-political culture of the Islamic world in a profound way. Its primary motive was a realization of the equality of Muslims. The collapse of political unity rendered possible the participation of all Islamized peoples in the development of an Islamic culture more specific to the given community. In the following two centuries, in the urban centers between Samarkand in Uzbekistan and Cordoba in Spain, the normative foundations of Islam were developed. Its first thought is religious unity. Rival dynasties of caliphs in Spain ('Spanish' Umayyads) and in North Africa and Egypt (Fatimids), as well as military confrontations among competing regional princes, compelled the rigid political theory of early Islamic times to adapt to the practical demands of various traditions, different real-life worlds, and different social systems. The divinely inspired Caliph, as 'commander of all believers,' continued to live in the Shiite 'Imamate.' For the majoritarian traditionalists, the Sunnites, he was at a good, safe distance. The Sulṭān ('Ruler'), who, according to the claims and conceptions of the majority, maintained the divinely willed order as best he could, replaced him. The relation between subject and sovereign came to be determined as a relation of reciprocal rights and duties, whose legitimacy was decided not by the feasibility of social interests, but by their justice. Justice meant agreement with the individual and collective behavioral norms, derived from 'principles' of law, that toward the end of the tenth century were codified in generally acknowledged collections of religious law.

Middle Ages and Modern Times

3. The factual end of the era of the caliphate, with the conquest of Baghdad by the invading Mongols (1258), was the visible expression of universal population changes in the Islamic world. The Islamic West was isolated from the East by the Christian re-conquest (Span./Port., reconquista) of Andalusia in mid-eleventh century, and by Berber independence movements in northern Africa. New empires had appeared in northern Africa, in the wake of the western advance of Islamized Central-Asian Turkish tribes, adding an important facet to the synthesis of civilization by Islamic culture: that of the Ottoman Empire (fourteenth century to 1922) in the Near East, the empires of the Grand Moguls (1525–1858) in India, and the Persian Safawids (1501–1722). Around the capital city of Constantinople (Istanbul), taken by Ottoman Sultan Mehmet II in 1453, as around Delhi and Isfahan, flourishing Islamic civilizations arose.

Modern Age

4. With the landing of French expeditionary troops in Alexandria under Napoleon I, on 1 July 1798, the new era of colonial rule and modern imperialism began to score broad regions of the Islamic world. By way of the bluntly propagated colonization motif of the cultural, 'civilizing,' mission (mission civilatrice), the ideas of the French Revolution reached the East. The economic and military expansion of Great Britain, France, and Germany parceled out the Islamic regions into colonies and protectorates from Morocco to Indonesia. Only Shiite Iran and Afghanistan were able to withstand foreign political control. The tenacious adaptation to the world of the modern national states revived a traditional conflict under new auspices. The concept of the nation—casting-mold of the new political order—basically contradicted ideal, historical Islamic forms of government. In the movements of 'pan-Islamism' and 'pan-Arabism' that emerged from Egypt in mid-nineteenth century, ideas of unity were shaped that set religio-cultural and ethnic membership above a state sovereignty and its artificial boundaries. The territorial national state—according to the minimal consensus of all contemporary 'fundamentalist' groups—can be understood only as a transitional form to a political order in which 'the' Islam determines identity, cohabitation, and boundaries.

Religion, 'Enlightenment,' and Sciences

5. The trigger for the formation of genuinely Islamic scientific discipline was supplied by a confrontation with the religions and doctrines of scholarship at hand. In Damascus, Muslims encountered Christian theologians of the aggressiveness of a John of Damascus, and in Baghdad, Christian, Jewish, and Zoroastrian experts in Greek philosophy. At first the challenge was met in a brief, intensive phase of adoption of the literature of the corresponding sources. In a second phase, Islamic scholars acquired this scholarship, put it into critical commentaries, and spliced it into the budding Islamic disciplines. The 'quiet Christianization' of the Neo-Platonic philosophy confronted Muslims with the problem of harmonizing the Qur'anic revelation with the logical, psychological, and ontological methods of ancient philosophy. Andalusian scholar Ibn Rushd (Averroes, d. 1198) was especially successful in this regard, casting his production in a form affecting the West itself. Truth is accessible to the demonstrating, logical, and natural understanding. In this series, even the Qur'an is unlocked for the human being. Truth, as the universal goal of the understanding, exists, after all, outside revelation. His rationalistic tendency brought Ibn Rushd intra-Islamic enmity, but also wide resonance.

The adoption of (Greek) philosophy, especially that of the logical conclusion ('syllogism'), also snipped the history of Islamic theology in two. Its 'older' form is characterized by apologetic exposition and dialectical discourse. The store of knowledge gained from the primary sources was composed in 'confessions of faith.' The Maqālāt al-islāmīyīn of theologian Aš'arī (d. 935) provided traditional theology with both its foundations and its norms. Faith is constituted by belief in God, the angels, the book of the Qur'an, and the one Prophet. The unicity of God grounds the indisputable focus of the doctrine of God, and in his omniscience lies that predetermination of human beings and their behavior that fixes the order of the here and the hereafter. As a normative work of 'orthodox' Islamic theology, the Maqālāt have remained an integral component of religious formation down to the present day.

It was an essential duty of this theology to discover the boundaries of the faith, and thereby the beginnings of → heresy in the confrontation with deviant doctrines. Hereby it acquired political weight. The role of state ideology was committed, albeit for a short time, to rationalistic theology (mu'tazila), a theological movement of the eighth to the tenth centuries, which laid stress on reason, and which was aimed against the traditionalists. But, at the same time, it betrayed the effects of philosophy.

Through opposition to and containment of rationalistic theology, the 'new theology' was formed. Al-Ġazzalī (d. 1111) is regarded as its normative representative, a sturdy combatant of the intellectual speculations and hairsplittings of the theologians, who, with his emphasis on subjective knowledge of God and on defense of the faith, serves Sufism as its exemplar.

As threshold and foundation of theology, the science of the Qur'an (tafsīr) and the science of the 'transmission' (ḥadīṯ) of the utterances of the Prophet—with 600,000 of them circulating in subsequent times—held their key position in the canon of Islamic sciences.

The science of law was at once driving force and profiteer of the development of both of these material sciences. The claim to be able to regulate immediately, from a limited divine revelation, the totality of relations among human beings, and of the latter to God, has awarded that scholarship its matchless role. It was and is developed by scholars and practiced by the faith community. The multiplication of the realities of law into four schools of law is to be explained by this origin. That the Islamic world nevertheless maintains a basic consensus on the Sharia is due especially to the production of legal scholar aš-Šāf'ī (d. 820). All four legal schools refer to him—the Mālikīya (west), Ḥanafiya (east), Ḥanbalīyā and Šafi'īya—that even today seek to keep the unremittingly transforming reality of law in harmony with the Sharia.

Culture and Religious Practice

6. Every fifth citizen of the world is a Muslim. Any attempt to explain the development of Islam from a religion of revelation to a world culture on the basis of its claim that it spreads in the one and sole God, Allah, is unsatisfactory. Islamic culture came out of a fusion of religious ideals with the Hellenistic and Eastern cultural legacy. It developed in the wake of its spread over the old world, a civilizing power that it drew from its susceptibility of adaptation. A believer, regardless of color or origin, with his or her enunciation of the Profession of Faith, "There is no god but God, and Muhammad is his prophet," inherits membership in the 'Community of Believers' (umma). The principal duties derived thence, (1) the quintuple daily prayer (ṣalāt), (2) fasting in the month of Ramadan (ṣaum), (3) discharge of the alms tax (zakāt), and (4) the pilgrimage (ḥajj)—if possible—to → Mecca and Medina during the pilgrimage month, compose the universal identity of Muslims worldwide. Even the sacred meaning of Arabic, the language of the Qur'an, has lost its identity-bestowing character, through translations, first into Persian and Ottoman, then into numerous other languages. Nevertheless, Arabic—the language of the sacred scripture of the Qur'an—has been retained in cultic contexts.

The Islamic cultic community, furthermore, is produced across the continents with reference to subjects that are of expressly Qur'anic origin. These include the ritual calendar, with its lunar year enumeration and its reference to Muhammad's flight from Mecca to Medina in 622 CE (year 1 of the Hijra): twelve lunar years shifting vis-à-vis the solar year, a weekly caesura on Friday, and a division of the day determined by the course of the sun but without an hour of fixed length.

Prohibitions and Prescriptions

Other items on the same list are the prohibitions and prescriptions, such as food taboos (e.g., carrion, pork, and eel), rules for marriage, as well as hygienic prescriptions intended to ensure purity at prayer, for instance through antecedent washing. The organization of community prayer in a 'mosque' likewise belongs here. A presider (imām) must lead this prayer. On the other hand, neither judge (qāḍī) nor counsel (muftī) has a strictly religious function. The former is named (and removed) by the political ruler, for warrant of the security of public law. The mufti, a juristic freelancer, assists him and the litigants in the form of official counseling (→ Fatwa) in the judicial finding. Basically, then, Islam disposes of no corporate religious instance between imam, caliph, or sultan and the Muslim or non-Muslim subject, comparable to the Christian hierarchical clergy (here, once more, the Shia forms a kind of exception). This institutional meagerness has permitted Islamic religious culture to adapt to the most varied political and social systems. In the hands of local lawyers, religious law has been able to assimilate to prevailing conditions to the extent that, from central Africa to Malaysia, forms of Islamic living communities have been able to appear that are more or less syncretistic and that nevertheless, in the minds of Muslims and outsiders alike, are to be ascribed to the umma. A central role in this self-understanding is played by the orthopraxis that comes to light in the specific religious usage of the Islamic cultural regions and their ritual usages. For instance, the Islamic world could be divided according to the variously prescribed attitudes of the head, bows of the trunk, and finger spread required for a valid prayer, or according to the food garnishing that—however they are permitted by the Sharia—is absent from kitchen recipes.

Man and Woman, Husband and Wife

The notorious inequality between man and woman before the Sharia rests on a meager Qur'anic basis (penal, inheritance, and testimonial laws). Over against it stands the emancipatory principle of the equality of all Muslim men and women. Respective social interests have taken advantage of the flexibility of Islamic positive law to legitimize exegeses pleasing to the regime. Such readings include the permissibility of the male marrying as many as four women, a form of polygamy that only the affluent can afford. As for female roles, the deeply veiled Taliban woman, with her multi-layered veil, is as much a part of Islamic reality as is the deeply committed, but unveiled, Sahara nomad woman or exiled woman of letters in Paris (→ Veil).

Islam is among the religions that reject images of faces, and of human beings in general, and enjoin aniconism (→ Image/Iconoclasm). Any representation of the Prophet is especially forbidden. Thus a sober Islamic art appears, which renounces representation in imagery. Its principal trait is an ornamentation that takes advantage of calligraphic and geometric elements. For all of its stylistic multiplicity, it adorns the Muslim's material environment as metaphorical praise of God and His creation: the jewelry, clothing, books, habitat, and architecture of the Islamic world are the products of a culture irreplaceably ensouled by a common spirit.

Main Currents Today

7. Beyond the distinction between law and unbelief, on which the Islamic image of the foreigner rests, two great directions in belief have formed, each producing comprehensive traditions.

The Muslim Sunnite majority is unified through its consensus on religious and historical tradition. Over against it stands the Shia, which, throughout Islamic history, has propounded and developed a programmatic foundation in terms of its opting for 'Ali and his successors. Among the numerous Shiite sects, only the 'Twelver Shia,' or Imāmīya, has embodied that foundation in a state organization, today's Republic of → Iran. (The twelfth imam recognized by this sect vanished in 940, but the myth of the 'concealed imam' lives on.) Its doctrine of faith and law is partially, but emphatically, distinguished from those of the Sunni. However, it regards itself as part of the umma. There are minority Shiite communities everywhere in the Islamic world. → Sufism can only be inadequately posited as a current that pervades both faith orientations. Sufist movements emphasize the subjective, mystical faith experience. Immediate knowledge of God, ultimate goal of a sūfī (Arab., 'wool-clad'), becomes possible through special practices (tending to be hostile to law, i.e. 'antinomian'). These may be of a meditative, ascetical nature, performed either singly or collectively. Since the thirteenth century, Sufi Movements have organized repeatedly, in the veneration of saints who mediate salvation, in orders or brotherhoods.

Sufism must be clearly distinguished from 'fundamentalist' or 'Islamistic' movements (→ Fundamentalism). There have always been such movements, which refer their religio-political concepts to an idealized early age of Islam, especially to the 'ideal state' of Muhammad in Medina. By way of concretization, and resistance to depressing experiences with the overpowering European colonial invaders, there arose in the 1920s the 'Muslim brotherhood' of Ḥasan al-Bannā' (d. 1949), and later Sayyid Quṭb (executed in 1966), its goal being the creation of a society established on Islamic foundations. With the new appeal to a primordial order, the modern Islamic national state was transformed into a natural archenemy. The Palestinian conflict provided one more direction for the manifold fundamentalist traditions, with Zionism functioning as the great foe. Splitting away from both movements at the beginning of the 1970s, radical underground groups have incited a battle against the enemy 'within and without': the secular state, and a Zionism supported by American imperialism, in which the orthodox obligation of the → Jihad has been reinterpreted as a call for terror and self-immolation. A majority of Islamic authorities worldwide deny legitimization to these radical political sects. The aftereffects of the 1978–1979 Iranian Revolution drive a deep cleft into the community of the Muslims (→ Iran). Today they divide states, classes, and families. The task of triumphing over this conflict between revelation and development is as much a property of Islamic religious history as is its insolubility.

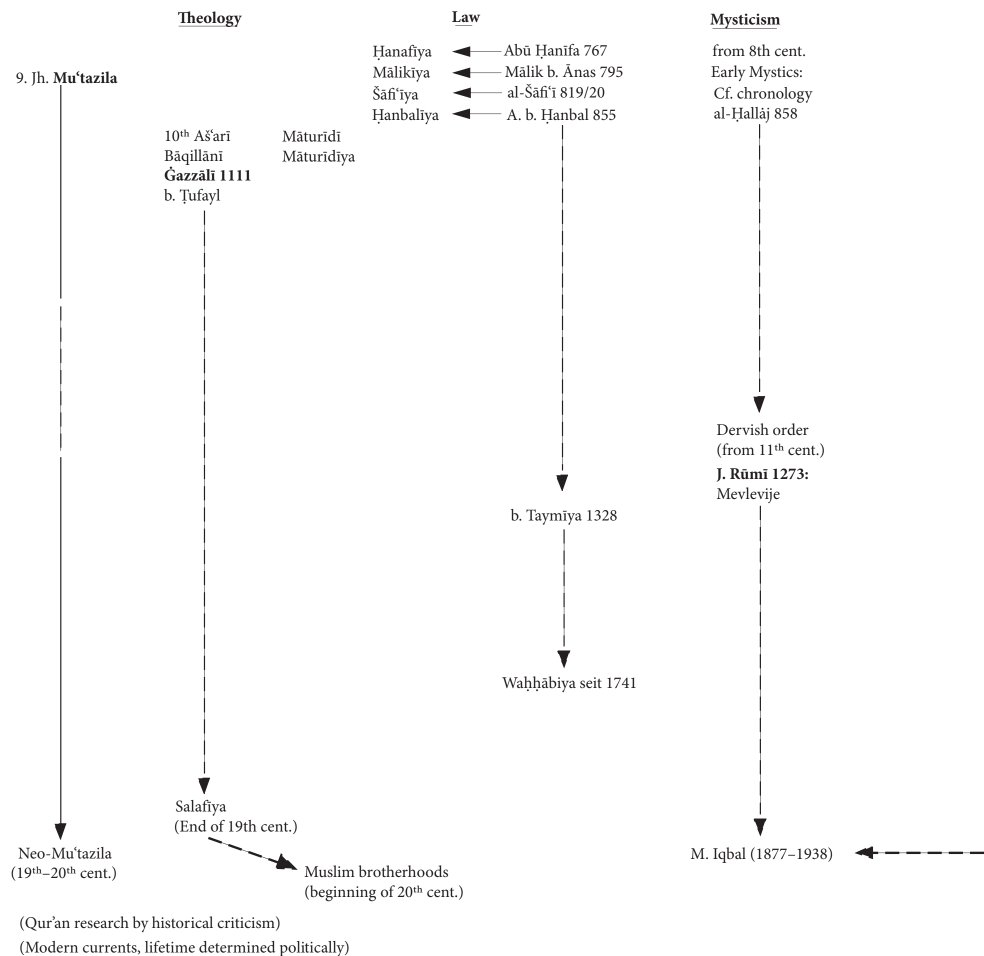
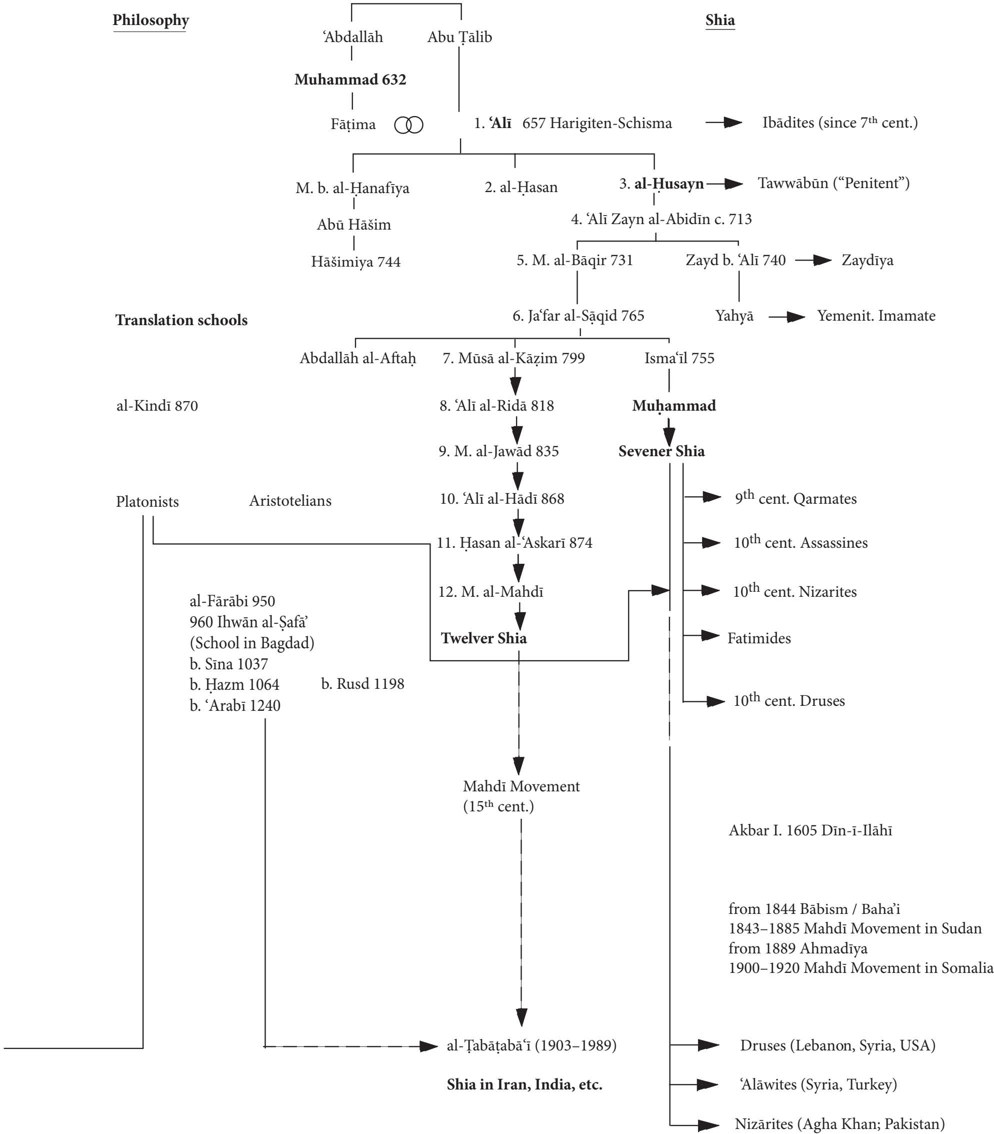
Hostile Islamic Image

8. Europe's historical experiences with the Islamic East over the course of a millennium have thickened into a wickerwork of stereotypical prejudices. 'Musulmans,' 'Saracens,' and—to the present day—'Turks' are major, alterable, 'stick-on labels' connoting bloodthirsty aggressiveness, uninhibited sexuality, and above all, the falsification of Christian revelation. The immigration to Western Europe of so many Muslims from Southern Europe, Turkey, Lebanon, and North Africa during recent decades has changed this picture with an enduring shift. The problem of assimilation has replaced confrontation.

Today more than six million Muslims live in Western Europe, a linguistic, religious, and cultural minority. Socioeconomic demarcation, especially the denial of equal confessional rights, blocks their integration. The path is scored by conflict over the construction of mosques, and the debate, politicized in France as in Germany, over the veil.



Literature



Brown, D. W., Rethinking Tradition in Modern Islamic Thought, Cambridge 1996; El-Solh, C. F./Mabro, J. (eds.), Muslim Women's Choices: Religious Belief and Social Reality, Oxford 1994; Esposito, John L. (ed.), The Oxford Encyclopedia of the Modern Islamic World, Oxford 1995; Idem (ed.), The Oxford History of Islam, New York 1999; Hoexter, Miriam et al. (eds.), The Public Sphere in Muslim Societies, Albany 2002; Husain, M. Z., Global Islamic Politics, New York 1995; Lapidus, Ira M., A History of Islamic Societies, Cambridge 1988; Mai Yamani (ed.), Feminism and Islam: Legal and Literary Perspectives, Reading 1996; Martin, Richard C. (ed. in chief), Encyclopedia of Islam and the Muslim World, 2 vols., New York 2004; Nonneman, G. et al. (eds.), Muslim Communities in Europe, Reading 1996; Rahman, F., Islam and Modernity: Transformation of an Intellectual Tradition, Chicago 1982; Rippon, Andrew, Muslims: Their Religious Beliefs and Practices, London [2]2001; Ruthven, Malise, Islam: A Very Short Introduction, Oxford/London 1997; Simons, Jr., Thomas W., Islam in a Globalizing World, Stanford 2003; Suad Joseph (ed. in chief), Encyclopedia of Women and Islamic cultures, Leiden 2003ff.; Various (eds.), The Encyclopedia of Islam, Leiden 1960ff. Voll, J. O., Islam: Continuity and Change in the Modern World, Syracuse 1994.

→ Africa I, Fatwa, Fundamentalism, Iran, Khomeini, Mecca, Mohammed, Orientalism/ Exotism, Qur'an, Socialism (Islamic), Veil

Ulrich Rebstock

Islam: Survey of Sects and Schools

Philosophy
Shia
ʿAbdallāh
Abu Ṭālib
Muhammad 632
Fāṭima
1. ʿAlī 657 Harigiten-Schisma
Ibādites (since 7th cent.)
M. b. al-Ḥanafīya
2. al-Ḥasan
3. al-Ḥusayn
Tawwābūn ("Penitent")
Abū Hāšim
4. ʿAlī Zayn al-Abidīn c. 713
Hāšimiya 744
5. M. al-Bāqir 731
Zayd b. ʿAlī 740
Zaydīya
Translation schools
6. Jaʿfar al-Ṣāqid 765
Yahyā
Yemenit. Imamate
Abdallāh al-Aftaḥ
7. Mūsā al-Kāẓim 799
Ismaʿīl 755
al-Kindī 870
8. ʿAlī al-Riḍā 818
Muḥammad
9. M. al-Jawād 835
Sevener Shia
Platonists
Aristotelians
10. ʿAlī al-Hādī 868
9th cent. Qarmates
11. Ḥasan al-ʿAskarī 874
10th cent. Assassines al-Fārābi 950
960 Ihwān al-Ṣafā'
(School in Bagdad)
b. Sīna 1037
b. Ḥazm 1064
b. ʿArabī 1240
b. Rusd 1198
12. M. al-Mahdī
10th cent. Nizarites
Twelver Shia
Fatimides
10th cent. Druses
Mahdī Movement
(15th cent.)
Akbar I. 1605 Dīn-ī-Ilāhī
from 1844 Bābism / Baha'i 1843–1885 Mahdī Movement in Sudan from 1889 Ahmadīya
1900–1920 Mahdī Movement in Somalia al-Ṭabāṭabāʿī (1903–1989)
Shia in Iran, India, etc.
Druses (Lebanon, Syria, USA)
ʿAlāwites (Syria, Turkey)
Nizārites (Agha Khan; Pakistan)

Islam: Time Chart

(Further information is to be found under regional entries → Africa and → Near East.)

Era 1: Muhammad and the Qur'an (c. 575–632)

c. 575	Birth of the Prophet Muhammad in Mecca	The time of Muhammad's birth is marked by military confrontations between the Persian Sassanid Empire and the great power of Byzantium.
c. 609	First revelation: God's ambassador, and his position in salvation history	According to Islamic legend, Mohammed received his first revelation from the Angel Gabriel in the Lailat al-Qadr (the night of the twenty-seventh of Ramadan), as he was meditating in a cave near the city of Mecca. The first revelations are signed by apocalyptic visions and expectations of the hereafter. Muhammad sees his own mission consciousness in the framework of a series of (biblical and Arab) prophets, to which he also ascribes Jesus.
622	Hijra ("Emigration"). Beginning of Islamic calendar	After the death of his uncle, Abu Talib, and Muhammad's wife, Khadija, (619) Muhammad's position of power in Mecca dwindles. In 622, the prophet and most of his followers finally leave Mecca for Medina (Yathrib), 300 kilometers distant.

622–630	Politicization: Wars and consolidation. The Qur'an as foundation of law	In Medina, Islam develops into a religion, with concrete ritual prescriptions. Principles of a legal system predominate in the revelations (in the year 623, community order). At the same time, a politicization emerges: the persecuted minority becomes a vigorous political and military system. The victory over Mecca in the Battle of Badr (624), although dampened by the defeat at Uḥud (625), motivates the Islamic expansion. The gradual decline of Judaism, which culminates in the expulsion or massacre of the three Jewish tribes of Medina (624, 625, 627), leads to a more powerful dependence upon the cultic system of the Ḥums (cultic community belonging to the Meccan Qurayš). Mecca (instead of Jerusalem) becomes the chief place of worship (first pilgrimage, or Hajj, to Mecca, 629; conquest of the city, 630).
632	Muhammad's death	After the Prophet's death, various Bedouin tribes abandon Islam, as they feel bound to their promise only with regard to Muhammad.

Era 2: The Caliphate and the first phase of expansion (632–749); emergence of theology and law. Beginnings of the Shia: first schisms. Power struggle for the Caliphate and the latter's function as a religious instance
635–749	Military/religious expansion	Conquest of Damascus (635–636), Jerusalem (638), Egypt (639–642), Persia (642–652) Tripoli (643–647), Carthage (698), Buchara, Samarkand, and Tashkent (706–710), Gibraltar (711).
632–661	The four "rightly conducted Caliphs"	The Sunni tradition understands here Abū Bakr (632–634), ʿUmar (634–644), ʿUṯmān (644–656), and ʿAlī (656–661). They had led the new umma in Muhammad's sense. The early phase of the caliphate is scored by strife over the succession of the political and religious superiors of the Muslims.
7th cent.	Beginning of the Hadith. First pious foundations (waqf)	After the death of the Prophet, the need grows for extra-Qur'anic behavioral prescriptions. Oral reports (hadiths) on Muhammad's life and comportment are collected.
656–661	First civil war (fitna). Caliphate of ʿAlī	After ʿUṯmān's murder, the Umma encounters a crisis. Conflict over legitimate succession emerges with Muhammad's son-in-law, ʿAlī, the victor.
661–749	Caliphate of the Umayyads: Expansion	After ʿAlī, the Meccan family of the of the territory of the Umma. Blossoming of poetry, grammar, architecture. Emergence of a state-system and a religious law, as well as the beginnings of an Islamic theology. First schisms	Umayyads establishes itself as a caliphate dynasty. Under its rule, campaigns of conquest are waged in Northwest Africa, Spain, Byzantium, and Central Asia. Within a very short time, the region of the Umma multiplies exponentially. An administrative apparatus develops, in many respects Persian-influenced, an organized directive policy, and a religious law (Sharia) in four schools. The military organization continues captive to tribal structures, which leads to feuding. Architecture experiences a first bloom with the building of the ʿUmar Mosque (Dome of the Rock) in Jerusalem (691), under ʿAbd al-Malik (685–705), the Friday Mosque (707–715), and so on. Poetry, especially love poetry, panegyric and invective verse, establishes norms valid to this day. In the newly founded garrison cities of Kūfa and Basra, philological schools appear, and centers of translation, especially of Greek material. Debates with Christians and Jews favor the gradual emergence of an Islamic theology. Under the rule of the Umayyads, further divisions occur of groups engaged in religious politics.

656–874	Formation of the Shia
657	Battle of Ṣiffīn (on the Middle Euphrates); schism of the Ḫarijites	After the battle of Ṣiffīn, between ʿAlī and his challenger Mu'awīya, ʿAlī negotiates with his opponent, and an arbitration instance is brought into play. Incensed, ʿAlī's followers abandon their encampment (ḫaraja, Arab., "to go forth"), and found the Ḫarijitic Shia. Except for a few centers in North Africa and Yemen, most Ḫarijitic groups no longer exist.
661	"Party of ʿAlī" is formed	After ʿAlī's death, his son, al-Ḥasan, renounces the caliphate in favor of Muʿāwīya. The Shiat Ali (Arab., "Party of ʿAlī") has given familiar Islamic currents their name, the Shia. Today, Shiites live principally in → Iran and Iraq, as well as in Syria, partly in Algeria, Lebanon, and Yemen.
10th Muḥarram 680	Battle of Kerbelā' (on the Euphrates) between Caliph Yazīd and Ḥusain ibn ʿAlī	In a violent encounter between ʿAlī's younger son, al-Ḥusain and the troops of Caliph Yazīd I, Ḥusain's people are exterminated. The Shiites celebrate this day as the Feast of the Martyrdom of Ḥusain, with passion plays, as a high holy day (→ Iran). His tomb in Kerbelā' in Iraq is the most visited pilgrimage destination in all of Shiite piety.

680–683	Origin of the Shia as a religious/political movement: Penitent Movement; Mahdī ideal and Messianism	Under the watchword of revenge for Ḥusain, a group of "penitents" (in Arab., tawwābūn) forms the Kūfa, who struggle for the overthrow of the Ummayads. ʿAlī's third son, Muhammad b. al-Ḥanafia, is proclaimed mahdī (Arab., "rightly conducted") Imam/Caliph. A mythologization of the Mahdī ideal occurs: the expectations of the Tawwābūn in the area of religious politics constitute themselves independently of the (fairly hesitant) relations of the b. al-Ḥanafīya. As he dies, the concept spreads regarding the Imam's rapture (in Arab., ġaiba, "absence"), from which he would return.
765	Death of the sixth Shiite Imam Jaʿfar al-Ṣadīq; break-off of the "Sevener Shia" ("Ismailites")	After the death of the sixth Imam, groups split off who proclaim his son (Muhammad's grandson) Ismaīl as Mahdī, who was deemed to be in "hiddenness," and would return. These "Ismailites," or "Sevener" Shia (after the Seventh Imam) adopt Gnostic and neo-Platonic elements. They form the basis of the Caliphate of the Fatimids (909/10–1171), as well as the movement of the "Assassins," Qarmats (899–c. 1030) and Druses. They proclaim an "esoteric" doctrine of the difference between the outer form and inner content of religion.

873/4	Beginning of the great ġaiba	The twelfth and last Imam "vanishes." The Shia supposes that he has only withdrawn into ġaiba (Arab., "absence, hiddenness"), to return in the End Time as Mahdi.
711–1492	Arabic culture in Andalusia	In 711, Ṭāriq b. Ziyād had crossed over to Spain. After a supposed Umayyad prince in Spain has built a small emirate (756–912 Marwanid Emirate, 912–1031 Caliphate), this spreads, in the tenth century, all but throughout Southern Spain. Cordoba becomes the embodiment of "Moorish" art and culture. After the fall of the Cordoban Caliphate in 1009, Andalusia, under the "Taifa Kings," enjoys a literary and cultural flowering. The storms of the Almoravides

		(1086) and Almohads (1146/47) are invasions, but, after all, do bring new ideas. Since the appearance of the Reconquista in the eleventh century, broad parts of Southern Spain fall to the Christians. After the Battle of Las Navas de Tolosa, in 1212, Granada is the last Arabic Islamic bulwark on the peninsula, until it is finally defeated by Ferdinand of Aragon and Isabella of Castile in 1492.
732	Battle at Tour and Poitiers	Charles Martell encounters Spanish Arabs who—probably on a plundering expedition—invade Southern France. In European sources of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, the episode is stylized as the "rescue of Europe from Islam," while in Arabic sources it is often altogether ignored.
1086	Incursion of the Almoravides into Spain	The Berber dynasty of the Almoravides (in Arab., Al-Murābiṭun, "Inhabitants of a Defense Monastery"), originating in Senegal, represents a radical re-Islamization, and observance of Islamic law. It founds the city of Marrakesh in Morocco, and in 1086 invades Spain, where it repels the Recon-quista. It is broken up by the Almohades in the twelfth century.

1146/7	Incursion of the Almohades into Spain	The second invasion of Spain from North Africa is mounted by the extremist sect of the Muwaḥḥidun ("Champions of the Oneness of God"). Under reformist Mahdī b. Tūmart, they have already captured Marakesh (1125), before they support Arabic culture in Spain in one last resistance to the Reconquista. In 1212, after the Battle of Las Navas de Tolosa, the realm has splintered into smaller dynasties.
1230–1492	Dynasty of the Naṣrides in Granada	Under the Naṣrides, a last flowering of Islam occurs in Spain (Alhambra, in Arab. Al-Ḥamrā', "the Red," 13th–14th cent.).
1492	Fall of Granada	See Era 6.
Era 3: Reception of antiquity, and "rational theology" (kalām). Philosophy, theosophy, and sciences. The extreme Shia and beginning of mysticism. End of the religious function of the Caliphate (8th to 10th cent.)
749–1250	Caliphate of the Abbasids	Phase of the rise of artistry, as in poetry, grammar, mathematics, and compiled collective works and catalogues of authors (Fihrist, K. al-Aġānī). Religious conflicts with the Shiites, emergence of extremist antinomian sects (Qarmats, Druses;

		the latter develop into a religion of their own), theological quarrels between "rationalists" (Muʿtazila) and "orthodox" on, among other things, predestination. Development of the "rational theology" (kalām) and jurisprudence. Appearance of Islamic mysticism. Under the influence of dynasties of vicars, the Caliphate splinters, and has nothing left to oppose to the invasions of Central Asian powers (Seljuks, Mongols).
from c. 800–1000	Translation of sources of Greek thought	At first from the Syrian, and later directly from the Greek, the great works of Greek medicine, philosophy, etc. are translated. Under Ḥunayn b. Isḥāq (808–873) and al-Kindī (801–866), centers of translation activity develop, for example, in Baghdad. Caliph al-Ma'mūn (d. 833) is one of the most important patrons.
2nd half 8th cent.–beginning 11th cent.	Philosophical-theological school of the Muʿtazila	Originating in the confrontation with Greek philosophy, the philosophico-theological school of the Muʿtazila (Arab., "They who stand apart"?) develops, in Basra and Baghdad. A characteristic premise is that reason (in Lat., ratio; in Arab., ʿaql) has an importance for the understanding and defense of the faith. Abu l-Huḏail (d. 849) can be regarded as its most important sculptor. From 833–847, the Muʿtazila was especially prominent, although thereafter contemned, and even occasionally persecuted. It is received by the Shia, and has only in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries been rediscovered by Sunnite theologians ("Neo-Muʿtazila").

786–809	Caliph Harūn ar-Rashīd	The best-known Caliph of the Abbasids is the protagonist in numerous stories from "The Thousand-and-One Nights." He emphasized the religious nature of the Caliphate more powerfully than had his Abbasid predecessors.
8th–10th cent.	Beginnings of Islamic mysticism	The "Sufis" (evidently from the Arabic ṣūf, "wool," with reference to the mystics' clothing) present a religious practice of the love of God (Rabīʾa al-ʿAdawīja, d. 801; Ḥasan al-Baṣrī, d. 728), absolute trust in God, and longing for union with God (Ǧunaid, d. 910). This practice is found in its most radical form with al-Ḥallāj, in his formulation, "I am the Truth (i.e. God)," which, in 922, led to his execution in Baghdad as a heretic.

9th cent.	Canonization of the Hadith	Six canonical Hadith collections appear. Then best known are those of al-Buḫārī (810–870) and Muslim (817–875).
870–950	Al-Fārābī	The Aristotelian-Platonic philosopher profits from the activity of translation in Baghdad. Building on Plato's Politeia, he sketches out the "ideal state."
9th cent.	Close of the development of religious law (Sharia)	Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal (d. 855) is the last to die of the founders of the four canonical Sunni schools of law. The other three are: the Ḥanafīya of Abū Ḥanifa (d. 767), the Mālīkiya of Mālik b. Ānas (d. 795), and the Šaf'īya of al-Saf'ī (d. 819/20).
Era 4: The orthodox Sunnite theology develops. Fatimids and chiliastic expectations in the Shia. Formation of Sufism
909/10–1171	(Counter-) Caliphate of the Fatimids in Egypt	The Shiite-Ismaili Fatimids, who appeal to a provenance from the Prophet's daughter Fatima, come from North Africa, and have had their center in Cairo since 973.
957 or 969	Death of al-Ḥāsibī, founder of the Nuṣairians (today: Alāwites)	Al-Ḥāsibī appeals to the Sufi extreme Shia. Especially in Syria, the Nuṣairi are prominent in the twentieth century, and the prevailing religious current among the Asads, who sieze power by riot in 1970. The modern self-designation is Alawite (in Arab., ʻ*Alawīyūn*, "Disciple" or "Follower of ʻAlī").

End of 10th cent.	Religion of the Druses forms from the Ishmaʻīlīya	The beginnings of the religion of the Druses lie in the movement of Muhammad b. Ismaʻīl al-Darazī (d. 1019) and Hamza b. ʻAlī (disappeared 1021). It venerates Fatimid-minded al-Ḥākim (996–1021) as the incarnation of God, and cultivate chiliastic expectations. Despite persecution at the hands of the Fatimids, a Drusic hierarchy is established, which develops into a religion of its own. Its followers live today in Lebanon, Syria, and the United States.
990–1013	Al-Azhar Mosque in Cairo	Under the Caliphate of al-Ḥākim, in Fustat (today's Cairo) the al-Azhar Mosque appears. Their homonymous university is today one of the most important centers of conservative Sunnite theology.
11th cent.	Establishing of the Madrasa	The establishment of Madrasa as a waqf (religious endowment) is the prelude of an organized Islamic educational system.

from 11th cent.	Forming of the great Sufi (Dervish) Order	Originally as master-student/disciple connections, the Sufis have come to form the threshold of the "mystical path," now in orders and brotherhoods. Mysticism here becomes a mass movement, and has developed its own music, poetry, and dance, especially in Turkish, Persian, and Sindhi linguistic space. The orders are centers, and often develop a cult of saints, with a pilgrimage system to the shrines of the latter (especially in North Africa and Turkey).
11th cent.	Nizarites ("Assassins")	Named for the son of Fatimid Caliph al-Mustanṣir, Nizār, they move into the discipleship of Ḥasan-i Ṣabbāh. After the latter's murder, they settle in the Elbruz mountain range, at the fortress of Alamūt. The order has become notorious by reason of a series of suicide attempts, as well as for the murder of Persian Wesir Niẓām al-Mulk. Their descendants are the Northwest Indian Hodsha, as well as the Aga Khan community (today likewise in India).

Era 5: Great thinkers of mysticism and theology. End of the Abbasid Caliphate

9th/10th cent.	Al-Aš'arī founds a new theological "orthodoxy"	Even though still schooled under the influence of the Mu'tazila, Aš'arī (873/74–935/36) turns once more to the "traditionals." He surrenders "rational theology" (kalām), and proclaims the uncreatedness of the Qur'an. The Aš'aritic school is promptly awarded the title of "orthodoxy."
980–1037	Ibn Sīna (in Lat., Avicenna)	Persian physician and philosopher of a Neo-Platonic identity, Avicenna becomes the very symbol of the Muslim doctrine of real universals. He stands under the influence of Aristotelian and pseudo-Aristotelian tradition. Outstanding work: the Kitab al-Šifā' ("Book of the Healing" of the soul).
994–1064	Ibn Ḥazm	The Neo-Platonic "Dove's Necktie" of poet and philosopher Ibn Hazm, becomes the paragon of Arabic "Platonic love." Theologically, b. Ḥazm represents a personal religiousness, independent of dogmas and clashes over orthodoxy. The key element is the conviction of the heart ('aqd bi-l-qalb). This development means a dismissal of the understanding-oriented kalam theologians.

1058–1111	Abu Ḥāmid al-Ġazzālī (Algazel), theologian and (in his old age) Sufi	Al-Ġazzali (also cited as Al-Ġazālī) ranks as one of the greatest Islamic theologians. His Tahāfut al-Falāsifa (Arab., "Confutation of the Philosophers") polemicizes against attempts to proclaim a primacy of philosophy vis-à-vis theology. In his advanced years, Ġazzālī turns to mysticism.
1126–1198	Ibn Rushd (in Lat., Averroes)	The Andalusian Aristotelian from Cordoba composes an important commentary on Aristotle for the entire medieval world. Theologically, he stands on the side of those who accept the unification of religion and philosophy. Against Ġazzālī, he composes the Tahāfut al-Tahāfut (Arab., "Confutation of the Confutation").
1165–1240	Muhyi'l-Dīn Ibn ʿArabī	Ibn ʿArabī is one of the best-known mystics of the Islamic world. He represents a pantheism inspired by love.
1207–1273	Jalāl ad-Dīn Rūmī	Rūmī is doubtless the most famous mystic of Islam. Born in Balḫ, in Persia, his tomb in Konya is a pilgrimage destination to this day. There, the Mewlewije emerged as a Dervish order that appeals to him, and that bears strongly pantheistic traits.

1055–1250	Empire of the Seljuks	Acknowledged by the Caliph as Sultan since 1040, Seljuk Togril appears before Baghdad in 1055. In 1058 he dissolves the Buyids, and founds the new Empire, which reaches to Anatolia (1071: victory at Mantzikert). The Seljuks are Sunnis.
1096–1270	Crusades of Western European Christian knights for the "liberation of the holy places in Palestine." Crusader locations and knightly orders in the Levant	After the capture of Jerusalem by the Seljuks in 1070, a cry for help comes from the Eastern Roman Emperor. Western and Central Europe mount a movement of support. By 1270, in seven military Crusades, with varying success, this movement will have attempted to place Jerusalem (first captured in 1099) under Christian control. This direct contact with the Islamic East leads to a flowering of European chivalric culture, as well as an intensification of long-distance trade with Central Europe. It also releases a flood of polemical and apologetical tracts, however, on both sides.

1169–1193	Rule of the Sultan of Egypt and Syria, Salāh al-Dīn ibn Ayyūb (Saladin)	In 1171, Seljuk General Saladin overthrows the Fatimids (and Egypt becomes Sunnite once more), and, after 1187, the Frankish Kingdom of Jerusalem. Like his Seljuk predecessors, Saladin rekindles the notion of a → Jihad against the Franks (and against Shiite extremists).
1206	General Quṭb-ud-Dīn Aibak founds the Sultanate of Delhi	First phase of the Islamization of Northern India (up to Timur's invasion in 1398).
1258	Invasion of the Mongols. End of the Abbasid Caliphate	Mongol Great Khan Hulagu captures Baghdad, and has the last Caliph executed.
1291	Sultan Baibars captures Akkon	This ends the presence of Christian Crusaders in the Holy Land.
Era 6: The primacy of law and the development of a spirituality in the Shia
1263–1328	Ibn Taimīya	Puritanical Ḥanbalit, from Damascus, formulates the thesis of the unity of state and dynasty (in Arab., dīn wa-dawla), and polemicizes against the veneration of the saints. His work is accepted by theologians of modern fundamentalist, or political, Islamism.

1326	Death of Ottoman I	The founder of the Dynasty of the Ottomans also laid the cornerstone for the later state system of the Ottoman Empire.
15th cent.	Extreme Shiite Mahdī Movement	In Iraq and Iran, Shiite Mahdī movements appear, of which the most important, under Dervish Ṣafī ad-Dīn Isḥāq, is founded by the Iranian Dynasty of the Ṣafawids. The propaganda he proclaims comports a chiliastic expectation of the now deified Mahdī, and a proximity to a Sufidom now organized as an Order.
1453	Fall of Constantinople	After several charges, the Ottomans under Mehmet II, "the Conqueror," capture Constantinople, which, under the name of Stambul/Istanbul becomes the new capital. Albania and Bosnia become Muslim, for the most part, after their defeat, while the Greek territories remain Christian.
1491	Fall of Granada	Naṣridic Granada was the last Arab center on the Iberian Peninsula. Granada and Córdoba, especially, become twin posthumous symbols of high Arab culture. But they also became the object of elegiac poetry of the lost paradise, and of the vision of a multicultural society.

1516/17	The Caliphate is transferred to the Ottomans	With the victory over the Mamelukes, the sacred cities of Islam also fall to the Ottomans. The last nominal Abbasid Caliph is brought to Istanbul, and his honor and office is transferred to the Sultan. Now the latter bears the title of Caliph.
1526	Timurite Barbur founds the Islamic Mogul Empire in Northern India (until 1739 or 1858)	Cultural flowering consequent upon the connection between Hindu Indian and Islamic Arab culture. In the eighteenth century, the central state collapses into princedoms.
1556–1605	Akbar I	The Mogul declares a syncretistic religion, that combines elements of Christianity, Islam, and Hinduism with a cult of the person of the ruler. This "Din-i-ilāhī" (Pers./ Urdu, "Divine Religion") dies, however, with him.
16th cent.	Founding of Islamic Sultanates in the region of today's → Indonesia	Sultanates Demak (1518), Bantam (1552), Mataram (1586). Indonesia becomes, until the twentieth century, one of the most populous of the Islamic states (87% Muslim, 1998).

1571	Battle of Lepanto	Annihilation of the Ottoman fleet by the League (Ecclesiastical State, Venice, Pisa, Spain) under John of Austria, 1573 peace with Venice. Mythically explained as the greatest victory over the long-established enemy, the Ottoman Empire, Lepanto becomes the symbol of the Christian Crusades.
17th cent.	Theosophist school of Isfahan	Founded by Mīr M. Bākir Astarābādī (d. 1630), the school adopts thoughts of Avicenna, Fārābī, and ibn ʿArabī. It is to be understood as the opposite pole from the ever more institutionalized spirituality in Iran.
1683	Siege of Vienna by the Turkish army	Mehmet IV suffers a catastrophic defeat at Kahlenberg, and the spread of the Ottoman Empire ends for good and all. It had been connected with the Timar system of the conferral of benefices in return for financing the military. The Western image of the siege of Vienna is stamped by the shock of the "Turks at the walls of Vienna," but is also an ideological stage-setting for of the defense of the Christian West.

Era 7 (18th/19th centuries): The Mahdī movement of the close of the nineteenth century. Beginnings of Islamic modernism 1703–1792	M. b. ʿAbd al-Waḥḥāb founds the traditionalist, rigoristic Waḥḥābite movement in Arabia	A first expansion is accomplished by the movement in ʿAbd al-Waḥḥāb's lifetime. A broad conquest of the Arabian peninsula (including Mecca and Medina) follows in the second Waḥḥābites' insurrection, in the nineteenth century. In a third assault, at the beginning of the twentieth century, the Saudis succeed in establishing a state.

1796–1925	Rule of the Qajārs in Iran	The formation of a hierarchically ordered Shiite clergy and a Shiite orthodoxy, begun under the Ṣafawids, is now complete.
round 1840	Establishing the Sanūsīya	The Libyan order today represents the spiritual foundation of the government of al-Qaḏḏāfī (Col. Kaddafi).
1844	Beginning of the Baha'i movement	A chiliastic Mahdī movement under ʿAlī Muḥammad (surnamed al-Bāb, = "The Gate" for the Imam) produces, under Mirza Hosein ʿAlī Nūrī Bahā'ullāh, the religion of the Baha'i.
1881–1898	Mahdī movement in Sudan	M. Aḥmad b. Abdāllah comes forward as a Mahdī, and proclaims asceticism, racial equality, and the unity of the Islamic schools of jurisprudence. In 1885 he captures Khartoum, which will be recaptured in 1898 by Lord Kitchener. His movement was joined by anti-colonialist Mahdī movements in Somalia (1900–1920) and Nigeria (from 1900).

19th/20th cent.	Salafīya	Modernist theologians, for example in Egypt, attempt to bring Islamic piety and a modern lifestyle into harmony under the conditions of colonialism. In Islam, there ought to be an alternative progressive thinking, that can be opposed to European Christian dominance. Important representatives: Jamal al-Dīn al-Afġānī (1838/39–1897), Muḥammad Abduh (1849–1905), Rāshid Riḍā (1865–1935).
1889	Founding of the Aḥmadīya	Mirza Ġulam Aḥmad (1835–1908) founds, in India, the syncretistic movement that adopts Shiite and Christian elements. He is reverenced as Mahdī as the incarnation of Jesus or of the Imam. Islam ought to be extended peacefully, by mission. The Aḥmadīya is widespread, in, e.g., West Africa.

Era 8 (20th century): Secularization vs. traditionalism: The emergence of political Islam ("Islamism") and its opponents since 1923	Turkish Republic	Under the government of Mustafa Kemal ("Ataturk"), the newly created Turkish Republic is transformed into a laicist state. In 1924, the Caliphate is dismantled. In the wake of the de-Ottomanizing, language and writing reforms take place, religious legal courts are closed.
1925–1979	Pahlevī dynasty in Iran	Cossack condottiere Reza Khan (Riḍā H̬ān) becomes the first Shah of the Pahlevī dynasty, which comes to power in a context of anti-British rioting. Loss of influence on the side of the clergy, secular instead of religious law, and a civil constitution are signs of the policy of secularization. A clerical opposition forms, as the Shah blocks the meetings of the religious alliance in 1963.
1925/6	Third Waḥḥābite uprising	The Waḥḥābite Saʿūd capture Mecca in 1924, and thereby create the basis for the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia.
1928	Founding of the Egyptian Muslim Brotherhood	These fundamentalist groups have been founded by Egyptian reformist theologian Ḥasan al-Bannā'. They are influenced partly by the Salafiya, and partly by the thinking of the Islamic states. Today they represent the largest Islamic organization in Egypt. One of its theoreticians, Sayyid Quṭb, is executed in 1966. In October 1981, the Muslim Brothers assassinate Anwar al-Sadat.

1920s and 1930s	Reformist movement in Maghreb	Anti-colonialist and reformist movements appear in Algeria and Morocco, under ʿAllāl al Fāsī and Ben Badis.
1947 (August 15)	Independence of India and Pakistan	Large population groups of both states succeeding the British Empire are resettled, on the basis of religion: Hindus, in the majority, to India, Muslims to Pakistan. Reciprocal pogroms cost some one million lives.
May 14, 1948	Founding of the State of Israel	The → Shoa, and the consequences of the Second World War (displaced persons), form the background of the decision of the United Nations to divide the British mandate region of Palestine, counter to the will of the Arab states. This act leads at once to bitter wars between the Jewish immigrants (→ Zionism) and the Arab armies, wars that Israel wins

		(the "Six Days' War," 1967, and the Yom Kippur War, 1973).
since the 1960s	In Western Europe, an Islamic diaspora emerges	Wars (between India and Pakistan; Algerian War; Kurdish War), and economic migration (from Turkey, Pakistan, and Maghreb states), lead to the formation of Muslim communities especially in England, France, and Germany. In some measure, ghettos appear in large cities (Bradford, London, Berlin-Kreuzberg), or on their outskirts.
1967	Six Days' War between Israel and the Palestinian Arab states. Israeli capture of the Temple Mount and the Wailing Wall	Israel occupies Syrian, Jordanian, and Egyptian territories. In consequence of the recent wave of expulsions, the Palestinians are politicized, and terrorist actions are perpetrated by the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO), under Yassir Arafat.
1979	Islamic revolution in Iran	In an at first general opposition to the regime of Shah Reza Pahlevi, the traditionalist group around Ayatollah → Khomeini prevails. Under his charismatic leadership, an "Islamic republic" forms, in 1979/80, with a spiritual leadership of Mullahs (→ Theocracy). Anti-Western, especially anti-American, propaganda, and the repression of religious minorities (Baha'i, Zoroastrians, "Parsees") typify political rhetoric and practice. Since the end of the twentieth century, the rather reformist course of President Khatami prevails, in which the interests of youth, women, and intellectuals are especially supported.

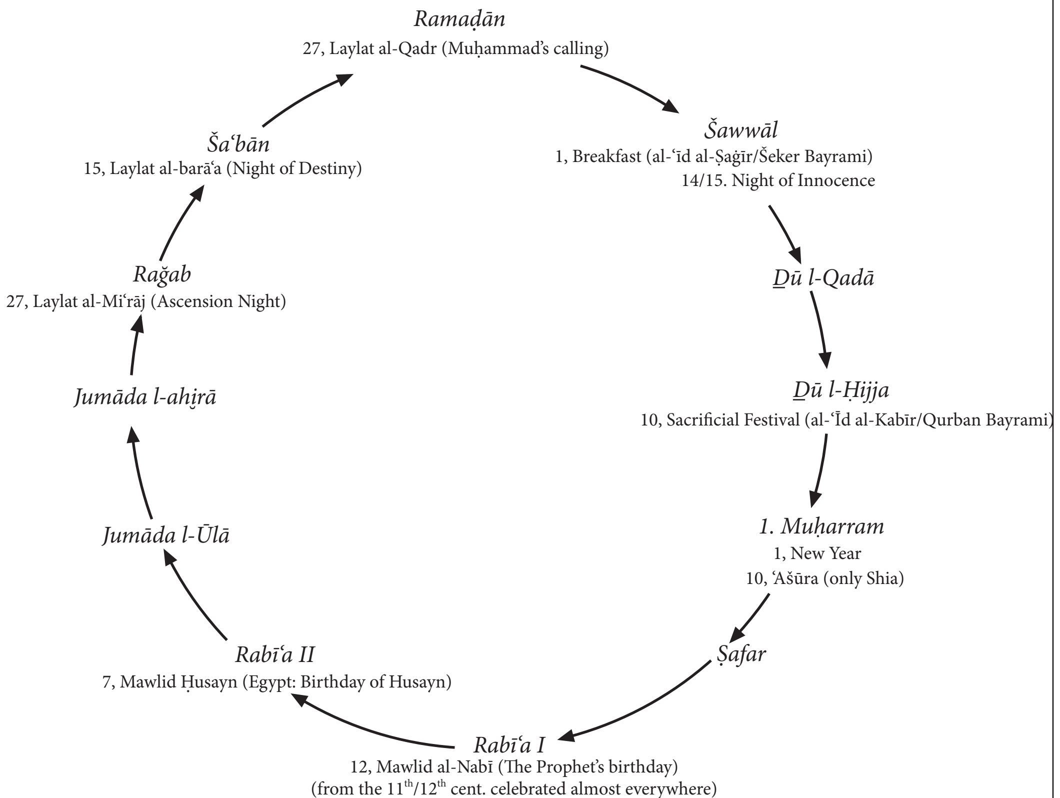
February 14, 1989	→ Fatwa against Salman Rushdie	Khomeini issues a Fatwa (juridical pronouncement) against Anglo-Indian novelist Salman Rushdie: the death sentence for apostasy.
1989–1992	Sovereignty or independence of Muslim states in Central Asia after the collapse of the Soviet Union	Independence is declared by Kazakhstan, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan. The independence of the Caucasian Republic of Chechnya is disputed in two bitter wars and a Russian occupation.
1991	Second Gulf War between Iraq and a Western Arabian alliance over oil state Kuwait	The war against Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein, which leads to the re-emergence of Kuwait and its dynasty, reactivates traditional caricatures of a "Christian West" and an "Islamic East." The alliance of Western Arabs, however, operates from fundamentalist Saudi Arabia.



1992	Beginning of fundamentalist disturbances in Algeria	After the suppression of the electoral victory of the Islamist FIS, the conflict begins between Islamists and the government with attacks mainly on journalists. The situation begins to escalate in c. 1994, and a militant arm of the FIS is founded: the GIA. A reconciliation parley is held in Rome in 1995, but then violence is renewed. The army, and militant Islamists of various groups, engage in bloody confrontations, and entire villages are victims of massacre.
1994–2001	Taliban in Afghanistan	The Islamist "Taliban" (Pers., "students" of the religious right; sing., "Talib") first appear on the scene. Trained in religious schools in Pakistan, and in military circles of the Mujaheddin, ethnic Pashtuns, especially, capture Kabul in 1996, and plan the construction of an "Islamic state." Promptly, they proscribe television, cinema, music, and the internet. They repress women and religious minorities. In 2000 and 2001, they destroy the statues of the Buddha in the North of the country. Since 2001, Hindus have had to identify themselves by wearing a piece of material with a particular pattern, as with the Jewish Star of David during the Third Reich.

1995	Compulsory separation of theologian Naṣr Ḥamid Abū Zayd	In a lengthier process, fundamentalists accomplish the removal of liberal Egyptian theologian Naṣr Ḥamid Abū Zayd for reason of "apostasy," in view of his historico-critical approach to the Qur'an.
2001	Sept. 11: Islamic terrorist attacks in New York and Washington, with some 3020 victims dead	After the September 11, 2001 attacks on the New York World Trade Center by members of radical Islamic organization al-Qaida, engineered by expatriated Saudi Usama bin Ladin, an "anti-terror alliance" comes into the picture, under the leadership of the United States, and ends the rule of the Taliban.

Islam: Festal Calendar

Due to the method of observation of the moon, the pure lunar calendar used by Muhammad, which determines the times of religious duties, etc. (e.g., fasting), is very inexact. Accordingly, even in Islamic antiquity, additional months of twenty-nine and thirty days were introduced. This device occasions a shift vis-à-vis the solar calendar. In parallel with the Islamic lunar year, other calendars were used from the outset, such as that of Yazdegird (Iran, 365 days), resting on the solar year, or the Julian (Egypt, Spain). Conversion tables and formulae for calculation, therefore, appear in astronomical works in Arabic as early as the Middle Ages. For example, we have Bīrūnī's "Chronology of Ancient Peoples," composed around 1000. Iran knows of the solar year, besides, by Hijra calculation, therefore by (Gregorian) solar years, counted from 622. Most Islamic states apply the Gregorian system; only in religious materials is the Hijra year found as well. The respective year of the Hijra can be looked up in tables or be calculated with the formula C = 3H/100 + 622, where C is the Gregorian year, and H the Hijra year, rounding off to whole numbers.

Festive Cycle

Agnes Imhof

Israel → Palestine/Israel

Japan → China/Korea/Japan

Jehovah's Witnesses

Origin

1. Jehovah's Witnesses (until 1931 the International Association of Bible Scholars) are an independent international Christian religious community that has performed intensive Bible and mission work since the 1870s. The name 'Jehovah's Witnesses' goes back to the biblical passage Isaiah 43:8-13: Jehovah (instead of Yahweh) takes a reading of the ancient Hebrew word for God YHWH that has altered vocalization (and a wordplay on adonai, 'Lord'), which Jewish believers use out of reverence for the → name of God itself.

One meets Jehovah's Witnesses on the street, in public areas, at intersections, and at the doors of homes. The key theme of their invitations to religious discussion and Bible study is the 'Kingdom of God.' According to the understanding of Scripture maintained by Jehovah's Witnesses, this realm is a regime on earth that, in the impending future, under the peaceful rule of Jesus Christ, will solve all of the problems of humankind. In the wars, natural catastrophes, and social collapses of the twentieth century, Jehovah's Witnesses see the fulfillment of apocalyptic prophecies (Matt 24, Rev 6, and 2 Tim 3:1-9). Against this background, unsalutary developments appear as signs of the (end) time, which indicate the proximity of God's punitive judgment upon his enemies (Battle of Armageddon, Mountain of Megiddo, Rev 16). Thus, the religious community of Jehovah's Witnesses—the more than 5.9 million faithful today, active in 234 countries—belongs to the chiliastic movements, known to the history of Christianity in no small number (→ Millenarianism/Chiliasm). True, they do not maintain this constant expectation or anticipation (Matt 24:42) unconditionally today. The reason is that, in the past, the reinforced expectations of many 'Bible Scholars' or Jehovah's Witnesses of the inauguration of the 'Thousand-Year Kingdom' (cf. Rev 20:1-10) had not been fulfilled in connection with certain dates (1914, 'Jubilee Years' 1925 and 1975). These hasty speculations, nourished as well by the Watchtower literature, have led to faith crises and disappointments. Still the Jehovah's Witnesses have stabilized, and at this time are expanding worldwide.

2. With the creation (1879) of the newspaper Zion's Watchtower and Herald of Christ's Presence, the early group of Bible scholars and their revered founder Charles Taze Russell called into question doctrines and traditions of the established churches. They challenged, for example, the church doctrines of the Trinity, the immortality of the soul, and the torments of hell. By way of an independent Bible study, they countered earlier Bible scholars on the question of theodicy with a Messianic eschatology oriented to the present world: Jesus Christ is the Son of God, he gave his life as a ransom for humanity, and he maintains a spiritual 'Presence' (in Greek, parousía). Next to come is the institution of the Kingdom of God, an earthly paradise, in which the dead themselves shall at last come to resurrection.

Messianic Eschatology

Self-Concept

3. Jehovah's Witnesses see themselves in the tradition of all of those in the course of history who have felt their way to the primitive gospel and the proclamations of the Bible and have sought to live them consistently—influenced, again and again, surely, by human speculations and errors—and have been crushed, persecuted, and put to death by political and clerical power (for example, the Waldenses in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, → Heresy).

Jehovah's Witnesses take the Bible as a whole, and see in it the revealed word of God. For them, the sense of scripture is literal, and its infallibility inspired (scripturalism). Every believer, then, must be directed by biblical principles. For them, faith and 'proclamation' form an indivisible unity. In terms of their self-understanding, a passive membership, or a practice of the faith restricted to private space, cannot be in this 'society of preachers.'

Organization

4. The religious community of Jehovah's Witnesses knows no membership contours fixed in writing: all are 'brothers and sisters in faith' as soon as they are baptized (see below parag. 6a). The absence of a division between professionals and laity within the Jehovah's Witnesses' religious living environment does not demand of each individual a mere partial commitment. While most Jehovah's Witnesses are engaged honorifically as 'publishers' or 'pioneers' (fulltime missioners who defray the expenses of their sustenance with a part-time job), there are also high-ranking missionaries or co-workers at the Central Office (in Brooklyn), and in the more than one hundred branch offices worldwide of the Watchtower Bible and Tract Society, founded in 1881, which represents Jehovah's Witnesses' legally registered publishing company. The spiritually supervisory 'governing body' is likewise in Brooklyn, and is practically identical with the group at the head of the Watchtower and Bible Society. Worldwide mission work is supported by voluntary contributions, and high-ranking co-workers are maintained by the organization in a community resembling a religious order.

Cult and Daily Religious Practice

5. Jehovah's Witnesses meet several times weekly in their gathering places ('Kingdom Halls'). 'Elders' (from the Gk. presbúteroi) and Service Office 'assistants' (from the Gk., diákonoi), who must meet particular biblical requirements (1 Tim 3:1-13), assume responsibility in the individual communities. In their practice of divine service, Jehovah's Witnesses know no fixed rituals. Once yearly, on the fourteenth of Nisan, at sunset (according to the calculation of the biblical calendar), they celebrate the 'memorial meal' (the Lord's Supper) to recall the death of Christ.

Thereby they distinguish Memorial Meal Sharers and Memorial Meal Observers. The Sharers consist in those Jehovah's Witnesses who today belong to the surviving 'remnant' ('Bride of Christ')—those 144,000 members of the elect, of the Messianic reign of peace, gathered since the Pentecost event of 33 CE.[1] The Memorial Observers are that numerically undetermined group of believers who hope for an 'eternal life' in the future paradise on earth.

By reason of their pagan origins, church festivals like Christmas or Easter are considered forms of idolatry. The members' plain, modest places of assembly are supported worldwide by voluntary contributions. A part of these moneys goes for assistance and construction in regions of crisis and catastrophe.

The experiences of a community of siblings—singing, praying, encouraging, taking instruction in the assemblies, organizing missionary undertakings—essentially structure this religion's environment and everyday life. Along with feelings like trust, and a sense of security, the members of this community also develop certitude that membership here is necessary for the acceptance and acknowledgment of God.

6. Three aspects deserve special attention in any balanced consideration of Jehovah's Witnesses: (a) an ethics of the faithful grounded in the Bible, (b) the external effect of religious practice, and (c) the reaction of state and society toward this religious community in terms of potential conflict.

Ethics

a) Consciousness of having found the 'one true faith' (cf. Eph 4:4-5), and of belonging as citizens to the eschatological Kingdom, steeps this community's religious ethics. Their moral norm is the example of Jesus. This element is what keeps them at a distance from political movements. In national and ethnic conflicts, or even military confrontations, they take a steadfastly neutral position. The use of violence and military service are rejected in principle; pre- and extramarital sexual activity, as well as → abortion, is defined sin. Appealing to Gen 9:4-7 and Acts 15:28-29, Jehovah's Witnesses refuse blood transfusions, or any medical treatment employing blood and blood products, and seek out alternative therapies. Enthusiastic, earnest commitment is regarded as evidence of a genuine personal consecration to God. The individual must be intimately familiar with the teachings of the Bible, as unconditional priority attaches to the goal of being a 'teacher of the word.' Thus, with Jehovah's Witnesses there is no infant baptism. Christian baptism by water, for a Jehovah's Witness, is an outward sign of complete bestowal of oneself to God through Jesus Christ. Thus, baptism represents the most important event in the believer's life.

External Effect

b) House-to-house visiting is a characteristic feature of Jehovah's Witnesses. A capacity for active → mission ('service of preaching') must be maintained through intensive group relationships, ongoing bible study, and activities of worship. The spectrum of methods of proclamation extends from congresses held for public effect to improvised underground activities.

Relationship to State and Society

b) Although Jehovah's Witnesses feel obligations vis-à-vis governments, in a case of conflict between state requirements and a commandment of faith the latter is assigned priority (Rom 13). This reservation of conscience coincides with the theologically founded Western Christian tradition of the responsibility of the individual before God.

Persecution

c) Jehovah's Witnesses refused to swear loyalty to the regime of → National Socialism, and refused military service during conscription. Thus, the religion (25,000 members in Germany) was outlawed and persecuted as early as 1933. Some 10,000 were locked in prisons and concentration camps, where 1,500 lost their lives. More than 250 were executed for refusing military service. Resistance became an obligatory precept for the community's self-respect and self-assertion. In 1950, Jehovah's Witnesses were once more proscribed, this time in the German Democratic Republic, suffered discrimination, and were subjected to arbitrary imprisonment. Almost always on account of their precept of neutrality and their refusal of military service, Jehovah's Witnesses today are restricted or proscribed in more than thirty countries (according to the Watchtower Society, 1999).

While Jehovah's Witnesses are in favor of open dialogue among all religions, and tolerance for various worldviews, their religious neutrality constrains them to forego participation in ecumenical movements.

7. Jehovah's Witnesses have been more and more involved in considerations of public interest in recent years. In Germany, for instance, their nonparticipation in political elections on the basis of a Christian irreconcilability of political and religious activities (John 17:14, 18:36), led to the rejection on the part of the Federal Court of Administration, on 26 June 1997, of the religious community's application for recognition as a legal corporation. Jehovah's Witnesses are currently making more use of the resources of public information to combat misunderstandings, especially those of tendentious and polemical reports in the media in connection with the debate on 'sects' (→ New Religions; Sect), and inadequate public information. With the founding of 'Hospital Connection Committees,' which form a dense information network worldwide, Jehovah's Witnesses seek to procure optimal medical treatment without blood transfusions. Thus, owing especially to the religion's normative orientation, interaction with Jehovah's Witnesses today comports a challenge to other Christian groups to confront their own basic notions.

1. Rev 7:4-10, 14:1-7; Luke 12:32. In 1999, 8755 Jehovah's Witnesses professed their 'heavenly' hope to be included in this class.

Literature

Primary Sources: Jehovah's Witnesses. Ed. with an introduction by Jerry Bergman, I: The Early Writings of J. F. Rutherford; II: Controversial and Polemical Pamphlets, New York 1990 ([1]1915–1929).

Secondary Literature: Beckford, James Arthur, The Trumpet of Prophecy: A Sociological Study of Jehovah's Witnesses, Oxford 1975; Bergman, Jerry (ed.), Jehovah's Witnesses: A Comprehensive and Selectively Annotated Bibliography, Westport 1999; Cronn-Mills, Daniel, A Qualitative Analysis of the Jehovah's Witnesses: The Rhetoric, Reality, and Religion in the Watchtower Society, Lewiston 1999; Holden, Andrew, Jehovah's Witnesses: Portrait of a Contemporary Religious Movement, London 2002; Kaplan, William, State and Salvation: The Jehova's Witnesses and Their Fight for Civil Rights, Toronto 1989; Penton, M. James, Apocalypse Delayed: The Story of Jehova's Witnesses, Toronto [2]1997.

→ Apocalypse, Baptism, Bible, Millenarianism/Chiliasm, Mission, Protestantism

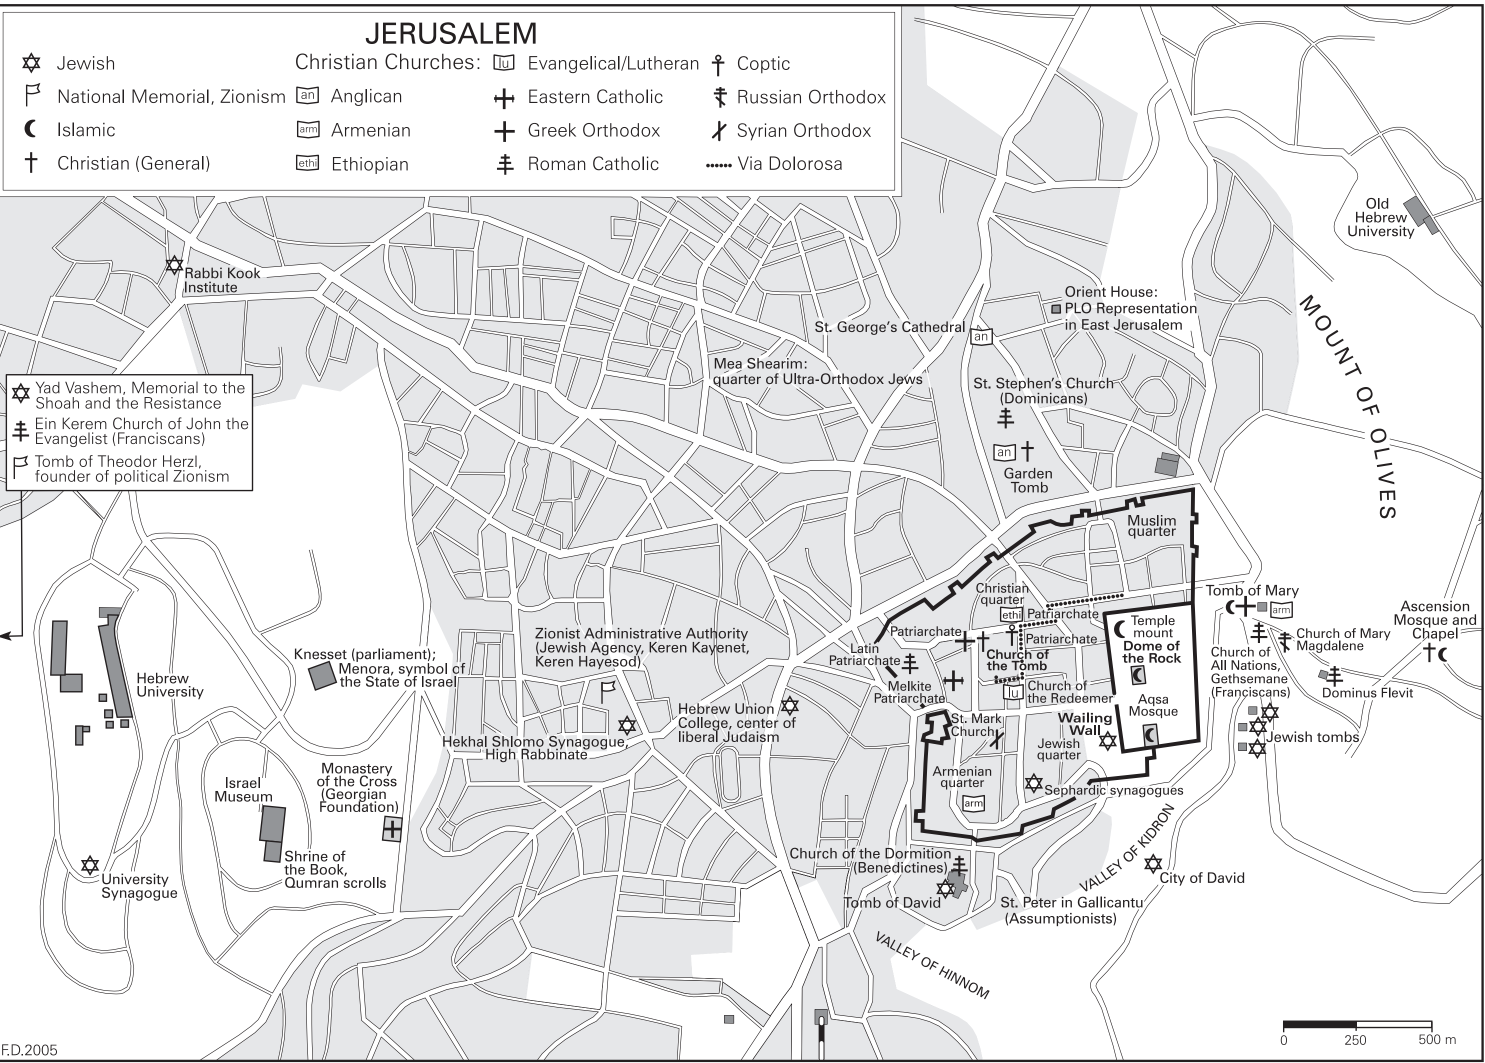
Robert Schmidt

Jerusalem

The Holy City

1. For the Judeo-Christian tradition, Jerusalem is 'The Holy City' plain and simple, the center of the world and the most important pilgrimage location. Jews, Christians, and Muslims revere the city as a kind of showcase of divine revelation and salvation. As a 'heavenly Jerusalem,' it is a major symbol of religious longing, and a driving force of religious utopias. As an 'earthly city,' it was always the bone of contention when it came to claims of possession and power interests. Today it is claimed by two nations, Israeli and Palestinian, as their capital city.



Jerusalem lies 800 meters high, in the mountainous land on the border of the Judaic wasteland, off the beaten track of the great trade routes that, for millennia, have crossed the 'fertile crescent' between Egypt and Mesopotamia. The name of the city can be traced back to City of God Salim, a name containing the Semitic root of the word for 'peace': in Arabic, salaam, and in Hebrew, shalom. Thus Jerusalem has often been designated the 'City of Peace.' Actually, there is scarcely a city over which more wars have been waged: in the course of its almost 5,000-year history, it has been captured thirty-seven times. Although Jerusalem seldom experienced a time of peace, it is firmly attached to the vision of a reign of peace in which swords are beaten into plowshares (Isa 2:2-4).

Holy City of the Jews

2. a) Jerusalem was one of the numerous Canaanite city-states in Palestine. The place of sacrifice was to be found in the heights of the city, and is identified in tradition as Mount Moriah, the hill upon which Abraham was to sacrifice his son Isaac (Gen 22). Around 1000 BCE, David captured the city, and made it the capital of his Jewish kingdom. He transported the Ark of the Covenant, the key sanctuary of the tribes of Israel, to Jerusalem. Consequently, he transferred the cultic and religious center of Israel, that had previously been found in Sichem (today's Nablus) with its Mount Garizim, to Jerusalem with Mount Moriah/Zion. Mount Zion was deemed the sacred center of the Kingdom, and the middle of the world. David's son Solomon built the Temple on Mount Moriah, as the stable place of worship, to house the Ark of the Covenant containing Moses's stone tablets of the Law, symbol of the presence of God (all this according to the biblical accounts). With the destruction of the Temple by the Babylonians in 587 BCE, the Ark of the Covenant was lost, and in the rebuilt Second Temple the Holy of Holies was left empty. After the Romans destroyed the Temple and the City once and for all in 70 CE, the symbolic presence of God was finally transferred to the western, surrounding wall, which is now left over as the last remains of the Temple. Jews are able to pray there on the commemoration day of the destruction of the Temple (Wailing Wall).

Christians

b) With the erection of the Temple to Jupiter on the Temple Mount, the Romans sought to have Jerusalem called Aelia Capitolina, and transformed into a Roman colony. With the arrival of the Christians, another rock became the center of religious veneration: Golgotha, as the assumed place of Jesus's crucifixion, with the nearby tomb as the place of his resurrection. Over both places, the Emperor Constantine erected in 335 the dome of the Church of the Tomb. Its monumental construction indicates a new sacred

JERUSALEM
Jewish
National Memorial, Zionism
Islamic
Christian (General)
Christian Churches:
Anglican
Armenian
Ethiopian Evangelical/Lutheran
Eastern Catholic
Greek Orthodox
Roman Catholic
Coptic
Russian Orthodox Syrian Orthodox Via Dolorosa
Old Hebrew University
Rabbi Kook Institute
Orient House: PLO Representation in East Jerusalem
St. George's Cathedral
MOUNT OF OLIVES
Mea Shearim: quarter of Ultra-Orthodox Jews
St. Stephen's Church (Dominicans)
Garden Tomb
Yad Vashem, Memorial to the Shoah and the Resistance
Ein Kerem Church of John the Evangelist (Franciscans) Tomb of Theodor Herzl, founder of political Zionism Muslim quarter
Christian quarter
Patriarchate
Tomb of Mary
Ascension Mosque and Chapel
Temple mount Dome of the Rock
Latin Patriarchate
Church of the Tomb
Church of Mary Magdalene
Church of All Nations, Gethsemane (Franciscans)
Zionist Administrative Authority (Jewish Agency, Keren Kayenet, Keren Hayesod) Knesset (parliament); Menora, symbol of the State of Israel Hebrew University
Melkite Patriarchate
Church of the Redeemer
Dominus Flevit
Aqsa Mosque
Hebrew Union College, center of liberal Judaism
St. Mark Church
Wailing Wall
Jewish quarter
Jewish tombs
Hekhal Shlomo Synagogue, High Rabbinate
Israel Museum
Monastery of the Cross (Georgian Foundation)
Armenian quarter
Sephardic synagogues
VALLEY OF KIDRON
Church of the Dormition (Benedictines)
City of David
Shrine of the Book, Qumran scrolls
University Synagogue
Tomb of David
St. Peter in Gallicantu (Assumptionists)
VALLEY OF HINNOM
0 250
500 m
F.D.2005

center of the world, and it became the pilgrimage place for Christians. On the world maps of the Middle Ages, consequently, Jerusalem is shifted to the middle, so that it became the geographical navel of the world even cartographically. In Christian theology, besides, the concept of the 'Heavenly Jerusalem' acquired importance. The motif comes from Jewish apocalypticism, which, in the time of the destruction of the Temple, had produced a counter-image: the utopia of a new, ideal city of the future, in which only God and the highest Good would reign. In the New Testament, the heavenly Jerusalem becomes the primordial model of the Church, an image now present transcendently, which, at the end of days, will descend upon the earthly Jerusalem.

Muslims

c) After the Muslim capture of Jerusalem by Caliph Omar in 638, the Temple mount received new importance as a sacred place. From the rock Moria, it was told, Mohammed had entered upon his ascension. On the rock, Caliph Abd al-Malik built the Dome of the Rock cupola alongside the al-Aksa mosque, and thereby created the third most important sanctuary of Islam, after Mecca and Medina, as well as the Islamic counterbalance to the Church of the Tomb and the Wailing Wall, in the city of, now, three religions that go back to Abraham. Excepting the time of Crusader rule (1099–1187), al-Quds ('the Sanctuary') has been an Islamic city to this day, in which Jews and Christians also live, and as a rule, have access to their holy places.

Divided City

c) Since mid-nineteenth century, the interest of the European colonial powers in the 'Holy City' has been awakened. Thus, the construction of the Catholic Dormition and the Evangelical Church of the Redeemer, in connection with the visit of German Kaiser Wilhelm II in Jerusalem in 1898, not only symbolized the presence of German Catholicism and Protestantism in Jerusalem, but also asserted the claim to power by the German Reich. Jerusalem also became the mighty goal of a Jewish immigration, especially from Eastern Europe, and Jews finally constitute the majority of the population of Jerusalem.

In 1917, with the occupation of Palestine, the British ended the four-hundred-year Ottoman rule of Jerusalem, and with the Balfour Declaration laid the foundation for the creation of a Jewish state, and the kindling of the Arab-Jewish conflict in that country. After a United Nations plan of division had foundered, one that would have turned Jerusalem into an international zone, the city was divided, in the 1948 War for Independence, with an Arab East Zone (including the old City), and a Jewish West Zone.

The Six Days' War of 1967 ended the division of the city with the capture and annexation of East Jerusalem. The status of Jerusalem remains disputed, however. While the United Nations insisted on a special international status, Israel in 1980 declared the entire city its national capital. But Palestinians still see their capital in East Jerusalem, and the entire Islamic world continues to assert its claim to the holy places there, symbolized in the Dome of the Rock.

Growing Fundamentalism

d) At present, the political confrontation in the Near East conflict is maintained less and less under national auspices, but rather under religious ones. The unrest leading to the Intifada—the 1980 uprising of the Palestinians against Israeli occupation—saw its beginnings mostly on the Temple Mount in Jerusalem. The growth of → fundamentalism in all three major Western religions fosters the misuse of religious myths and symbols as a weapon in the political struggle. Accordingly, despite the presence of three religions that honor it as the City of Peace, Jerusalem is a city of hatred and religious conflict.

4. Everyday life in Jerusalem is to a great extent impregnated with religion. In the Orthodox Jewish quarter of Mea Shearim, the nineteenth-century Yiddish shtetl lives on (→ Judaism). The inhabitants reject the Israeli state, since only the coming Messiah can found a Jewish kingdom. They pay no taxes, and perform no military service. Now and then they cast stones at drivers as transgressors of the Sabbath rest. In the Armenian quarter, which can be entered only through a narrow gate leading into the Patriarchal compound, the life of the inhabitants is altogether that of the Armenian Orthodox Church. Armenians in Jerusalem see themselves as guardians of the cultural and religious identity of the Armenian people.

Not only does the city's economy strongly depend on tourism and pilgrimage, but even the image of the streets is impregnated with it. Pakistani Muslims, on their way to the Dome of the Rock, may encounter, for example at the Gate of Damascus, American Jews on their way to the Wailing Wall, and Italian pilgrims seeking to follow the route of Christ's passion, behind a wooden cross, along the Via Dolorosa. Their way leads past what is doubtless the most remarkable kitsch ornamentation in the world—a crescent, cross, and Star of David, candles, incense, models of the Dome of the Rock, and seven-armed chandeliers. Here are the religions in peaceful togetherness—at least in the show windows of the souvenir-merchants.

Literature

Armstrong, Karen, A History of Jerusalem: One City, Three Faiths, London 1997; Friedland, Roger/Hecht, Richard D., To Rule Jerusalem, Berkeley 2000; Gilbert, Martin, Jerusalem in the Twentieth Century, London 1996; Gonen, Rivka, Contested Holiness: Jewish, Muslim, and Christian Perspective on the Temple Mount in Jerusalem, Jersey City 2003; Grabar, Oleg, The Shape of the Holy: Early Islamic Jerusalem, Princeton 1996; Poorthuis, Marcel/Chana, Safrai (eds.), The Centrality of Jerusalem: Historical Perspectives, Kampen 1996; Rosovsky, Nitza (ed.), City of the Great King: Jerusalem from David to the Present, Cambridge 1996; Rubin, Rehav, Image and Reality: Jerusalem in Maps and Views, Jerusalem 1999; Schein, Sylvia, Gateway to the Heavenly City: Crusader Jerusalem and the Catholic West (1099–1187), Burlington 2003; Smith, Jonathan Z., "In Search of Place," in: Idem, To Take Place: Toward Theory in Ritual, Chicago/London 1987, 1-23; Weinfeld, Moshe, "Zion and Jerusalem as Religious and Political Capital: Ideology and Utopia," in: Friedman, R. E. (ed.), The Poet and the Historian: Essays in Literary and Historical Biblical Criticism, Chico 1983, 75-115.

→ Conflict/Violence, Palestine/Israel

Christof Meyer

Jesuits

1. 'Jesuits' is the general designation for the Catholic community and → order founded by Ignatius of Loyola (1491–1556), the 'Society of Jesus' (Lat., Societas Jesu, abbr. 'S. J.'; in Span., Compañia de Jesús). The Order's principal concern is worldwide apostolic and missionary activity. To this end, the Order has placed itself directly under the Pope as representative of the Church as a whole—in contradistinction from the regional church or diocese (fourth vow: obedience to the Pope). Further characteristics are a centralized outer structure, on the basis of obedience, and a strict inner organization, including an academic priestly training of rather many years.

Founder and Founding

2. After incurring serious wounds, Basque courtier and officer Iñigo López de Loyola turned to the study of Christian theology. In emulation of his favorite knightly hero Amadis, from the later romance cycle, he worked out a 'mystique of service' as a knight of Christ. In 1534, together with six companions, he pronounced the sacred vows of poverty, celibacy, and obedience. In 1540, Pope Paul III issued the bull Regimini Militantis Ecclesiae, officially recognizing the new community as an order. In 1531, Ignatius was elected the first Superior General of the Society of Jesus. The Order does not regard itself as a monastic community, as which it would have a stable, cloistered residence; rather it is the demands of the apostolate that are the criterion of inner organization. At the center stands the spread of Christian doctrine and faith through preaching, spiritual exercises, and works of love (where a goal and manner of life are established in the first rule of the Order, "Formula Instituti").

Development and Constitution

3. After the exemplar of an army, the Order is organized in a strict hierarchy, with a General at the top. The image of a 'spiritual army' reflects the medieval ideal of the noble knight in the service of Christ. At the same time, this organizational structure serves as a tool for the militant thrust of the Counter-Reformation. The Superior General, with his seat in Rome, is elected for life, and conducts the business of governing the Order. The legislative organ of the Society, the General Congregation, which determines the guidelines of the Order, elects the Superior General. The society distinguishes three types of Jesuits: scholastics, who are in training; fathers, who have been ordained priests; and brothers, 'lay' members of the Order. A further distinction is made between the 'professed'—ordained members who have professed the papal vow and are destined for apostolic mission—and the 'coadjutors' (Lat., 'Assistants'), who do not pronounce this vow, and whose activity is that of priests or brothers.

4. During the first century after the founding, the Order spread out rapidly, and advanced to be one of the major agents of the Counter-Reformation. Along with mission and the battle against heretics, tasks arose in the area of training and education, as well as in the cultivation of theology and the sciences. In 1559, General of the Order Aquaviva issued a general Order of Studies (in Lat., Ratio Studiorum). The Jesuit work in the schools stood in the service of musical religious education of youth and moral training. Internal conflicts (methods of accommodation, the rites controversy), conservatism, and a growing inner immobility of the Order led to outer hostility. Under pressure from the Bourbon courts, Pope Clement XIV suppressed the Society (Dominus ac Redemptor, 21 July 1773). By papal decree (Pius VII, Sollicitudo Omnium Ecclesiarum, 7 August 1814), the suppression was rescinded. The history of the Society in the nineteenth century is uneven, and marked by enmity and expulsion. The international character of the Order went contrary to the new self-concept of the national states; its reproduction under the auspices of the restoration rendered it suspect in the eyes of liberal and socialist powers. The Order's position in in favor of the dogmatization of the infallibility of the Pope (First Vatican Council, 1870) led to difficulties with Protestant national church movements in Germany, and peaked in 1872 in Bismarck's 'Jesuit laws.' (Cf. the Kulturkampf: state against the Catholic Church and against an 'ultramontanism' focusing on Rome; rescission of the Jesuit laws only in 1917).

Mission

5. In Ignatius's own lifetime, the first extra-European missions left Portugal for India (Francis Xavier, 1541) and Brazil (Manuel de Nobrega, 1549). Xavier went on to Japan and China. Beginning in 1574, Alessandro Valignano was entrusted with the mission to the Far East; Michele Ruggieri and Matteo Ricci worked successfully in China. Here, as in India and Japan, the method of 'accommodation' was applied. This tactic attempts to render Christian teaching easier to integrate in a given culture by adaptation in dress, custom, and lifestyle to those of the native population. Work methods, mission strategies, and means are evaluated and applied on the criterion of their effectiveness (c.f. the concept of 'inculturation,' developed after Vatican II). Japan's first encounter with Christianity occurred in 1549, with the landing of Spanish Jesuits in Kagoshima. Under the leadership of Francis Xavier (1506–1552), they plied their mission at the princely courts of southern Japanese provinces, and founded the first Jesuit communities (Hirano, Yamaguchi, Funai). At first, the new religious teaching seemed to the Daimyos to be a variant of Buddhism, and, together with their vassals and subjects, they adopted the foreign belief, promising themselves economic advantages from contact with the Europeans. However, central concepts and faith content such as guilt, sin, and forgiveness remained strange; they found no correspondence in Japan's religious teachings (→ Shintô; Buddhism). Finally the suspicion crystallized that, with the help of the Fathers, the Spanish were planning to conquer and colonize Japan. The activities of the Jesuits ended after a scant one hundred years, with a cruel persecution of Christians by the Japanese government (expulsion, torture, crucifixion of members of orders). The main showplace was Nagasaki. Foreigners must leave the country; Japanese Christians recanted the new faith under compulsion, or went underground ('Crypto-Christians'; in Jap., Kakure Kirishitan).

Stereotypes

6. Biretta and cassock have long since been laid aside, and the 'Roman collar' transformed into the cravat. The Order's presentation and policy have been changed. Still, clichés and stereotypes abide: papal militia, papal lobby, elite order, blind obedience, the intellectual, the atheist, the pragmatic opportunist ('the end justifies the means'). Entangled in secret machinations and conspiratorial scenarios, Jesuits, along with Freemasons and Jews, are fantasized as subversives, acting globally or as agents of foreign powers. The cliché of the intellectual derives from the Jesuit's long years of training, and involvement in education, but also conforms to the negative, anti-intellectual stereotypes of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Methods of accommodation, and moral 'casuistry' (with 'probabilism'), fostered the imputation of the end-means rationality. Conspiratorial scenarios of the nineteenth century (e.g., rumors of Jesuits being the wire-pullers in the Dreyfus affair) impregnated the image of the Jesuit with that of the enemy of the state and a traitor.

Jesuits Today

7. With some 25,000 members worldwide, in 113 countries, the Society of Jesus is the largest order of priests in the Catholic Church today. New themes have occupied the Order since the 1970s: place of woman in the Church, inter-religious dialogue, assistance to refugees, sociopolitical engagement in Latin America (→ Liberation Theology), peace and disarmament. Projects and aid organizations have been founded for new assignments: international refugee assistance ('Jesuit Refugee Service'), 'Jesuit Volunteers' devoted to work with socially marginal groups, peace initiatives, and a forum for inter-religious dialogue ('Jesuit Secretariat for Inter-Religious Dialogue'). Jesuits performed the work of pioneers in the confrontation of the West with → Zen Buddhism. H. Dumoulin, H. M. Enomiya-Lassalle, H. Waldenfels and others have made various contributions to the scholarly investigation of Zen, along with the practice and development of an actual 'Christian Zen.' The spiritual point of departure for Lassalle (1898–1993) was the spirituality of Ignatius's Exercises. He attempted to integrate Zen as a form of meditation and practical method into Christian spirituality (accommodation in reverse!), and his pupils continue his efforts. The Jesuits' critical confrontation with some of the philosophical, ethical, and socio-political questions and developments of the 1960s and 1970s have changed the stance of the Order on a number of issues, in some cases leading it to positions contrary to the official opinions of the Church (cf. socio-political engagement in Latin America, criticism of the duty of absolute obedience vis-à-vis the doctrinal opinion of the pope and of the encyclical Humanae Vitae's proscription of birth control). Tones critical of pope and papacy increasingly color the internal development of the Order: Pope Paul VI reacted by imposing silence on the Jesuits gathered in Rome for the Thirty-Second General Congregation in 1975. The role of the Society as the 'strong right arm of the papacy' seems to have been played out, especially after the accession of Pope John Paul II in 1978: the ultra-conservative militant Catholic organization Opus Dei (Lat., 'God's Work') has replaced it in that capacity.

Literature

Bangert, William, A History of the S. J., St. Louis 1972; Feingold, Mordechai (ed.), Jesuit Science and the Republic of Letters, Cambridge 2003; Hollis, Christopher, A History of the Jesuits, London 1968; McCoog, Thomas M., A Guide to Jesuit Archives, St. Louis 2001; O'Malley, John W., The First Jesuits, Cambridge 1993; O'Malley, John W. et al. (eds.), The Jesuits: Cultures, Sciences, and the Arts 1540–1773, Toronto 1999; Polgár, László, Bibliography of the History of the Society of Jesus, Rome 1967.

→ Catholicism, Mission, Order/Brotherhoods, Papacy, Zen Buddhism

Sabine Bayreuther

Jesus

The Historical Jesus

1. Jesus was a Jewish preacher and healer appearing in Galilee (in today's Israel), especially in the region of Lake Gennesaret. His biography is visible only sketchily behind the religious reception of his activity, which reception forms the content of the four "Gospels" (writings of the Christian Canon) and related sources. That Jesus was born shortly before the death of King Herod the Great (4 BCE) may be a historically accurate approximation. His father and he were building artisans. The father seems already to have died by the beginning of Jesus's public appearance (between 26 and 29 BCE). Under Roman governor Pontius Pilate, Jesus was executed in → Jerusalem by crucifixion (→ Cross/Crucifixion); it may be assumed that the accusation was his criticism of Jewish temple worship and the suspicion of having planned a popular uprising against the Romans.

Teaching

2. Jesus taught mainly among the simple folk of a country region. He proclaimed an entirely new relation between God and human beings, along with the imminence of the world event that he called the 'Kingdom of God.' In preaching this Kingdom, he clothed it in stories and sayings that make use of a rich pictorial language ('parables'). The point of departure for his ethics is the conviction that the interior of a person is more important than the exterior, and that therefore a purification and renewal of the human being must occur from within, through trust in God, righteousness, and love. Outward behavior is not unessential, but it is without value if it is in contradiction with an inner attitude. This conception brought Jesus into conflict with other expositions of the Jewish order of life; the confrontation was kindled especially in his denunciation of official determinations of Sabbath rest, and of the rejection of persons who were regarded as unclean (skin diseases, handicapped, mentally ill, etc.). According to the writings of his followers, Jesus turned to such persons repeatedly, delivering many of them from disease or → possession with a call to God, and thus led them back into society.

For a number of his adherents, Jesus came to be regarded as the Messiah (Heb., mashiah, '[Lord's] Anointed [One]') of Jewish tradition, and the object of hopes for a political deliverance from Roman rule. On his last pilgrimage to Jerusalem, for the Feast of Passover, he apparently himself reckoned with his arrest and execution under this accusation. There, in the circle of his twelve disciples, he celebrated a ritual meal, and interpreted it in the sense of a current Jewish conception, through which it became the farewell meal of a martyr whose blood can efface the sins of the people.

Reception

3. From the very beginning, a number of groups appealed to Jesus. For instance, homeless and destitute itinerant ascetics raised the claim of continuing Jesus's lifestyle. Their ideas are ordered in a larger ascetical movement, originally resident in India, and there, among other things, taking a classic form in Buddhist monasticism. It appeared in the Mediterranean area in the form of itinerant Cynic philosophers, for example.

Jesus in Christianity

Emerging from Jerusalem, another group was formed, whose point of crystallization was the belief that Jesus had been raised from the dead by God and had thereby been certified as the Messiah (in Gk., Christós). Both of the latter currents quickly had effects beyond Judaism, and led to the rise of Christianity as a distinct religion, at whose center stands Jesus as the risen Lord. On the other hand, Jesus's effect among his own Jewish popular and religious community was of brief duration.

By the fifth century, the dogma had formed in Christianity that, in the person of Jesus, God had appeared in human form, taking that form actually, and not merely seemingly. Jesus Christ was interpreted as one person, in whom divine and human nature are joined 'unconfusedly,' but undividedly. Thus he was understood according to his divine nature as one of the three persons of the divine 'Trinity'—along with the Father and the Holy Spirit—that, together are the one, 'triune,' God. This dogma provided the wherewithal for the formation of countless different interpretations of Jesus in Christianity. In the Byzantine Empire, he represented especially the Ruler of the All (Pantokrator), while in the Western European Middle Ages the suffering aspect of the crucified Christ was emphasized. The Reformation held firmly to the latter aspect, but marked even more profoundly the redemptive effect of Jesus's death.

In the nineteenth century, Romanticism discovered Jesus's 'co-human' traits anew. Authors of this period like Ernest Renan, David Friedrich Strauss, and Daniel Schenkel sought to write the actual life of Jesus, until, in his Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung (Ger., "History of Research into the Life of Jesus"), Albert Schweitzer showed these biographies to have been reflective images of the time in which they had been written. Nonetheless, the concerns of theologians to reconstruct the actual historical Jesus and his proclamation went even further, with the attempt to uncover this factual material through a critical analysis of the biblical texts. The extent to which this material can become visible 'behind the Bible's Christ of faith,' however, remained disputed.

For many members of the Christian churches, Jesus Christ is a superterrestrial figure, vaguely mingling with the image of God, and is often felt to be someone watching one's own life for signs of good and evil unless he is invoked in a process of emancipation. Characteristics that are positive, but powerfully typical of the folktale, attach to the image of the infant Jesus ('Christ Child') activated at Christmas time and offered to children as being the one who brings 'presents.'

In recent decades, the discussion is fraught with the fascination of alternative images of Jesus (Jesus the revolutionary, the hippie, the magician, the 'female man'), and with a high vulnerability to theses that present Christianity's Jesus of faith as deceit. In this connection, the relation between Jesus and the Jewish Qumran community, among other things, is brought into play.

Jesus in Other Religions

The religious effect of Jesus reaches far beyond Christianity. In Islam, Jesus is central to the message of the Qur'an as a prophet who was born of a virgin through the word and Spirit of God. Islam sharply rejects any interpretation of Jesus as a divine person, along with his death on the cross and his resurrection. For Muslims, Jesus is alive in heaven, and effective as an advocate in need; at the end of the world, he will play an important role, and will confess himself a Muslim.

In reform Hinduism, since the nineteenth century, Jesus has been adopted as one of the human manifestations (avatara) in which God appears time after time, or as one of the supreme actualizations of the principle that God and the human being are ultimately undivided. In the Theosophical Society, anthroposophy, and the 'New Age movement,' further concepts—often in mutual dependency with the Indian interpretations—have been influential.

Literature

Bock, Darrell L., Studying the Historical Jesus: A Guide to Sources and Methods, Grand Rapids 2002; Charlesworth, James H. (ed.), Jesus' Jewishness: Exploring the Place of Jesus within Early Judaism, Philadelphia 1991; Cragg, Kenneth, Jesus and the Muslim: An Exploration, London 1984; Fredriksen, Paula/Reinhartz, Adele (eds.), Jesus, Judaism, and Christian Anti-Judaism: Reading the New Testament after the Holocaust, Louisville 2002; Khalidi, Tarif (coll./ed.), The Muslim Jesus: Sayings and Stories in Islamic Literature, Cambridge 2001; Lüdemann, Gerd, Jesus after Two Thousand Years: What He Really Said and Did, Amherst 2001; Maier, Johann, Jesus von Nazareth in der talmudischen Überlieferung, Darmstadt 1978; Sanders, E. P., Jesus and Judaism, Philadelphia 1985; Stegemann, Ekkehard W./Stegemann, Wolfgang, The Jesus Movement: A Social History of Its First Century, Edinburgh 1999; Stegemann, Hartmut, The Library of Qumran: On the Essenes, Qumran, John the Baptist, and Jesus, Grand Rapids 1998.

→ Bible, Christianity, Cross/Crucifixion, Lord's Supper/Eucharist, Qumran

Andreas Feldtkeller

Jihad

Etymology

1. In its basic denotation, the Arabic word jihad means 'exertion,' or 'effort in the direction of a certain goal,' and appears in the Qur'an, in the majority of cases, in the context of military 'exertion along the way of God.' It is important that the Meccan suras of the Qur'an preach patience when it comes to attacks on the Muslim community, while in the Medinan suras the right to repel attacks appears; it finally became a prescribed duty to subdue enemies. The prevailing military meaning of the jihad in the first century of the hijra (Islamic reckoning of time) is connected with the expansion of Islam all the way to Asia Minor and Southern Europe. The stagnation of expansion (→ Islam) in the course of the second century leads to a reinterpretation of that concept in Islam: jihad no longer means primarily a military effort against an enemy without, but the effort of a battle against the inner reservoir of one's own drives, therefore a battle against one's own ego. The spectrum of the concept of jihad, then, extends from exertion in the sense of aggression, to that of meditation, to the juridical term jihad, meaning effort on the way to the solution of a legal problem, which is especially important with the Shiites (→ Iran). Consequently, there is a basic distinction between two forms of jihad: the 'great' jihad (jihad al-akbar) and the 'small' jihad (jihad al-asgar). The 'great jihad' had a greater historical meaning than the original form of the 'small jihad,' and in the course of time led to a plenitude of philosophical and mystical writings of Muslim thinkers, which has also influenced juristic thinking.

The 'Small (Military) Jihad'

2. In the early age of Islam, the battle or war later classified as the 'small jihad' counted as the obligation and duty of every Muslim, and as a fundamental bolster of the order of belief and faith: it formed a sixth in addition to the five pillars of Islam still recognized today. Today, only radical groups only maintain it. In early Sunnite law, it counted as an obligation—as 'the best of deeds after prayer,' and as one of the 'gates of Paradise.' For Shiites, owing to the current incertitude concerning the twelfth Imam (→ Iran), there can be no jihad until the hidden Imam appears once more. In principle, the duty to do battle against an outside enemy is in Islamic law the sole permitted manner of war, since Muslims ought theoretically to form a single community; any armed conflict among Muslims is officially forbidden. Thus, the concept of jihad is unambiguously a missionary duty as well, when it serves the spread of the faith. There is general agreement that, for the jihad, non-Muslims can be called to assist.

The duty of a jihad is a collective one, on the principle of sufficiency, that is: as soon as a number of Muslims have come together that is sufficient in order to fulfill this duty and prosecute the jihad, it is no longer the duty of the rest of Muslims. But then, in case of a general mobilization, the 'particular duty' of each individual Muslim to prosecute the jihad comes once more into force. As early as the eighth century, however, the beginnings of reinterpretation are drafted, along with the development of the second sense of jihad, soon to be valued more highly.

The manifestations of the renewed interpretation of jihad, in the sense of jihad al-asgar, among the radical Islamistic movements of the twentieth century, all for the purpose of excluding and eliminating political adversaries by having them declared as 'enemies of Islam,' amounts to the 'Fascisizing' of the concept. By 'Fascisization' is meant the reinterpretation of the concept of jihad as jihad al-asgar, among extremist groups such as the Front Islamique du Salut in Algeria, or the Refah Partisi of the Necmettin Erbakan in Turkey, which preach a fanaticism of the doctrine of purity, aimed, as a rule, at secular or even socialist-oriented members of society, as well as against tolerant liberals and intellectuals. The military splinter groups of these political currents, the Groupe Islamique Armée in Algeria for example, use this concept as a tool of terror.

The 'Great (Spiritual) Jihad'

3. The 'great jihad' is important especially with the Shiites, who designate it the 'spiritual jihad' and assign it a higher value. It denotes an 'effort imposed upon oneself to achieve moral and religious perfection.' At present, it is of especially great meaning for secularists of the Islamic world who are of a democratic orientation and involved in cultural activities. Here the jihad is understood as an 'effort along the way of conflict-solution,' or as an 'effort to be recognized on the international cultural scene' (Fatima Gallaire). For example, during his incumbency, Tunisian statesperson Habib Bourgiba decided, by counsel's opinion, that laborers need not fast during the month of → Ramadan, since factory work would be social work in the sense of jihad. Cybermuslim's homepage on the Internet lists the addresses of Islamic activist and assistance organizations whose brief self-description invariably indicates that they understand jihad in the sense of 'intellectual or social effort.' Their goals are the realization or preservation of peace and social justice.

In the wake of Khomeini's successful revolution in Iran in 1979, Muslim thinkers also interpret jihad as a struggle against 'McWorld,' clearly indicating a mature self-awareness of the Islamic world vis-à-vis the world dominated today by the United States of America.

Ideologization

4. This ideologization of the jihad is a modern development of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, having to do with the renovation of colonial history from the Muslim side. There is precious little propaganda to be found in favor of the jihad in Islamic history; Saladin's victory against the Crusaders is a conspicuous exception. Doubtless this form of 'great jihad,' for defeat of the socioeconomic problems of the Islamic world of the present, is of greater importance than the 'small jihad.' After all, in the Muslim world, too, the thought is clear that, with war, no one today can win in the long run.

Literature

Barber, Benjamin R., Jihad vs. McWorld, London 2003 ([1]1995); Bunt, Gary R., Islam in the Digital Age: E-Jihad, Online Fatwas and Cyber Islamic Environments, London 2003; Firestone, Reuven, Jihad: The Origin of Holy War in Islam, Oxford 1999; Johnson, James Turner, The Holy War Idea in Western and Islamic Traditions, University Park 1997; Kelsay, John/Johnson, James Turner (eds.), Just War and Jihad: Historical and Theoretical Perspectives on War and Peace in Western and Islamic Traditions, New York 1991; Kepel, Gilles, Jihad: The Trail of Political Islam, London 2003; Partner, Peter, God of Battles: Holy Wars of East and West, London 1997; Peters, Rudolph (ed.), Jihad in Classical and Modern Islam: A Reader, Princeton 1996; Pruthi, R. K. (ed.), Encyclopaedia of Jihad, 5 vols., New Delhi 2002; Rashid, Ahmed, Jihad: The Rise of Militant Islam in Central Asia, Harmondsworth 2003.

→ Conflict/Violence, Fundamentalism, Holy War, Islam, Prejudices/Stereotypes, Terrorism

Assia Maria Harwazinski

Joan of Arc

Life Story

1. Joan of Arc, the 'Maid of Orleans,' was born the daughter of a well-to-do farmer in Lotharingian Domrémy, on the Meuse. January 6, 1412 is indicated as her birthday. From the age of thirteen, she heard the 'voices' of Michael the Archangel, Saint Margaret, and Saint Catherine of Siena, from whom beginning in 1427 she received the political task of intervening in the Hundred Years' War between France and England, and liberating the country from the English troops. Joan forced her way to the Dauphin, to convince him of the authenticity of her divine mission. On the recommendation of a commission of theologians—who also verified Joan's virginity—the Dauphin permitted Joan to intervene in the war that, by now, was all but lost to the dynasty of the Valois. Under her military leadership, an army was dispatched to deliver the besieged city of Orleans, and it succeeded in lifting the siege of the English troops. After victory in Orleans, the Dauphin did not hesitate to have himself crowned as Charles VII, King of France, in Reims, on 17 June 1429. The enthronement was the high point of Joan's brief political career; her military efforts continued, as she saw to the fortification of cities.

Christian Joan of Arc as battler of the 'non-French,' or, more precisely, of the Jewish citizens of France: the 1939 anti-Semitic plaque from Orleans is presented as a Gothic church window for a reason. As personification of the 'French race,' the French national saint stands with 'God and Fatherland' under the vault of heaven strewn with Bourbon fleur-de-lis, against the 'Jewish infiltration' of Parliament and the military, justice and the municipality, the supporting 'pillars' of the Republic. The iconographical connection to Freemasonry—symbolized by the square and compass in the upper third of the pillars—suggests a world-conspiracy of various groups: Judaism, Freemasonry, and Communism, were 'anti-state forces,' to be battled in National Socialist Germany, as well. (Jutta Bernard)

In a sortie from the city of Compiègne, on May 23, 1430, Joan was taken prisoner by the troops of the Duchy of Burgundy, who were allied with the English. It is unclear why Charles VII did nothing to ransom her, despite an offer from the Burgundians. The result was that—for a horrendous sum of money—she was handed over to the forces of the English occupation. Under the administration of Bishop Pierre Cauchon, a political trial was staged according to the rules of procedure of the Holy Inquisition. Under massive pressure from the English, the Maid was sentenced as a heretic, and on May 30, 1431, she was burned alive. Twenty years later, Pope Calixtus III permitted a procedure of rehabilitation, that, in conformity with the altered political situation, concluded in Joan's posthumous acquittal.

Under pressure from French nationalistic forces, Joan was beatified by Pope Pius X on April 11, 1909, and canonized by Benedict XV on May 16, 1920.

Reception

2. Little in the political life of the French national saint, or in her activities, seems credible to us today, or even possible in our understanding of the historical facts. Joan has become a myth. In myths concerning persons, ideologies are concentrated, and the persons mythologized supply the abstract edifices of idea with a dimension of the cultic. In the veneration of a hero, a martyr, ideology acquires a ritual dimension. In Joan of Arc, a whole parcel of different, and contradictory, ideologies flow together into one. The myth of an Amazonian, virgin-pure warrior, of agricultural origin, who, by her sanctity, frees her native land from the troops of an imperialistic invasion, and then—betrayed by a man, her King—becomes the victim of a clerical Inquisition, seems an appropriate symbol for representatives of any political coloration. In terms of respective specific interests, particular aspects of the myth are stressed, others are 'forgotten.'

From the very beginning, Joan's image was the object of an extreme tension among various interests. From the side of the French, she was venerated as a wonderworking virgin sent by God, and from the side of the enemy denounced as "the devil's disciple and spy, the so-called Pucelle [virgin]," who owed her victories to black magic (according to a letter from the Duke of Bedford, commander-in-chief of the English troops, to his King).

In today's interpretation, Joan's image is even that of a pitiable physical or mental cripple: she was actually insane (Bertrand Russell), or developmentally impaired physically. The absence of her defloration is to be explained as a deficit, and is adduced as grounds for deviant behavior on her part. Joan herself legitimated her insistence on wearing men's clothes with her well-founded fear of sexual brutalities at the hands of her guards, although this transgression of the Mosaic Law was to be one of the main grounds invoked for her conviction.

Far from hindering her public expansion, the rather absurd conjectures on the life and sex of Joan of Arc seem actually to have promoted it. Joan has her 'market,' with some three hundred new products a year; and, of course, the market is avid for novelty.

Further, the Maid of Orleans must have been unusually well adapted for political manipulation throughout history. In the French Revolution, royalists appealed to a monarchist Joan who crowned the rightful king. The revolutionaries, at the same time, promoted the image of a young woman warrior who—atop the very barricades—had delivered France from the evil of a purposed despotic dictatorship. A similar constellation was repeated in the 1940s: Joan served not only as symbolical figure of the national-oriented anti-Fascist resistance of Charles de Gaulle against the National Socialist German troops of occupation during the Second World War, but her allusion was just as earnest an instrument of the Fascist propaganda for the deportation of Jews on the part of the Vichy government of Marshal Pétain. Both protagonists were confessed clients of Joan of Arc, and explicitly appealed to the Pucelle in their summonses to the barricades.

But Joan of Arc also has her interpretations as a feminist provocateure, triumphantly penetrating the military domain of the male, or as an early symbol of the North-South conflict, in which Joan's battle is taken as anti-imperalistic resistance (Régine Pernoud). The radical political left, of course, appreciates playwright Bertold Brecht's vision of Joan as the heroine of the working class in the battle against American capitalism in Chicago's stockyards ("Die Heilige Johanna der Schlachthöfe"; 1929/30; Germ., "Saint Joan of the Stockyards" 1929/30; premiere, Hamburg, 1959). A woman burned at the stake 450 years ago is still, to our own day, a projection screen of the most varied interests.

A recent example is the grotesque struggle over a statue of Joan in Strasbourg. The National Front, a party of the extreme right, is particularly attached to memorials of Joan of Arc for their political rallies and demonstrations; Jean-Marie Le Pen, then Party Chair, is Joan's confessed admirer. By way of rewarding Alsace for the electoral victory there, the Party's annual convention was held in 1996 in Strasbourg. As there was no preventing the meeting, Socialist Mayor Catherine Trautmann—later French Minister of Education and the Arts—who, for her part, proclaims Joan as a symbol of the woman's movement, simply had the saint's statue taken down. Now political opponents could no longer deploy under her banner there. In French party politics, the Other Side must, to this day, be prevented from celebrating 'their' hero Jeanne d'Arc with wreaths at her feet.

Literature

Astell, Ann W., Joan of Arc and Sacrificial Authorship, Notre Dame 2003; Astell, Ann W./Wheeler, Bonnie (eds.), Joan of Arc and Spirituality, New York 2003; Blaetz, Robin, Visions of the Maid: Joan of Arc in American Film and Culture, Charlottesville 2001; Gordon, Mary, Joan of Arc, London 2000; Goy-Blanquet, Dominique (ed.), Joan of Arc, a Saint for All Reasons: Studies in Myth and Politics, Aldershot 2003; Margolis, Nadia, Joan of Arc in History, Literature, and Film: A Select, Annotated Bibliography, New York 1990; Warner, Marina, The Trial of Joan of Arc, Evesham 1996.

→ Collective Representations, Gender Stereotypes, Hero/Heroism, Sexuality, Veneration of the Saints

Stefan Hartmann

Joke (Religious)

Word and Concept

1. The word 'joke,' like 'jocund,' or 'jocular' is from the Latin jocus, meaning a game or joke. A synonym for 'joke,' namely, 'witticism,' as well as words such as 'witty,' 'witness,' and the word 'wit' itself—meaning both attentive intelligence ('keeping your wits about you'), and cleverness at humor—come from the Old English wit, meaning 'know,' as that word survives in the legalese 'to wit' ('i.e.,'), and are akin to 'wise,' 'wizard,' and other words and expressions in various languages, denoting or connoting knowing.

The joke is one of the simple literary forms, and is usually transmitted orally, as anonymous brief prose. Beginning with an introductory narrative limited to the essentials, it aims for the final point, which brings the listener to laughter—provided the attempted account is understood

Judaism

(1) Hasid: "I'm going to tell you a miracle my Rabbi worked. We were going along on a hay wagon when it started pouring. Everybody was yelling, but the Rabbi spread his arms—and do you know what? It rained on the left, it rained on the right, but in between, where the wagon was going—it was completely dry!"

But the Mitnaged said, "That's nothing. Wait till you hear the miracle my rabbi worked! We were riding on a train, and the track got blocked by snowdrifts. It was late on a Friday afternoon. Finally the train got by. But then it started to get dark, and the Jews on the train started yelling . . . (By nightfall the Sabbath had begun, and traveling by conveyance was no longer permitted.) So the Rabbi spread his arms, whispered a prayer—and do you know what? On the left it was Shabbes [Sabbath], on the right it was Shabbes—and the train went in between!" (Landmann, p. 113)

(2) United States: The son of a wealthy, observant couple gets a Jaguar sports car for his birthday. The father says, "Before you drive around in that, you'd better have the Rabbi say a broche over it (pronounce a blessing on it). The young man goes to the Orthodox rabbi and says, "Rabbi, please say a broche over my Jaguar."

"I can say a broche for you, but what's a Jaguar?" So the young man goes to a Reform rabbi. "Rabbi, please say a broche over my Jaguar."

"Your Jaguar is interesting. But what's a broche? (Meyerowitz, p. 93).

Islam

(3) Once Dshuha was on his way to market to buy a donkey. He met a man who asked him, "Where are you going?"

Dshuha answered, "To market, to buy a donkey."

The other responded, "Say, 'God willing' "! (As the future is ultimately in the hand of God, a pious Muslim will add that expression.)

But Dshuha said, "I don't need to say, 'God willing.' There are donkeys at the market, and I have money in my pocket."

But when he got to market, thieves stole his money. Then on the way back home, he met the same man, who asked him, "Where are you coming from?"

"I'm coming from market, God willing! And I have no donkey, God willing! And now I'm going home robbed, God willing!" (Marzolph, p. 43)

(4) One day Nasreddin Hodscha was performing his ritual purification at a lake. As he was washing his feet, one of his shoes fell into the water. At first he did not know what to do, but then he said to the water: "Look, I'm going to give a fart, and you'll get your purification back. Just give me back my shoe."

Buddhism

(5) Buddhist teacher: "Today I should like to speak to you about the anatta-teaching: the Buddhist conception that there is no such thing as a determinable, abiding 'I.' "

Pupil: "To whom are you going to speak about that?"

Hinduism

(6) God: "Devotee, why have you undertaken ascetical exercises for so many years?"

Devotee: "To get a hot-water heater, Swami!"

God: "Couldn't you have asked for something in God's power?" (Eichinger Ferro-Luzzi, p. 122)

(7) "How do I get to Pillayar-temple [Temple of the God Ganesha] Street?
"You can take a taxi, you can take a rickshaw, you can walk, or you can do ankappratatcinam [Traverse the distance with a series of prostrations]!" (Echinger Ferro-Luzzi, p. 123)

Christianity
a) Catholicism
(8) Michelangelo was painting the Sistine Chapel. He noticed a woman who came in every day to pray. One day he thought he might amuse himself at her expense, and suddenly called down from the scaffolding: "Hello down there! I'm Jesus Christ!"
But the woman completely ignored him.
So he tried it again: "Good woman, Jesus Christ is speaking to you!"
No reaction.
Nonplussed, the painter spoke even louder:
"This is Jesus Christ! Listen!"
At this the woman looked up at last, and said, "Shut up, I'm talkin' to your Mother!"

(9) A man who had just died finds himself at the gates of hell. The devil on duty lets him in, and takes him on a sightseeing tour first. The new denizen of hell is completely amazed. Everyone is laughing and dancing, there is food and drink and cozy corners for lovers. But then he sees, through a half-open door, a pool of fire in which poor souls are being tormented by devils. Red-hot tongs, boiling oil, everything is there.
"So!" he whispers, flabbergasted, and turns questioningly to his companion.
The devil shrugs his shoulders. "Those are the Catholics. That's the way they want it."

(10) A Jesuit archaeologist who has been digging in Jerusalem comes to his General, in high excitement, to tell him that he has discovered the grave of Jesus.
"Wonderful!" says the General.
"Maybe so. But he didn't rise from the dead! His skeleton was in it!"
"You don't say!" replies Father General. "So he really existed, then?" (Bemmann, p. 121)

b) Protestantism
(11) During the Spanish Civil War, a Protestant missionary attempts to convert a Catalonian anarchist. "You can spare yourself the trouble, Reverend. I don't even believe in the true religion! How am I going to believe in yours?"

(12) A group of newcomers is being shown around heaven by an angel. Most impressed, they look around everywhere, until they pass a high wooden fence, where the angel holds his finger to his lips to indicate silence to be kept by all. Out of hearing, one of the group asks the angel what had been behind the fence.

"Oh," replies the angel, respectfully, "that's the Adventists. They think they're the only ones here!"

New Myths
(13) An American Indian observes the landing of a heavily armed UFO. Annoyed, he calls out, "Oh no, not again!"

(Jokes without source references rest on oral tradition.)

and received (provided the listener 'gets the point'). As fiction, a joke can recount possible, improbable, or altogether unreal events. Its discourse refers to formulae, and shows a preference for the dialogue form (question-answer schema).

Point and Joke Techniques

2. For the 'point' (as used in the expression above) to succeed, a joke must comport a moment of surprise. In the introductory narrative, a horizon of expectation is constructed, into which the 'point' steals through an unforeseeable turn, or which it confirms in an unexpected manner. The selection of the jocular techniques and themes rests on culture- and group-specific, as well as on personal, preferences. Unlike the situation comedy, which, in the religious area, comes to expression for example in cult drama or → myth (→ Trickster), jokes rest primarily on speech and thought comedy. Word and speech plays employ the ambiguity of discourse, or creatively recast it. They are, as a rule, untranslatable. Another joke technique consists in the breach with convention. Here, 'points' ignore norms of discourse, behavior, or logic. They make use of rhetorical figures like reversal, exaggeration, and understatement. Obvious connections are ignored; diverse, indeed, contradictory elements are linked, equivalated, 'switched.' A prerequisite for an understanding of such 'points' is an acquaintance with what counts for 'normal' in a given context. This technique is especially effective when the division among elements of diverse values is removed, and the trivial is paired with earnest or dignified—for example, religious—thematics (as in inset, Joke no. 7).

Appropriate and Incongruent

Taboos

3. A particularly keen form of breach with convention is at hand in the breach with taboo. Sexual taboos, anal and fecal taboos, disease, accident, and death are omnipresent, and are vulnerable to 'dark humor.' On the one hand, these are themes avoided in everyday discourse; on the other, breaches with taboo are precisely expected in jokes. Tabooed themes as a rule include religion. One who dares make jokes about the sacred comes under suspicion of → blasphemy, and challenges the wrath of the divinity/ies or of the offended believer. Avoidance of the latter is an imperative precisely of inter-religious contacts. Whether a joke is felt to be offensive varies with the narrative situation ('Who is talking to whom about what religion?'), and with the particular elements of a religion that are being addressed. Far from all pious persons see an affront in jocular narrative. Jokes are narrated by all: believers, unbelievers, mockers, religious indifferents, and religious specialists.

Functions of Religious Jokes

4. Theories on psychological and social functions of joking are not infrequently based on considerations of the need for compensation for the obstacles of life—for example, → Freud's metaphor of the psyche as a 'steam kettle,' in need of a 'safety valve' to release aggression and libido.

Enjoyment

Not all persons seem to share this need. But those who tell jokes and listen to them are said to acquire space or room for emotional and aesthetic enjoyment for its own sake.

Themes and Disputes Internal to Religion

Jokes transmit popular religious knowledge. Bible jokes, and the mythological allusions so much loved in India, presuppose 'inside knowledge.'

Beneath the surface, a special thematics is constituted by problematic themes, for instance by the opposition between social and mythic roles (as in Joke no. 8) or the question of evil (→ Theodicy, Joke no. 3). Productive themes include internal religious disputes (Jokes no. 1, 2) and processes of change (John XXIII at the opening of the Council: "Here I sit, I can do anything else, God help you!" Or: "Anybody remember the Seven Commandments?")

Aggression and Subversion

Jokes are not per se aggressive, but can transport aggression. It is the narrative situation that is decisive. Frequently, two figures enter the scene in a hierarchical relationship: teacher and pupil, bishop and priest, divinity and human being (Jokes no. 5, 6). In many cases, a momentary leveling or reversal of the order of power is reached. As subversive compositions, jokes attack authority and expose it. Under reversed auspices, they are directed against disadvantaged groups, especially → minorities. Here, just as in sexist jokes, the purpose is an attestation of the superiority of the narrators and the defense of their privileged status.

Demarcation and Polemics

Directed without, religious jokes serve for demarcation and polemics. Jokes in which the protagonists successively 'outdo' one another bring representatives of various communities into confrontation ('A minister, a priest, and a rabbi . . .'). The faith content of other groups is exposed to humorous observation in jokes about 'ultimate reality' in the 'hereafter' (Jokes 9, 12). Finally, narrators can feature themselves as the object of a joke, as is so brilliantly done in Jewish jokes. Jokes can therefore name inconveniences and nuisances, express criticism, and question religious → authority, but they can also serve to confirm → prejudices and solidify positions.

Figures

5. Customary joke-personnel consist of stereotyped figures, betrayed in these textual loci and—occasionally—called in question. Indian humor, for instance, features the self-seeking priest, the hapless astrologer, and the ascetic by no means averse from the world: in Christian contexts, the naïve nun, the good-for-nothing pastor, the fork-tongued Jesuit, and the missionary enjoyed by lions and cannibals for dinner. Unmistakably, general human experiences are represented in jokes by male figures—still at heaven's or hell's gate. Female figures lead to a female-specific 'point.' Some traditions have standard protagonists: among the most celebrated is the Turkish Nasreddin Hodsha, who fuses with the Arab Dshuha, whose name, in turn, in multiple variants, embellishes collections of comic lines well into Central Asia. As a Mullah, Nasreddin is a man with (limited) religious formation: his relation to God extends from the pragmatic to the shameless. In his intermediary position between bumpkin, and member of the theological establishment, he enjoys the freedom of the fool, the blatantness of the rascal, who deceives others, and the clumsiness of the individual who gets himself into difficulties. His repertory spans a gamut from robust situation comedy to the surreal.

Particular Jocular Traditions

The Jewish Joke

6. The Jewish joke arose as "highly intellectual, craftily honed, dialectical folklore"[1] of the Middle and Eastern European Jew (Ashkenazi). Its genesis stands in connection with Talmudic casuistry and its concerns to bring the requirements of the Law and daily life in harmony with one another (→ Talmud). In order to examine the applicability of a law, legal problems are set in ever more fabricated, out-and-out fantastic situations. This is reflected in the Jewish joke as a preference for surreal trains of thought, however it is "at the same time a secularized form of the Talmudic disputation and its persiflage" (J. Janke). Jewish jokes also employ painful content, such as problematic contact with non-Jewish culture, or the situation of the baptized, between-two-chairs, Jew, and they parody the sham logic of → anti-Semitism. The Jewish joke has reached North America with the immigrants, and survived even the Shoah in the comic tradition of the United States, as witness film comedians like the Marx Brothers and Woody Allen.

Clerical Joke

A category in itself is constituted by jokes of the Catholic clergy, which spring from a hierarchically ordered world apart. These address group-specific taboo themes that underlie the (self) censorship of everyday discourse. Painful experience does not eschew jokes—on the contrary. The debate concerns intra-ecclesial power structures, the power of conviction (theme: sleeping during the sermon), and the demands of the pious life-style. This last contribution is often in the sexual area, which is taken into account in numberless jokes about → celibacy. Another onerous subject, ordinarily passed over in silence, is that of doubts of faith (Joke 10).

Transmission and Commercialization

7. Inasmuch as the textual loci of the joke are those of oral tradition, it is difficult to decide their age, or even the modalities of the joke in the past. Informal transmission is an invitation to the formation of variants. Consequently—as with the → fairytale—there are itinerant jokes, in which a quasi-structural 'point' is clad in ever-new relations. Today, jokes appear as part of daily culture, in the printed media, shown as cartoons or comics, as well as in cabaret presentations and comedy. While the formative agents of the joke, for example comedy shows or satirical newspapers, work with intentional breaches of taboo, those responsible for the production of the mass media are constrained to take careful accounts of 'when the fun is over' for the audience. Today, mental and physical handicaps, fatal diseases such as cancer and AIDS, sexual violence, and the radical right seem more strongly tabooed than religion.[2]

Comedy and Jokes in Religions

8. Are jokes open to an ordering to religious goals? In sacred scripture itself, if not thigh-slapping laughter, humorous elements, at any rate, have been discovered.[3] The didactic or homiletic use of humorous exempla ('little stories') was a component of the medieval preacher's art, in the spirit of the joy of Easter laughter. Comedians of the history of religions include outsiders in the form of personalities like Zen masters or Sufis, who have dedicated themselves to an intentional break with convention. From the perspective of Islamic mysticism: Idries Shah sees the possibility of calling conventional habits of thought into question with jocose parables as 'eye-openers,' as with the Mullah Nasreddin stories.[4] The cognitive function precisely of paradoxical and surreal jokes—as with the koans of → Zen Buddhism—lies in their relativization of conventional human logic in posing the 'surprise question': "What is real?" "What is rational?" "Who is 'crazy,' who is wise?"

1. Meyerowitz 1971, 8.
2. Lambernd, Jochen, Scherz ist Trumpf: Humor im Fernsehen, eine empirische Analyse am Beispiel der Comedy-Show "RTL Samstag Nacht," Aachen 1998, 196f.
3. Jonsson 1965; Radday/Brenner 1990; Rahula 1997, 51-73.
4. Shah 1997.

Literature

Bemmann, Hans (ed.), Der klerikale Witz, Düsseldorf 1999 ([1]1970); Eichinger Ferro-Luzzi, Gabriella, The Taste of Laughter: Aspects of Tamil Humour, Wiesbaden 1992; Halloway, Gary, Saits, Demons, and Asses: Southern preacher anecdotes, Bloomington 1989; Horowitz, Jeannine/Menache, Sophia, L'humour en chaire. Le rire dans l'église médiévale, Geneva 1994; Jonsson, Jakob, Humour and Irony in the New Testament: Illuminated by Parallels in Talmud and Midrash, Reykjavik 1965; Landmann, Salcia, Der jüdische Witz. Soziologie und Sammlung, Düsseldorf 1999; Marzolph, Ulrich (ed.), Nasreddin Hodscha. 666 wahre Geschichten, Munich 1996; Meyerowitz, Jan, Der echte jüdische Witz, Berlin 1971; Radday, Jehuda T./Brenner, Athalya (eds.), On Humour and Comic in the Hebrew Bible, Sheffield, 1990; Rahula, Walpola, Humour in Pali Literature and Other Essays, Kotte 1997; Röhrich, Lutz, Der Witz. Figuren, Formen, Funktionen, Stuttgart 1977; Shah, Idries, Special Illumination: The Sufi Use of Humor, London 1997; Siegel, Lee, Laughing Matters: Comic Tradition in India, Chicago 1987; Ward, Hiley H. (ed.), Ecumania: The Humor that Happens When Catholics, Jews, and Protestants Come Together, New York 1968.

→ Blasphemy, Popular Culture, Prejudices/Stereotypes

Kirsten Holzapfel

Judaism

1. Jews in the world: There are about 13,000,000 Jews in the world. In most countries outside of Israel, they are a small, vanishing minority. Their quantitative representation, however, is scarcely proportionate to their qualitative importance. In their own self-concept, the Jewish people are the 'whirlwind of world history'; nor are they alone in this estimate. One need only pick up the paper, or glance at a TV guide, to measure the importance of the Jewish theme. Anti-Semites are so obsessed with the omnipresence of the Jews that they have invented the myth of a Jewish world conspiracy, and glimpse Jewish machinations behind every occurrence. This negative anti-Semitic perception of Jews as 'foreigners' par excellence is the verso of the positive Jewish self-perception. There are at least two reasons for Judaism's towering importance, one of them religious and the other political.

A World Religion

a) Judaism is a world religion. Here it is not the number of members that 'counts,' but Judaism's universal conception of God and the human being, a conception that cuts through all family, tribal, and national boundaries. The God of the Bible did not create the first Jew, but the first human being—and that God is concerned with the well-being, the salvation, not only of the Jewish people, but ultimately with that of the whole of humanity. Further, as Nietzsche and the young Hegel disapprovingly observed, Judaism is a 'slave religion': it represents not the standpoint of the owners, but that of Hebrew University, on Mount Scopus in the vicinity of Jerusalem, has a synagogue. The characteristic breadth of the synagogal community room—as with mosques in Islam, but unlike Christian churches' axial direction to the altar—is filled out in a circular design, with the pulpit (almenor, bima), from which the Bible is read and expounded, in the middle. Even in modern architecture, in most cases the prescription is observed that women assist at divine service from a gallery, without active participation. From without, some modern Israeli synagogues have the shape of a pavilion or large tent, thereby indicating the nature of the sanctuary before there was a Temple with a permanent location: God does not live in one place alone (so that He would be 'homeless' were it to be destroyed), but descends to his people wherever they are to be found, even as they wander in the desert. (Christoph Auffarth) their servants, and therefore corresponds to the yearnings of the greater part of humanity for emancipation and freedom. This explains how Judaism, numerically so insignificant, could become the progenitor of great world religions. Although the relation of the scion religions to their forebear was disturbed by conflicts of legacy, older Jewish authorities themselves, as Moses Maimonides (1138–1204), acknowledged the role of Christendom and Islam in the spread of the God's word.[1] The promise to the common tribal ancestor Abraham (Gen 12:3) has been literally fulfilled. The 'Abrahamitic' religions, taken together, represent by far the largest of the religions. True, the descendant religions take their distance from their progenitor, and their sources transmit negative assessments in its regard. Consequently, most persons, altogether independently of whether they have ever come in contact with Jews, have prejudices against them.

b) Jews, on the other hand, have become the embodiment of the political minority. In Christendom, they were the only 'tolerated' religious minority, and in Islam one of the few such. But their situation remained ever precarious. For example, Christianity conceded to the Jews the right of abode and occupation, so that, as Church Father Augustine put it (in his commentary on Psalm 59:11-12), they might testify to Christianity, albeit against their will: "Do not destroy them, but scatter them abroad by your power, that my people [the Church] may not forget."[2] Christianity had appropriated the Jewish sources, while the Jews themselves were excluded or debased as a sign of the Christian triumph. The Bible, Jewish prayers, the Psalms, Jewish hope (the Messiah), the Jewish name for itself as a people (Israel), and the Jewish capital, Jerusalem, were all now

Mea Shearim, a quarter in Jerusalem, is a replica of an Eastern European stetl, and so, practically a city in itself. Orthodox Jews, mostly of Hungarian origin, live here: The men, with their black hats and full beards, are completely devoted to religion and the study of the Torah. The boys have ringlets, and start to school at the age of three, where they are taught to accept the Torah as literally true. The Messiah is to be awaited by way of a holy life: a Jewish state and Zionism constitute no progress. Financially, the settlement is dependent on gifts, and the families live without any wants, in small, old, group dwellings. In the earliest (1874), four families shared a kitchen and a bath. The houses are decrepit nowadays; but

'Christian.' In the darkest of backgrounds, above which Christianity could swell so brightly gleaming, they were demonized, and ever and anon subjected to denigration, persecution, forced conversion, expulsion, and annihilation. One of the aims of the Enlightenment was to do away with this Christian prejudice, and the middle-class revolution had inscribed the demand for equal rights for the Jews on their standards. But as shown by the epochal programmatic composition of the Prussian War Council, Christian Konrad Wilhelm von Dohm's Über die bürgerliche Verbesserung der Juden (Ger., "The Improvement of the Jews as Citizens"; 1781), it was not only the Jews' situation, but the Jews themselves that were deemed in need of improvement, and the Jewish religion constituted an obstacle to their emancipation. The thinkers of the Enlightenment, then, sought the emancipation of the Jews not only from the discriminatory Jewish Laws, but also from the antiquated laws of the Jews for themselves. Only the extensively de-Judaized Jew should be assimilated and integrated into the confessionally neutral state. Despite many reactions, the emancipation and assimilation of the Jews made progress everywhere in the course of the nineteenth century. With the collapse of liberalism, however, and the rise of political anti-Semitism and racism in the last quarter of the century, even this attainment of Enlightenment and Revolution was finally erased, and the relegation of the Jews to ghettos and extermination camps in the twentieth century cast all of the persecutions of the 'dark Middle Ages' in shadow.

No group has borne the fate of the minority in as many circumstances as have the Jews. The history of the Jewish → diaspora is a goldmine for research on the scapegoat mechanism, which the Hebrew Bible itself had described (Lev 16) and unmasked (Isa 53). Humanity—as French Jewish philosopher Emmanuel Lévinas has said, looking back on this tortured history—has blossomed through Jewish wounds. The unsettling question abides, how the two reasons that we have seen for the universal meaning of Judaism are connected. Why have the people chosen for the good of the world become the people damned to calamity throughout the world?

Scripture

2. The Jewish Tradition: a) The Hebrew Bible, or 'Old Testament'—relativized by the New Testament, and corrected by the Qur'an—became universalized. But Judaism, or, more precisely, rabbinical Judaism, regards itself not only, as Christianity saw it, a religion of the letter, and as Islam saw it, a 'people of the Book' of the Old Testament. Scripture (ha-k'tav) consists of the thirty-six writings (kitevei ha-qodesh) of the Hebrew Bible (acronym, TaNaKh), namely, the five books of Moses (chumash, the 'teaching,' or torah, in the stricter sense of the word), the nineteen books of the Prophets (nevi'im), and the twelve "writings" (ketuvim). Granted, scripture is fixed to the last 'jot and tittle' (koz), indeed to the ornamental turns (tagim) of the letters, and immutably. But scripture is only one of the foundations of Judaism. The other is a specific 'tradition' (massoret), here meaning not any incidental folkloristic customs and usages, but a strictly obliging, originally orally transmitted, teaching (torah). Rabbinical Judaism has therefore fixed two sources, of equal authority: the written teaching (torah she-bi-k'tav) and the oral teaching (torah she-be-al-pe).

The Oral Torah

b) The adoption of an oral Torah, it is easy to show, is not an arbitrary supplement to the written Torah, but its necessary complement. Scripture itself uses the self-definition of 'readings' (mikra), since the oral Torah is intended for public presentation, and should consist of a precise teaching and instruction (torah) for the people. The reading (kria) of the literal word (keri) from a consonantal writing without vowels or punctuation itself rests on oral tradition (massora). Against the Careans (from kara, to read), a Jewish sect of the eighth century, who accepted only scripture, and rejected the oral teaching, the apologist of rabbinical Judaism, Yehuda Halevi (1075–1141), objected that, without oral tradition, it would be impossible even to read, let alone to understand.[3] With the reading, as the first biblical portrayal of such a presentation shows (Neh 8:8), an interpretation (perush) by an explicator (mefaresh) was connected, who was a specialist (derash) in the presentation of scripture (Esther 7:10), and who explained the teaching to the people. The most elementary stage of the presentation (midrash) was a translation (targum) of the material to be explained into the colloquial speech of the community (Aramaic, Greek). The translator (metargem) construed the scripture, but not slavishly, word for word—rather he made use of current religious concepts and needs: "Who, says the Talmud, translates a verse literally is a liar."[4] Furthermore, two kinds of expansive presentation of scripture can be distinguished: the presentation of the Law (halakhah), and the presentation of the narratives (aggadah) of the Bible. Unlike the haggadah, the halakhah is absolutely binding. Halakhah means a 'going,' a 'change,' and denotes the way prescribed by the Jewish religion from cradle to grave. Being a practical norm, the meaning of the halakhah must be clearly decided at every moment, while no such decision applies to the aggadah, which includes philosophical and theological controversies. This distinction modernization is precisely what the people do not want. Yiddish here is mainly of Eastern European origin; Hebrew is used only for religion, not in everyday life. And so the quarter forms a world in itself; outside, inhabitants are misfits. For those afar, it presents a nostalgic ideal; for their neighbors, if the villagers happen to block the streets on the Sabbath, rather a nuisance. (Christoph Auffarth) has even been formulated to the effect that Judaism is an orthopraxis rather than an orthodoxy. Finally, even the → Kabbalah ('transmission') can be addressed as a mystical Midrash interested especially in the cosmogonic and theogonic mysteries of the Torah (sitrei torah) in connection with the work of creation (maassei bereshit) and the Prophet Ezekiel's vision of the chariot of the throne of God (maassei merkavah). The Kabbalah's most important source, the thirteenth-century Book of Zohar, is presented as a second-century rabbinical Midrash. The Midrash, in all of its forms, is constantly concerned that the letter of the Torah not become a 'dead,' indeed 'killing,' letter (cf. 2 Cor 3:6).

'Oral teaching' (torah she-be-al-pe) is properly understood a revelation independent of written teaching, that has been orally transmitted from Moses on Sinai, in an uninterrupted chain, until Rabbi Yehuda Ha-Nassi codified it in the mishna ('teaching,' properly 'repetition') in the second century. The explanations and complementarities of the written law give rules for all areas of life: (1) farming (seraim), (2) festivals (moed), (3) women (nashim), (4) injuries (nezikin), (5) sacrifice (kodashim), and (6) purity (toharoth).

c) If the codifiers of the Mishna had the intention to establish the Law once and for all, then they failed. After all, the teachings not given in this codex, but remaining without (baraitoth), have by no means fallen into oblivion, but have been collected as a halakhah considered an effect or addition, for example in the tosefta ('appendix'), and confronted in the schools with the Mishna. The controversial discussions of the teachers (amorim) over the origin, meaning, and validity of the Mishna and the other Tannaitic material are material of the gemara ('completion'). Together, Mishna and Gemara make up the Talmud ('study,' 'teaching'). There are two 'mountings' of the Talmud. The first, the Jerusalem Talmud (Yerushalmi) emerged from the teaching houses of Palestine, and was closed at the beginning of the fifth century. The second, the Babylonian Talmud (Bavli), testifies to the determining influence of the rabbinical academies of Babylon on the Jewish diaspora up to the eleventh century. Subsequently, the foci of the study of the Talmud shifted, on the one side, to North Africa and Spain (Sepharad), and on the other, to France and Germany (Ashkenas), here especially in Mainz. R. Shlomo ben Yizchaqi (1140–1105), of Troyes, called 'Rashi' after the initial of his name, studied in Mainz, and retained, in his explanatory glosses to most of the Talmud, the fruit of the Rhineland houses of study that were to be destroyed in the First Crusade. Rashi's continuous Commentary on the Talmud is indispensable for the traditional understanding of the text. The text is written without periods and commas, in difficult Aramaic dialects, with many loan and foreign words and variant readings. Rashi's Commentary is in all standard editions of the Talmud printed in the inside margin, alongside the text. His Commentary was continued, as well. The disclosure and publication of the Babylonian, as well as of the Jerusalem Talmud, like its commentaries, commentaries on the commentaries, corrections, and supplementary clauses or amendments, proceeds apace, and has appeared, for example, entered down in the apparatus in the margins around the text in the famous edition of the Talmud that appeared at the end of the nineteenth century in Vilna. The Talmud and all of its expansions form the backbone of Jewish tradition.

Rashi's Commentary

Solutions to Disputed Question

d) It is altogether erroneous to regard the Talmud as a kind of Jewish code of law. As a rule, discussions of the law of religion (halakhah) remain undecided in the Talmud. Obviously what is at stake or of interest is more the controversial, analytical publication and disclosure of the Halakhic material, than the practical rule. Further, comprehensive and very disparate Aggadic material has been worked into the Talmud, and bears on all spiritual aspects of religious life. The Talmud, then, is the successive 'noting down' of the religious life of the Fathers in all of its dimensions. Of course, unambiguous decisions are offered in the Halakhah. They are decided by specialists (possqim, pl. of posseq). Halakhic questions (sheeloth) can be addressed to any available rabbi. Responses (tshuvoth) are binding in the first instance only for the inquirer; how far they apply as a binding general norm depends on the authority of their collection of responses (sheeloth u-tshuvoth). From time to time, the need arises to gain an overview of the deciding Halakha (halakha psuka) and to gather it in a codex. Of the four comprehensive codifications of the law, "The Covered Table" (Shulkhan arukh) of Yosef Karo (known as Bet Yosef, 1488–1575) is basic down to the present day. Previously, it had been Maimonides with his Mishne Torah, who pursued the intent of definitively resolving all Talmudic and post-Talmudic controversies, and to create a kind of Codex Juris. But finally, what has occurred with the Mishne Torah, and all other codifications, as likewise to the Mishna, is that they have gradually branched out in commentaries, which are called 'arms bearers' (nossei kelim), but which actually, and in every respect, bear to the field their divergent traditions, and thus reopen discussion on the sources and validity of the law. It was also basically in view of the traditional form of learning that criticism was directed at attempts to reduce Judaism to a legal handbook, and Jewish life to the pursuit of an unquestioned indication of usages. A literary form was sought that, as already was the case with the Talmud, the living exposition of the law (perush), and the collected lists of the law (khibbur), would be bound together. The success of Yosef Karo's composition doubtless rests mainly on the fact that it met this requirement. His Shulkhan arukh was only an appendix to his Bet Yosef, a comprehensive discussion and grounding of his halakhic decisions as based on the sources. But his Codex is imbedded in criticism, commentary, and updating, circling the printed text like a spiral, that continue to this day.

Directions of Judaism

3. All modern directions of Judaism can be distinguished in terms of how they correspond to this normative tradition and the Shulkhan arukh. To be sure, there had always been controversies (makhloqot), and the rabbis even construed the history of their tradition along the lines of controversial disputations (sugot). But with Judaism's modern directions, what is at stake is no longer a matter of the customary conflict of scholars within tradition, but of various positions with regard to tradition as a whole, and the authority of its vehicles. The intra-Judaic discussion is a paraphenomenon of the European process of modernization.

Hasidism and Enlightenment

a) The three most important religious renewal movements of the eighteenth century remain extensively within the framework of tradition. Almost simultaneously, Israel ben Eliezer, known as the Ba'al Shem Tov (1700–1760), Elia ben Salomo, the Gaon of Vilna (1720–1797), and Moses Mendelssohn (1729–1786) emerged as towering figures. The Ba'al is the founder of Eastern Jewish pietism (→ Hasidism), who questioned rabbinical scholasticism and preached a folk religiosity that included a stress on emotions. The Gaon was the pioneer of the rabbinical opponents (Mitnaggdim) of the Hasidim, and introduced a renewal of the critical study of the Talmud, as well as of the Talmud academies (jeshivoth), in Eastern Europe. Mendelssohn is one of the seminal figures in Jewish Enlightenment (haskala), who championed the maintenance of the special Jewish lifestyles, as well as the connection of the Jews to the modern movement of education and Enlightenment, and who stepped forward on behalf of equality for the Jews and against the hegemony of the Jewish legal scholars. The first two directions, still alive today in Hasidic quadrangles and Lithuanian Talmudic colleges, have joined forces in the battle against the incursions of the enlighteners (maskalim) into Eastern Europe.

Haskala: Enlightenment

Emancipation and Assimilation

b) In Central Europe, with the progress of the nineteenth-century emancipation and assimilation of the Jews, a modernization of the Jewish tradition became a question of survival. Abraham Geiger (1810–1874), leader of the Jewish reform movement and cofounder of the liberal Hochschule für die Wissenschaft des Judentums ("School for the Academic Study of Judaism") in Berlin (1872), came out for a religious adaptation of Judaism to the Protestant Christian environment, and advocated extensive reservations when it came to the reception of the traditional Halakha. By contrast, his opponent Samson Raphael Hirsch (1808–1888), founder of the Orthodox Israelitische Religionsgesellschaft ("Israelitic Religious Society," 1851) in Frankfurt am Main, and of the exemplar of the Orthodoxes Rabbinerseminar ("Orthodox Rabbinical Seminary," 1873), stood for the strictest Halakhic observance, with a simultaneous cultural adaptation (Torah im Derech Erez). Zacharias Frankel (1801–1875), meanwhile, first Director of the Jüdisch-Theologisches Seminar ("Jewish Theological Seminary") in Breslau (from 1854), sought a scientifically grounded middle way between Orthodoxy and the Reform, a historically based alteration-in-continuity. Judaism's three directions—Reform, Neo-Orthodoxy, and Conservatism—diverge on fundamental Halakhic questions, for instance with regard to the criteria of membership in Judaism, and have founded, in their rabbinical seminaries and their communities, especially in the United States, their own respective Jewish traditions, that abide to this day.

Zionism and the State of Israel

c) Zionism, appearing at the end of the nineteenth century as a response to anti-Semitism, produced a revolution in all previous standpoints, and critically confronted all previous forms of tradition and assimilation. National and secular as Zionism's conception of Judaism might be, religion was still a key expression of culture and popular mentality. In response to the growing discrimination against and elimination of European Jews in the first half of the twentieth century, political Zionism soon appeared to Jews of all religious directions to be the only correct answer in view of history. Orthodox Jews are nevertheless divided with regard to the State of Israel. On one side, a national religious party was formed (1902, Mizrakhi, properly "Oriental"), which, as a tip of the scale between the great political blocs, exercises a disproportionate influence in today's State of Israel, and pursues the Judaization of an extensively secular Israeli society. The ideology of a national religion is embraced as well by extreme religious settlers, as the Gush Emunim ("Bloc of the Faithful"), who lay claim to the biblical tribal area of Judah west of the Jordan (→ Fundamentalism). On the other side stand the Haredim (as it were, "God-Fearing"): most of the Hasidim and Mitnaggdim, who reject the Jewish state as a collective assimilation to the non-Jewish world, and in dress (kaftan, etc.) and language (Yiddish) extend in the land of Israel the existence of the diaspora. An especially extreme group, the Neturei Karta (Aram., "Guardians of the City"), regards the Jewish state as a sinful threat to the Messianic redemption, refuses all contact with it, and maintains relations with its Arab enemies. Despite the political contrarieties, all religious parties are at one in the struggle against 'Western' culture and the liberal denominations that dominate in Anglo-American countries.

Religious Renewal

Since the late 1970s, contemporaneously with the reinforcement of Christian and Islamic fundamentalism, Judaism has seen a religious renewal. After the demise of the great revolutionary ideologies, in which Jews frequently fought in the very forefront, after the crisis of political Zionism, and under the enduring shock of the → Shoah, a re-examination of Jewish sources and history occurred, which occasionally took extreme forms, even in Judaism. However, this renewal also rescues the lived and learned Jewish tradition in our generation: in Israel, in the United States, in England, and in France, editions of the Talmud are published for the laity, and the Yeshivot have never been so frequented as they are today.

1. Hilchot Melakhim 11:4. This locus is censored in the usual printings.
2. Augustine, De Civitate Dei, 18:46.
3. Halevi, Yehuda, The Book Khusari, 3:30-31.
4. Talmud, Tractate Kidushin, 49a.

Literature

Historical Overview and Encyclopedias: Dubnow, Simon, History of the Jews, 5 vols., South Brunswick 1967–1973; Goldberg, David J./Rayner, John D., The Jewish People: Their History and Their Religion, Harmondsworth 1987; Malamat, A. et al., A History of the Jewish People, London 1976; Netanyahu, B. (general ed.), The World History of the Jewish People, 9 vols., New Brunswick 1964–1977; Neusner, Jacob et al. (eds.), The Encyclopaedia of Judaism, 3 vols., Leiden 2000; Roth, Cecil (ed. in chief), Encyclopaedia Judaica, 16 vols., Jerusalem 1971; Singer, Isidore et al. (eds.), The Jewish Encyclopedia, New York/London 1901–1905; Wigoder, Geoffrey (ed. in chief), The New Encyclopedia of Judaism, New York 2002.

Antiquity: Ahlström, Gösta W., The History of Ancient Palestine from the Palaeolithic Period to Alexander's Conquest, Sheffield 1993; Applebaum, S., Judaea Independent und Under Alien Rule, Leiden 1987; Idem, Judaea in Hellenistic and Roman Times, Leiden 1989; Bartlett, John R. (ed.), Jews in the Hellenistic World (Josephus, Aristeas, The Sibylline Oracles, Eupolemus), Cambridge 1985; Cohen, Shaye J. D., The Beginnings of Jewishness: Boundaries, Varieties, Uncertainties, Berkeley 1999; Neusner, Jacob, A History of the Jews in Babylonia: V. Later Sasanian Times; Otzen, B., Judaism in Antiquity: Political Development and Religious Currents from Alexander to Hadrian, Sheffield 1990; Safrai, S./Stern, M., The Jewish People in the First Century, 2 vols., Philadelphia 1974/76; Schürer, Emil, A History of the Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ, 2 vols., Peabody 1994 ([1]1890).

Medieval to Early Modern Times: Brann, Ross/Sutcliffe, Adam (eds.), Renewing the Past, Reconfiguring Jewish Culture: From al-Andalus to the Haskalah, Philadelphia 2004; de Lange, Nicholas (ed.), Hebrew Scholarship and the Medieval World, Cambridge 2001; Fank, Daniel H./Leaman, Oliver (eds.), The Cambridge Companion to Medieval Jewish Philosophy, Cambridge 2003; Fine, Lawrence (ed.), Judaism in Practice: From the Middle Ages through the Early Modern Period, Princeton 2001; Goitein, Shlomo D., A Mediterranean Society: The Jewish Communities of the Arab World as Portrayed in the Documents of the Cairo Geniza, 5 vols., Berkeley 1967–1988; Meyerson, Mark D./English, Edward D. (eds.), Christians, Muslims, and Jews in Medieval and Early Modern Spain: Interaction and Cultural Change, Notre Dame 2000; Stow, Kenneth R., Alienated Minority: The Jews of Medieval Latin Europe, Cambridge 1994; Twersky, Isadore/Septimus, Bernard (eds.), Jewish Thought in the Seventeenth Century, Cambridge 1986.

Enlightenment to Modernity: Borowitz, Eugene, Reform Judaism Today, New York 1983; Cohen, Arthur/Mendes-Flohr, Paul (eds.), Contemporary Jewish Religious Thought, New York 1987; Gartner, Lloyd P., History of the Jews in Modern Times, Oxford 2001; Gillman, Neil, Conservative Judaism, West Orange 1993; Mayer, Michael, Responses to Modernity: A History of the Reform Movement in Judaism, Oxford 1988; Mendes-Flohr, Paul, Divided Passions: Jewish Intellectuals and the Experience of Modernity, Detroit 1991; Mendes-Flohr, Paul/Reinharz, Jehuda (eds.), The Jew in the Modern World: A Documentary History, New York/Oxford 1980; Rubinstein, Hilary L. et al., The Jews in the Modern World: A History Since 1750, London 2002; Seltzer, Robert, Jewish People, Jewish Thought, New York 1980.

→ Anti-Semitism, Antiquity, Book, Canon, Diaspora, Hasidism, Jerusalem, Kabbalah, Palestine/Israel, Race/Racism, Shoah, Talmud

Daniel Krochmalnik

Judaism: Time Chart[1]

The Babylonian Exile (597–538 BCE)

597/586 BCE	First and second capture of Jerusalem Beginning of the "Babylonian Exile"	Deportation to Babylon of a part of the upper class of Jerusalem and Juda; preservation in Exile of faith in God; Torah, Sabbath, and circumcision; beginning of the polarity between the Land of Israel and the → Diaspora, lasting up to today.

The period of the Second Temple (538 BCE–70 CE)

538	Edict of the Achaemenid Cyrus II	The original Aramaic composition of Ezra 6:3-5 governs

1 Jewish time-calculation according to: Mahler, Eduard, Jüdische Chronologie, Frankfurt/M. 1916 (reprinted Hildesheim 1967). Mahler's chronological tables (pp. 526-605) begin only with the year 4001 (240 CE) of the Jewish calculation, but include, altogether, 2,000 years. His recalculation of the Christian time calculation, therefore, follows in this reckoning only from the year 4186 (= 426 CE).

		the financing of the construction of the Temple. The Hebrew "proclamation" (ibid., 1:1-4) joins the decree for the temple construction with the permission for the return of the exiles.
520–515	Rebuilding and Dedication of the Jerusalem Temple	Eighteen years after the edict of Cyrus II, there follows, under Zerubbabel—supported by Prophets Haggai and Zechariah—the laying of the Temple cornerstone.
2nd half of 5th cent.	New order of Jerusalem and Juda under Ezra and Nehemiah	Separation of the returned exiles from the am ha'aretz ("People of the Land"), reconstruction of the city walls of Jerusalem, and diverse religious reforms; Israel submits to the Torah.
175–164	Time of the Rule of Antiochus IV Epiphanes	Flourishing of Hellenism, and penetration of Jerusalem by foreign sects.
167–164	Maccabean Uprising	Proclamation: Antiochus IV establishes the cult of Zeus Olympios in the Temple. Judas Maccabeus as leader in the guerilla war against Seleucid troops.
14th Dec. 164	Rededication of the profaned Temple	Hour of the birth of Hanukka Holiday, celebrated among the Jewish people, from 24 Kislev to 2 Tevet.

140–63	Dynasty of the Hasmonaeans	As early as 150 BCE, the important normative group of the Pharisees begins to take shape. After 70 CE, the Pharisees manage to develop the decisive influence on rabbinical Judaism. Founding of the Qumran settlement.
37–34	Time of the Rule of Herod the Great	Consolidation of Pharisaic rabbinical Judaism by Hillel—the towering figure in religious law, and founder of a dynasty of Patriarchs reaching from here to 426 (429) CE.
c. 30 CE	Activity of Jesus of Nazareth	Until the end of the Talmudic era, it is rather hesitant attitudes toward Jesus that prevailed.
66–70	Jewish uprising against Rome: Capture of Jerusalem and Destruction of the Temple	Jewish groups attached to the Temple were caught in a decline (e.g., the Sadducees). Pharisaic rabbinical Judaism saw a replacement for Temple services in prayer and the reading of the scripture.
Time of the Talmud (70–640)
from 70	Jochanan ben Zakkai	Reforms liturgical life in Yavne.
132–135	Bar Kochba uprising	Simeon bar-Kochba is the name of one celebrated as the King Messiah (his name, Bar Kochba, is used as meaning “Son of a Star," with a reference to Num 17) who leads the second uprising against Rome. With his failure, the Jews are expelled from Jerusalem, which, as Aelia Capitolina, becomes the city forbidden to the Jews (until well into the fifth century).

135	Martyrdom of Rabbi Aqiva	Born c. 50, Rabbi Aqiva ("Father of Rabbinical Judaism") sets guiding rules for the deduction of the "law of religion" from the Bible, and lays the foundation for the Mishna.
c. 200	Codification of the Mishna and Tosefta	R. Meir and R. Jehuda ha-Nasi are normatively involved in the codification and redaction of Mishna and Tosefta (trailblazing writings on Jewish Law).
after 219	Babylonian Academies	In Sura, on Rav's initiative (Rav Abba ben Josef ben Chama, d. 352), Nehardea and Pumbadita are erected (schools of higher education on the Torah). Based on the instructional methods of Eretz Israel, the method here is to study the Mishna, assimilate decisions and determinations in religious law, and cultivate Haggadic traditions.

426	4186	End of the Patriarchate	The Patriarchate, supreme representative organ of the Jews vis-à-vis the Roman government, ends with the death of Gamaliel VI. The center of the Jewish people in Eretz Israel remains Tiberias. Anti-Jewish legislation leads to riots/ excesses on the part of Christian fanatics.
5th–7th cent.		Final Redaction of the Babylonian Talmud	The redaction of the Babylonian Talmud is ascribed to Rav Ashi (d. 424) and Rabina (d. c. 500). Interpolations are made up to about the time of the Arab capture of Babylonia (634), and even subsequently.
The Jewish Middle Ages: Jews between pogrom, ghetto, and privilege (7th–18th cent.)
c. 570–632	c. 4330–4393	Muhammad	Borrows Jewish traditions and prescriptions: monotheism, elements of biblical and post-biblical history, position in prayer facing Jerusalem, calendrical divisions, etc. In 624 begins a widening breach with Judaism.
622–721	4382–4482	Arab Conquests Rise of Islam	640: victory over the Byzantines in the land of Israel. 711/12: Capture of the Iberian Peninsula. Under Islam, as "People of Scripture," Jews are among the protected citizens (dhimmi):

			special tax, disadvantage in legal disputes, proscription of marriage with Muslim women. The statute of the dhimmi guards against an assimilation of Jews into Islamic society.
762–767	4522–4528	Anan ben David founds the sect of the Ananites (Later: "Karaites") in Baghdad	Karaites reject rabbinical religious law, in favor of the Bible as foundation of the presentation of law. The Karaite movement, in contradistinction from the Rabbinic, favors the establishment of the Mazora (vocalization of the text of the Bible, the insertion of diacritical marks to indicate vowels).
middle of 8th cent.		Conversion of Khazars to Christianity	Ninth and tenth centuries: Kingdom of the Khazars as a Jewish state with Christian and Muslim minorities. In 965, annihilation of the Khazars by Svyatoslav of Kiev.
928	4688/89	R. Saadja (882–942) becomes Gaon of the Academy of Sura	He composes works by subjects: religious law, philosophy, interpretation of the Bible, grammar, literature, and poetry. He further distinguishes himself by his anti-Karaite polemics.
middle of 10th to middle of 12th cent.		Zenith of Sephardic Judaism in Muslim Spain	Close connection between Jews and the Omayyad princely court. Enhanced Jewish social position in Islamic society. Trail-blazing accomplishments in, e.g., literature, philosophy, and linguistic science (→ Time Chart of Islam, in present volume).

c. 940–975	c. 4700–4736	Activity of Physician and Minister Chasdai ibn Shaprut (Cordoba)	Between 955 and 960: correspondence with Khazar King Joseph
1040–1105	4800–4866	Rabbi Solomon ben Isaac (Rashi) of Troy (northern France)	Composes important commentaries on the Talmud and the Bible. His commentary on the Pentateuch becomes the first Hebrew book ever published.
1096	4856/57	Beginning of the First Crusade	Summoned Nov. 27, 1095, by Pope Urban II. Massacres in, e.g., the cities of Speyer, Worms, and Mainz. Consequence: decentralization and settlement of Jews in smaller, countryside communities.
1120	4880/81	First Sicut Judaeis bull of Pope Callistus II	Followed by several bulls of this kind until 1432. Augustine's teaching on the lesser, but worthy of protection, status of the Jews is translated into enforceable ecclesiastical and secular law. Papal protection and free exercise of religion are included in the essential content of the bulls.

1144	4904/05	First indictment for ritual murder in Norwich (England)	In its wake, convert Theobald of Cambridge maintains the absurd notion that Jews would cast lots to determine which Christian child is to be offered in sacrifice before Passover.
1163	4923/24	First Synagogue in Kaifeng (China)	Jews from India or Persia come to Kaifeng even before 1127, to work in the cotton industry there.
1190	4950/51	Maimonides composes the "Guide of the Perplexed" (More Nevukhim)	One of the most important compositions in the philosophy of religion of the Middle Ages. Maimonides seeks to bring Aristotelian philosophy and revealed religion into a synthesis.
1215	4975/76	Fourth Council of the Lateran	Constitutions 67-70: Restriction of the span of tax collection, obligatory signs of identification: yellow ring and Jewish hat (Caliph Omar I ordered Jewish identification tokens as early as 644), prohibition of the exercise of public violence, and determinations for maintaining the purity of the Catholic faith among proselytes.
1225–1274	4985–5034	Thomas Aquinas	Referring to Augustine, provides the rationale for the position of the Jew within Christian society: Jews are subjected to the reigning princes in perpetual servitude. Thus, they are to be shown tolerance, and afforded protection.

July 1263	Tammuz/ Av 5023	Disputation of Barcelona	The disputation between convert Pablo Christiani and R. Moses ben Nahman (Nahmanides) has wide-reaching consequences for the Christian-Jewish polemic. In 1267, Nahmanides emigrates from Spain to Eretz Israel.
1264	5024/25	Statute of Kalisz (Poland)	King Boleslaus V grants Jews the privilege of settling in Poland-Lithuania. The statute serves later Polish rulers as a model for broader comprehensive privileges in respect of the Jews.
18th July 1290	9th Av 5050 (!)	Expulsion of the Jews from England	As a result of their impoverishment, and consequent tax arrears, King Edward I decrees the expulsion of some 16,000 Jews.
9th Oct. 1334	9th Cheshvan 5095	Ratification of the Statute of Kalisz	King Casimir III ("the Great") extends the rights of the Jews from Kalisz throughout all Poland. His love for Esterka of Opoczno, a Jewish woman, is legendary.
31th March 1492	3rd Nisan 5252	Edict of expulsion of "Sephards" from Spain (1496 from Portugal)	Some 150,000 Jews are expelled to Morocco, Venice, southeastern Europe, and the Netherlands; 50,000 are forced to receive baptism, and 20,000 are killed.

16th cent.	from 5276	Ghettoization	1516: Ghetto in Venice (reception of the Sephards). 1555: Pope Paul IV decrees the consignment of Jews to a closed residential area of Rome. As a consequence, the Jewish communities suffer a gradual social isolation.
1648–1657 1665–1666	5408–5418 5425–5427	Uprising of Ukrainian Cossacks and pogrom of the Jews by Bogdan Chmelniecki; Sabbatian movement; messianic crisis vis-à-vis Sabbatai Zvi (1626–1675)	On Ukrainian and Polish soil, several hundred Jewish communities are annihilated, and c. 100,000 Jews killed. Subsequently, there arise a number of messianic movements, such as that of Sabbatai Zvi: Nathan of Gaza declares Zvi the Messiah. But in September 1666, the latter converts to Islam, occasioning a protracted crisis in Judaism.
1654	5414/15	Arrival of Jews in New Amsterdam (New York)	A year later, the immigrants, chiefly of Sephardic heritage, receive the right of citizenship in the colony.
1656	5416/17	Oliver Cromwell	Annuls the edict of expulsion, and Jews may settle in England once again.

Haskala (Jewish Enlightenment) and Hasidism (18th cent.)

1700–1760	5460–5520	Israel ben Eliezer (Baal Shem Tov)	is accounted the founder of → Hasidism, which emerges from Poland/Lithuania, a movement of rebellion on the part of poor, uninstructed people against the intellectual rabbinical elite. The spiritual superior of Hasidism is the tzaddiq, who functions as "intermediary" between God and the people. The movement becomes an important social factor in the Judaism of Eastern Europe.
1720–1797	5480–5558	Gaon Elijahu ben Solomon Salman, of Vilna,	one of the greatest Jewish scholars of all time, issues a summons to a renewal of the study of tradition, and battles the Hasidic movement, among others.
1729–1786	5489–5547	Moses Mendelsohn	is accounted the father of the Haskala, the Jewish Enlightenment. His amicable contact with G. E. Lessing brings him to the notion of leading Judaism out of its spiritual and cultural ghettoization. His writing, Phaedo, or on the Immortality of the Soul, in Three Dialogues (1767; 2nd ed., 1768) becomes a chef d'oeuvre of the Enlightenment.

1785–1840	5545–5601	Nachman Krochmal	is the leading exponent of the Haskala movement in Eastern Europe, and one of the founders of the Wissenchaft des Judentums (Ger., "Science of Judaism"). In his More Nevukhe ha-Zemam ("Guide of the Perplexed of the Time"), he develops his thoughts, in confrontation with Hegel's idealist philosophy of history.
Between Zionism and Anti-Semitism (1880–1933)
May 1881	Ijjar/ Sivan 5641	Kiev Pogrom	Anti-emancipationist tendencies on the part of the Russian government vis-à-vis the Jews, bolstered by German anti-Semitists, lead to more pogroms.
1881/82	5641/42	First Alyia (Immigration)	to Eretz Israel as upshot of the Russian pogroms.
1894–1906	5654–5667	Dreyfus Affair	Jewish officer Alfred Dreyfus (1859–1935), from the Alsace, is groundlessly suspected of espionage. Under pressure from the intellectual public, the indictment is finally dropped. Consequence: anti-Semitism as intellectual and political movement has less importance in France than in the German Empire.
1896/97	5656/57	Beginnings of the Zionist Movement	In February 1896, motivated by the Dreyfus trial, journalist Theodor Herzl (1860–1904) publishes his programmatic Der Judenstaat (Ger., "The Jewish State"). In August 1897, he convokes the first Zionist congress, in Basle. One of its demands is for a "publicly and juridically guaranteed homeland in Palestine" for the Jewish people.

1904–1914	5664–5675	Second Alyia	to Eretz Israel. Effect: the decisive alteration in the concept of national rebirth. In 1909, the immigrants found Tel Aviv as the first city in the new homeland. Construction of the first Kibbutzim.
October 1905	Tishri/Cheshvan 5666	Pogrom in Odessa	After the turn of the century, Russia is the scene of further extensive anti-Jewish pogroms as a means of securing Tsarist hegemony. Effect: many Jews emigrate to Central and Western Europe, and to America and Eretz Israel.
November 2, 1917 17th Cheshvan 5678		Balfour Declaration	The declaration of intent on the part of British Foreign Minister Arthur J. Balfour for the "creation of a national homeland in Palestine for the Jewish people" (in a letter to Lionel W. Rothschild) becomes a binding norm in public law (in the Preamble, acceptance of the peoples' union mandate for Palestine, 1922).

The National Socialist persecution of the Jews, the shoah, and the results
September 15, 1935	17 Elul 5695	"Nuremberg Laws" passed as foundation of Nazi racial policy	Reichsbürgergesetz (Ger., "Law of Citizenship in the Reich"): henceforward, Jewish members of the state are without civil rights. Blutschutzgesetz ("Law of the Protection of Blood"): prohibition of marriage between Jews and "members of the state of German, or related, blood."
November 9/10 1938	15/16 Cheshvan 5699	Reichspogromnacht ("Reich Pogrom Night")	Occasion: Herschel Grünspan's attempted assassination of German Legation Councilor E. vom Rath. Outcome: 75 Jews murdered and 25,000 arrested, 267 synagogues destroyed and 7,500 Jewish homes and businesses laid waste.
January 20, 1942	2 Shevat 5702	Wannsee Conference	Meeting of leading National Socialists, for coordination (present: Reinhard Heidrich, Chief of the Reichssicherheitshauptamt, Heinrich Müller, Gestapo Chief, and Head of Protocol Adolf Eichmann), in preparation or the systematic murder of the European Jews ("Final Solution of the Jewish Question").

1939/ 1942–1945	5699/ 5702–5705	→ Shoah	State-organized murder of some six million Jews by the National Socialist German Reich.
April 4–May 16, 1943	14 Nisan –11 Ijjar 5703	Jewish resistance in the Warsaw ghetto	For the first time Jewish resistance becomes public to the eyes of the world. More than 56,000 killed in the struggles.
January 27, 1945	13 Schevat 5705	Russian troops liberate concentration camp at Auschwitz	Since 1966, January 27 has been the official Day of Memorial for the victims of National Socialism in the Federal Republic of Germany.
Present
May 14, 1948	5 Ijjar 5707	David Ben Gurion proclaims the State of Israel	First Jewish state since antiquity, and end of the British mandate over Eretz Israel.
1948–1951	5708–5712	Mass Immigration to Israel	Some 700,000 Jews, from Europe and the Arab countries, immigrate to Israel (1949: Project “Magic Carpet,” in which some 49,000 Jews flee Yemen for Eretz Israel. 1950: Project “Ezra and Nehemiah,” some 120,000 Jews helped out of Iraq).
September 10, 1952	20 Elul 5712	Conclusion, in Luxemburg, of the Reparations Agreement with the Federal Republic of Germany	January 16, 1952: the Knesset, the Israeli parliament, with a slim majority (61 to 50) votes to accept money from Germany.

1960	5720	Theodor Heuss visits Israel	As first German President to visit the State of Israel: Theodor Heuss.
April 11–December 12, 1961	25 Nisan 5721–8 Tevet 5722	Eichmann trial	1960: Adolf Eichmann, responsible for the death of some 400,000 Hungarian Jews, as well as for the dispossession and deportation of others, is hunted down in Argentina by the Israeli Secret Service, and executed after a sensational trial (Hannah Arendt, Eichmann in Jerusalem, 1963).
May 12, 1965	10 Ijjar 5725	Adoption of diplomatic ties between the Federal Republic of Germany and Israel	Consequence: recognition of the German Democratic Republic by the Arab states, and the breaking off of relations between most Arab states and the German Federal Republic.
June 5–10, 1967	26 Ijjar–2 Sivan 5727	Six Days' War	Results of Israel's victory over the united Arab armies: occupation of East Jerusalem, including the Temple area and the Western Wall ("Wailing Wall"). Occupation of the West Jordan territory, the Sinai Peninsula, and the Golan Heights. Ultra-orthodox religious parties oppose a withdrawal from the "areas"; beginning of Palestinian resistance.

1978	5738/39	Isaac Bashevis Singer (1904–1991) receives the Nobel Prize for Literature	The American author returns the down-trodden world of Eastern European Judaism to life in his writings (in Yiddish).
1990	5750/51	Immigration movement from the Soviet Union to Israel	By 1999, some 750,000 Jews have immigrated to Israel from the succeeding states of the fallen Soviet Union. Russian Jews thus constitute the strongest group of peoples in Israel (ahead of the Moroccan Jews with their some 550,000 persons).

Judaism: Festal Cycle

Aseret Yeme ha-Tshuva: 10 penitential days (1–10 Tishri)

Yeme ha-Omer: time of paying the omer (15 Nisan to 6 Sivan)

Ben ha-Mezarim: "In Affliction" (17 Tammuz to 10 Av)

The Year

- The Jewish year consists either of 12 months (shana pshuta, "common year,"—lit., "simple year"), occurring 7 times in a cycle of 19 years, or else of 13 months (shana me'ubbret, "intercalation year"—lit., "pregnant year"), in which case there is a second month, Adar (Adar sheni).
- The calendar year begins with the month of Tishri, the holiday cycle with the month of Nisan.

The Month

- Jewish months have either 30 (male, "full-numbered") or 25 days (chaser, "faulty," "deficient"). Only (Mar-) Cheshvan and Kislev can be both full-numbered (and then the entire year is reckoned as shlema, "over-numbered"), deficient (then the whole year counts as chasera, "deficient"), or both deficient and full-numbered (then the year is kesidra, "regular").
- The first day of a month is New Moon Day (Rosh Chodesh).
- The month of Elul is seen as the time of conversion, and of preparation for the ten-day penitential time in Tishri.

The Holidays

- Division:
  - Biblical feasts:
    - — 3 pilgrimage feasts: Pesach, Shavuot, and Sukkot
    - — Rosh ha-Shana and Yom Kippur
    - — Rosh Chodesh
  - Post-Biblical feasts (selection)
    - — Purim and Chanukkah
    - — Memorial days: Lag ba-Omer and Tu bi-Shevat
    - — Modern feasts (Israel): Yom ha-Atzma'ut ("Independence Day"—Israel's national feast day commemorating the founding of the state, on 5 Ijjar 5708, = May 14, 1948—and Yom Yerushalayim ("Jerusalem Day," to recall the reunification of the city on 28 Ijjar).
- On the first day of each month, Rosh Chodesh is celebrated, New Moon Day.
- In the diaspora, a second day is added to each Biblical holiday (with the exception of Yom Kippur).
- The days between the first and last days of Pesach and Sukkot are "half feast days" (Chol ha-Mo'ed); important work may be performed on them.
- In an intercalation year with 13 months, Purim is celebrated in the second month of A*dar.* In the first Adar, Purim katan ("Little Purim") is celebrated instead.

Dirk Bültmann

Kabbalah

Kabbalah and Secrecy

1. 'Kabbalah' is the term employed by both practitioners and scholars to denote the esoteric lore and practice cultivated by elite rabbinic circles from the Middle Ages to the present. The word itself is derived from a root that means 'to receive,' and hence 'Kabbalah' signifies in its most basic sense → 'tradition.' Needless to say, Kabbalah is not monolithic in nature; on the contrary, it is better described as a collage of disparate doctrines and practices encompassing such diverse subjects as alchemy, → astrology, → magic, → mysticism, theosophy, and theurgy. An essential feature of the Kabbalah from its historical inception has been the emphasis on → secrecy. One could even say that kabbalists have consistently maintained that the mystical phenomenon must be circumscribed within the framework of → esotericism. The notion of a secret may imply a doctrine or practice that potentially could be communicated but whose communication is withheld from those who do not possess the requisite intellectual and moral perfection or it might denote a truth that is inherently ineffable and therefore must be kept secret, since any form of communication would be prove to be inappropriate or worse a distortion. The hermeneutic of esotericism displayed in many kabbalistic sources does attest to the elitist posture based on the presumption that secrets must not be divulged to those unworthy to receive them, but it certainly goes beyond it as well, inasmuch as the concealment of the secret is dialectically related to its disclosure. Simply put, the utterance of the mystery is possible because of the inherent impossibility of its being uttered. Even for the adept who demonstrates unequivocally that he deserves to be a recipient of the esoteric 'gnosis' there is something of the secret that remains in the very act of transmission for the secret has an ontological referent that is separate from the phenomenal realm and thus transcends the limits of human understanding and modes of conventional discourse. Alternatively expressed, the duplicitous nature of secrecy is such that in order to be a secret, the secret cannot be disclosed as the secret it purports to be, but if the secret is not disclosed as the secret it secretly cannot be, it cannot be the secret it exposes itself not to be.

Theosophic-Theurgic Kabbalah

2. It is commonplace in contemporary scholarship to distinguish between two major typological trends of medieval Kabbalah, theosophic-theurgic and ecstatic-prophetic, a distinction that can be traced to nineteenth-century scholarship though only developed in the twentieth century. This classification, however, runs the risk of oversimplification. Careful scrutiny of the relevant texts indicates that kabbalists whom we dub as 'theosophic' were capable of ecstatic experiences of a unitive nature and that kabbalists labeled 'ecstatic' presumed that esoteric gnosis imparted theosophic wisdom. Moreover, shared traditions about the secret names of God, and particularly the most sacred of these names, YHWH, the sefirotic potencies as the means and end of mystical communion, and the theurgical interpretation of ritual, bridge the presumed gap separating the proposed schools of Kabbalah. But in spite of the legitimate challenge to the typological schematization, it is still useful to utilize these categories in providing a thumbnail sketch of the different schools of Kabbalah.

The Sefirot

Theosophic Kabbalah is concerned primarily with the visual contemplation or imaginary envisioning of ten luminous emanations that reveal the light of the Infinite that must remain hidden if it is to be revealed. A variety of terms are used to name these emanations but the one that became most emblematic was sefirot, an idiom initially employed in the first section of an older multilayered anthology of cosmological and cosmogonic speculation, Sefer Yetsirah, the "Book of Formation," which may in part be traced back to Late Antiquity but which was likely redacted into a discernible textual form in the ninth and tenth centuries. Whatever the origin of the term and the genealogy of its meaning, the distinctive turn taken by kabbalists is to assume that the sefirot are the hypostatic potencies that collectively constitute the configuration of the Godhead.

In the course of generations, allegedly new and more intricate images have been deployed by kabbalists in the poetic envisioning, but these were, in great measure, based on principles already at work in earlier sources, albeit reticently, such as the idea that each of the sefirot reflects all the others, or the even more arcane notion that there is a decade of potencies either above or within the first of the sefirot, which parallel the ten regular gradations, a philosophical idea imaged mythically as the primal human form perched above a second human form, perhaps the symbolic locus of the secret of the androgyne.

In spite of the evolving complexity of kabbalistic theosophy through the generations, the sefirot remained structurally at the core of the contemplative visualization that characterizes the way of wisdom, the life experience, transmitted by masters of tradition. The sefirotic gradations are configured in the imagination in potentially manifold semiotic deflections and ocular displacements, but the principal form by which they are imaged is an anthropos, the primal Adam in whose image the lower Adam was created. The goal of the kabbalist is thus inherently speculative, but one must avoid a conceptual split between the practical and theoretical. The theosophic structure itself entails a performative gesture (whether of a nomian or anomian nature) and, conversely, a performative gesture entails the theosophic structure. Indeed, the redemptive nature of kabbalistic esotericism ensues from the inextricable reciprocity of doing and knowing: theosophic knowledge is a corollary of mystical practice, mystical practice a corollary of theosophic knowledge (→ Mysticism).

Symbolism of Light and Symbolism of Language

Gershom Scholem identified two main 'symbolic structures,' by which the sefirot are to be understood, the symbolism of light and the symbolism of language. The observation that the sefirot are viewed primarily under the symbolic guise of → light and → language is a generalization that has stood the test of time and is still a credible explanatory paradigm. In the kabbalist's imaginal representation of the infinite emerging out of its boundlessness, an image that pushes against the limit of understanding, emanation of light coincides with revelation of name. Consequently, seeing and hearing are intertwined in mystical envisioning, to behold the image of the invisible is to heed the evocation of the ineffable (→ Vision/Auditory Experience).

A current that runs through the landscape of Jewish esotericism presumes that Hebrew, the sacred tongue, may be viewed as the cosmic language or, in the telling phrase of Jacob Böhme, Natursprache, the single Adamic language that is purportedly the source to which all the other languages may be traced. It is axiomatic for kabbalists, therefore, to assume that language, and particularly Hebrew, is essential; cosmology cannot be separated from semiotics, as the cosmological event is decipherable as a sign that must be interpreted. What exists in the world, examined sub-phenomenally, are the manifold permutations of the twenty-two Hebrew letters, themselves enfolded in the four-letter name, YHWH, which is identified further as the esoteric essence of the Torah. Nevertheless, the matter is complicated by the fact that kabbalists must (following the reason of their own mythologic) assume that the things to which words refer, the signified of the signifier, are themselves signs, since the ineffable ultimate reality can never be known except through the prism of language. If we are to suppose a genuine confluence of the ontic and linguistic, then there would be no way out of the further assumption that what is real is a sign that points beyond itself to another sign in an infinite semiosis, a seemingly endless play of representation.

Ecstatic-Prophetic Kabbalah

3. The brand of Kabbalah known as prophetic Kabbalah was expounded in the thirteenth century by Abraham Abulafia. As part of his response to the criticism directed towards him by one of the most powerful rabbinic leaders of the Spanish Jewish community, Solomon Ibn Adret, who was himself a master of the kabbalistic lore, Abulafia distinguished 'two types of Kabbalah,' namely, the Kabbalah of the sefirot and the Kabbalah of the → names. In spite of this typological classification, for Abulafia himself, the Kabbalah embraces both the knowledge of the sefirot and the knowledge of the letters, an idea that he traces back to thirty-two paths of wisdom mentioned in Sefer Yetsirah, which consists of the ten sefirot and twenty-two Hebrew letters. Both branches of Kabbalah are related to the names of God, which are contained in the one unique name, YHWH, also identified by Abulafia as the mystical essence of Torah. Cleaving to the latter, which is facilitated by the meditation technique of letter-permutation (tseruf ha-otiyyot), results in the attainment of a state of felicity depicted in terms of the philosophical ideal of intellectual conjunction (devequt), and is the ultimate focus of Abulafia's Kabbalah.

Mystical Experience of Union

Insofar as the self is unified with the Active Intellect in the experience of conjunction, and the latter comprises the ten separate intellects, which are identified as the ten sefirot, it follows that, for Abulafia, the sefirotic entities play an instrumental role in the mystical experience of union. The sefirot, which Abulafia also identifies as the attributes (middot) of God, are the channels by means of which the intellectual overflow is drawn upon the mystic and thereby induces his cleaving to the divine name. The sefirot as ideal intelligible forms are distinct from God, yet they are not found apart from him as they are expressive of his power. Abulafia describes the containment of the ten sefirot within the divine as a great secret. In language that he borrows from Eleazar of Worms, he links the ten sefirot to the ineffable name, decoding YHWH as yod hawwayot, the ten essences that are the separate intellects. The name is thus intrinsically connected to the sefirotic gradations. Abulafia insists, accordingly, that divine unity is expressed within and through the ten sefirot. His frequent warning against the danger of separating the sefirot, an act that he calls (in a manner analogous to theosophic kabbalists) by the rabbinic idiom for heresy, 'cutting the shoots,' must not be seen as mere rhetoric. On the contrary, according to Abulafia, human intellect plays an active role in unifying God through the ten separate intellects as a consequence of intellectual conjunction, which is presented as the paramount mystical rationale for the commandments. Abulafia's psychological interpretation of the sefirot as internal states of mind is predicated on this ontological assumption.

In the experience of conjunction, the distinction between self and other is erased, for the realization of the former depends on merging with the last of the separate intellects, which is identified with the first of the intellects, a confluence symbolically portrayed by the figure of Metatron, the angel who is both an elder (zaqen) and a youth (na'ar), Israel and Jacob. For Abulafia, the imaginal form of the angelus interpres is composed of the letters of Torah, which are comprised within the Tetragrammaton. The imagination thus serves not only as the prism through which the invisible is rendered visible and the ineffable declaimed as the name, but as the vehicle by which the soul merges with Torah in its mystical essence. To be conjoined to the name, therefore, is to be incorporated into the textual embodiment of the name, that is, the imaginal body constituted by the letters YWHW, which comprise all the letters of the Hebrew alphabet, the hylomorphic substance, as it were, of Torah, and, by extension, given the identification of Torah and the Active Intellect, of all that exists in the cosmos (the Active Intellect, according to the widespread cosmological view adopted by philosophical sages in each of the three monotheistic faiths in the High Middle Ages, believed to comprise the forms of all existents in the sublunar sphere). The soul, unfettered from the knots of corporeality by means of the meditational practice, is united with the Active Intellect and is thereby transposed into the body that is made up of the letters of Torah. The separation of the soul from the body, a form of simulated death that is true life, occasions the transposition of the body that restores the corporeal to its elemental form composed of the Hebrew letters.

Kabbalah as Divine Wisdom

To the degree that the self and the intellect are unified in the moment of conjunction, it is possible, even necessary, to speak of the sefirot as internal states of consciousness. But the psychological cannot be separated from the ontological, which is to say, these internal states correspond to the external intelligences that govern the movement of the celestial spheres. From this vantage point it is possible to use the term 'theosophy' to render Abulafia's characterization of Kabbalah as hokhmat ha-elohut, which denotes divine wisdom that stands in contrast to divine science as understood by Maimonides. The divine wisdom consists of the esoteric gnosis of the name, which cannot be attained by the discursive metaphysics of the philosophers. Indeed, on numerous occasions in his writings, Abulafia emphasizes that this knowledge cannot be apprehended by philosophers; it is unique to the prophets of Israel who have received and transmitted this knowledge as an oral tradition.

Abulafia is not totally consistent on this point as he embraces as well the philosophic classification that accords a special place for 'man' in general in the chain of existence, the being who has been granted the rational faculty by means of which one comes to know God. Indeed, in line with the Maimonidean approach, Abulafia even identifies tselem elohim, the divine image with which Adam was created, as the natural faculty of reason, and thus it would seem that he would necessarily have to resist positing an ontological distinction between souls of Gentiles and the souls of Jews, for the former, as the latter, are immaterial intellects capable of attaining the disembodied state of conjunction, which is designated by the traditional eschatological category of the world-to-come. Notwithstanding the explicit affirmation of a philosophically influenced anthropology, Abulafia does maintain persistently that the people of Israel are accorded a privileged rank vis-à-vis other ethnicities, an elitist position that, in the spirit of Halevi and in opposition to Maimonides, is linked to the potentiality to attain prophecy and to the linguistic supremacy of Hebrew.

The Jewish People

The distinctive tradition (qabbalah) of the Jews, which has been received in a continuous chain from the prophets and can be traced to God, is superior to philosophical opinions based on the faculty of reason (sekhel) that is shared equally by all people. Just as Hebrew is the 'natural language,' that is, the matrix language of creation, basis for all other languages—which, by contrast, are deemed to be 'conventional'—so the Jewish people represent the ethnicity that embodies the human ideal most fully. This standing is connected more specifically to their possession of the divine name, which is expressed somatically as the inscription of the sign/letter of the covenant on the male organ and psychically as the envisioning of the name in the imaginal form of the divine anthropos. This possession, which Abulafia and other kabbalists considered unique to the Jewish people, facilitates the actualization of their angelic potentiality.

Contested Scholarly Demarcations

The presentation of Abulafia's views in this way significantly narrows the gap separating the two major trends of Kabbalah with regard to the conception of human nature that is most fully realized in the embodied polity of Israel. The morphological delineation of Kabbalah in any historical context, which alone can be the standard by which to measure the legitimacy and relevance of the typological taxonomy of contemporary scholarly conventions, requires one to take into account such matters, for only by considering these will one be attuned to the epistemological assumptions that inform the hermeneutical presuppositions that inform a particular mystic's experience of the world. Thus, for instance, Abulafia and Moses de León, taken respectively as paradigmatic proponents of the two main types of Kabbalah, prophetic-ecstatic and theosophic-theurgic, would have agreed that Hebrew is the essential or natural language, the language by means of which the structure of natural entities may be decoded. For both, moreover, the ontic character of the natural language is not to be sought in its semantic morphemes, that is, particular cultural configurations of the language, but in the phonemic and graphemic potentiality contained in Hebrew as a conceptual grid to chart the character of language more generally. Another perspective that would justify narrowing the gap dividing theosophic and ecstatic streams of Kabbalah is the mystical spiritualization of traditional → ritual, a process that involves union (or conjunction) with the divine. The transfiguration of ritual into a sacrament that occasions psychic ascent and the ontic reintegration into the divine is an experience that theosophic and ecstatic kabbalists alike considered to be on a par with prophecy.

Literature

Altmann, Alexander, Studies in Religious Philosophy and Mysticism, Ithaca 1969; Seth, L. "Human Hands Dwell in Heavenly Heights: Contemplative Ascent and Theurgic Power in Thirteenth Century Kabbalah," in: Herrera, Robert A. (ed.), Mystics of the Book: Themes, Topics and Typologies, New York 1993, 123-158; Fine, Lawrence, Physician of the Soul, Healer of the Cosmos: Isaac Luria and His Kabbalistic Fellowship, Stanford 2003; Idel, Moshe, Kabbalah: New Perspectives, New Haven/London 1988; Idem, The Mystical Experience in Abraham Abulafia, Albany 1988; Idem, Studies in Ecstatic Kabbalah, Albany 1988; Idem, Language, Torah, and Hermeneutics in Abraham Abulafia, Albany 1989; Idem, Absorbing Perfections: Kabbalah and Interpretation, New Haven/London 2002; Liebes, Yehuda, Studies in Jewish Myth and Jewish Messianism, Albany 1993; Idem, Studies in the Zohar, Albany 1993; Mopsik, Charles, "The Body of Engenderment in the Hebrew Bible, the Rabbinic Tradition and the Kabbalah," in: Feher, Michel with Naddaff, Ramona and Tazi, Nadia (eds.), Fragments for a History of the Human Body, New York 1989, 49-73; Idem, Les Grands Textes de la Cabale: Les Rites Qui Font Dieu, Paris 1993; Idem, Le sexe des âmes: Aléas de la différence sexuelle dans la Cabale, Paris 2003; Pedaya, Haviva, Vision and Speech: Models of Revelatory Experience in Jewish Mysticism, Los Angeles 2002 (Hebrew); Scholem, Gershom, Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism, New York 1954; Idem, On the Kabbalah and Its Symbolism, New York 1969; Idem, Origins of the Kabbalah, Princeton 1987; Idem, On the Mystical Shape of the Godhead: Basic Concepts in the Kabbalah, New York 1991; Tishby, Isaiah, The Wisdom of the Zohar, Oxford 1989; Wolfson, Elliot R., Through a Speculum That Shines: Vision and Imagination in Medieval Jewish Mysticism, Princeton 1994; Idem, Circle in the Square: Studies in the Use of Gender in Kabbalistic Symbolism, Albany 1995; Idem, Abraham Abulafia—Kabbalist and Prophet: Hermeneutics, Theosophy, and Theurgy, Los Angeles 2000; Idem, Language, Eros, Being: Kabbalistic Hermeneutics and Poetic Imagination, New York 2005.

→ Esotericism, God/Gods/The Sacred, Gnosticism, Language, Magic, Mysticism, Name(s), Revelation, Secrecy, Tradition, Vision/Auditory Experience

Elliot R. Wolfson

Khomeini

Biographical Data

1. Ruhollah Musawi Khomeini, born on September 24, 1902 in Khomein (Iran), who died on June 3, 1989, was the spiritual and political leader of the Iranian Revolution of 1979. After studying religion in the sacred city of Qom, Khomeini achieved the title of a Mujtahid (→ Iran). He first came to public attention in 1943, when he criticized the deposed Shah for his dictatorial exercise of power and his sellout of Iranian interests to foreign powers. In 1963, now with the rank of Great Ayatollah, Khomeini was among the embittered adversaries of an introduction of women's suffrage, planned by the Shah, and of a land reform by which the clergy had been affected as well. He delivered harsh addresses against the Shah, complemented by a radically anti-colonialist attitude, which won him the praise of broad elements of the population, including that of the intellectuals. Inasmuch as he summoned the population, including the military, to resist the Shah's regime, he was exiled from the country. He went first to Turkey, then to Iraq and the holy city of Nadshaf, from which he was able to disseminate his religio-political and anti-monarchistic ideas without obstacle. At the end of the 1970s, there were new demonstrations against the Shah, and massive rallies for Khomeini, whereupon the latter was banished from Iraq. Finding refuge in Neauphle le Château, in France, he once more summoned Iranians to resistance to the Shah, and now openly proclaimed the goal of an Islamic republic. During the following months, the situation escalated. On 16 January 1979, the Shah had to leave Iran, and, on 1 February, Khomeini arrived in Teheran. In the same year, he managed to exclude all groups of the opposition. On 3 December 1979, the new theocratic constitution was proclaimed, which ascribed sovereignty not to the people, but to God alone. Its sole legitimate representative was the 'concealed Imam' of Shiite tradition (→ Theocracy). Until the latter's return, he would be represented by the supreme cleric of the land. Khomeini's goal had been attained, the creation of a 'government of [Islamic] experts in the Law' (Pers., velayat-e feqih). In his lifetime, Khomeini himself held the position of 'religious and political leader,' the Rahbar. His successors in this office continue to dispose only of political leadership, religious authority having fallen to a ruling body.

The 'New' State

2. The introduction of the velayat-e feqih represents an innovation in the Shia (→ Islam): instead of an expectation of the Mahdi, the Redeemer, the velayat-e feqih should itself create a just rule, in the immediate present. Even the office of Rahbar is a novelty introduced by Khomeini. It had been tailored to him, and was de facto equivalent to the Imamate. Its claim to absolute authority was emphasized by the fact that Khomeini was seen as practically infallible. Thus, his → fatwas were elevated from the status of a personal doctrinal opinion to that of an obligation incumbent on all believers: usually, as in the case of the death sentence pronounced upon Salman Rushdie, and contrary to the provisions of prevailing Islamic law, they remained valid even after Khomeini's death. In other areas, as well, as in the interpretation of religious prescriptions, he altered existing law. Khomeini is by no means an Islamic fundamentalist, then, but must be classed as a reformer, indeed as a revolutionary.

Publications

3. Along with his addresses, and a legal commentary on various aspects of daily life, the Touzih ol-masa'el ("Explication of the Problems"), two publications are of special importance. In 1942, Khomeini published Kashf al-asrar ("Disclosure of the Mysteries"), in reaction to the occupation of Iran by allied troops in 1941 and the deposition of the Shah. There he severely criticizes the dictatorship of Reza Shah, alleging his failure to observe religious values and prescriptions, and calls for strict conformity to Islamic laws and norms; the latter, in turn, ought to be controlled by a body of mujtahids. The continuation of the monarchy was not called into question. In Hokumat-e eslami ("The Islamic Government"), a collection of lectures delivered in 1970, Khomeini represents a far more radical religious and anti-colonialist position: in this polemical writing, which opposes the separation of religion and state, he reproaches British and Soviet colonialists with having replaced Islamic norms with Western ones. The colonialists' intent, so runs Khomeini's indictment, is to repress religion, and therewith the influence of the ulama, the legal experts, in order to prevent the liberation and independence of Muslims. As an ideal, he envisions a government by clerics, and this he was eventually able to bring to realization.

Veneration and Criticism

4. Although Khomeini was theoretically no more than a traditional Mujtahid, with large segments of the population he had the reputation of being a saint even during his lifetime. Many Iranians believed that they saw his face in the moon. The seemingly impossible defeat of the Shah and his heavily equipped army, the failed rescue of the hostages from the American Embassy in Teheran because of a sandstorm, along with other 'miracles,' nourished the belief that Khomeini had divine assistance at his disposition. In addition, on the one side, there was his → charisma, and his popular and unpretentious manner of expression; on the other side, there was his gigantic propaganda machinery. By association with the battle of Kerbela (→ Iran), Khomeini was stylized as the icon of good that had conquered evil, the latter personified in the Shah. After his death, he was elevated to the status of a mythic figure. His body is exposed in a mausoleum in Teheran, with circumstance properly reserved for imams. Nor is it only architectonically that his mausoleum resembles the shrine of Husain in Kerbela; the rituals performed there, as well, are like those celebrated for imams.

Thus, Khomeini is reverenced by most Iranians even today as a charismatic personality and exceedingly extraordinary figure, and among their number even many of those whose attitude toward today's religious leadership is one of criticism. Just so, the Western world demonizes him. Years after his death, he is regarded in the West as the one who has led Iran back to the Middle Ages. He is accused of brutal suppression of women, contempt for human rights, and the introduction of the economic and social decline of the country.

The Iranian government does face great interior problems: the liberal wing, around secular leader President Khatami, who intends to open the country up, must take careful account of the framework that Khomeini has so narrowly erected. His legacy still weighs heavy in the balance today, and the conservative circle around religious leader Ayatollah Khamenei undeviatingly grounds its rejection of liberalization on the decisions and stern principles of its one-time exalted leader.

Literature

Primary Sources: Khomeini, Ruholla Mousavi, A Clarification of Questions: An Unabridged Translation of Resaleh towzih al-Masael, trans. J. Borujerdi, Boulder 1984; Idem, The Ashura Uprising in the Words and Messages of Imam Khomeini, Teheran 1995.

Secondary Literature: Chelkowski, Peter/Dabashi, Hamid, Staging a Revolution: The Art of Persuasion in the Islamic Republic of Iran, New York 1999; Hoveyda, Fereydoun, The Shah and the Ayatolla: Iranian Mythology and Islamic Revolution, Westport 2003; Martin, Vanessa, Creating an Islamic State: Khomeini and the Making of a New Iran, London [2]2003; Moin, Baqer, Khomeini: Life of the Ayatolla, London 1999; Taheri, Amir, The Spirit of Allah: Khomeini and the Iranian Revolution, London 1985; van Dooren, Ron, Messengers from the Promised Land: An Interactive Theory of Political Charisma, Leiden 1994; Wright, Robin, In the Name of God: The Khomeini Decade, New York 1989.

→ Fatwa, Iran, Islam, Theocracy

Silvia Kuske

Kitsch, Religious

'Kitsch' versus Art

1. An 'aesthetics ready for occupancy,' is what Gillo Dorfles called kitsch; 'evil in art,' Hermann Broch; tastelessness, lack of character ('tricky subject'), pseudo-art, a contradiction between form and function—are what others have called it since. Nevertheless: "Of the inclination to kitsch, no one is free. Any superiority is therefore uncalled for" (Eberhard Roters). The word 'kitsch,' unclear in its origin, emerges in Southern Germany in 1870, and has since become an international concept. Kitsch stands today for trivial art and mass production ('oleographies,' 'plaster of Paris figures'), with no claim on artistry. Socio-historically, hidden behind the condemnation of kitsch lurks a class-specific prejudice, that, from the lofty chair of educated-middle-class taste, invalidates popular routine art vis-à-vis 'high,' purpose-connected art.

For one thing, this attitude tampers with the view of a democratization of art, which, in modern Western → industrial society, is now universally accessible, and—at least as reproduction (illustrated book, poster, replicate, devotional image) open to acquisition. "Art work in the age of its reproductibility" (W. Benjamin) is submitted to manifold processes calculated for ready application (of the singular, the exclusive, the perverse, the multifunctional): by way of alteration of the format (usually diminution or, as with posters, enlargement), or by replacing the original stuff with inexpensive material.

For another thing, the aesthetical verdict overlooks the fact that (religious, etc.) mass-generation possesses its independent worth, as production of symbol, for interpersonal communication, or creation of wares for determinate application (on a pilgrimage, at a festival, for a memorial). The manners of address of believers to religious kitsch, then, is first of all context-related—it does not occur from a somehow formed 'understanding of art,' but as ritual, magic, collage, or in private religious selection and adaptation in everyday practice: the 'cockpit' of a cab-driver or trucker in Palermo, Madrid, Peoria, or New York with his illuminated Madonna, his Christ on the cross dangling from the rear-view mirror, his dusty artificial flowers draping the likewise dusty, long-since faded snapshots of his wife and child helplessly glued to the dashboard, illustrates a private world of wish, assembled of ready-made substitutes for the wishes—a world irrevocably building on presence, on → love, on fetishism, a world that appeals to a feeling of security and familiarity, a world of special presence, even if the social, big-city 'daily grind' has suffocated so many forms of the ritualization of the → fetish.

2. The socio-psychological laboratories of the garden dwarfs, the 'holy picture' of Our Lady of Perpetual Help, the Christ amidst the field of grain, the crowning of Mary, or the Holy Madonna della Sedia ("Madonna of the Chair"), Christ at the Last Supper (→ Lord's Supper/Eucharist), the devotional image of the lower-middle-class bedroom, that was obligatory for decades, the world of the key-chain with its religious motifs, of the private home-altar, of an all-embracing, powerfully impressive world of religious feeling—frequently syncretistic, for instance that of the Afro-Cuban or Afro-American—has been little researched, and may well constitute less a question of the aesthetics of art than of comparative ethnology, or indeed of sociology across the board. Here, attention must be paid to the Kitschy figures in clay or cement for sale along a street in Upper Italy. Garden dwarfs, praying Madonnas, a crowing rooster, an elephant, an ancient water-bearer, and, not to be ignored, as if multiplied by four, the woman with the rolling-pin, all dressed the same—a watching and punishing ghost.

producer and the supplier: the transition from cultic apparatus, to devotional item and votive offering, to the demands of tourists, just as easily overleaps the boundary of the practice of religion, as it is easy for the crowd of producers to settle within (orders) the communities and outside (locally produced small handwork). Throughout all world religions, it is a souvenir industry, particularly, that makes rather a good living on the calculated exploitation and marketing of a religious feeling concentrated on the domestic. Price does not play the decisive role here. The profession of membership in the → group (football fans, pilgrims) is an important individual motive (the 'fan syndrome'). In addition, what seems to be decisive for the emotional situation is the literal presentation of the idealized absent person or thing—the wish fantasies, the figures of the Mother, Redeemer, or patron saint (guardian angel)—a helpless, but nonetheless earnest, and to be taken in earnest, form of elimination of the alienation of daily life.

The psychodynamic level of kitsch has been clearly presented in two publications, by Ludwig Giesz and Abraham A. Moles respectively: by the former, on the basis of a comprehensive anthropology of the Mediterranean tourist as a 'kitsch person'; by the latter with a view to industrial manufacture technologies (e.g., of 'gadgets'), and their need-oriented, psychosocial design. As universally as kitsch appears or is produced, and as seemingly 'annihilating' as it is of 'every finer thought,' it is all the more immense and indispensable in the area of inter-personal presentation of religious feelings: love for devotion and meditation (not to be underrated), the gaze on high toward the beautiful-in-itself, the glance at what may be, for me, holy. These feelings are globally valid for Western religious cultures, and significant as well for Eastern cultures of religion.

Literature

Brown, Curtis F., Star-Spangled Kitsch, New York 1975; Calinescu, Matei, Faces of Modernity: Avantgarde, Decadence, Kitsch, Bloomington 1977; Dorfles, Gillo, Il Kitsch: Antologia del cattivo gusto, Milan 1964; Eco, Umberto, "La struttura del cattivo gusto," in: Idem, Apocalittici e Integrati, Milan 1964; Friedländer, Saul, Reflets du Nacisme, Paris 1982; Giesz, Ludwig, Phänomenologie des Kitsches, Munich 1971; Kulka, Thomas, Kitsch and Art, University Park 1996; Moles, Abraham A., Le Kitsch. L'art du bonheur, Paris 1971; Sterne, Jan/Sterne, Michael, The Encyclopedia of Bad Taste, New York 1990.

→ Art/Aesthetics, Everyday Life, Popular Culture, Private Religion

Bernd Lutz

Korea → China / Korea / Japan

Ku Klux Klan

1. The Ku Klux Klan, later the "Invisible Empire, Knights of the Ku Klux Klan," is phonetically derived from the Greek kúklos ('cycle,' or 'circle'), appending an arbitrary spelling of 'clan' for the purpose of a triple visual alliteration that might inspire curiosity and uneasiness. The name originally designated a secret society of white men in the American Southern States unwilling to come to terms with the outcome of the Civil War (1861–1865)—the victory of the Northern states, and the emancipation of the black slaves. In the further course of American history, the Klan comprised, especially, a racist and 'nativistic' secret society of males of European extraction. Its main political goal was the defense of the supremacy of the 'white race.' Even today, not only in the United States, but also in European countries, groups convinced of the supremacy of the 'white' peoples over all others use the name Ku Klux Klan and the flag of the Confederacy (→ Race/Racism).

First Phase

2. Six unknown young men from comfortable families founded the original Ku Klux Klan in 1866, in Pulaski, Tennessee, as a secret brotherhood, without declared political goals. They were content at first to ride through the streets at night, disguised with hoods, and arousing fear and terror in the 'childlike' blacks, who could believe that they were witnessing the resuscitation of fallen soldiers of the Confederacy. A year later, a series of officers and soldiers of the old Southern army transformed the hooded club into a paramilitary troop, under General Nathan B. Forrest, for the purpose of interfering with the Republican state government of Tennessee, which cooperated with the North. Granted, the Klan did not dare provoke an actual armed struggle; it was essentially satisfied with intimidating 'onslaughts' on the black population, as above, and subversive 'pranks' against state authority, in order to render it ludicrous in the eyes of the citizenry. By the beginning of the 1870s, it had practically disappeared again.

Second Phase

3. The Ku Klux Klan as a politically influential secret society, arrogating the right to private justice and violence, including lynching, was essentially a phenomenon of the first third of the twentieth century. The main area of its extension was now the Midwest and Northwest of the United States. Its self-image was that of a kind of conservative Christian action movement of Anglo-Saxon Americans wishing to mount a defense against the aspects of industrialization that were taking root, and seeing the concomitant 'infiltration' of foreigners as a major threat. In the last quarter of the nineteenth century, expanding industry had attracted a mighty wave of immigration into the country, predominantly from the Catholic lands of Eastern and Southern Europe. The brutal monopolistic practices of maximized profits provoked radical populist and socialist counter-movements, both among Midwestern farmers in the country and among new immigrants in the industrial metropolis. Through all of this, many 'born Americans,' chiefly of English extraction, felt threatened in their ancestral Protestant Christian lifestyle. They premised an 'American primogeniture,' and posited theologically founded claims of a right of 'control over their surroundings.' Concretely, to them this meant limitations on immigration, a 'prohibition' of the marketing of alcohol, and the unconditional observance of puritanical moral prescriptions, especially in sexual behavior. They packaged these political ends in the belligerent concept of 'Americanism.'[1]

To a certain extent, the Ku Klux Klan was the warhorse and spearhead of this movement. Unlike its namesake in the nineteenth century, the new Klan was a predominantly urban phenomenon. It was militantly anti-Catholic, anti-Semitic, and anti-trade-union. It was by no means sectarian in the effort to achieve the goals of these attitudes. On the contrary; as early as the 1890s, for the purpose of repulsing the socialist/populist danger, the elite of the North had propagated a 'reconciliation' with the landowners of the old South, and to this end promoted a romanticization of a slave-owner society and its racist self-image. An eminent role was played in this turn by certain products of popular culture, such as Thomas Dixon's novel The Clansman (1905), and especially the film made on this model, David W. Griffith's Birth of a Nation (1915), the first 'epic' film of American film history. They spread the image of the Ku Klux Klan as that of a community of white men, persons of integrity, loyal to their families, who meet at night in a secret place, form a circle, hold a divine service, and burn a cross. (The original Klan did not burn crosses.) There was no deeper meaning of this act—merely dramatic self-edification and the theatrical terrorizing of others. The rite was obviously borrowed from Dixon's novels. The acts of terrorism solemnly vowed were preponderantly of a local nature, and directed as a rule against individuals who had contravened the code of 'Americanism.' These could be blacks who had 'forgotten their place,' or whites who behaved 'immorally' or had agitated for the unions. From time to time, actions were also directed against persons who did not 'fit in': Catholics, Jews, Asians, Mormons, new immigrants, drug addicts, alcoholics, adulterers, and so on. Victims were usually surprised by night and 'punished'—sometimes even lynched, although usually they were merely 'taught a lesson' (e.g., flogged, tarred and feathered, and driven out of town).

At the height of its activity, in the early 1920s, the Klan numbered well over three million members, of whom, to be sure, the overwhelming majority were nonviolent. They served rather as the paying members of a political community of belief that served not least of all as a lucrative source of income for their ringleaders. The latter, for the most part, were cynical demagogues, who waged merciless battles for the income of the organization. True, there were strict hierarchies and ranks within the regional clans, but no overarching national leadership and organization. On this basis, exercise of power on the part of the regional and local leaders was practically unlimited as far as the institution was concerned. The attitude of the Protestant Churches was similarly open to the Klan, which depended on local relations. In many places, the Klan was identical with the local (fundamentalist) community, while in others the (liberal) Presbyterian community represented the only opposition to the Klan. The upward evaluation and ultimate legitimization of the union movement by the Roosevelt administration (policy of the New Deal, 1933–1938), along with the patriotic full employment community of the Second World War, finally deprived the Klan of its social and ideological grounds. In 1944, it was officially dissolved.

The Klan after the Second World War

4. A few years after the war, the first attempts at reorganization were made. Principal motives advanced in the process of mobilization now became the government's officially promoted hatred of Communism, as well as resentment of the emerging political emancipation of Afro-Americans. Granted, the postwar Klan was never able to ride far on the coattails of its predecessor: at its high point in the 1960s it numbered a scant 17,000 members nationally. Far from hindering the exercise of civil rights, the bizarre anachronism of its opposition rather hastened their acceptance among the broad public. The Ku Klux Klan rode a temporary final crescendo in the 1960s, this time as a marginal phenomenon of the broad neo-conservative and right-wing populist current that had formed in reaction to the democratization and secularization of the 1960s. Appraisals of the strength of the Klan's personnel in today's generation oscillate considerably, between 5,000 and 100,000. But as an organizing political power it has become insignificant today.

1. Evans, Hiram Wesley, "The Klan's Fight for Americanism," in: North American Review, March 1926, 33-63.

Literature

Chalmers, David, Hooded Americanism: The History of the Ku Klux Klan, New York 1987; Sims, Patsy, The Klan, Lexington ^{2}1996; Trelease, Allen H., White Terror: The KKK Conspiracy and Southern Reconstruction, New York 1971; Tucker, Richard, The Dragon and the Cross, Hamden 1991.

→ Apartheid, Fundamentalism, North America, Race/Racism, Terrorism

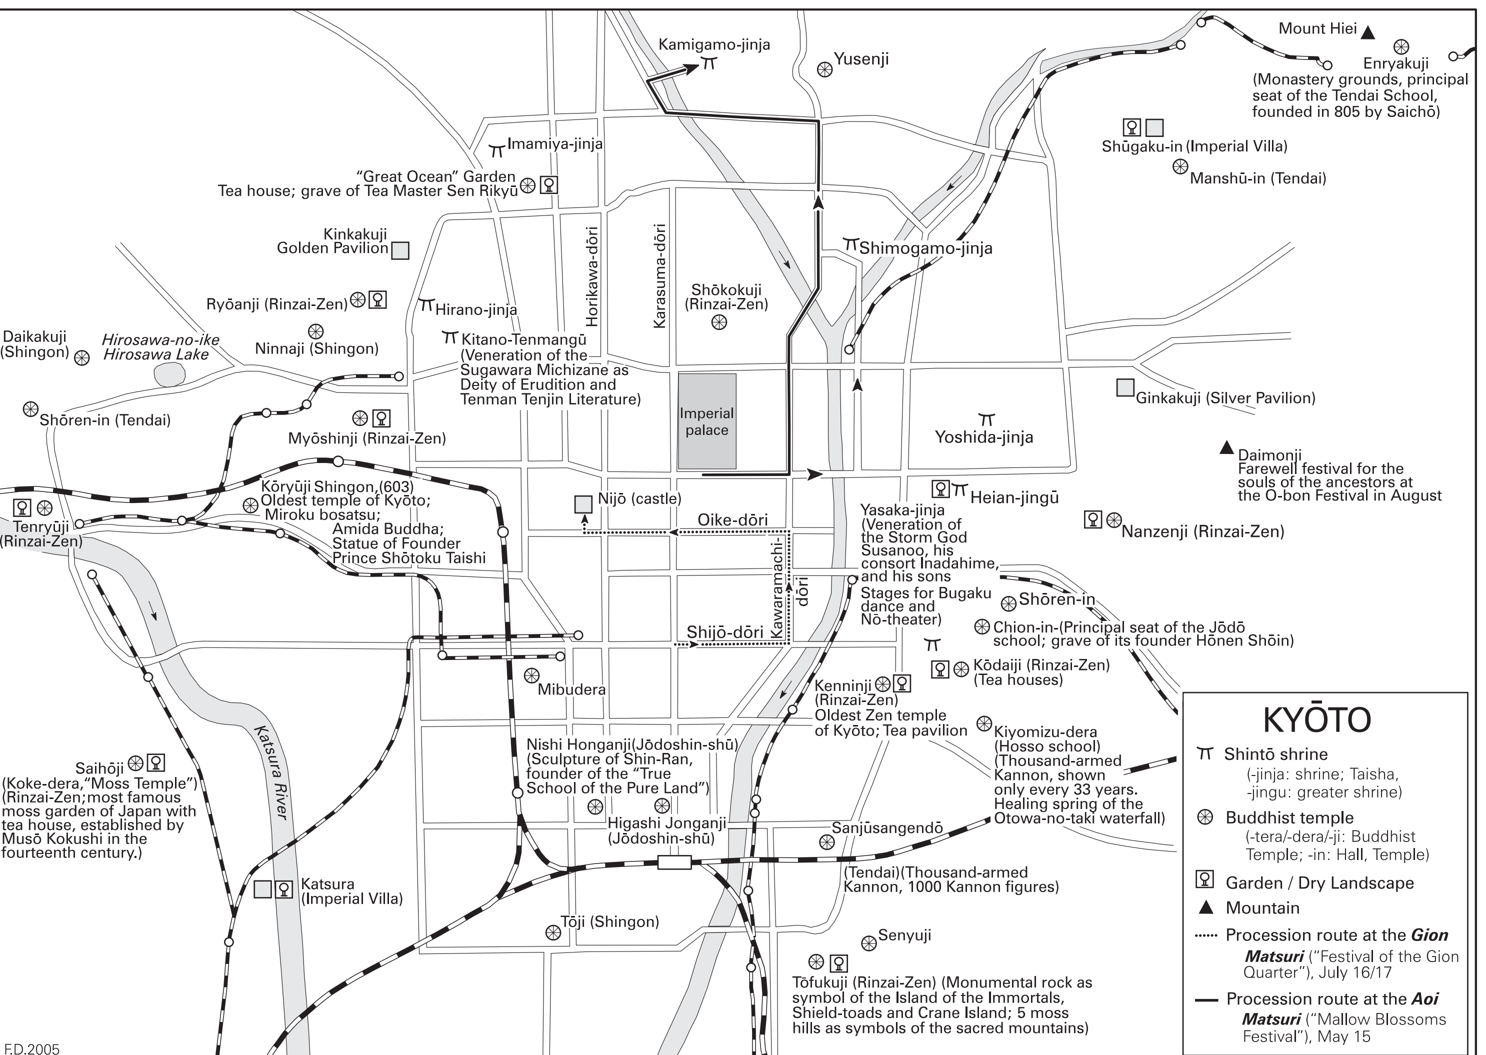
Frank Unger



Kyôto

1. The ancient imperial city of Kyôto, in the Western part of the great island of Honshu, southwest of the Biwa Lake, was the capital of Japan from 794 to 1868. Its founder, Kammu Tennô (781–806), had the city with the historical name of Heiankyô ('Capital of Peace'), or Miyako ('Imperial Residence') laid out like a chessboard, after the exemplar of Chinese metropolis Ch'ang-an (today Xi'an). Like its model city, Kyôto had its Imperial Palace, with the seat of government, in the North, protected by the twin peaks of Hieizan in the Northeast and Atogayama in the Northwest. Kyôto, the historic city with its incomparable cultural legacy, is immensely wealthy from the viewpoint of religious history. It is the 'city of the holy places.' Two religious traditions dominate the image of the city, and impregnate human beings' daily existence. Several hundred Shintô shrines, places of pilgrimage, and Buddhist temples of all schools keep their powers of attraction today. → Shintô and → Buddhism exist in peaceful contiguity. Visits to shrines and temples, participation in the festivals and rites of the calendar year (→ Life Cycle) belong to everyday life, and are part of an everyday attitude. Nature itself (rivers, mountains, trees, and rocks; → Water, → Landscape) is drawn into the performance of religious practices, and in Shintô becomes the object of a sacred honor. Popular piety and tourism are intimately intertwined: the interests of tourism are occasionally superimposed on religious interests, and undermine them.

Buddhist Schools and Temples

2. a) From the outset, Kyôto was the seat of residence and government of the Emperor, until, in 1868, the latter raised Tokyo to the status of the new center of government, in the Meiji Restoration. Today, with few exceptions, the elements of the Imperial Palace of Kyôto are a pure tourist attraction, and have lost the cultic function that they once enjoyed in a framework of Shintô ceremonies at the Imperial Court. The local shift from Nara (capital during the Nara period, 710–784) to Heiankyô, in 794, was a reaction to Buddhism's increasing influence on politics. The new capital lay outside the expanse of the great Nara Monastery, whose resettlement to Heiankyô the Emperor had refused to effectuate. He saw to the protection of two new esoteric Chinese Buddhist schools that suited the needs of the court because of their willingness to abstain from political commitment. On the one side, monk Saichô (767–822) built Enryakuji Monastery in the North, on the Hieizan, on the principles of the Japanese version of the Tendai school, which he had founded in 805. That monastery was intended to protect the new capital from evil spirits that were supposed to come from the Northeast. Beginning in the late eleventh century, the Enryakuji, with its some three thousand branch and twig temples on Hiei Mountain, temporarily grew more and more powerful, lodging several thousand monks, and threatening the capital with military personnel from among the monks, in order to secure the gigantic land holdings of the high monastery and to accommodate its demands. Only in the sixteenth century did Shogun Toyotomi Hideyoshi succeed in crushing the power of the Enryakuji. On the other side, Kûkai (744–835) founded the school of Shingon Buddhism in 806. Its principal seat is the 'mountain monastery' on the Kôyasan, in the interior of the Province of Kii (today, Wakayama). Under the influence of esoteric Buddhism, eclectic currents expanded as well, in a mix of Shintô and Buddhist reverential

Shingon Buddhism

KYŌTO
Shintō shrine
(-jinja: shrine; Taisha, -jingu: greater shrine)
Buddhist temple
(-tera/-dera/-ji: Buddhist Temple; -in: Hall, Temple)
Garden / Dry Landscape Mountain
Procession route at the Gion Matsuri ("Festival of the Gion Quarter"), July 16/17 Procession route at the Aoi Matsuri ("Mallow Blossoms Festival"), May 15
Mount Hiei
Enryakuji
(Monastery grounds, principal seat of the Tendai School, founded in 805 by Saichō)
Shūgaku-in (Imperial Villa)
Manshū-in (Tendai)
Ginkakuji (Silver Pavilion)
Daimonji
Farewell festival for the souls of the ancestors at the O-bon Festival in August
Nanzenji (Rinzai-Zen)
Shōren-in
Chion-in-(Principal seat of the Jōdō school; grave of its founder Hōnen Shōin)
Kōdaiji (Rinzai-Zen) (Tea houses)
Kiyomizu-dera (Hosso school) (Thousand-armed Kannon, shown only every 33 years. Healing spring of the Otowa-no-taki waterfall)
Heian-jingū
Yoshida-jinja
Shimogamo-jinja
Yusenji
Kamigamo-jinja
Shōkokuji (Rinzai-Zen)
Imperial palace
Yasaka-jinja (Veneration of the Storm God Susanoo, his consort Inadahime, and his sons Stages for Bugaku dance and Nō-theater)
Kenninji (Rinzai-Zen) Oldest Zen temple of Kyōto; Tea pavilion
Sanjūsangendō
(Tendai)(Thousand-armed Kannon, 1000 Kannon figures)
Senyuji
Tōfukuji (Rinzai-Zen) (Monumental rock as symbol of the Island of the Immortals, Shield-toads and Crane Island; 5 moss hills as symbols of the sacred mountains)
Kawaramachi-dōri
Oike-dōri
Shijō-dōri
Karasuma-dōri
Horikawa-dōri
Nijō (castle)
Nishi Honganji(Jōdoshin-shū) (Sculpture of Shin-Ran, founder of the "True School of the Pure Land")
Higashi Jonganji (Jōdoshin-shū)
Tōji (Shingon)
Mibudera
Imamiya-jinja
"Great Ocean" Garden
Tea house; grave of Tea Master Sen Rikyū
Hirano-jinja
Kitano-Tenmangū (Veneration of the Sugawara Michizane as Deity of Erudition and Tenman Tenjin Literature)
Kinkakuji Golden Pavilion
Ryōanji (Rinzai-Zen)
Ninnaji (Shingon)
Myōshinji (Rinzai-Zen)
Kōryūji Shingon,(603) Oldest temple of Kyōto; Miroku bosatsu; Amida Buddha; Statue of Founder Prince Shōtoku Taishi
Katsura (Imperial Villa)
Katsura River
Hirosawa-no-ike Hirosawa Lake
Shōren-in (Tendai)
Daikakuji (Shingon)
Tenryūji (Rinzai-Zen)
Saihōji (Koke-dera,"Moss Temple") (Rinzai-Zen;most famous moss garden of Japan with tea house, established by Musō Kokushi in the fourteenth century.)
F.D.2005

practices that survive in folk belief down to the present day. Shintô gods are identified with Buddhist figures, displayed in temples, and reverenced as local manifestations of Buddhist saints. Frequently, temples and Shintô shrines locally form units.

Amidha Buddhism

b) In the tenth century, among the followers of Tendai Buddhism, the veneration of Amidha, Buddha of the Pure Land (jôdo) or Western Paradise spread abroad, issuing in the twelfth century in a school of its own. The Chion-in (1234) is the principal temple of the Jôdo school. Amidha Buddhism, which emerged from the monasteries, became a great lay movement. Belief content and practices were simple, and their orientation was to the needs of the population. Front and center is a belief in redemption by Amidha Buddha, and the transitus to the 'Western Paradise.' Beggar monk Kûya Shônin (903–972) propagated the new message in the streets of Kyôto. The Honganji ('Temple of the Primordial Vow'), founded in 1272, originally part of the mausoleum for Shinran (1173–1262, founder of the 'New School of the Pure Land,' [Jôdoshin-shû]) quickly became the mighty center of this largest Buddhist movement in Japan today.

Zen Buddhism

c) In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, → Zen Buddhism gained a foothold in Japan. A plenitude of temple foundations then followed in the capital. The oldest Zen temple in Kyôto is the Kenninji (founded 1202); its first abbot was Eisai, founder of Rinzai Zen. Each of the Gozan, the 'Five Mountains' of the Rinzai school, has a representative in Kyôto and another in Kamakura; in Kyôto, toward the end of the fourteenth century, in hierarchical order, these included the monasteries of Tenryûji, Shôkokuji, Kenninji, Tôfukkuji, and Manjuji. At the great Zen monasteries, a flourishing culture of scholars sprang up. Their highly educated and elegantly conducted monks were appropriate for diplomatic missions and administrative activities, and worked closely with the apparatus of state. The monasteries were at once spiritual and artistic centers; especially, they were promoters of the traditional fighting techniques (martial arts) and the celebrated Zen arts. The Zen arts include very diverse artistic ways of creation and shaping: watercolors, calligraphy, poetry, Nô theater, flower arrangement, the tea ceremony, ceramics, architecture, and gardening. Clear rules, discipline, the schooling of body and of the attention, stand in the service of a personal spiritual development reflecting the Zen Buddhist methods of teaching. In the process of artistic creation, the pupil practices the art of psychic immersion, and absolute presence of mind, resembling the mental state of meditation. The artistic product, in its clarity, concentration, naturalness, and simplicity, is an expression of this mental and spiritual process. The sacred landscapes of the Zen garden are vivid examples of this art. In China itself, gardens were laid out that referred to hidden religious motifs. Far Eastern landscapes were exemplars of the Daoist Islands of the Immortals or the Western Paradise in Amidha Buddhism. It was especially under the influence of Zen Buddhism in medieval Japan that gardens were in the foreground as sacred topographies, and conscious symbols of the human quest for knowledge. One of the old Zen gardens of Kyôto is the Ryôanji Garden (→ Garden/Paradise, with photograph), created around 1500, incorporating the most consistent and most abstract form of karesansui (dry landscape), a garden of stone and sand. Simplicity and depth of shape and form invite one to meditation, and recall the simple style of the monochromatic watercolors. Many gardens are intended to be contemplated from a certain point, and are laid out in relation to this point; they become a 'landscape painting,' whose material is taken from nature itself. Zen Buddhism impregnates the image of the city of Kyôto with its aesthetics of the garden. One of the most fascinating examples of Zen Buddhist garden aesthetics is the Moss Garden of the Saihoji, or Kokedera (Moss Temple), in Kyôto's West. Here, in exemplary fashion, Abbot Musô Soseki (1275–1351) realized the potential identity between the Zen monk and garden architect.

The Zen Garden

Shintô Shrines and Festivals

3. There are numerous large shrines in Kyôto, with their own local cults and yearly festivals. Kammu Tennô promoted the Kamo Shrine to the status of protective shrine of the city proper. It lies on the edge of the tilled agricultural plain. Here, each year on 15 May, the 'Festival of the Mallows' (Aoi Matsuri) is celebrated, as it has been since the sixth century, for the mollification of the divinities of the Kamo Shrine. It centers on religious ceremonies, and a procession around the festival in clothing from the Heian times. Kyôto's largest, most famous, and most animated festival is the month-long Feast of the Gion Quarter (Gion Matsuri), at the Yasaka Shrine, in July (celebrated first in 869, then, from 970, annually, with Shinto purification ceremonies and liturgical dances). The high point of the festival is the procession of twenty-nine splendid portable shrines and festival carts on July 16 and 17. In a framework of the Buddhist Feast of the Dead (o-bon), the Great Farewell Festival (Daimonji Okuribi) is celebrated, on the Daimonji Hill in Kyôto, on August 15, for the souls of the dead, who visit their kin for three days each year, and are solemnly received and honored by them. On the Day of the Farewell itself, great fires are kindled on five hills in the region of the city, and the population light paper lanterns, which they set afloat on the rivers. These float away, and guide the souls of the ancestors back to the realm of the dead. The background of the O-Bon Festival is the belief, received from the Chinese mainland, that the multitude of the ancestral souls determines the destiny of the family.

The Fushimi Inara Taisha (ninth century), in the South of Kyôto, is the most famous of the some 30,000 Shintô shrines dedicated to the rice divinity Inari, symbol of prosperity. The fox is her messenger. The hill behind the shrine is rimmed by thousands of cinnabar-red torii, wooden entrance gates to the sacred precinct of the shrine, which are financed by various commercial enterprises.

Literature

Mosher, John Stewart, Kyôto: A Contemplative Guide; Parry, Richard Lloyd, Tokyo, Kyoto and Ancient Nara, London [2]1999; Plutschow, Herbert E., Introducing Kyoto, Tokyo 1979; Röpke, Ian Martin, Historical Dictionary of Osaka and Kyoto, Lanham 1999; Treib, Marc/Herman, Ron, A Guide to the Gardens of Kyoto, Tokyo 1980.

→ Buddhism, China/Japan/Korea, Garden/Paradise, Martial Arts, Shintô, Zen Buddhism

Sabine Beyreuther

Labyrinth

1. The labyrinth is one of the symbols that exercise an enduring fascination upon human beings. Labyrinthine tracings and rituals are demonstrably present in many eras and cultures, and are applied with astounding persistence and identity of form. What is often called the 'original' labyrinth (Kerényi) lies beside its mythic place of origin, in Minoan Crete, and is propagated across the whole of the ancient Greek world, as well as perhaps received from the Mediterranean basin in India and Southeast Asia. The existence of labyrinths is demonstrable even in the Indian cultures of the Southwestern United States, as in Central America. The etymology of the word that has entered all Western languages from the Greek, but that is certainly pre-Hellenic, is unexplained and disputed. Today it is especially esoteric and psychotherapeutic literature that uses the classic labyrinth, and this literature uses it as an almost universally applicable symbol, so that its traditional interpretations have all but been lost for modern consciousness.

Phenomenology

2. For an interpretation of the labyrinthine motifs, a distinction must be made among (1) the labyrinth as a figure appropriate for use in movement (ritual or dance), (2) the labyrinth as a graphic figure (drawing, engraving, mosaic, architecture), and (3) the labyrinth as a literary motif, serving as a broadened metaphor for a difficult, dark problem, obscure or treacherous.

The original phenomenal embodiment of the concept of the labyrinth seems to have been the interweaving line dance, with the conceptual presentation of the labyrinth as a stone structure replacing it only later. Even in Homer, and then with Virgil (Aeneid V, 545ff.), the labyrinth is thought of as a dance. The case is the same with the conceptualizations of the labyrinthine Cranic dance on Delos. The labyrinth was primarily a ritual concept of movement: the 'labyrinthine way' was the path taken by line dancers. Thus also, the 'Troy-games,' familiar in antiquity and into the Middle Ages, are interpreted as ritual line dances in labyrinthine form. Accordingly, the ancient and medieval concept of the labyrinth offered only one way in and one way out: there is no getting lost in it.

The most current form of the labyrinth today, however, is the second, the graphic labyrinth, under which the maze is (falsely) included. The configuration of the labyrinth as a maze system, however, is attested only from the fifteenth century (Giovanni Fontana, ca. 1420). It has maintained itself in the form of the Baroque hedge and garden labyrinth to the present day. In that form, the specific concept of the 'labyrinthine' has degenerated into its universal minimalist metaphorical denotation.

Functions

3. Ancient tradition connects the labyrinth with the prison of the Minotaur in Knossos, built, in the saga of Theseus, by Daedalus, architect of King Minos. Its conception as a maze from which escape was possible only with the help of the proverbial 'Ariadne's thread,' however, is once more of modern origin. The thread rather, as an umbilical cord, secured the → hero's bond with the world of the human during his penetration of the labyrinthine depths. The primary interpretation of a labyrinth is doubtless to be seen as being in connection with a 'transition to the other' (→ Rites of Passage). The labyrinth is to symbolize the spiritual transformation of the one who traverses it, inasmuch as that 'journey' consists of a successful traversal of exclusion and moment of reintegration. Thus, the labyrinthine form has found application in rites of → initiation and puberty, with the exorcism and exclusion of spirits, and in festivals of the calendar year. The labyrinth has been used to present both a passage to the realm of the dead, and as contact with the chthonic powers. Exclusion from the group is here presented specifically as an interior element as well as that of the beyond: the dancer moves to the center, turns within it, and struggles out of it. A person ran or danced through the 'castles of Troy' that were scattered across the coasts of Scandinavia. They were used as late as the eighteenth century. Medieval lawn labyrinths, instead, were set in a Christian interpretation of distance from God and return by repentance, and navigated, in prayer, on one's knees. Along with this interpretation of the labyrinth, however, comes a parallel meaning: that of the labyrinth as space of protection. In the Roman Troy-play, a labyrinthine riders' dance had a ritual role in the foundation of a settlement or temple precinct. Only in the Baroque did the labyrinth become a plaything: as arrangements of flowers or hedges, it was a component of feudal and public parks.

4. After a period in the nineteenth century that was out and out hostile to the labyrinth, when countless garden and stone labyrinths were leveled, the labyrinth today is the subject of a renaissance, as a symbol or metaphor, not only in the esoteric area, where it is especially important, but also among artists and architects (J. Willenbecher, T. Fox, R. Fleischner).

Literature

Attali, Jacques, The Labyrinth in Culture and Society: Pathways to Wisdom, Berkeley 1999; Bord, Janet, Mazes and Labyrinths of the World, London 1976; Fisher, Adrian/Gerster, Georg, The Art of the Maze, London 1990; Kerényi, Karl, Labyrinth-Studien. Labyrinthos als Linienreflex einer mythologischen Idee, Amsterdam 1941; Kern, Hermann, Through the Labyrinth: Designs and Meanings over 5,000 Years, Munich 2000; Wright, Craig M., The Maze and the Warrior: Symbols in Architecture, Theology, and Music, Cambridge 2001.

→ Dance, Initiation, Rites of Passage, Ritual, Symbol/Sign/Gesture

Georg Hehn

Laicism

1. Laicism is a political ideology developing in Catholic-dominated France, under the name laïcité, beginning in the mid-nineteenth century. The French word laïcité is a neologism, derived from laïque (French, 'secular,' or 'lay'), which is in turn derived from the Greek laós ('simple people,' as distinguished from their rulers and priests). It arises as a counter-concept to the polemical expression 'clericalism,' which has been used since the Revolution of 1848 as a deprecating designation for the dominance of the Catholic Church in society. The aim for laïcité is the strict legal and institutional separation of church and state (→ Secularization), and thus comports the termination of ecclesiastical influence in politics, especially in educational policy.

Beginning in around 1923, under the designation laiklik (Turkish loan word from laïcité), laicism became one of the six ideological foundations of the movement promoted around Mustafa Kemal Ataturk (1881–1938), founder of the Turkish Republic (Kemalism). As part of a societal renewal, an aim of laiklik is the expulsion of religion (Islam) from public and state life. Since 1937 in Turkey, and 1958 in France, laiklik and laïcité are constitutionally anchored principles that mark the relation between religions and state down to the present day.

Laicism in France

2. In the Second Republic (1848–1852), opposition increased against the monopoly on instruction exercised by the Catholic Church since the Napoleonic concordat of 1801. With its point of departure in the premises of the French → Revolution (→ Enlightenment), the demand emerges for a state education that is in harmony with the basic principles of the Republic (morale laïque). A first Regulation comes in the Falloux Law of 1850. Along with the state 'public schools' (écoles publiques), 'private schools' (écoles privées) were permitted to teach, although they received no more than one-tenth of their annual fiscal outlay from state subventions. Further, religious education held by the church was permitted in state schools. In 1879, in the Third Republic, republican anticlerical forces win the political majority. In consequence, clerics are withdrawn from the highest educational offices across the board. Under Minister of Education Jules Ferry, as a compromise between conservatives and anti-clericals, the concept of the neutral world-view prevails. To some extent, this concept is implemented in the Law on the Primary Schools (1882), which, among other things, provides for the replacement of religious instruction by an 'education in morals and citizenship.' The provisional high point of the debate is: the Law on the Separation of Church and State (Dec. 9, 1912). The principles passed in this law form the basis of the modern laicist state system in France:

(a) No preference for any religion;
(b) No state financial support for religions;
(c) No interference on the part of the state in internal matters of religion;
(d) Religions are under private law, not state law, and, in order to be recognized, must be organized as associations culturelles, 'cult associations.'

This final regulation is a—failed—attempt to force the Catholic Church to adopt democratic structures.

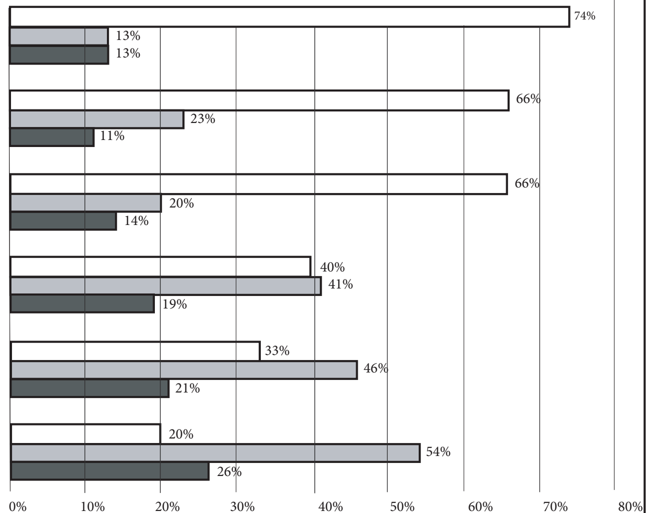
The Holy See reacts to the laicist policy with blunt rejection. As soon as Pope Pius IX, in his Syllabus of Errors (1869), had condemned leading laicist premises (e.g. state monopoly on instruction), the Vatican, on February 2, 1906, prohibited the French bishops from implementing the law of separation, and thus, at last, a special regulation prevailed (1907).

Turkish Kemalism

4. With the Kemalist laiklik, the laicism historically imbedded in traditionally Christian countries spread out into the domains of Islam. This development is remarkable, in view of the special relations among states having Islamic governments and population. To them, the concept of two separate societal areas, religion and state, is traditionally foreign. The Prophet → Muhammad himself was at once religious and state leader. Nor in (Sunni) Islam is there any institution comparable to the Christian churches. After the founding of the Turkish Republic (1923), Ataturk and his followers had striven above all else to modernize Turkish society by adapting it

What does Laicism Mean, or What is Laicism?

An opportunity for persons to represent various religious convictions in reciprocal acknowledgment



The route to the reception of freedom of instruction

The position that religious practices represent something strictly private

A bulwark against religious intolerance

The absence of any relationship to religion, with the ultimate intent of marginalizing the phenomenon of religion

The expression of anticlericalism

Mostly in agreement
Mostly disagree
No opinion

Source: La Croix-L'Événement (April 1989) citing Julien Potel, L'Église Catholique en France. Approches sociologiques, Paris 1994.

Survey by the newspaper La Croix-L'Événement (April 1989) on the understanding of laicism in France. Despite its historical roots in the struggle against the political influence of the Catholic Church, laicism in France today exists more as one of the foundations of religious tolerance. Laïcité has been transformed from a combative concept to a principle of coexistence in a society stamped by religious pluralism. Even today, however, the understanding of free education remains closely connected to the historical discussion.

to Western culture. Thus, laiklik is, first of all, the adoption of a French concept, now adapted to the special religious conditions of Turkey: not separation of Church and state, however, but separation of Islam and state. Unlike in France, Turkish laiklik is emphatically antireligious, conditioned above all by Ataturk's rationalistic and materialistic worldview. Turkish laicism was expressed first of all in a series of state measures in three areas of public life.

(a) Subordination of religious institutions to state authority. The Caliphate is abolished, and the ministries for Sharia Affairs and religious foundations are closed (1924). Instead, the new Presidium for Religious Affairs controls all religious officials and public religious declarations.

(b) Educational system. The Islamic schools are unified and nationalized (1924). Religious education, at first still separately administered, is abolished (1936).

(c) Elimination of religious symbols and institutions. The mausoleums are closed, and the cult of the saints thereby paralyzed; mystical orders (Sufis, etc.) are interdicted (both, 1925). Finally, Roman script replaces Arabic, the script of the Qur'an (1928).

With exceptions, these determinations are still in force today—indeed, to some extent, even expanded by succeeding governments. For example, since 1949, acts and enunciations contrary to the principle of laicism have been punishable by law.

The discussion on laicism has continued uninterrupted, and this in Turkey as well as in France—especially in the Turkey of recent times, in connection with the growing empowerment of Islamic fundamentalism. Here, the latter is regularly opposed by compulsory measures taken on the part of the state. Recent examples have been the prohibition of the wearing of headscarves or full beards in the universities (1995; → Veil), and, in February 1998, of participation in the government by the Islamist Welfare Party (Refah Partisi).

Finally, at the beginning of 1994, after the French conservative government had emended the Falloux Law and promised the private schools—of which 90% were Catholic—unrestricted subsidies, some 600,000 partisans of laicism poured into the streets of Paris (in the largest demonstration to be mounted there since the student revolt of 1968).

Literature

Laïcité(s) en France et Turquie, Paris 1995 (Cahiers d'études sur la Méditerranée orientale et le monde turco-iranien, No. 19); Hasquin, Hervé (ed.), Histoire de la laïcité: principalement en Belgique et en France, Brussels [2]1981; Stock-Morton, Phyllis, Moral Education for a Secular Society: The Development of morale laïque in Nineteenth-Century France, New York 1988; Wedel, Heidi, Der türkische Weg zwischen Laizismus und Islam. Zur Entwicklung des Laizismusverständnisses in der türkischen Republik, Opladen 1991.

→ Civil Religion, Democracy, Enlightenment, Government/Rule/Politics/State, Islam, Revolution (French), Secularization, Veil

Oliver Grasmück

Lamaism

1. Lamaism denotes the version of → Buddhism practiced in → Tibet. Nowadays the concept refers especially to the theocratic system of Tibet before 1959 (→ Theocracy). (The prevailing Tibetan religion is now usually called 'Tibetan Buddhism.') 'Lamaism' comes from the word Lama (religious teacher), a title for ranking monks.

History

2. The first attempts to convert the Tibetans to Buddhism were made through Indian → Tantra Buddhism, beginning in 640 CE. Only through the efforts of Indian missionary Padmasambhava, however, did Buddhism begin to gain foothold in Tibet, from the eighth century onward. Its success was due to Padmasambhava's successful synthesis of traditional Bon religion and Indian Buddhism. The Tibetan kings promoted Buddhism, so that it quickly won many adherents. Since the beginning of the fifteenth century, there have been four schools of Buddhism in Tibet (Nyigmapa, Kagyüpa, Sakyapa, and Gelugpa), which accept one another. The differences among these schools lie partially in the importance they ascribe to meditation, their scripture scholarship, and their emphasis on a life of → celibacy. They also have partially different sacred scriptures and meditation techniques. The most influential school founded was the Gelugpa (Tib., 'the virtuous,' pl.), in the fifteenth century, whose followers in the West are known as the 'Yellow Caps.' Their founder was Tsongkhapa (1357–1419). The first → Dalai Lama was Gedungrub (1391–1475), on whom this title was conferred posthumously. In 1642, the fifth Dalai Lama was named by a Mongolian ruler as religious and secular leader of Tibet, whereupon he placed his master, the Panchen Lama (Sansk.-Tib., 'Great Scholar') in charge of religious affairs,

In Lamaistic Tibet, hundreds of oracles were active. These persons fell into a trance, and prophesied in a tongue that only schooled assistants could understand and translate. The highest-ranking of these was the state oracle, who even today is questioned in important decisions to be made by the Tibetan government in exile. The state oracles of Tibet placed themselves at great risk, however, since if they pronounced false prophecies, they could lose their rank and be imprisoned.

and raised him above himself in that area. This led to a rivalry, which has been exploited by China to the present day. Although the Panchen Lama had never had political duties before the twentieth century, China has repeatedly sought to appropriate him and exploit him in the division of Tibet. In 1951, the People's Republic of China annexed Tibet, and the authority of the Dalai Lama was completely abolished (1959). Between 1959 and 1976, the People's Army of Liberation, a Chinese force, destroyed more than ninety-nine percent of the originally 6,000 sacred buildings of Tibet. More than a million Tibetans were killed. Most of the 550,000 monks living in Tibet before 1959 (today there are only 6,900 at most) have been interned in labor camps or prisons, or driven into forced marriages. Monks and nuns continue to be subjected to torture even today.

The Theocratic System

3. After the appointment of the fifth Dalai Lama as religious and secular head of the country, Tibet was ruled as a theocracy. Socio-economically, Tibet was a feudal state. Nearly two-thirds of the arable land belonged to the government, to monasteries, or to the elite nobility, the last named numbering five percent of the total population. Nearly twenty-five percent of the male population were monks, to whom their basic sustenance was therefore afforded gratis. They met their further needs by offering religious services. The majority of the Tibetan population (sixty percent) were farm slaves, who had to work for their landowners without monetary compensation. The nomads (twenty percent of the total population), who had no compulsory labor to perform, were better off than the farmhands. Monasteries were supported primarily by the produce of their fields, and the unpaid labor of their farmhands. The country was administered by 170 titled officials, and the same number of clerical functionaries, who were monks of the Gelugpa school. Under the Dalai Lama, there were numerous offices with various tasks; their power and that of the abbot depended on the strength of the current Dalai Lama. When a Dalai Lama died, an interim regent ruled the country until the person seen as his reincarnation had attained his majority. Many Dalai Lamas died young; the regents essentially ruled Tibet longer than did the Dalai Lamas themselves. At the beginning of the twentieth century, the thirteenth Dalai Lama sought to modernize the feudal economic system in Tibet along Western lines, but foundered at the opposition of the monastic elite, who feared for their future economic basis. The current, fourteenth Dalai Lama has likewise been concerned for reform, and in 1963, in exile in India, proclaimed a provisional constitution combining democratic and social progress with Buddhist principles. To this date, however, there has been no opportunity to test it in practice.

Lamaism Today

4. Living in their Indian and Nepalese exile, in over three hundred Tibetan monasteries, are more than 15,000 monks and over 1,200 nuns. In Europe and in the United States as well, some Tibetan monasteries have been founded in recent decades. Monks and nuns have to provide for their own maintenance, which is actually contrary to Buddhist monastic rules. Since 1985, monasteries in Tibet have been permitted to receive novices once more, after a long prohibition. But the capacities of the monasteries are far surpassed by applications. Since Tibet was opened to → tourism in the mid-1980s, visitors can see for themselves today a picture of the continuing massive suppression of freedom of religion in Tibet. On official travel routes, however, visitors see only monasteries that have been restored with tourism in mind. A special museum in Lhasa, built by the Chinese government for propaganda purposes, is intended to show the 'unbearable' situation of Tibetans before the Chinese takeover. While some of China's claims to this effect have a basis in reality, Tibetans' 'poor socioeconomic conditions' before 1959 are presented with exaggeration and distortion.

Literature

Campbell, June, Traveller in Space: Gender, Identity, and Tibetan Buddhism, London 2002; Goldstein, Melvyn C., A History of Modern Tibet: The Demise of a Lamaistic State, Berkeley 1989; Goldstein, Melvyn C./Kapstein, Matthew T. (eds.), Buddhism in Contemporary Tibet: Religious Revival and Cultural Identity, Berkeley 1998; Grunfeld, A. Tom, The Making of Modern Tibet, New York 1996; Harrer, Heinrich, Seven Years in Tibet, London [4]1953.

→ Buddhism, Dalai Lama, Mandala, Theocracy, Tibet

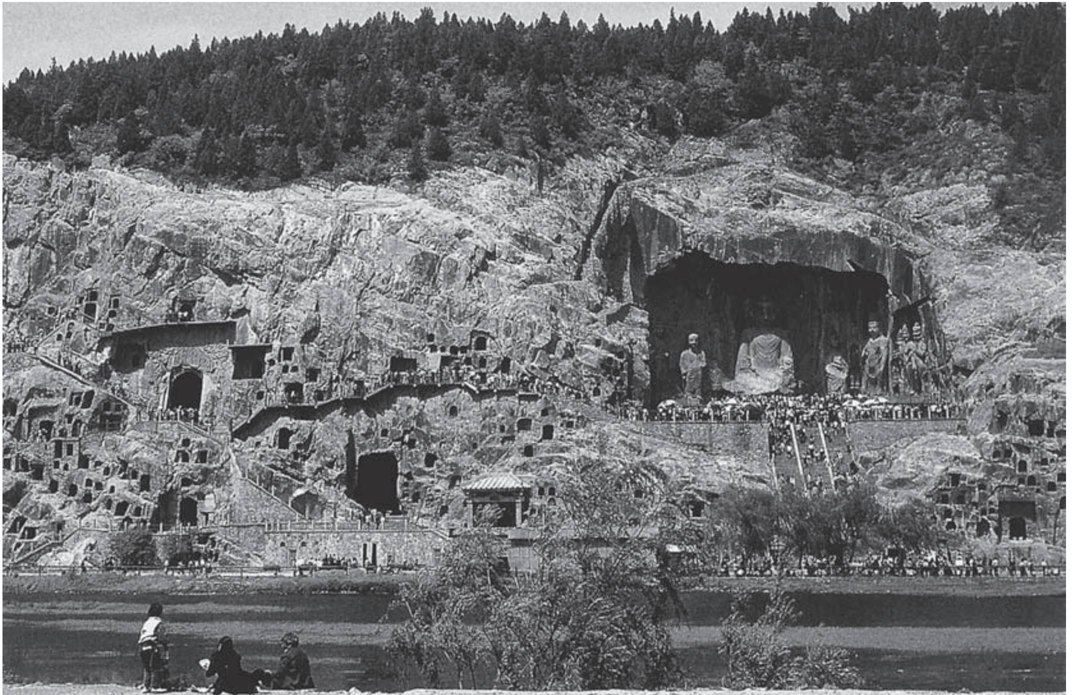
Željko Marković

Landscape



Definition

1. Landscapes appear by way of the perception and formation of the 'natural environment.' They are the consequence of special forms of subsistence ('cultured landscapes'), and the expression of social conceptions of order. Religiously motivated 'imprints' on a landscape are of various kinds. The structuring of space, the formation of centers, → boundaries, sacred places, or taboo zones, are all lasting manifestations of value concepts. The contrast between 'cultured land' civilization and 'natural landscape/wilderness' as a spatial projection, for example, is basic for the formation and maintenance of a 'world within and without.' Thus, in rites of initiation, pilgrimages, and even, in a broader sense, today's tourism of adventure, landscape and a temporary stop in the 'wild' have real meaning. Places of worship can be artificially composed, like pyramids or temple ensembles, or they can be elements of the landscape that are 'ensouled by gods,' like trees, mountains, or waters. The beyond is persistently represented as an idealized landscape, usually as a garden or sylvan grove. As an aesthetically mediated totality of nature, landscape stands at the midpoint of the reaction of Romanticism, designated 'art religion,' against the rational world image of modernity.

Concepts of Landscape

2. Landscapes receive their characteristic Gestalt from the interplay of natural conditions with the historical elaborations under which natural space is assimilated. The most ancient testimonials to consciously perceived landscapes in European space include the Paleolithic cave paintings in France and Northern Spain. From the context of Chinese Daoism, we have the art of geomancy (Feng-Shui), which emerges from relations of origin and kinship between landscape elements, constructions, and society. The key motif of this approach can be understood as the cosmic paradigm of the tension of the sexes: here, all forms perceived as 'cosmic powers' are underlain by their division into female (yin) and male (yang) 'primordial powers.'[1] The focus of the cosmology of the Australian → Aborigines, which has come down to the present, is the connection of special elements of landscape in the form of 'sacred paths' mapped out by totem ancestors, in a mythic past described as the 'dream time.' In antiquity, the Latin concept cultus included activities such as the cultivation of the soil, the veneration

Religious landscaping in China. Since 494 CE, Buddhist monks have chiseled more than 1,200 caves along a 1.4-km stretch of the Longmen Hill, twelve kilometers south of Luoyang (Henan Province). The grottos of Longmen today form one of the three largest cave-temple installations of China. Many of the wall paint-of the gods, and the education of the human being. In the Middle Ages, the transformation of natural into cultivated land became a religious duty. The agreement of 'being' and 'nature' had been God's command in the divine injunction to 'subdue the earth,' which humanity had received as the instrument of God. Natural landscapes, such as → forests, were a negative quantity. In a recommendation to princes in their establishment of cities, Thomas Aquinas, while acknowledging the importance of the beauty of a landscape, nevertheless warns of an "exaggerated attraction" there, "that would draw persons too much to pleasure."[2] The threshold between settlement and wilderness (the latter being mythologized in 'popular belief' as the place where witches dwelt) became a prominent feature of medieval landscape in the form of walls and fences.

ings, stone inscriptions, chiseled rock inscriptions, and more than 100,000 sculptures have been damaged or stolen over the course of the centuries, so that today only a part of the installation remains to be seen. (Benita von Behr)

In North America, from the beginning of colonialization the idea of 'wilderness' was a crucial element of identity, merging with ideas of 'civilizing' nature and the Native American population. In the nineteenth century, the American landscape became part of the → civil religion of the United States; the National Parks—Yosemite, in particular—can be read as an aesthetization of the American 'salvation project,' fashioned after the example of the Garden Eden (→ Garden/Paradise).

A counter-image to prevailing religion, and to a modern understanding of nature, was created by the Romantic conception of art, which claimed that, through a 'new mythology,' it was fashioning a new, superior system of interpretation. The religious aestheticization of landscape was a central consideration, an attitude proclaimed by Petrarch long before, in the report of his 1336 ascent of Mont Ventoux.[3] A nature 'decomposed' by science was countered with an aesthetic contemplation of landscape as standing for an 'integral' nature. What was important was meditation—'the power of the inward'—and the strength of the person who sallies forth alone into nature, as epitomized, for example, in the landscape compositions of Caspar David Friedrich. The Romantic notion of an 'inner paradise turned outward' came to embodiment in the English style of garden art, and was presented as landscape. The motifs of its figures received their orientation—in opposition to the severe order of the feudal Baroque garden—in the conceptualization of an Arcadian landscape. A 'piecemeal' consideration of nature was usually complemented here by an appreciation of the scenes, temples, and ruins of Asia or the East, or of antiquity.

Twentieth Century

In the tradition of the religious experience of nature embraced by Romanticism, we find the youth movement and reform movement of the twentieth century, the hippie culture, the ecological movement, and tourism. In this context, South Tirolean mountain-climber and environmentalist Reinhold Messner, with his reporting of his experiences of the 1970s in solitary, wild and hazardous, mountain expeditions, and statements like, "At such moments, persons learn to find God within themselves,"[4] became the herald of a new form of existential appropriation and experience of landscape. In the framework of a practice to be engaged during one's free time, 'adventure tourism' combines forms of consciousness that have already been developed in Romanticism: a critique of civilization, a refusal to replace the existence of religiosity with rationality; the experience of union with the infinite amidst the finite (→ Mysticism), and the instrumentalization of landscape and nature as a medium of religious self-reference.

3. As cities expand, and agricultural production wanes in importance, cultivated landscapes are disappearing today, along with the last 'wildernesses' (Amazon basin, New Guinea, Borneo). At the same time, there is a tendency to present new landscapes in the interior of cities, even in greenhouses. 'Nature experiences' are increasingly featured in the media, and simulations of landscaping are projected in virtual space. At the same time, industrial projects increasingly encroach on nature, while attempting to compensate with parks and 'natural' spaces. Even in this historically new reciprocation, one discerns the desire to reconcile civilization with nature.

1. Jellicoe 1987.
2. Warnke 1992, 91.
3. Burckhardt, Jacob, Die Kultur der Renaissance in Italien, Gesamtausgabe, Stuttgart 1930, 5:213.
4. Messner 1979, 128.

Literature

Albanese, Catherine L., Nature Religion in America: From the Algonkian Indians to the New Age, Chicago/London 1990; Chidester, David/Linenthal, Edward T. (eds.), American Sacred Space, Bloomington/Indianapolis 1995; Glacken, Clarence J., Traces on the Rhodian Shore: Nature and Culture in Western Thought from Ancient Times to the End of the Eighteenth Century, London 1967; Jellicoe, Geoffrey/Jellicoe, Susan, The Landscape of Man: Shaping the Environment from Prehistory to the Present Day, 3rd, rev. ed., London 1987; Messner, Reinhold, Alleingang Nanga Parbat, Munich 1979 (Engl. as: Solo Nanga Parbat, London 1980); Schama, Simon, Landscape and Memory, London 1995; Thomas, Keith, Man and the Natural World: Changing Attitudes in England, 1500–1800, Oxford/New York 1983; Warnke, Martin, Politische Landschaft. Zur Kunstgeschichte der Natur, Munich 1992 (Engl. as: Political Landscape: The Art History of Nature, London 1994).

→ Environmentalism, Forest/Tree, Garden/Paradise, Nature, Nature Piety, Place (Sacred), Romanticism

Ursula Pieschel

Language

Just as there is a necessity to write this article in only one of the many natural languages, so too we can not discuss language in general, but must start with some historical examples.

Scriptural and non-Scriptural Religions

In Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, God's revelation was made available to humans through a language: Hebrew, Greek, or Arabic. The three religions attribute speech to God; in each the Word of God is associated with Creation ('God said' or 'God decreed'). In Judaism and Christianity human reason (logos in Greek) became intimately linked with this Word (also logos). Christianity went even further in affirming a divine-human commonality in speech by proclaiming that the Word became incarnate in Christ. (Most theologies teach that the highest authority belongs to the Incarnate Word—who spoke Aramaic, and not to the apostolic witness given in Greek in the New Testament). The three religions each have an authoritative Scripture, which issues statements and commands, but there are nuances in the authority granted to it. The texts in their materiality are treated with respect.

Greek religion, being non-scriptural, made us familiar with gods who act rather than speak, teach, or issue laws. But Greek cults abound in oracular practices. At Delphi, the Pythia, under divine inspiration, issues oracles, often in answer to questions. The statements are frequently obscure, but hermeneutes are there to interpret what was said. Other techniques of → divination, through dreams, for instance, also make available messages that remain somewhat short of the clarity of the Ten Commandments. Contemporary studies of ancient techniques of divination (from the scrutiny of tortoise shells in China to the very elaborate Mesopotamian procedures) argue that these procedures strive to transform opacity into some meaningful statement. By gathering and classifying chaotic data, they lay the bases for what became known as rational procedures. Models of inquiry are being developed. In Africa, the diviner carefully interrogates the querent in search of an answer (J. P. Vernant et al. 1974).

Language, social formation, culture, and religion can thus be said to find their common birth in a process that aims to wrest some meaningful propositions from the "eternal silence of infinite spaces" that caused so much fright to Pascal. At the close of the 18th century J.-J. Rousseau speculated on origins and affirmed that language, society, and religion arose simultaneously. B. Constant built on this insight. After Humboldt's statement ("he who knows only one language knows none") came Max Müller's: "he who knows only one religion knows none." Human cognitive efforts are therefore perspectival. But it took time for this insight to be seriously exploited. This delay had something to do with the sort of religion that Christianity was.

Scriptural religions spread and maintain themselves on the understanding that a fully adequate, basic intelligible meaning has been made available. If religions are 'conquests of the world by interpreters,' interpreters who work from a Scripture have a clear base to work from. A language is for them a given fact. 'Faith is from hearing.' 'How shall they believe, unless it be announced?' Early Christianity formulated creeds, to separate the orthodox from the heretics (→ Heresy). In the medieval universities theologians used Greek metaphysics to frame a synthesis between rational truth and revealed truth. The → Enlightenment attacked this harmonious doctrinal whole and strove to demonstrate that 'revealed truths' were dogmas that were neither true nor rational, thereby setting the terms for Western debates for a long time.

Language Invites Further Language

This Christian history thus shows (like all others) a fundamental feature of language: namely to invite further language. It takes a socially enforceable act to declare a canon closed. But this being done, Scriptures remain to be interpreted. It does not take a long time, or many interpreters, before it becomes admitted that even the Ten Commandments are not as clear as all that. A further flowering of reasoning activity is called for.

A first path consists in legal recording and weighing of opinions. The three Scriptural religions have built huge edifices (quite distinct, of course) with the simple dual tool of pro and con. A second, more recent, path examines texts not to establish what they mean but what they meant. In the West the opening of this new option is credited to Lorenzo Valla (1407–1457) and his critical approach that enabled him to denounce some forgeries. This approach flowered with the humanists and the scholars of the Renaissance (→ Humanism). The rise of this type of historical consciousness had two immediate consequences. First the new critical approach could claim to be disinterested, because the historical question of what the text meant was kept quite distinct from the question of its contemporary relevance, of what it means. That Christians had a long tradition of pondering the presence in their canon of both a First and a Second Testament undoubtedly facilitated the articulation of this problem. So did the high valuation placed among them upon the task of translating of the Bible. And, second, the new 'scientific approach' marshaled immense resources (from archaeology to philology) to pursue its textual inquiries. Starting around 1820, a worldwide religious library was being studied in this way. Classical non-European languages started being formally taught: Arabic, Chinese, Sanskrit, Persian; soon Pali and Japanese followed. In a sense the nineteenth century social sciences only had to ask new questions and experiment with new methods: the libraries existed already.

Languages became scientific objects with the work of de Saussure (Cours de linguistique générale, 1916). The turn toward making the study of language a 'natural science' was taken when it was decided that investigations would be limited to actual, used (so-called natural) languages, and that no speculations would be ventured on the origin of language and no attempt made to invent an ideal language. In this wake, further sciences of language were born, psycho-linguistics and socio-linguistics. The latter should be of special interest to scholars in religion, since numerous religio-cultural conflicts have a language dimension.

The Linguistic Turn in Philosophy

After World War II many philosophers started doing their work in some space they constructed between their theories of language and their view of religion. The new developments came under the label of 'the linguistic turn.' Philosophies in the English-speaking world became dominated by attention to how language is being used, and by proposals on how it should be used. 'Linguistic analysis' spent therefore much time examining Christian theological affirmations with a view to assessing their verifiability or falsifiability (Ramsey 1957). Language was conceived at first almost exclusively as having a referential value. Such philosophies commonly gave 'a spectatorial account of knowledge' which tends to see the mind as a great mirror. (For the reaction, see Rorty 1979 and his defense for a therapeutic rather than a systematic view of philosophy.)

With the work of Wittgenstein, J. L. Austin, and R. Searle, philosophical attention shifted to a wide spectrum of uses of language. It became stressed that there is more to religion than belief in the truth of some doctrines. J. S. Jensen (2004) thus speaks of a 'semiotic turn.' Pragmatics became added to semantics and the focus included what people do to themselves and to each other when they use language. Attention was also paid to grammars and applications of speech acts (Winch 1977). "A language which we cannot imagine being used is not a language, and the sort of language we can imagine is determined by the language we ourselves use" (Rorty 1967, 17).

Semiology showed how to consider language as one in a series of signs used among humans. A distinction became crucial, that between speaking and speaking about speaking. While the former acts in some way upon the world, the latter invites minds to reflect and to think in methodical ways, most specifically not to ask questions unless there are procedures to embark upon common work toward finding the answers. Language then became commonly acknowledged to be an unwieldy tool for knowledge ('unperspicuous') and yet not replaceable. We cannot think without words, but it is hard to think with them. A more serious attempt was also made at that time to examine religious language in general and not just typically Christian affirmations.

Somewhat simultaneously, some Christian theologians, instead of considering religious language as a way of teaching the faithful or convincing the Western doubters, put their ability to speak to new uses not so closely tied to traditional Western and metaphysical moorings. Acknowledgment of deep cultural diversity led them to promote and practice 'dialogue among religions' (in fact among religious people), often with the object of furthering mutual understanding. The objectives varied all the way from convergence on some truth to world peace. (For earlier accounts of the benefits to be gained from dialogue, see Despland 2004.)

Interpretation and Translation

Philosophers belonging to what Anglo-Americans call the Continental tradition have taken a hermeneutic rather than a linguistic turn, and have tended to place language in a broader family of communicative action (→ Communication). The heuristic and cognitive potentialities of metaphor were acknowledged. Theories of interpretations moved from texts to meaningful action (Ricoeur 1981; Joy 2004). The distance between speaking and speaking about speaking was also attenuated. Derrida (1970) distinguished two interpretations of interpretation. In the first case, the mind claims to decipher a truth (or at least tries to), to reach an origin which is free from the constraints of the world of signs. The other gives up the dream of full presence or reassuring foundation, and sees interpretation as a sort of play between two partners. (Interpretation then becomes more like translation.) Derrida recommends accepting both options and rejecting neither.

Philosophers (mainly those on the Continent) thus started to pay attention to practices of → translation. A recent French work (Cassin 2004) recruited 150 authors to write 400 entries on the difficulties entailed in translating philosophy. Why has Hegel's Phenomenology of the Mind become Phenomenology of the Spirit? And do ontologists know that Spanish has two verbs for to be, ser and estar, which have very distinct meanings?

The Contribution of the Social Sciences

In contrast, nearly all trends in the social sciences instructed theorists of religion to see languages as historical and perspectival, → discourse as constructed, and knowledge as socially attained. In 1903 Durkheim and Mauss (1963) wrote their essay on Primitive Classification. In 1910 Lévy-Bruhl laid the basis for comparative epistemology in Les fonctions mentales dans les sociétés inférieures ("How natives think," 1926). It became admitted that languages inform to some extent the perceptions, concepts and modes of thought of the people who use them. Marcel Mauss undertook to improve upon Durkheim by showing the thousand and one forms of symbolic action (Tarot 1999). With such anchoring in social-cultural semantic realities, concepts like 'religious experience' and 'belief' became problematic. Needham (1972) argued that belief is an unanalysable private state of mind and that we cannot establish 'believing' as a natural resemblance among humans. While the term seems indispensable to Europeans' account of themselves, Needham recommended that it be not used in ethnographic reports. When this social-scientific tradition met historians of religion attentive to the plurality of cultures, criticism turned to the questionable presuppositions and objectives that were present in much 'Western' science as it organized knowledge of other cultures. A major epistemological point was made: maps are not territory and many of our maps are totally incongruous (Smith 1978).

After the demise in the 1970s of a sociology of religion dominated by too exclusive an interest in organizations (or denominations), studies of religion went to the school of anthropologists (Wallace, Geertz, Turner) to focus on meanings and how meanings come to be shared through linguistic and other means. Empirical changes in religions (especially in the West) were then forcing attention upon new movements, many small, some short-lived. The descent to the level of micro phenomena made the work of the older Chicago symbolic interactionists (G. H. Mead, E. Goffman) appear relevant (Neitz 1990). Discourse was then studied in its nascent states. Here, too, attention shifted from 'religions' as storehouses of symbols to uses of the symbolic capital and changes in it. 'Conversation analysis' shows symbolic interaction being started almost de novo (with the preexisting tools of a given language of course), discourse being seen then as an achievement. In talk, thought becomes action and talk is intrinsically social interaction (Boden 1990).

This perspective raised many new questions for historians of religion. Religions like cultures came to be seen as 'semantic processes' (Jensen 2004). Religious language used to be studied mostly under the heading of 'myth' and was considered mainly as socially unitive and conservative, more frequently seen at work in maintenance rather than resistance or innovation. (For the view that language does not suffice to make individuals appear reliable to each other and that it takes ritual to establish minimal social stability, see Rappaport 1999; see also Bird 1995.) In contrast, religious language is now commonly seen as a major resource against hegemonic ideologies. Languages do establish social boundaries. But languages never stop all traffic at the borders. Ideas are not subject to customs dues; this eighteenth century saying is truer than ever. Languages make contraband possible (Lincoln 1989). Hermes, considered to be the god of hermeneutics, was also the god of thieves.

The Recourse to Literary Language

This sense of the extreme fluidity that language can lend to meanings is no news to students of literature. Cervantes created in the early seventeenth century a hero who goes into the world mentally armed with a canon: the novels of chivalry. The woeful inadequacy of his epistemological equipment is quickly apparent: his delusions are so numerous that he passes for insane. The novel (the father of all novels) has a further achievement: readers move from judgment of Don Quixote's pitiful folly—which gets him into cruel troubles, to a non-judgmental attitude and even to a genuine admiration for the artistic valor of this 50-year old knight. Don Quixote reconstructs his shattered world with an enviable resiliency. And in time, as the story moves on, he has moments of insight, flashes of cognitive brilliance. Clearly he is not consistently mad. A lesson is inescapable: canons of reality are not to be entirely trusted; not only is what passes for reality unreliable, but unreality too is fickle. Delusions (of some nature and to some degree never to be settled once and for all) are parts of the art of living. (In fact his 'delusions' are not those psychiatrists diagnose: the windmills are there: he only believes them to be giants; his folly may be nothing worse than unusually bold beliefs.) In 1705, the year Don Quixote was published, Shakespeare offered King Lear, where he made a convergent demonstration: experience can damage the mind.

The epistemological instability created by Cervantes, the distrust of ordinary language he fosters by inviting interest in his literary language, are demonstrably linked to Spain's religious history, i.e. to the conflicts between three religions brought about by Christian policies of persecution. Inquisition and censorship forced all religious consciences into previously uncharted waters. Subtle artistry in expression was the first fruit. While characters in the novel occasionally say that all Moors are false in their dealings with Christians, the author says he got the true story of the errant knight from one of them, Cide Hamete Benengeli. There are hints that the beautiful Dulcinea about whom the Don fantasizes is not born of Christian blood. Cervantes showed in other writings as well that secret religion, dissembling and ambiguous talk are the flip side of the forcing of consciences.

Lists and Canons

Establishing lists, the earliest form of categorization, started humans on a long course of intellectual activity. The world contains both semantic and non-semantic facts (Jensen 2004). Closing a list establishes a → canon, which is a frame for inquiry and a language to work with. Exegetical labor can proceed with something concrete that draws the line between what questions may be raised just now (and perhaps settled) and what may not. Limitation is the necessary springboard for the exercise of ingenuity (J. Z. Smith 1982). But in a world where métissage or hybridization keeps occurring at nearly all boundaries, lists are not as stable as they used to be. Available classifications still provide reliable epistemological instruments but, in fact, social and symbolic interaction keeps experimenting with new lists. The vaccinated post-modern sophisticate is significantly but not entirely different from the Etruscan reading sheep's livers. The celebration of language can serve to praise both God and humanity, the majesty of one and the frail ingenuity of the other.

Literature

Bird, F., "Ritual As Communicative Action," in: Lightstone, J. N./Bird, F. B. (eds.), Religion and Ethnic Identity, Waterloo 1995, 23-52; Boden, D., "People are Talking. Conversation Analysis and Symbolic Interaction," in Becker, H. S./McCall, M. M. (eds.), Symbolic Interaction and Cultural Studies, Chicago 1989, 244-274; Cassin, B., Vocabulaire européen des philosophies, Paris 2004; Despland, M., "The Dialogue as a Literary Form Used in Western Inquiries into Religious Diversity," in Kleine, Chr./Schrimpf, M./Triplett, K. (eds.), Unterwegs: New Paths in the Study of Religions, Munich 2004, 149-166; Derrida, J., "Structure, Sign and Play in the Discourse of the Human Sciences," in Macksey, R./Donato, E. (eds.), The Languages of Criticism and the Sciences of Man, Baltimore 1970; Durkheim, É./Mauss, M., Primitive Classifications, Chicago 1963; Jensen, J. S., "Meaning and Religion: On Semantics in the Study of Religion," in: Antes, P./Geertz, A. W./Warne, R. R. (eds.), New Approaches to the Study of Religion, vol. I, Berlin/New York 2004, 219-252; Joy, M., "Philosophy and Religion," in:

Antes, P./Geertz, A. W./Warne, R. R. (eds.), New Approaches to the Study of Religion, vol. I, Berlin/New York 2004, 185-217; Lévy-Bruhl, L., How Natives Think, London 1926; Lincoln, B., Discourse and the Construction of Society: Comparative Studies of Myth, Ritual and Classification, Oxford 1989; Needham, R., Belief, Language and Experience, Chicago 1971; Neitz, M. J., "Studying Religion in the Eighties," in: Becker, H. S/McCall, M. M. (eds.), Symbolic Interaction and Cultural Studies, Chicago 1989, 90-118; Ramsey, I. T., Religious Language: An Empirical Placing of Theological Phrases, London 1957; Rappaport, R., Ritual and Religion in the Making of Humanity, Cambridge 1999; Ricoeur, P., "The Model of the Text: Meaningful Action Considered as Text," in: Thompson, J. B. (ed./trans.), Hermeneutics and the Human Sciences, Cambridge 1981, 197-221; Rorty, R., "Introduction," in: Idem (ed.), The Linguistic Turn: Recent Essays in Philosophical Method, Chicago 1967, 1-39; Idem, Philosophy and the Mirror of Nature, Princeton 1979; Smith, J. Z., "Map Is Not Territory," in: Idem, Map Is Not Territory: Studies in the History of Religion, Chicago 1978, 289-309; Idem, "Sacred Persistence: Toward a Redescription of Canon," in: Idem, Imagining Religion: From Babylon to Jonestown, Chicago 1982, 36-52; Tarot, C., De Durkheim à Mauss. L'invention du symbolique. Sociologie et sciences des religions, Paris 1999; Vernant, J. P. (ed.), Divination et rationalité, Paris 1974; Winch, P., "Meaning and Religious Language," in: Loades, A./Rue, L. D. (eds.), Contemporary Classics in Philosophy of Religion, LaSalle 1977, 349-375.

→ Communication, Discourse, Literature, Meaning/Signification, Perception, Text/Textual Criticism, Tradition, Translation

Michel Despland

Late Antiquity

Concept and Time Span

1. Until the mid-twentieth century, researchers understood late antiquity "as the long decay of ancient times, or as the commencement of the European-Byzantine Middle Ages."[1] Since then it has been regarded as an era 'of its own,' a genuine part of antiquity. Its characterization as a 'time of decay' arose from the evaluation of a humanistic, partly anti-Christian classicism—unless it was positively conceived in terms of the décadence-ideal of the fin de siècle.

To be sure, the boundaries of eras always have something of the arbitrary or optional about them, since they are set up in accordance with modern viewpoints. Still, there are altogether good grounds for a demarcation of late antiquity: the year 284 CE presents a place to make a clean division, with the accession of Diocletian as Roman Emperor (284–305). A new phase in the history of the Roman Empire was introduced in the area of politics, administration, and economics. It is also certainly reasonable to date the end of late antiquity in the late sixth century: it was under the Eastern Roman Emperor Justinian (527–565) that the last attempt was undertaken to bring the Roman Empire under one rule, in its old geographical magnitude. Justinian's "fall marks the end of the Roman history of the Mediterranean basin."[2] A more extensive approach was that first presented by Belgian historian Henri Pirenne (1862–1935), which ties the end of the era—and therewith of antiquity as such—to the arrival of → Islam, and the division of the Mediterranean world following the Arabian campaigns of the seventh and eighth centuries.

The 'Constantinian Turn'

2. For the history of religions, the 'Constantinian turn' is surely the most important event of late antiquity. This designation is used for the Roman state's conversion to the Christian religion, introduced by Emperor Constantine I (306–337, autocrat from 324). The date at which Constantine was converted to the Christian Religion remains a matter of dispute. It may be only a legend that he was converted by an apparition of the cross in the battle at the Milvian Bridge in 312 (→ Rome, map of vicinity), but at all events it is clear that he openly protected Christianity, or the Church, at least from shortly after 312. All of his measures, such as episcopal jurisdiction in civil matters, tax-exemptions for clerics, or the right of the Church to receive legacies, indeed advanced Christianity, but did not yet place it over traditional religions. Instead, despite any personal preference on his part for the new faith, and by contrast with his successors, legal equality for the Church and its functionaries vis-à-vis the pagan state cults seems more likely to have been Constantine's aim. What is certain is that, with these measures, the Emperor, who had himself baptized shortly before his death, set a development in motion that, in the year 391, climaxed in the proscription of all pagan cults by Emperor Theodosius I. Thus Christianity became the de facto state religion.

Ideology of the Sovereign

3. A typical phenomenon of the Roman state of late antiquity is an autocratic monarchy with a sacred exaltation of the Emperor. Admittedly, there had been a cult of the Emperor from the beginning of the Empire; but the office of Emperor had not been religiously legitimated, nor had the Emperor himself been surrounded with a sacred aura. This reserve changed under Diocletian (reigned 284–305). To insure his rule against possible usurpation by the military—a real threat, especially in the third century—he needed a basis of legitimization that, at least theoretically, was not the army. He and his co-emperor became Jovii or Herculii—descendants of Jupiter or Hercules. What was new in this concept was that no longer was membership in the physical family of the sovereign (domus Augusti) the criterion of succession, but rather membership in the divine house of sovereigns (domus divina) by adoption. To doubt the divine origin of the emperors, then, was tantamount to denying their legitimacy. Here indeed may have been one of the essential motives for Diocletian's persecution of the Christians.

Constantine I, under Christian omens, carried this concept further. Not only was the Emperor, as God's representative on earth, identified, de facto, with Christ by official theologian Eusebius of Caesarea (260–337/40), but the Emperor himself seems to have entertained this concept. That he should have had his sarcophagus set amidst the monuments of the Twelve Apostles in the Church of the Apostles in Constantinople lent fitting climax to his program across the board. If his Christian successors stopped short of this, still the person of the sovereign retained a religious component, and was enfolded in a sacred aura, as was clearly demonstrated in court ceremonial as in ornament or image (→ Epiphany). Everything about the Emperor was 'sacred' (sacer). This perception, which remained integral to state theology in Byzantium, was ultimately one of the roots of medieval divine right, as of the modern absolutism based thereon.

Christianization

4. The Christianization of the Roman Empire was not restricted to court society and a ruling elite, of course, but led to a fundamental religious reorientation. That Christianity was ultimately able to suppress the pagan cults was less a matter of a (repeatedly supposed) crisis of ancient religion, nor indeed, with the state's demand, violent imposition of the Christian religion. There was also the facilitating element that the new faith was flexible in adopting and adjusting existing religious concepts, satisfying ritual needs in ways more or less accommodating of traditional usages. Thus, ancient → polytheism survived in the veneration of the saints. By contrast, Christian → monotheism was of greater value as a political concept, and a more suitable path to the religious legitimization of sovereignty than Diocletian's construct had been: after all, Eusebius himself would have the monarchy the earthly image of the rule of the one God. One God, one Emperor, one Empire! Theological conflicts, typical of Christianity in late antiquity, were a factor of disturbance in this context. As a consequence, one of the interests of the emperors of late antiquity lay in the unity of the Church. From Constantine onward, emperors interfered in confrontations within the Church, and sought—by force, if need be—to repress heresies. An essential means here consisted in the 'ecumenical councils,' assemblies of theologians and bishops which the Emperor supervised, and which, beginning with Constantine, were held (at least in claim and effect) all over the Empire—the first in 323 at Nicaea, in the environs of Constantinople—and had unity of worship and doctrine as their task. A more than incidental determinant of the theological direction that would prevail consisted in the preferences of the then reigning emperor. Until the demise of the Byzantine Empire in 1453, the dependency of the Church on the Byzantine Emperor endured, ultimately finding its prolongation in the role of the Orthodox Church in Tsarist Russia. In the West, on the other hand, the collapse of imperial power supplied the prerequisite for the emancipation of the Roman Church from political institutions. Finally, the Pope became his own Emperor (→ Papacy).

Feudalization

5. Beginning in the third and fourth centuries, the cities rapidly lost their role as autonomous, self-managing communal institutions. The state of late antiquity placed its confidence in hierarchically organized central bureaucracies, and thus gradually deprived the old local urban elites of their political and economic power. That power increasingly came into the hands of large landowners, whose latifundia were cultivated by dependent coloni—a system of transition to serfdom and feudalism. Ancient cults, then, which were always essentially local cults, in a particular municipality, slowly but surely lost their ideological and financial base. Further, the political and economic crisis of the Empire since the third century seemingly all but required supernatural things and persons for protection—"ranging from relics, exorcists, divine and semi-divine patrons, to dreams, wonderworkers, and magical practices."[3] In this fashion, religion acquired a more pronounced individual character than it had before. Personal salvation, and no longer that of the political community, shifted to the center of consciousness. Christianity, precisely, with its 'holy men' (Gk., sing. theíos anēr), the ascetics, wonder-working bishops and hermits, satisfied these needs: holy persons demonstrated their special intimacy with God by expelling demons, healing the sick, and performing miracles. Thus they served as intermediaries between individuals and God (in their lifetime as well as after their death, through their relics); this function gave them a power grounded in religion, granted, but which acquired an altogether political significance. Bishops—especially in the Western part of the Empire—knew how to make use of 'saints' in their jurisdiction, and the cult of their relics for their own purposes: these were the "visible representatives of the invisible patronus."[4] Their political role as local authorities after the fall of central authority in the West owed not least to that, as well.

1. Brandt 1998, 17.
2. Demandt 1989, XVIII.
3. Martin, Jochen, Spätantike und Völkerwanderung, Munich 1995, 123.
4. Ibid., 124.

Literature

Brandt, Hartwin, Geschichte der römischen Kaiserzeit. Von Diokletian und Konstantin bis zum Ende der konstantinischen Dynastie (284–363), Berlin 1998; Brown, Peter, The Making of Late Antiquity, Cambridge/London 1978; Idem, Society and the Holy in Late Antiquity, Berkeley 1982; Demandt, Alexander, Die Spätantike. Römische Geschichte von Diocletian bis Justinian 284–565 n. Chr., Munich 1989; MacMullen, Ramsay, Enemies of the Roman Order, Cambridge 1966; Idem, Christianizing the Roman Empire (A.D. 100–400), New Haven/London 1984; Idem, Christianity and Paganism in the Fourth to Eighth Centuries, New Haven/London 1997; Stark, Rodney, The Rise of Christianity: A Sociologist Reconsiders History, Princeton 1996.

→ Antiquity, Christianity, European History of Religion, Mediterranean Region, Veneration of the Saints, Middle Ages

Markus E. Fuchs

Law

Concept

1. 'Law,' as a continuous quantity, usually denotes anything that pertains to state statutes ('laws' in the discrete sense), is fixed in writing, and is applied by way of specialized state organs. State 'law,' then, is characterized by its expression in 'laws,' which latter unambiguously determine the regulation of factual circumstances and situations, and to the violation of which are attached predetermined punishments (sanctions)—these too, applied by the state. Thus, state law is 'posited' in positive, objective, law, and is invested with a note of coercion: persons are obliged to its observance, and its non-observance is punished.

Subjective law refers to persons' appeal to 'rights' accruing to them in virtue of their existence (human rights, basic rights, natural rights), or called for by them vis-à-vis third parties without state sanctioning (e.g., appeals to contracts and agreements).

Finally, there are unwritten, or 'customary' laws—generally recognized agreements, arrangements, settlements, among given agents, derived from tradition or traditional practice—derived from custom. These are not ordinarily sanctioned, and therefore, in case of conflict, have no official binding force. The importance of customary law, then, arises exclusively when there are no legal or contractual regulations. Today it involves, especially, popular law; but state, objective law, as well, knows applications of customary law (e.g. the reference to 'honest and credible' and 'commercial customs' in contractual law).

Development and Functions of Law

2. The core of any law is the binding regulation of relations of persons among one another, in relation to the state and its organs, and in relation to other social institutions. Law, then, is a special form of social norms that determines the life of human beings. It is distinct from other social norms (moral norms, ethics, values) by reason of its sanctioning, and by way of the fact that law tends to detach from ethics and morals, claims its validity independently of tradition or concrete life-situations, and therefore comes forward as an abstract norm. However, in the spectrum of particular norms of law, again, a sense or meaning in the system of law is discernible that 'refers' to the greater whole (state, society).

In a Euro-centric perspective that leaves traditional and/or analphabetic cultures out of account, the development of law occurs as a progressive abstracting and secularization of social norms, in the presence of a simultaneous extension of the legalization of social relationships. This development finds its highest expression in the General Declaration on → Human Rights, which transforms subjective law or right into objective law, sees, or seeks to see, its validity extended upon all persons of the earth, and has its provenance exclusively in the intrinsic value of all human beings—independently of an appeal to social or religious bases. The development of law takes its point of departure in the codification of social norms in early societies.

A first written institution or fixing of law is found in the ancient Babylonian Code of Hammurabi, from the seventeenth century BCE. Even here, basic characteristics of law become clear: it is valid for all subjects of the Mesopotamian Empire, it has the function of regulating the social convocation of these subjects, and it determines the sanctions to be invoked in case of noncompliance with the regulations.

The next great collection of laws is represented by the Torah of → Judaism, which, according to tradition, was revealed by God to Moses in approximately the thirteenth century BCE. Here the pacifying function of law appears in all lucidity: the observance of the Torah would make it possible for the people of Israel to have a good life, in safety and prosperity.

The pacifying function of law is also clear in early determinations of ancient Hellenic culture. The most significant and important expression of law, of course, is that of the Roman Empire. Roman law imposed a completely novel systematization of norms, and this in a unitary structure of laws. The Codex Justinianus (Lat., "Code of Justinian," 529 CE) collected the hitherto existing imperial laws, and then gathered together the later expansions of the most important Roman juridical literature. The Corpus Iuris Civilis (Lat., "Body of Civil Law") that thus appeared was directed to the formation of the whole of social life.

The Christian Church adopted the Roman system of law. By way of the link between the Roman Catholic Church and the Frankish Kingdom, beginning in the seventh century the fundamental thinking of Roman law was transported to Central Europe, and with the Middle Ages was tied to the Teutonic tradition, emphasizing freedom and an autonomous legal schematization. The gradual codification of regional or urban customary law followed (e.g. Saxon Speculum, 1220/35; Swabian Speculum, 1274/75), until the princes gradually acquired the power to posit obligatory law for all subjects, and to warrant or annul determinate rights.

In the wake of the Enlightenment and humanism, and in reaction to the arbitrariness of absolute rulers, the sixteenth century saw the beginning of an emphasis on the notion of 'natural law,' which is of Greek origin (Aristotle), and which gained entry into the Roman Catholic Church by way of Scholasticism (Thomas Aquinas), where it acquired Christian support. Natural law inquires into the ordering, values, and meaning that can be expressed in, or can come into conflict with, those of positive law. Such order and values can be recognized and pursued by contemplation of nature, or, for example with Thomas Aquinas, by insight into the divine order of creation. Natural law, then, is a 'prepositive,' a priori rule—antecedent in nature to positive law. An appeal to natural law became a weapon against the arbitrary and the unjust, inasmuch as it recalled the 'religious' character of any human act, in the framework of an order characterized by superior values. In humanism, the theological content of natural law was stripped away, and there was a development of the concept of inalienable rights investing the human being simply as such, so that the idea of natural law could even be turned against religion.

Thus, the individual was no longer merely the object of law, or dependent on a guarantee of rights on the part of superior authorities, but a repository of rights in an individual capacity, and thereby, indeed, authorized to posit 'state' law.

The eighteenth- and nineteenth-century movements for middle-class emancipation took up this notion, and countered the monarchs and the church with the 'people'—in the form of the male members of the several social classes—as supreme sovereign, to whom the authority accrued both to posit law, and to transfer rights to state power. Law was transformed from an influence on the part of 'authority' on the life of human beings—whether by appeal to social status or to divine authority—to an instrument of self-determination and freedom.

But it lay with the social movements of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries to extend the formula of liberty, equality, and fraternity, proclaimed in the French Revolution, to all persons irrespective of their social status or gender, and to confer on the people, by way of the democratic instruments of the constitutional state, a share in the shaping of social relations through law and in the exercise of the rule of the state. Only then was there a juridical state, with its laws posited by, and valid for, all persons. With the victory of the social reform powers of the labor movement, the notion definitively prevailed of translating, through right and law, the change in society recognized as necessary, in a legally regulated procedure of the formation of the political will. Beginning with the League of Nations (1919), and continuing with the founding of the United Nations (1945), an attempt has been made to make the peace-keeping function of law, and the shaping of social relations by juridical norms, effective on the inter-state level as well, and to replace customary law, usually still valid here, with norms that are juridically formed, binding, and sanctioned.

Law in the Religions

3. Although historically the law of organized common entities (states) and of religious communities has often coincided or extensively overlapped, each religion has nonetheless developed its own law, a law referring to its own community. In varying degrees, social norms and the content of religious tradition are comprised in juridical form and developed in a system of law, in connection with the use of scripture, the size of the religion in question, its extent, and its interior differentiation.

Tribal Religions

In tribal religions, social norms and law usually coincide. The absence of a written tradition entails the unavailability of a juridical system codified in writing. Nevertheless, the status of law accrues to norms of oral tradition, as also to behavioral indications deriving from the world of religious conceptualization; after all, there is a common, generally recognized store of convictions and laws constituting and structuring the social order and outfitted with sanctions. It is the task of certain functionaries within the tribal organization or ethnic group (e.g., elders, priests) to watch over the observance of the rules, to certify the fact of transgressions, and to apply the sanctions.

Hinduism

In Hinduism, with the appearance of the Dharmashastra and Arthashastra literature in the second century BCE, a fertile basis appeared for regulating the implementation of religious usages, and establishing norms for social relations—for example, in the caste system—as well as for determining the rights and duties of rulers, and stipulating conditions for economic life. In terms of its position, this Hindu legal literature lies on a borderline between texts of revelation, like the Veda, and scholarly literature, since an appeal is made to myths, or to a knowledge of the dharma (order), for the legitimization of the norms.

Buddhism

In Buddhism, by contrast, it is mainly self-'obligation' that establishes social norms. Moral rules like the Five Obligations (Pancasila) are only means along the way, means of assistance in abandoning the cycle of rebirths and entering nirvana. Thus, they do not represent juridical norms for an outward comportment, but must be individually assimilated and followed. Likewise the instance of the sanction is missing: individual transgression generates individual 'bad karma,' thereby diminishing the possibility of an 'extinction' of individuation. In Buddhist monasticism, however, life is influenced by a multiplicity of behavioral rules, whose validity is limited to determinations within the social group constituted by the monks.

Judaism

Judaism has transmitted numerous norms in the Torah itself, and elaborated them further in the Talmud. The prescriptions of the Torah—among others, the Ten Commandments—have divine legitimacy, and stand at the beginning of historical Judaism. The rules of the Talmud draw their authority from tradition, and can be read as a complementation and interpretation of the Torah.

Christianity

The sacred texts of Christianity do contain numerous conceptions for right behavior, but no legal norms in the strict sense. Only the appearance of the Ecumenical Councils, beginning in the fourth century and adopting the Roman legal tradition, have led to the appearance of ecclesiastical law. While the Eastern Orthodox tradition applies church law more powerfully in a perspective of the 'cure of souls,' in the Catholic Church the notion has prevailed that the exact observance of ecclesiastical norms is needful for salvation. On the Roman exemplar, the Corpus Iuris Canonici (Lat., "Body of Canon Law") was issued under Pope Gregory VIII in the sixteenth century, as a systematized collection of the laws of the Church. The version valid for today appeared in 1917–1918, and was revised in 1983 under Pope John Paul II. Just as the law of the Catholic Church appeals to the Church's comprehensive claim to stand as mediator of salvation, so the Pope as representative of Christ is the authorized instance for the promulgation of objective ecclesiastical law. The 'legalification' of the faith, with its accompanying tendency to legalism itself, was addressed by the → Reformation. At the midpoint of Reform theology stood the origin of the justice of the human being before God exclusively in faith and the grace of God; accordingly, the teachings of the natural law were rejected even when they had been formed by Christianity. Law in the Protestant Churches, then, generally regulates formal relations among church, clergy, and faithful, even more strictly than they are regulated among Catholics. The Evangelical Free Churches attempt to develop concrete social norms from the biblical texts, so that life in the Free Churches frequently appears as a system of norms strictly to be observed. Particular rules are seldom codified, however, but rest on tradition, transmittal, and the application of the biblical texts to concrete everyday situations.

Islam

The highest degree of legalization in Islam is in the sacred texts themselves, although the texts have not been composed as a book of laws. Islamic law (Sharia) is founded in the Qur'an and tradition alike. Here, besides the hadiths of the Prophet Muhammad, is also the tradition of the previous acknowledgment of the law. In Sunnite Islam, four legal schools have formed, whose theology and jurisprudence enjoys an authoritative character for the faithful. In Shiite Islam, the higher imams take up the task of determination of the law. According to the general claim of Islam, the Sharia comprises all areas of human life, so that a division between society (politics, economics) and religion in the traditional sense does not exist. It is the task of the respective community leader (in the Sunni, the Caliph; in the Shia, the Imam), together with a Judge (Qadi) to supervise the observance of the Sharia and to apply Islamic law.

New Religions

The so-called → new religions have more often not developed their own differentiated legal systems. The essential reason for this lies in the prominent position of their (usually charismatic) founder, which enables him to exercise a simple and direct influence on the faithful, and, ordinarily, to resolve conflicts case by case. Life in the new religions is usually one of personal dedication, and is more often marked by persons' individual and personal appropriation of norms than by a formal observance of general prescriptions. Only with the development of organizational structures, and the growth of the community, as well as with the diminishing effectiveness of a religious leadership originally built on charisma, does the need arise to develop norms binding on all, create instances to oversee their implementation, and thereby posit a law proper to the new religion in question.

Interpretation and Alteration of Law

4. This brief survey of law in the religions points up a problem. A unitary legal system, free of all contradiction, unambiguously defining all situations and subsuming these into its norms, is an ideal impossible to achieve in reality. Rather, legal norms are often formulated broadly, so that, for example, a generally held prescription can be applied to various cases. Technological and societal developments create new situations that, while not occurring in the wording of a law, are nevertheless included in its meaning. Finally, norms of one legal document can collide with those of another.

In principle, it is true, the possibility obtains of adapting concrete laws to new situations. But an all too frequent change in law creates legal uncertainty, and undermines the force of the validity of legal norms. This problem pertains especially to authoritative juridical documents, such as contracts and religious texts. If constitutions change, the above-cited possibility of adapting concrete laws is no longer open in the case of religious texts that have been revealed, any more than in the case of those whose operable validity derives from a historically lengthy tradition.

If authoritative juridical documents cannot be, or ought not to be, altered, then a new particular case not comprised by the norm can be decided only by way of interpretation of that juridical norm. The nature of the relevant criteria can vary. In Islamic law, for example, several factors exercise an influence: the tradition of previous juridical perceptions, the status of analogy—that is, the application of already defined solutions of earlier, similar cases—and even pragmatic viewpoints such as the interests of believers (the endorsement of a 'human' interpretation, and the tendency to expound the Sharia in the sense of 'making things less onerous' for believers). A like casuistry is also found in other religions inclining to leniency, as, for example, Judaism; but it occurs in all juridical systems. English 'common law' is particularly marked by it: there, legal judgments are supported by a limited number of laws, but at the same time by comparable judicial judgments that can be applied to current cases or cited as 'precedents.' In Continental systems, which are based on Roman law, a casuistic application of law is found especially in contractual law. When an application of law thus arisen is consolidated, new law is created de facto, or else prevailing law that has been fixed in writing is changed. Here it is characteristic of secular or religious law that only especially legitimized institutions (contractual courts, schools of law, highest ecclesiastical juridical instances) can form and alter positive law by this particular route.

Legality and Legitimacy

5. Experiences in Fascist Germany especially, where a state entity of injustice that rested on laws was established along a route itself based on laws, have evinced the potential contradiction between the legality of law and the legitimacy of its application. To put it another way: law and justice can part from each other.

The positing and application of law are an expression of relations of rule. In the ideal, typical model, the legislating sovereign is subject to no limitations, independently of whether this sovereign is an absolute prince, a democratically elected parliament, or a religious leader. But if law is to develop validity—find acknowledgment—then a reference must occur to superior values or conceptualizations of belief. The latter can consist in constitutions, or codified human rights, as positive law, but it can also consist in ideas ranging from natural law as pre-positive law, to common convictions of the sense of life, to truths of faith. Just as the democratic legislator is bound to the constitution, nor may the application of laws contravene human rights, so neither must religious law contradict foundations of belief held by all followers of a religion. Thus, the legitimacy of the legislation and of its application is ultimately evinced in their conformity with commonly held superior convictions. Justice is established when law takes account of these convictions.

Law and Religion in Pluralistic Societies

6. As long as there was a close connection between state and religion in the most diverse societies, no real contradiction existed between religious law and state law. Rather, religious law formed broad parts of state law. In Central Europe, ecclesiastical marriage law, for example, was at the same time state law. In democratic Israel, this area is subject, to this day, to the respective instances of the religions represented there. The separation of church and state, that is, of organized common entities and religion, is rather a modern, Western development of the past two hundred years. Despite all conflicts, this jurisprudence could be allowed the churches partly because the 'secular' law of modern Western states is broadly religious, that is, is 'scored' by Christianity. The Christian religion was able to assert its rule as a vessel of culture even without direct connection to the state.

Islamic Societies

In Islamic societies, on the other hand, a reverse process is currently to be observed. The Muslim states, including the Ottoman Empire, had always been characterized by the interweaving of the state and Islam, and the discharge of Islam from state structures (except in Turkey) occurred under the pressure of the European colonial powers. But, in parallel fashion with a growing Islamic self-awareness, after the ending of colonial dependency, a renewed empowerment of the state through religion is occurring. This process is first of all to be appraised as an expression of the prevailing culture as it regains its sovereignty. Here, all Islamic countries have constitutions, or similar documents of law constituting the state system, which determine Islam as the state religion only in a few instances; instead, frequently—with reference to sura 2:256 ("Be there no compulsion in belief")—they pledge freedom of religion. At the same time, in the Islamic state juridical system, great importance attaches to symbolic acts (e.g., the prescription that the highest government official must be of the Islamic faith), pre-positive values that determine the constitution or similar document (e.g., an Islamic understanding of family), or the concept of 'consultation' (shura) on the legislation through Islam, either in institutionalized form, or as a principle permeating the discrete laws. Even in today's Islamic juridical systems, there are approaches that at least limit the validity of the Sharia as they do that of all prevailing state law; thus, diverse conceptions frequently prevail there, especially in Islamic countries, as to how the Sharia is to be applied in concrete cases.

Eastern Europe

A similar development is to be observed in the former socialist states of Eastern Europe. Here again, traditional—Christian—churches seek empowerment under the auspices of the state, and to reclaim an erstwhile precedence over state law.

Western Europe and America

In the case of Western Europe and America, one sees that the constitutionally protected freedom of religion and separation of church and state has not led to the equality of the Christian religious communities with other associations on the level of law. The Christian communities do hold numerous privileges, and/or are in a position to assert or demand a privileged position, although the juridical structure of the position of the religions is regulated from state to state with the highest degree of variation. In the United States, the evangelical movement has tried to having creationism taught instead of evolution. Religious communities have the right to legislate for their organizations (e.g., with respect to law for the structuring and implementation of religious services), and to establish a judicial accountability of their own, independently of state law, and this not only in Germany, where the special position of the religious communities—read, the churches—is secured by the Constitution. Even in the case where, under the principle of subsidiarity, church organizations perform state tasks, their own personnel are in place (e.g., in kindergartens, hospitals), and are supported financially by the state, and these institutions have the right to restrict employment to members of their own community ('tendential management'). When juridical quantities are to be counterbalanced, religious claims are usually assigned priority. By subsuming bell-ringing under the principle of religious freedom, as well as through the acknowledgment of the cultural position of the Christian religion, the law of noise or other pollution finds no application. Members who practice spiritual professions are exempt from duties incumbent on ordinary citizens (e.g., the obligation of giving legal testimony, exemption from military service).

As long as it is supported by a social consensus, this privileged position is conflict-free. However, when other religions appear on the public scene, the consensus becomes questionable. The position of the churches in the state is fixed by legal norms referring not only to the churches, but to religious societies across the board. Thus, the right to preach in public places, without attention to the commercial right of way and obstruction of traffic, is obviously valid for all religious communities and not only for the churches, just as the slaughter of cattle according to Jewish ritual is allowed, for Jews, even though it contravenes animal protection laws. But since law applying to the religions is general law, newly appearing communities, such as Islam in Germany, or new religions, likewise seek to lay claim to these privileged juridical positions. Recent examples for Germany are attempts on the part of Buddhist groups, as well as of new religions or particular Christian communities, to receive the status of a corporation of public right, or the confrontations over Islamic religious instruction in public schools, or the demand on the part of the members of a mosque for a public muezzin call, or conflicts over the right to a certain height of minarets on mosques, or to permission for the construction of Buddhist and Hindu temples.

These recent conflicts, of which there are similar examples in other countries, show that the juridical shaping of relations between religious communities and state, as well as of the position of the religious communities in society, either is not practically applicable in the situation of a multicultural and multi-religious society, or else admits of a situation for which no societal consensus as yet exists. Conflicts arise over law without law being able satisfactorily to perform its functions of pacification or the shaping of social relations. For instance, when advocates of the muezzin call appeal to positive constitutional law (principle of equality and freedom of religious practice), opponents argue with pre-positive principles of Christian culture in Western Europe. The foundational instances adduced by the parties to the conflict for their interpretation of the law are not identical. A demand for equality of rights is opposed by defense from foreign beliefs. The legality of the right to the muezzin call clashes with its legitimacy to the mind of the majority of society, because the necessary acceptance is lacking in society for the consequences emerging from this application of the law. Ultimately, new conflicts in a pluralistic situation can almost never be solved by law, and therefore break out again elsewhere. This repeated dispute, in turn, would threaten the texture of society, which rests, not least of all, on the principle of a universal extension of the validity of law.

Literature

Baird, Robert D. (ed.), Religion and Law in Independent India, New Delhi 1993; Berman, Harold J., Faith and Order: The Reconciliation of Law and Religion, Atlanta 1993; Idem, Law and Revolution, vol. I: The Formation of the Western Legal Tradition, Cambridge 1983; vol. II: The Impact of the Protestant Reformations on the Western Legal Tradition, Cambridge 2003; Broyde, Michael J., The Pursuit of Justice and Jewish Law: Halakhic Perspectives on the Legal Profession, New York 1996; Ebert, Hans-Georg, "Islam und šarī'a in den Verfassungen arabischer Länder," in: Zeitschrift für Religionswissenschaft 6 (1998), 3-21; Ferrari, Silvio et al. (eds.), Law and Religion in Post-Communist Europe, Leuven 2003; Edge, Peter/Harvey, Graham (eds.), Law and Religion in Contemporary Society: Communities, Individualism and the State, Aldershot 2000; Luhmann, Niklas, Rechtssoziologie, Opladen 1983; Potz, Richard/Wieshaider, Wolfgang, Islam and the European Union, Leuven 2004; Radan, Peter et al. (eds.), Law and Religion: God, the State and the Common Law, London 2005; Ramadan, Said, Islamic Law: Its Scope and Equity, London 1961; Richardson, James T. (ed.), Regulating Religion: Case Studies from Around the Globe, New York etc. 2004; Sullivan, Winnifred Fallers, Paying the Words Extra: Religious Discourse in the Supreme Court of the United States, Cambridge 1994; Tierney, Brian, Religion, Law, and the Growth of Constitutional Thought, 1150–1650, Cambridge 1982; Witte, John, Jr., Law and Protestantism: The Legal Teachings of the Lutheran Reformation, Cambridge 2002.

→ Capital Punishment/Execution, Church, Constitution, Fatwa, Freedom of Religion, Human Rights, Inquisition, Penance/Penitent, Tolerance

Steffen Rink

Liberation Theology

Socio-Historical Connection

1. Liberation theology, or 'the theology of liberation,' is the first comprehensive theological movement within the Christian churches that has reacted to the social relations of the so-called Third World and sought to alter them with the help of the Christian faith—even in revolutionary activity. It stands in close connection with the social and historical development of Latin America (→ South America; Central America).

Its appearance in the mid-1960s was no coincidence. This decade saw international capital begin to gain an ever more solid foothold in Latin America. A process of economic monopolization emerged (mines, plantations), with an enormous concentration of wealth in the hands of capitalists and large landowners. Neo-Fascist regimes sprang up everywhere, under Castelo Branco in Brazil (1964), Hugo Banzer in Bolivia (1971), and Augusto Pinochet in Chile (1973). Their policies, directed toward the further growth of the proprietary privileges of the ruling classes, and of the international, preponderantly North American, companies connected with them, led Latin America into more and more politico-social polarization and radicalization. Now proletariatized industrial workers, landless peasants, students, and various groups on the left arose in protest. Beginning in the late 1950s, guerrilla movements sprang up in Cuba, Colombia, El Salvador, Nicaragua, and Chile. Lengthy civil wars were often kindled, whose helpless victims were generally the civilian population. Dictatorial regimes countered opposition groups, of whom more and more members were committed Christians, by violent repression.

Latin American Liberation Theologians

Leonardo Boff—Born in 1938 in Concórdia, Brazil, he studied theology in Brazil and Germany. Boff has contributed as much to the development and deepening of the theology of liberation as to reflection on the Christian faith in general. He was the first Latin American theologian to develop a Christology from a viewpoint of social criticism. In 1985, the Vatican imposed a one-year injunction of silence on him. In 1992 he surrendered his priestly status.

Hélder Câmara—Born in 1909 in Fortaleza, Brazil. 1964–1985: Archbishop of Recife and Olinda, in the Brazilian Northeast. Because of his political commitment, Câmara was persecuted by the military regime: "If I give a poor person a piece of bread, I'm regarded as a saint. But if I show the poor and impoverished people why they have no bread, I'm treated like a Communist."

Ernesto Cardenal—Born in 1925. Sacerdotal ordination, 1965. Priestly status suspended, 1985. 1963: Founding of the "basic community" of Solentiname. 1979–1990: Minister of Culture under the Sandinista revolutionary regime in Nicaragua.

Enrique Dussel—born in 1934 in Mendoza, Argentina. Studied theology and philosophy in Madrid and Paris. Currently in Mexico City: Professor of Ethics, History of Theology, and, intended as a new interpretation from the viewpoint of the poor, Latin American Church History. For Dussel, the poor return a verdict on history: they are the criterion of objectivity.

Gustavo Gutiérrez, "Father of Liberation Theology"—Born 1928 in Lima, Peru. Studied philosophy and psychology in Louvain (Belgium), theology in Lyon (France). Currently Professor of Theology and Social Sciences at the Catholic University in Lima. Taking his point of departure in a perceived insufficiency of a purely speculative theology, he developed his reflections on the method and function of theology in a situation of rule and dependency. Gutiérrez claims that theology is always pastoral theology, and therefore practical theology. By "liberation," he understands a complex process: (1) liberation from a situation of injustice and exploitation; (2) elimination of all that prevents the human being from reaching full development; and (3) liberation or deliverance from sin, from persons' sundered relationship with one another and with God.

Jon Sobrino—Born in 1938 in the Basque country of Spain, but Salvadoran citizen. Diploma in Engineering. Licentiate of Philosophy and Doctor of Theology (Frankfurt). Currently Professor of Theology at José Simeon de Canas Central American University, San Salvador. Next to Boff, has contributed most to Christology in Liberation Theology.

Camilo Torres, 1929–1966 (executed by firing squad). 1954–1965, Catholic priest. Mid-1960s, joined Guerrilla movement in Colombia.

Theology of Liberation in the Catholic Church

2. Owing to the influence of the Second Vatican council (1962–1965), convoked by Pope John XXIII, the Church underwent a process of renewal that has led to a new pastoral practice. At the same time, a transformation in certain church groups in Latin America occurred, as these moved to new social engagement. This meant a breach with the traditional role of the Latin American church as the defender of social stability. The members of these groups belonged primarily to the Catholic Action movement (in Port., Açao Católica). The persons involved were primarily priests and bishops, students and young workers, who fought for social change. Catholic Action was one of the most important roots of the theology of liberation at the end of the 1950s and beginning of the 1960s in Brazil. Liberation theology's triple methodological step—"see, judge, act"—was undoubtedly the most important element taken over from Catholic Action.

The two General Assemblies of the Latin American bishops at Medellín, Colombia, from August 24 to September 6, 1968, and at Puebla, Mexico, from January 28 to February 13, 1979, were decisive for the temporary success of liberation theology in the 1950s and 1960s. The new self-concept of the Latin American church as a 'church from below' here took hold at the pinnacle of the ecclesiastical hierarchy. With the accession of John Paul II, in 1978, a systematic campaign was undertaken by the Vatican against the representatives of the theology of liberation. In particular, Brazilian theologian Leonardo Boff was the object of sanctions, as, in the opinion of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, he had adopted the Marxist theory of class struggle.

Practice

3. The theology of liberation can only be understood in association with the politicization of the popular movements and the church of Latin America. It is a theology of critical reflection on historical practice: from a point of departure in the factual social relations of power, Christians 'ought to take sides' with the disadvantaged, the exploited, and the persecuted. The Latin American Church has begun an epoch-making renewal in this direction. In many countries of Latin America, representatives of the theology of liberation have promoted the formation of small communities in which the individual is respected, and where problems that arise can be dealt with in democratic fashion by the groups themselves. These "basic communities" (in Span., Comunidades de base) have arisen all over Latin America.

Owing to the influence of liberation theology, the Catholic Church has also acknowledged various elements of African and Indian culture still very much alive in South America.

4. Since the demise of the military dictatorships, liberation theology remains as alive as ever. True, neo-liberalist regimes have improved the economic condition of many countries. And yet, poverty, 'structural injustice,' and exploitation are still often the order of the day, and with these, grounds for the role of (the Christian) religion in social protest, as well.

Literature

Boff, Leonardo, Introducing Liberation Theology, Maryknoll 1987; Cadorette, Curt et al. (eds.), Liberation Theology: An Introductory Reader, New York 1992; Cummings, George C. L., A Common Journey: Black Theology (USA) and Latin American Liberation Theology, Maryknoll 1993; Ellacuria, I./Sobrino, J. (eds.), Mysterium Liberationis: Fundamental Concepts of Liberation Theology, Maryknoll 1993; Finson, Shelley D. (ed.), Women and Religion: A Bibliographic Guide to Christian Feminist Liberation Theology, Toronto 1991; Fornet-Betancourt, Raúl, Befreiungstheologie, 3 vols., Mainz 1997; Hopkins, Dwight N., Introducing Black Theology of Liberation, Maryknoll 1999; Musto, Ronald G., Liberation Theologies: A Research Guide, New York 1991.

→ Capitalism, Catholicism, Central America, Ethics/Morals, South America, Theology

Claudio Mattes

Life Cycle

1. The concept of the life cycle refers to a socially regulated succession of life phases, that are divided from one another and articulated by 'typical' life events. 'Cyclical' therefore refers not to repetitions of phases or events in the life course of the individual, but to the collectively recurring succession of life phases and events. Which life events are typically regarded as being those of the life cycle varies from one society to another. An obviously universal character as life-cycle happenings attaches to → marriage, or to the → birth of children. The death of one's parents as well, or of one's marriage partner, might be listed among them. In modern industrial societies, characteristic transitions between segments would be, for example, the beginning of one's education, or of one's professional employment, graduation from school and the beginning of one's professional activity, and the transition to retirement. Where they coincided, the conclusion of a formal education and the beginning of professional employment usually marked the transition to adulthood, while entry into retirement is regularly regarded as initiating the phase of old age.

Life events seen as key in a society, and the transitions between life segments marked by these events, are socially institutionalized, and, as a rule, are accompanied by → rituals, which in many respects recall the → rites of passage celebrated in tribal societies. With the ritualization of transitions in lifestyle, an important role accrues to the religions. At times, however, rites of passage are preserved in a religious context whose original existential rooting has long since been lost. An example of this would be confirmation in Christian churches. In tribal societies, besides the ritual accompaniment of marriage, birth, and death, there are rites of initiation, during adolescence, that, as van Gennep has put it, have the function of discharging initiands from the asexual world and grouping them by gender (→ Sexuality).[1]

2. In most modern Western societies, the ritual accompaniment of the passages of the life cycle is a principal area of concern for the Christian churches. But competition is being increasingly offered by secular providers. In the mid-1990s, the Berlin Community of Jesus Christ, Inc., also known under the name of the Boston Church of Christ, aroused attention by offering young couples practicing neither Protestantism nor Catholicism the option of celebrating their wedding in one of the church buildings used by the group and antecedently de-consecrated by the Evangelical Church. The Evangelical Church in Berlin criticized this offer with unwonted harshness, as a church wedding seemed to require the actual membership of at least one of the partners. With striking transparency, this conflict points up the growth of the struggle maintained by groups of divergent worldviews over the form of the transitions of the life cycle—a form that, as late as the 1980s, was still an extensive monopoly of the Evangelical and Catholic Churches. Especially in large cities, secular providers and religious minorities now compete with both of these large Christian churches. Of course, this example evinces the continuing attractiveness of rites of the life cycle among the general population.

Life Cycle, Family Cycle, Employment Cycle

3. Especially at the transitions of the life cycle, there is obviously a need for symbol and reflection. At the same time, societies ensure the social attachment of the couple or family—precisely through the ritualization of transitions of the family cycle, especially in the rituals of marriage and → baptism. Most of the great religious communities have created rituals for the key transitions of the life cycle (birth, adolescence, marriage, death). These rituals bear a strong orientation to the family cycle, as well as to biological and sexual development. Scarcely, however, is there an orientation to the transitions of the life cycle like that gone through by most persons today—and, to a high degree, standardized (transitions of formation and employment, such as the beginning of schooling or retirement). A historical juncture with the end of schooling and transition to adulthood is indicated by the celebration of confirmation, going back to the Reformation, and remaining a firm piece of piety in the Evangelical churches since the seventeenth century. Catholics have their confirmation, with its origins in ancient times; Jews have the bar mitzvah celebration (bat mitzvah for girls[2]), and there is the Socialist youth dedication. To be sure, with today's expansion of the years of youth into a span of 'teen age,' these celebrations are scarcely key any longer, and have lost their one-time rootedness in the life cycle. Surveys of participants of these festivals betray an uncertainty with regard to their function in the life cycle: children experience them as marking not a transition to adulthood, but to youth. Their experience is mainly that of coming before parents and the larger society precisely as youth, and of gaining acknowledgement in the eyes of the adult generation.

Great importance, however, continues to attach to the accompaniment, in religious ritual, of birth, marriage, and death. In Germany, the essential suppliers in this field are the Evangelical and Catholic churches. Especially in the 1950s and 1960s, the entire population was de facto integrated into the church rites at these transitions, and even in the 1980s, the ritual monopoly of the Christian churches was by and large retained. Granted, certain tendencies to dissolution were reinforced, especially in the 1990s in large cities. Thus, in 1994, only half of those couples of whom at least one partner belonged to a Christian church were still married in church. Baptism was less affected: nine out of ten couples of whom at least one partner was Evangelical or Catholic had their children baptized, although a certain tendency to have the baptism postponed is observable.[3]

In Eastern Germany, in the wake of state repression of the Christian churches, a drastic diminution occurred in the number of baptisms, confirmations, and church weddings. As a result of the massive anti-church policy of the Socialist government, along with strong propaganda in favor of secular youth dedication, the celebration of confirmation was successfully repressed and replaced. After the unification of the two German states, interest in Christian ritual administration did increase to some extent, but youth dedication as a secular rite of passage has continued as a strong competitor.

Motives and Needs of Believers

Generally speaking, when church members are asked what personal profit they draw from their church membership, they assign great importance to the rites of passage. In 1995, 57% of Catholic and 58% of Evangelical church members asserted that it was of key meaning to them "that important events in life can be celebrated in church ritual, e.g., marriage, baptism."[4] A ritual accompaniment of life is today the essential basis of church membership on the part of many believers.

New Family Orientation

Correspondingly, a greater 'family insertion' of church rites is an observable phenomenon.[5] Especially baptism, but also confirmation, is increasingly celebrated primarily as a family celebration. In a representative survey of religious attitudes in Switzerland,[6] in which various types of church attachment were investigated, most often, corresponding to the type of motivation on the part of the 'clientele,' about one-third of the latter represented themselves as members for whom a church celebration of rites of transition is important. Their attachment to the church is overwhelmingly characterized by a relationship of observance and nonobservance. Here, the particular form taken by church observance of the transitions of the life cycle is the most important contribution expected from the Church. From this motivation, specific problems result for the churches, inasmuch as theological questions, and reference to → transcendence, in this form of church attachment are of altogether secondary importance. At the same time, however, a sensitivity of the churches renders this development plausible, when groups representing other worldviews offer ritual observance of the life cycle, thereby opening up the opportunity of escaping the heretofore generally valid premise of church membership.

Allegorizations and Models

4. a) As precursor of the concept of the life cycle, diverse manners of dividing a human life into periods can be observed, and this since ancient times. Among the oldest is a division of life into four 'ages,' in correspondence with the four seasons of the year: (e.g., child, youth, adult, elderly). Another is one of seven ages, corresponding to the seven planets or days of the week. In the Middle Ages, 'wheels of fortune' suggested wheels of life: cyclical orderings of a person's life phases, with Christ, for instance, or else death, in the middle. Wheels of life were often characterized by a moralization of life, in which, along with its phases, models of a successful—or unsuccessful—life could be represented. This moralization often took advantage of religious admonitions that underscored a distinction of the right and the wrong transit of the stages of life, and warned of the transience of life itself. In the sixteenth century, the first images of steps of age appear, usually showing the life of a person in ten steps, as an ascent from the cradle to the pinnacle of life, posited at the age of fifty years, and finally as a descent to the grave. Especially in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, these presentations appeared on picture sheets, and were broadly popularized. In the same centuries, a presentation of the various 'ages of life' was connected with typical life events, with an orientation of these ages for women (to the family cycle) and men (to the life of employment besides). The construction of the steps, more or less simplified, follows a schema by ten-year intervals, with rhymed designations.[7]

These presentations are highly typified and idealized, supported by the vehicle of a linear, step-by-step life course. What is traced here are often not only ideal images of a middle-class life (or of its extreme antithesis, an existence that has met with catastrophe), but also the gradual progress of one's life to old age as an idealization, standing in contradiction with the reality of life in our present era. Especially when the stages of life were first introduced into the cultural consciousness, the step-by-step progress of life to the ninetieth or one-hundredth year of one's age was the absolute exception: more likely, death would intervene at an earlier age.

The Twentieth Century

b) Only in the twentieth century has mortality been postponed, in consequence of medical therapy and improved nutrition. Now the models of life stages by age could actually become a reasonable model for a life and family cycle.[8] With this general postponement of death to old age, and with the extensive temporal standardization of life events—such as entry into school, beginning of employment, marriage, birth of one's first child, and so on—the basis for the modern model of a life cycle appears that can be regarded as a general pattern, and that need not have (as with the stages of life outlined at the beginning of modern times) a primarily moralizing character. Of course, these steps produce necessary conceptualizations of a chronologically ordered 'normal life course.' Inasmuch as a long life has become the normal expectation, the early occurrence of a death, for instance, works precisely all the more unsettling an effect in us.

Present: De-standardization of the Life Cycle

c) Since the 1960s, in the United States and in many European countries, a certain 'de-standardization' of the life cycle is to be observed. For one thing, a more lengthy education frequently drafts a different map of the course of life: many postpone committing themselves to full-time employment, and in that case, usually to having a family as well. The transition to the married state is still usually accompanied by falling in love. Divorce, often with remarriage, is more and more likely today, especially with the younger generation (→ Marriage/Divorce). To boot, alternatives to marriage are more and more regarded as legitimate, such as cohabitation without marriage, or even life as a 'single,' both usually temporally limited, but in many cases permanent. Cohabitation of homosexual couples has become a publicly observed phenomenon. But as life trajectories multiply, and produce new life transitions, there also arises a need for new forms of ritualization. As an example of the development of new rituals, one may cite the blessing of homosexual couples, modeled on marriage ceremonies and practiced by many church officials, even though they are not recognized as official ritual (→ Homosexuality/Homoeroticism).

Rites of the Life Cycle in Comparative Religions

5. Rites at the transitions of the life cycle are found in most religions. They are not always ritually framed for the same events, however. Most Christian religious communities, as well as Judaism, celebrate rituals a short time after birth: baptism in Christianity, → circumcision of male children in Judaism. In the Islamic context, although it is not mentioned in the Qur'an, circumcision is traditionally practiced with older children; here, the moment is frequently postponed, not least of all because it is regularly accompanied by a large celebration, entailing costs for the family. The ceremony symbolically marks the child's transition from the immediate society of the mother to that of the father.

Rites during adolescence are celebrated in Christian churches as confirmation, and in Judaism as the bar mitzvah or bat mitzvah. In industrial countries, rituals at this stage of life are very often omitted.

In almost all world religions, there are more or less elaborate and determined rituals for the celebration of marriage and funerals. While, in Buddhism, marriage is regarded as a secular event (although often accompanied by a blessing), in Catholicism it is accorded the status of a sacrament.

Newly Invented Rituals

But rituals of the life cycle are not simply universally present and unchangeable. New developments can occasion the invention of new rituals. One example is the Buddhist misuko kuyo ritual in Japan, observed in memory of aborted fetuses or stillborn or short-lived infants. In its current form, it arose in the mid-1960s,[9] and has since then been frequently employed by women who have secured an → abortion (with plate). This example shows how, under certain conditions, new forms of ritualization can be developed that implicitly indicate altered transitions in the life cycle.

6. The concept of the life cycle indicates universal sequences in the human being's natural aging and development process. It also indicates how this process is divided in particular social and cultural connections, is translated into institutionalized rules and procedures of transition, and is accompanied by ritual. On the other hand, the life cycle comprises a series of historically specific, socially standardized transitions closely bound up with institutions of work and formation, and only secondarily transmitted with the natural aging process. However, these transitions are doubtless more decisive today for what marks age or aging in our society than are the transitions to puberty, the married state, or parenthood. To the extent that the orientation of the great world religions is primarily to the classic passages of birth, marriage, and death, so that what is expected by the members of these religious organizations is precisely the ritualization of these passages, there is a tendency to neglect them on the part of persons whose life no longer runs along the tracks of a traditional life cycle: they do not marry, or they have no children, they divorce, or live unmarried for a long time. With the new, strong family emphasis in ritual, then, the orientation of religious communities to a traditional life and family cycle is growing stronger precisely at a time at which this cycle is caught up in the most change. Thus, from the side of the great religious communities, little ritual opportunity is meaningfully available to persons with 'atypical' life courses, and, accordingly, having other interests with respect to interpretation and symbolization. But precisely these groups have a special need of biographical reflection, since they frequently cannot 'find themselves' in the chronology of the traditional life cycle, and therefore find it difficult to relate to the symbolical life traditionally surrounding this cycle. Granted, recent times have seen more opportunities for ritual celebration along the course of these less usual patterns of life transition, both within and without the great religious communities. Feminist theological groups, for instance, often conduct experiments geared to the accompaniment of life transitions in ritual terms that until now have been excluded from the canon of rituals. But it is precisely the new religious, 'New Age,' or therapeutic groups, that frequently make their offers on these counts, and shift a concern with one's own biography into the center of religious consideration. In this connection, one is struck by the accentuation in feminist groups on gender-specific transitions in the life cycle, such as a ritual accompaniment of the onset of menopause.

1. See Van Gennep 1961.
2. The Bat Mitzvah celebration for girls appeared only in the nineteenth century, at the hands of Reform Judaism, and points both to mutual influences among the various religions, and to alterations in the area of gender relationships.
3. Ebertz 1998, 65.
4. Emnid: Was glauben die Deutschen? Vol. of tables, Bielefeld 1997, 73.
5. Ebertz 1998, 85.
6. Dubach, Alfred, "Bindungsfähigkeit der Kirchen," in Dubach, Alfred/Campiche, Roland J. (eds.), Jeder ein Sonderfall? Religion in der Schweiz, Zurich 1993, 133-172.
7. Die Lebenstreppe. Bilder der menschlichen Lebensalter (Schriften des Rheinischen Museumsamtes Nr. 23), Cologne n.d., 141.
8. Cf. Kohli 1985.
9. Smith, Bardwell, "Buddhism and Abortion in Contemporary Japan: Mizuko Kuyo and the Confrontation with Death," in Cabezón, José Ignazio (ed.), Buddhism, Sexuality and Gender, New York 1992, 65-89.

Literature

Conger, Rand D. (ed.), Continuity and Change in Family Relations: Theory, Methods, and Empirical Findings, Mahwah 2004; Cressy, David, Birth, Marriage, and Death: Ritual, Religion, and the Life-Cycle in Tudor and Stuart England, Oxford 1997; Crockett, Lisa J. (ed.), Agency, Motivation, and the Life Course, Lincoln 2002; Ebertz, Michael, Kirche im Gegenwind. Zum Umbruch der religiösen Landschaft, Freiburg [2]1998; Erikson, Erik H., the Life Cycle Completed, New York 1997; Gabriel, Karl, Christentum zwischen Tradition und Postmoderne, Freiburg [4]1994; Giele, Janet Zollinger/Holst, Elke (eds.), Changing Life Patterns in Western Industrial Societies, Amsterdam 2004; Hockey, Jenny/James, Allison, Social Identities across the Life Course, Basingstoke 2003; Kohli, Martin, "Die Institutionalisierung des Lebenslaufs. Historische Befunde und theoretische Argumente," in: Kölner Zeitschrift für Soziologie und Sozialpsychologie 37 (1985), 1-29; Idem (ed.), Soziologie des Lebenslaufs, Darmstadt 1978; Moran, Gerald F./Vinovskis, Maris A., Religion, Family, and the Life Course: Explorations in the Social History of Early America, Ann Arbor 1992; van Gennep, Arnold, The Rites of Passage, Chicago 1961.

→ Birth, Death and Dying, Family/Kinship/Genealogy, Homosexuality/Homoeroticism, Initiation, Marriage/Divorce, Rites of Passage, Ritual, Sexuality

Monika Wohlrab-Sahr

Light / Enlightenment

Physical Light and Luminous Bodies (Sun, Moon, Stars)

1. Light—the basic condition of organic life on earth: without light, there can be no photosynthesis, no food chain supplying the needs of the human being. The sun is the source of light par excellence, a mighty nuclear fusion reactor, transforming hydrogen to helium and streaming its energy on earth and moon. Light, as today's physics understands it, is electromagnetic radiation. But for denizens of earth, light is mainly an overwhelming experience—whether sunlight, fire, or lamp bulb. Light imparts warmth; light alone makes it possible to exercise the sense of sight, brings colors to their brilliance. Deprivation of light can lead to a deterioration of one's sensitivity and feelings to the point of depression (serotonin deficiency). It is not to be wondered at, then, that, as concrete phenomenon as well as metaphor, or as model and medium of knowledge, in many religions light is a key 'medium of presentation' (D. Bremer), in worship, doctrine, and mythology.

Here, a quadruple distinction is to be made:

(1) Sensory light stimulation, received from without by the eyes as organs of perception and represented physiologically in the central nervous system, can be introduced as stimulation in worship ('bright-dark-reflexes,' often staged in sacred drama; → Mysteries; Sacred Drama).

(2) Psychophysical light phenomena are produced by the body itself (e.g. endorphin secretion) in certain states of consciousness, during ecstatic religious techniques (→ Meditation; Intoxication/Drugs/Hallucinogens), or in extreme corporeal states such as near-death experiences, and, to some extent, projected into the external world.

(3) Light symbolics describe God, the absolute, or spiritual beings, mythically (as aural or diaphanous 'beings of light,' with aura or halo, or as an 'astral body') or metaphorically, by means of the elementary interpretational pattern of 'light,' where, by way of theological models, special qualities of physical light are characterized, such as purity, swiftness, invisibility or inconceivability, or 'abstractness.'

(4) Metaphysics of light, speculatively sketch light—on a Platonic model—as the cause and medium of knowledge ('theory of illumination': Augustine, R. Grosseteste).

Light and Fire in Ritual

2. Light can be artificially, culturally generated: by fire. This discovery is one of humanity's greatest. Indeed, as the myth of Prometheus testifies, it ranks as the basic condition of human culture. The invention of lights, torches, oil lamps, and candles broadened ritual opportunities, and, down to the present day, has standardized them. In the Abrahamic religions—unlike the Brahmanic Vedic cults—open fire plays no cultic role. But candles, lamps, and, today—beginning in the twentieth century—electric light are part of the basic paraphernalia of worship in these religions. Here, sacred drama obviously stages presentations, effects, and symbols of light that are simple to perceive and appreciate, as follows:

(1) Contrariety and alternation of dark and bright obtains when, in the Catholic liturgy, Easter candles are lighted as a symbol of the Resurrection; or when, in ancient Greek Eleusis, the 'view' (in Gk., epópteia) of the cultic event was presented with bright/dark effects (→ Mysteries); or when—especially in the Eastern churches—baptism is understood as a 'flaring' or 'kindling' of the 'light of faith' (in Gk., photismós).

(2) Presentation of duration, even of eternity, occurs when an 'eternal light' burns to indicate the permanent presence of a god (Lev 24:1-4; in Catholic churches even today; cf. the eternal hearth of Vesta in ancient Rome).

(3) Festivity and gladness are shown in the 'life element of light,' as in the fires of Easter and the solstice.

(4) Purifying, hygienically disinfecting quality of fire, is used in magic rituals as in the Catholic 'Saint Blaise blessing' (February 3, Feast of Saint Blaise; two burning candles are laid crosswise against the throat as a protection against diseases of the throat; → Purification/Hygiene/Bodily Grooming); then, preferably, the purified don white garments and walk about or leave the sacred area (as in Zoroastrianism).

(5) The opportunity of directing light and refraction of colors through architectural provisions, may produce virtuosic effects of illumination: as sunlight falling through Gothic stained glass, especially the 'rose window'; or ingenious architectural arrangements that employ astronomic calculations in order to direct a ray of the sun into the center of a sacred edifice at a particular point in time (→ Orientation); or even the 'light dome'—making use of anti-aircraft-guns' searchlights—over the Nuremberg celebrations of the Third Reich.

(6) Finally, powerful rows of light are created when thousands of torches, lights, or other lighted or burning objects are held aloft by a mass of persons, in the Lourdes light-procession, in admiration of and homage to pop stars (→ Idol; Hero/Heroism; Veneration of Persons/Personality Cult), or in demonstrations by the peace movement.

Light and Dark in Mythology and Ethics

3. Lights are also the preferred paraphernalia for the accompaniment of gods and spirits: they appear in light (Dionysus in Euripides's "The Bacchae," vv. 1017, 1082–1083), or in a pillar of fire (YHWH; Exod 13:21-22; cf. Exod 3:2-6) (→ Epiphany), are equated with the elementary light-sources of the sun (ancient Greek Helios, Egyptian Re) and lightning (ancient Indian Agni). Their dwelling places are light, or filled with light: "Ye are transformed to light above, ye hallowed genii," we read of the denizens of Olympus in Hölderlin's classic mythology.[1] The Second Person of the Trinitarian God is "Light from Light" in the Nicaeo-Constantinopolitan (→ Profession of Faith), and the Son appears with a halo, as do Greek Helios and Roman Sol-Apollo, an accoutrement of angels and saints as well since the sixth century, with their celestial nimbus of light. Today's 'aura' or 'halo photography' claims to have shown spiritual energies with technical apparatus. → Angels too, and other spiritual or composite beings often appear in and by means of light, fire, or white as the color of light. Generalized as 'beings of light,' they populate modern → esotericism, which seeks to learn from them, and to ascend to them through 'light work.'

As day follows the night, so also many mythologies set 'dark' gods over against the 'bright' divinities of light: gods of the lower world, of death, of the anti-divine worlds. According to a polarized—and popular—black-and-white schema, the world, indeed the entire cosmos, is divided into two opposing realms, with likewise contrary mythic personnel. This sort of → dualism when it comes to world images is especially well known from ancient Persia, where Zoroastrian Zurvanism set the light divinity Ohrmazd over against dark Ahriman (→ Zoroastrianism). The same dualism found its expression, more or less officially, into many religions: in Christian popular theology, God is opposed to the 'Adversary,' Satan (→ Devil). And so, figures and messengers of light that traverse 'earth' to gather up the 'parts' of light that have fallen into 'matter,' and to lead them back once more to the light, impregnate many doctrines of redemption, especially those of the tradition of → Gnosticism. Of course, since the invention of gas lighting and electricity in the nineteenth century, the artificial illumination by street lights and neon signs in center city and residential areas have forced night, darkness, and shadow to forfeit much of their hostile power.

It is only a short step from a cosmological opposition between 'bright' and 'dark' to the ethical dualism of 'good' and 'evil.' Members of the primitive Christian communities saw themselves as the good 'children of light' (Eph 5:8, 1 Thess 5:5), lifted and raised out of a dark, corrupted environment. So do today's rigoristic fundamentalist groups that militate against the 'Kingdom of Darkness' (in Moscow, Baghdad, or Washington, and so on), or, in fantasy, in the racist paraphrases of J. R. R. Tolkien's fantasy epic Lord of the Rings (3 vols., 1954–1955), where aristocratic white 'light elves' fight with evil, black 'Orcs.'

Enlightenment: Light as Inner Experience

Maharishi Mashesh Yogi happily proclaimed the beginning of the 'Age of Enlightenment' on January 12, 1975, among the followers of Transcendental Meditation (TM). Exactly one year later, at the same location, at Lake Lucerne, with an alphorn, the accompanying 'World Government' was proclaimed. The purpose of the latter was no less than to "develop the full potential of the

4. Is it astonishing that, in European cultural history, light is the model of one of the most important of spiritual experiences, that of knowledge, or 'new thought'? Here, the 'lightning-like' illumination of knowledge (Plato), whereby all becomes 'clear and distinct' (Descartes), is the utopian goal of intellectual work and mystical striving alike. The 'illuminatio' forms a suggestive intellectual myth which is the heir of an ancient and widespread tradition—in the philosophical metaphysics of light since Plato, in the theological theory of illumination, and in Christian and Islamic mysticism. Common to all of these conceptualizations and theories is a model whose orientation is at once to the sun and to the human perception of light. To know, then, is an event of outpouring and reception of light, respectively, between one source of light—the divine itself conceived as sunlike (lumen supranaturale = 'light of revelation'), and an inward light of the human being, 'natural light' (lumen naturale), or 'beams' of reason and understanding, that can see truth with the 'eyes of the mind' or 'soul.' The underlying notion here is that the eye itself is 'sunlike' (Ger., sonnenhaft, Goethe), and therefore a source of light. Two basic variants, both rooted in Platonism, can be distinguished:

(1) The cognitivist theory of illumination, restricted to the process of knowledge (basic metaphor: the 'intelligible light' of Plato and Bonaventure), which finds its profane locus in world history in the 'Enlightenment';

(2) The mystical theory of illumination, that understands the event of knowledge as an 'ecstatic unification' (F. Wagner) of the 'inward light' of the soul with the light of the transcendent 'All-One' (Plotinus's metaphysics of light; Augustine);

The latter tradition ultimately fits enlightenment into a triple process: 'purification, enlightenment, and unification' (purgatio, illuminatio, perfectio, Dionysius the Areopagite). As imbedded in a via ethica under the latter formality, illuminatio is not the prerequisite for, but—especially in → Pietism—the result of a particular attitude of piety, bound up with demonstrative acts like conversion, → penance, and → rebirth. Enlightenment, then, can today be equated with conversion and call. This tradition is nourished by an unremitting current of mystical imagination, with its phenomena of light, visions of light, beings of light, and 'journeys into the light.' Here also we find techniques of concentration like those of Zen Buddhism (satori), or of transrational knowledge practiced as the paradoxical, spontaneous 'bolt from the blue' of an 'empty,' contentless condition of enlightenment.

5. The via illuminativa (Bonaventure) of 'enlightenment' has become suspect in today's (Protestant) theology. In the wake of the Enlightenment, the siècle des lumières (Fr., 'century of lights'), it describes enlightenment as a subjective theory of 'in-lightenment' (Ger., einleuchten, "standing to reason," cf. F. Wagner), that is, simply of comprehension. The danger of an intervention from the 'beyond' is thereby rationalistically excluded. By contrast, outside traditional theology and church, the concept is presently enjoying a surprising and unexpected surge. With all of the → charismatic movements, the waves of Buddhism, and a tenacious interest in → esotericism, scarcely any new religious movement, any weekend seminar, any illustrated periodical fails to extol the 'way to enlightenment.' After all, in the twentieth century, there are also personal life-defining experiences of enlightenment such as that of English spiritual healer Tom Johanson (b. 1919), who avers that, at noon on 5 September 1959, two days after a heavy stroke of fate: "Slowly, all around me changed to a golden flash, and I was myself the giant, lightsome sun. . . . Right after that—or was it right then?—there arose in me a feeling of infinite rejoicing, an indescribable, measureless gladness, followed by an enlightenment that I can only describe as the glory of Christ. This since then has been an inseparable part of my consciousness, and has given my life constant direction and inspiration."[2] human race, and thereby to introduce the Age of Enlightenment and lend it a lasting span." The World Government, whose sole area of activity is to be (world) consciousness, which it intends to administer, has ten ministries, according to internal planning, among them not only the 'Ministry of Education, Training, and Enlightenment,' but also the 'Ministry of All Possibilities—Research and Development' and the 'Ministry of Health and Immortality.' (Benita von Behr)

1. Hölderlin, Friedrich, "Hyperion's 'Schicksallied,'" in: Idem, Hyperion oder der Eremit in Griechenland, 1799, vol. 2, book 2, 6th letter, "Hyperion zu Bellarmin."
2. Johanson, Tom, Through Pain to Freedom, London 1987.

Literature

Böcher, Otto, "Licht und Feuer," in: Theologische Realenzyklopädie 21 (1991), 83-119; Bremer, Dieter, "Licht als universales Darstellungsmedium. Materialien und Bibliographie," in: Archiv für Begriffsgeschichte 18 (1974), 185-206; Kapstein, Matthew T. (ed.), The Presence of Light: Divine Radiance and Religious Experience, Chicago 2004; Lindberg, David C., Theories of Vision from Al-Kindi to Kepler, Chicago 1976; Olschanski, Reinhard (ed.), Licht-Ortungen. Zur Reflexion des Sichtbaren, Bodenheim 1998; Ritzke-Rutherford, Jean, Light and Darkness in Anglo-Saxon Thought and Writing, Frankfurt/M. 1979; Schivelbusch, Wolfgang, Disenchanted Night: The Industrialisation of Light in the Nineteenth Century, Oxford 1988; Wagner, Falk, "Erleuchtung," in: Theologische Realenzyklopädie 10 (1982), 164-174; Zajonc, Arthur, Catching the Light: The Entwined History of Light and Mind, New York 1993.

→ Dualism, Electricity, Enlightenment (Age of), Epiphany, Esotericism, Gnosticism, Mysticism, New Age, Perception, Vision/Auditory Experience

Hubert Mohr

Literature

Literature as the Medium of Revelation, Revelation as Form of Literature

Literature, understood in its literal meaning as written text, has always had a central function for religion in the process of revelation and → tradition. At the same time, literature has essentially been motivated and constituted by this function as well. All of the more extensive religious traditions, especially the 'revelatory religions' or the 'religions of the book' (Judaism, Christianity, Islam), are build upon processes of literary textualization. By means of these processes, literature and textuality get a historical-philological and at the same time a theological meaning for religion. In the historical-philological sense, the literary textuality constitutes religion and enables canonization (→ Canon), spreading, transmission, and transformation. In a theological sense, the scripture is considered as holy text, written in a holy language, handed down by God or a prophet, interpreted by clerics.

Consequently, religious understanding of symbolic representation may construct a distinction between a cultic and a profane figuration of text. The Egyptians, for instance, separated scripture for sacred and profane places: hieroglyphic scripture on the one hand, hieratic and demotic scripture on the other hand. As literary power became more and more an initial item of the holy, from the Pali-Canon to the Torah, this distinction was dropped, and literature as a whole complex was accepted to be the preferable medium of religious thought. Without making expansive use of literature and its mobility in space and time, revelation could never have left the sacred places, transmitted among the masses and throughout generations. Neither traditions of faith nor political entities like states would have been successfully established and kept. As a cultural phenomenon, religion thrived on the grounds of text, and thereby also adjusted itself to textual structures.

In a complementary process, literature never did content itself with being only a servant of religion, a carrier of thought, or a simple vessel for teachings. Literature always had its own (linguistic, aesthetic, rhetorical) rules and techniques, its own (cultural, political) interests and aims, and therefore also tried to utilize the sacred for its own purposes. Texts like the Tanakh (the Hebrew → Bible), the New Testament and the → Qur'an were literary strategies to carry through a certain 'theopolicy.' The Qur'an, for example, can therefore be interpreted as the establishment of a literary kingdom that equated Arab culture to that of Christians and Jews by employing religious patterns and arranging them with literary technique.

Anti-Idol and Holy Text

We can also understand the function of literary textuality in religious contexts with reference to the fundamental opposition of image and text. Whereas the image is to be seized in terms of worshipping, i.e. of being an idol and a magical device (→ Image/Iconoclasm), the initial religious function of literature is political and historical: it constitutes a community. Moreover, the text appears as an objectification of the holy that does not draw any attention to itself; it may even form a barrier against idolatry (e.g. by constructing a difference between the Egyptian and the Israelite religion in the Torah). The difference between image and text implies therefore the fundamental opposition of nature and history, of polytheism and monotheism, of magic and law. The two-dimensional letter functions as an anti-type to the three-dimensional image that God forbade humans to produce. This relationship explains the outstanding function of literature in monotheistic religions.

However, the question of the image rises also within the text on a figurative level. At first sight, religion considers literature to be an unsuspicious medium without any claims for its own, no matter how much loaded with literary images—with rhetorical and poetical tropes—a text might be. Even highly aesthetic texts as the "Song of Songs" are not considered idolatrous at all. Nevertheless, holiness cannot be separated from its figurative manifestation, mere literature gets transformed and charged under the spell of religion into 'holy texts'—texts that cannot be likened to other texts, since they are supposed to be 'inspired.' The Bible, for example, is not considered to be a conventional, profane book, but a holy text, in which divine revelation on the one hand and literary materiality and figurality on the other are interwoven. Hence, the holy text is not to be translated or changed. In Judaism, particularly in kabbalistic tradition (→ Kabbalah), the literal constitution of the Torah is directly linked to the book of the world written by God; the Torah is understood as the pattern of creation, and the letters of the (Hebrew) alphabet have a magical and theurgical power. Any translation of a holy text has therefore to legitimate itself, as for example Martin Luther did in a new iconoclasm by rejecting the magical literality of the text and holding against it the sensus, the 'spirit.'

Text and Commentary

The function of literature and textuality for religion lies not only in the metaphysical concept of the holy text, but also in its realization and actualization in space and time. The scriptural religions therefore differentiate between revelation as textual possibility and commentary as textual realization. In Jewish tradition this distinction led to the differentiation between the 'written Torah' (torah she-bik'tav) and the 'oral Torah' (torah she-be-al-peh). The latter means the process of literary transmission in space and time, which materializes in textual types as Midrash and Talmud. Literary preoccupation—reading and writing, commenting and narrating, interpreting and explaining the Bible and the Suras—turns out to be the crucial performance of religion. The textual and semiotic practice of literature shows the presence of the divine in a potentially never-ending process of reading, explaining, and narrating.

This continuous writing and hermeneutic activity of literary transmission also has a political dimension: it founds communities and secures their existence throughout forthcoming generations. The word of God, which is processed in the literal movement of the commentary, turns it into a complex communicative structure. In this sense, religion as a phenomenon of communities is essentially an effect of the literary manifestation of revelation in the process of reading and commenting. In this communicative process, techniques of reading are established, books canonized, exegetic schools built up, etc. By way of example, Judaism might then be regarded as a community legitimated and performed in a literary process, involving reader and writer in an endlessly progressing act of revelation that passes through every line, from interpreter to interpreter, from generation to generation. So the story telling—the haggadah—performs religion within a social space and time. In a similar way, Christianity can then be seen as an alternative reading community of the biblical text, as new tradition of commenting.

By developing literary strategies the commentary turns out to be aware also of the aesthetic qualities of the holy text. The commentary looks closely at the semiotic and symbolic structure of the holy text, considering the different layers of meaning not only in every portion and sentence, but also in every single word and letter, even in the white space between the words, in the hidden space behind the word. God, in this understanding, can be sought not only within a symbol (e.g. in the name), but also in the space between the symbols. Returning to the same book time after time can be understood also as an attempt to get—through the letters—to the sphere 'beyond' scripture. This emphatic linguistic consciousness is characteristic especially of mystical theologies (as → Kabbalah, → Sufism, Christian → mysticism, → Buddhism); it brings the mystical commentary close to the aesthetic practices of literature. In all kinds of mysticism, the religious experience is definitely bound to literary concepts, to a certain type of narrative, to specific poetics and rhetorics. Structure, rhythm, and word order do not only correspond to the content of speech, but also enable the reader to refrain from the written word at all and to transcend himself beyond the text in mystical and ecstatic experiences. (Cf. the linguistic practices in Kabbalah or the linguistic meditation in the speeches of Buddha or in the Vedic scriptures.)

Literature and Secularization

As most modern civilizations became 'literate' in close relation to religion, literature grants a considerable part of its modern existence to religion. Since the dawning of the modern age in the eighteenth century, especially in Western contexts, religion finds itself confronted with changed conditions and under a vital threat by the struggle for human autonomy. This situation had its impact on the relation between religion and literature as well.

First, as a result of → secularization, the status of 'holy texts' was called into question, ultimately even denied. Texts like the Bible or the Qur'an have more and more been conceived in a historical-critical perspective, i.e. as texts that were conceptualized, arranged, and written by men—instead of being a convolute of prophetic inspiration; Spinoza was one of the first to make this claim for the Torah, in his Tractatus theologico-politicus (1670). Abraham Geiger argued similarly in 1833 for the Qur'an. This secular view of the Bible as historical text written by men also opened the door for a new understanding of the Bible as literary text. In Germany, for example, Johann Gottfried Herder was addressing the Bible as "Hebrew Poetry" (Vom Geist der ebräischen Poesie, 1782/83). And for Geiger, Muhammad was a 'poet.'

Consequently, the discursive borders between theological (sacred) and belletristic (profane) literature, which have been valid for centuries, were erased in the → Enlightenment. This process led to an expansion of discourse. Not only were holy texts more and more read as poetic texts, they also were challenged and competed with by literature. Even in spaces where religious texts kept their absolute primacy, in schools for example, holy discourse became more and more infiltrated by literature, which was not derived from sacred spaces. What actually was meant to be an expansion of religious influence into the world of the profane, has finally located religion within an endless net of literary references, paradoxically undermining its ambitions to dominate cultural life. This development, at the end of which religion had turned into a page of the encyclopedia of the written, is a phenomenon of modernity in Christianity as well as in Judaism. It is the detection of a second book, with which the Jewish Enlightenment, the Haskalah, confronts traditional, orthodox Jewry. Next to the Law of God (Torat ha-Shem) the Law of Man (Torat ha-adam) has come up. In order to adjust both texts to each other, their structures have to be leveled, compared, and linked. Subsequently, the holy text gets more and more transformed into a cultural system of symbols that can be segmented, broken down, re-shaped, and easily connected to the texts of the 'gentile.'

This process of secularization not only questions the status of the holy text, but also—in complementary fashion—strengthens the status of literature. Up to the Enlightenment or at least to the Renaissance, literature used to be subordinated under theological matters and definitions. Literary narrations had to serve theological aims and ought to be written in a biblical style quoting biblical knowledge, and poetry had to follow the pious pattern of the psalms. Whereas at that time, literature was a field within religion, the revolutionary turn that came along with Enlightenment finally left religion as a special field within literature. The autonomy of the human being brought along the renaissance of literature as a vast layer of varying, controversial, and comparative discourses—religion still being one of them but having been robbed of all its privileges of holiness. As long as poetry stood under the dictate of religious conformity, the only poetic treatment for religious topics was an allegorical one, the figuration of abstract entities, as still is the case in baroque drama, especially the Jesuit's plays. With the shattering of the allegorical concept during the seventeenth century, new ways of transforming religious content into an autonomous literary discourse were explored. Now, poetic literature was entitled to re-write the holy text (see, for example, Milton's Paradise Lost and Klopstock's Messias, 1748–1773). As a further consequence, narrative elements of all religions, from the Upanishads to the life of Buddha, to stories or figures of the Hebrew Bible (e.g. Thomas Mann's Joseph-novels, 1933–1943, and Joseph Roth's Hiob, 1930) and the New Testament frequently entered modern literature. The former holy texts turn into a cultural thesaurus of intertextual references. This 'profanization' of religious topics in 'profane' literature has also been criticized by orthodox institutions, lately still in the case of Salman Rushdie's Satanic Verses (1988; → Fatwa). However, the status of those texts remains ambiguous: they might be read as documents of an accomplished secularization, which dissolved and drowned all the metaphysical character of holy texts within the realm of aesthetics; but they might also be perceived as an attempt to save religious heritage under the new regime of discourse.

Finally, the process of secularization absorbed not only motifs and topics of religious narratives. Religious techniques of writing, following religious concepts of → language, were transferred into poetical and aesthetical devices. The mystical technique of letter combination, which plays a crucial role in kabbalistic meditation, for example, turns out to be a poetical technique of writing from the seventeenth century Mannerism (Gracian in Spanish, Harsdörffer in German literature) up to avant-garde literary experiments in the context of Surrealism and the 'Oulipo' (Raymond Queneau, Georges Perec).

Literature

Agus, Aharon R. E., Heilige Texte, Munich 1999; Bandera, Cesáreo, The Sacred Game: The Role of the Sacred in the Genesis of Modern Literary Fiction, Pennsylvania 1994; Bloom, Harold, Ruin the Sacred Truths: Poetry and Belief from the Bible to the Present, Cambridge 1989; Borgman, Erik (ed.), Literary Canons and Religious Identity, Aldershot 2004; Grözinger, Karl E./Rüpke, Jörg (eds.), Literatur als religiöses Handeln?, Berlin 1999; Hamlin, Hannibal, Psalm Culture and Early Modern English Literature, Cambridge 2004; Hartmann, G./Budick, S. (eds.), Midrash and Literature, New Haven 1986; Jasper, David (ed.), Believing in the Text, Oxford 2004; Kilcher, Andreas B., Die Sprachtheorie der Kabbala als ästhetisches Paradigma. Die Konstruktion einer ästhetischen Kabbala seit der Frühen Neuzeit, Stuttgart/Weimar 1998; Moses, Stéphane, Spuren der Schrift, Frankfurt/M. 1987; Zenger, Erich (ed.), Ritual und Poesie. Formen und Orte religiöser Dichtung im Alten Orient, im Judentum und im Christentum, Freiburg etc. 2003.

→ Bible, Canon, Discourse, Kabbalah, Language, Oral Tradition, Qur'an, Revelation, Symbol/Sign/Gesture, Text/Textual Criticism,Tradition, Writing

Andreas B. Kilcher and Philipp Theisohn

Liturgy / Dramaturgy

1. The term 'liturgy' derives from the Greek leitourgia, which denotes the execution of an act by or for the people—a "public service." The technical concept was coined in a context of sacred devotion, with the specific meaning of a ritual, publicly performed, service to a deity. In the Church, it is generally understood that the Eucharist (→ Lord's Supper/Eucharist) will be at the center of a liturgy. The world over, liturgical celebrations are closely linked to temporal cycles and calendars, and, in their constant recurrence, receive their own respective, ritual timelessness, their character as phenomena independent of the 'everyday.'

'Dramaturgy' is the doctrine and knowledge of the substance, effect, and prescribed form of drama (Gk., "action," "act"). In drama/dance/theater, music, song, movement, a platform, a presenter, and an audience all work in concert. Their origin, as attested in cave paintings, can be traced to the Old Stone Age. An extraction from contexts of ritual and worship is usually supposed (V. Turner), although, today, the transference can work in the other direction, from art to worship (→ Drama [Sacred]).

Liturgical Forms and Examples

2. How close is the conjunction between divine service and dramatic presentation today? To what extent is divine service a theatrical, dramaturgically 'thought out' presentation and execution?

Christianity

a) The proclamation of the word of God, the act of reading from sacred scriptures, has an eminent place in Christianity, Judaism, and Islam. In order to emphasize the holiness and power of these words, a ritually dramatic environment has always been procured. The construction of the Catholic mass, with its precisely prescribed devotional and ritual flow of actions, leads to a presentation of the religious that stands out from the everyday: priests wear imposing 'vestments,' are surrounded by equally solemnly clad → 'altar servers' ('ministers'), perform prescribed actions on an 'altar platform,' and implement a specific set of gestures. At their signals, instrumental or vocal music sounds forth, and, with formulae and → singing that have been committed to memory, this personnel draws the 'audience,' the 'community of onlookers,' directly into the action at special moments. Calls, words and sounds of praise, impetratory utterances, the prayers of the celebrant—alone or with the community—the → sermon, the Lord's Supper ('Communion'), and finally, a blessing and further components of the Christian divine services, which (differently, according to confession and denomination) each possess their place within a complex ritual event. For complicated courses of action (e.g., at 'high feasts,' like Easter or Christmas), the Catholic Church even introduces a special 'master of ceremony,' as sacred dramaturge.

From Liturgy to Sacred Drama—India

b) Another example, from another culture: In the Christian religion, of course, the dramaturgic presentation, however impressively and finely polished, has always been relegated to second place in the divine service (being excluded as its center). In India, we see an altogether different picture. Although, as elsewhere, we find specially long liturgies here as well—as, for example, the event of the erection of a Vedic fire altar, which extends over many days.[1] In addition, however, there are eminently imposing and cyclically appearing imitations of mythological stories, that likewise serve the veneration of the gods. Dance and theater are a solid component in reverence of divinities, as the classical manual Nāṭyaśāstra (Ghosh 1951–1961) evinces. Not only is the art of the stage of divine origin, its execution is expected by the gods as 'visible sacrifice.'

Dance

Sacred dance is a further liturgical element characterizing the Indian sphere. Until the beginning of the twentieth century, temples housed resident dancers, the devadāsi. Their dance was completely reserved for the deity, as well as being a solid component of the daily liturgy. Today these dance forms are only to be seen on secular stages, and are widely known as bharata natyam, odissi, and kuchipudi. Although the temple was abandoned, many dancers continue to exercise their skill in a kind of divine service. Even Christianity has slowly begun to discover this art of proclamation. Thus, in recent years, alternative forms of Christian divine service are multiplying, inspired by the quest for feminist spirituality, or by the adoption of non-European liturgical forms that incorporate circle dancing and the like.

Rites of Threshold/ Passage

c) Last, so-called threshold rituals, or rites of passage, are to be addressed (→ Life Cycle). In Western culture today one still finds, for example, first communion or confirmation, that make a young person a full-fledged member of the Christian community. The strictly prescribed courses of action here, the extraordinary 'costuming,' the carefully rehearsed 'acting' on the part of the dedicands, on a stage-like space divided from the observing community of the faithful, give the impression of a ritual presentation. The same holds true for the new, non-confessional celebration of the youth dedication.

3. At all times and places, service celebrated for the deities is accompanied by impressive ceremonies, involving the element of the supernatural, and containing obligatory elements of the theatrical. Not even Christian churches are an exception, as we have seen. Just as eagerly, → political religions refer to the liturgical repertory at hand. Here we may even list instances of the direct adoption of elements of religious worship, such as the entry of the ruler ('leader,' and so on; → Epiphany), songs, formulae of prayer and summoning (→ Civil Religion).

1. Staal 1983; R. Gardner has made the accompanying film, "Altar of Fire."

Literature

Secondary Literature: Ghosh, Manomohan, The Nāṭyaśāstra: A Treatise on Ancient Indian Dramaturgy and Histrionics, 2 vols., Calcutta 1951–1961; Lang, Bernhard, Sacred Games: A History of Christian Worship, New Haven/London 1997; Metzger, Marcel, History of the Liturgy: The Major Stages, Collegeville 1997; Turner, Victor, From Ritual to Theatre: The Human Seriousness of Play, New York 1982.

Literature Concerning the Examples: Barboza, Francis Peter, Christianity in Indian Dance Forms, Delhi 1990; Kersenboom-Story, Saski C., Nityasumangalī: Devadasi Tradition in South India, Delhi 1987; Kurvers, Robert G. A., Ad faciendum Peregrinum: A Study of the Liturgical Elements in the Latin Peregrinus Plays in the Middle Ages, Frankfurt/M. 1996; Richmond, Farley P., Kutiyattam: Sanskrit Theater of India, Multimedia-CD-Rom, University of Michigan 2002; Staal, Frits, Agni: The Vedic Ritual of the Fire Altar, 2 vols., Berkeley 1983.

Heike Moser

Local Devotion

1. By "local devotion" is meant the veneration of one or more higher powers in a particular → place, usually practiced by persons of a restricted group. These powers are effective only in limited ways, and they make no claim to generality. It may be a matter of numinous objects, protectors of a home, patrons of the → family, mythic tribal → ancestors, a matter of → heroes of various extraction, or, indeed, of gods, to whom an area, a grove, a precisely defined space, is assigned. It is their possession, or dedicated to them. Although not per se something completely different, visits to the holy places of the scriptural religions are not generally reckoned as local devotion—prayer at the Western Wall of the temple in Jerusalem, assistance at a pontifical Mass in Saint Peter's Basilica, or the pilgrimage to → Mecca. Veneration of the universal God of these religions is in principle possible always and everywhere. Here, then, it is a matter of, for example, a → pilgrimage, or of a (usually) once-in-a-lifetime visit to a place of religious importance, and is usually regarded as a matter of religious merit.

Arbitrary Distinctions

2. The boundaries between local and universal division are arbitrarily drawn. They can arise from an intra-religious criticism directed against traditional forms of devotion, as, for example, in the Hebrew Bible, the reform of King Josiah (1 Kings 22-23, 2 Chron 34-35), or Luther's criticism of outward forms of piety. These are treated as idolatry. In the West, since the eighteenth century, local devotion is accounted a matter of superstition, not of 'reasonable religion'; since the nineteenth century, it is ascribed to 'folk piety', and occasionally even idealized as primitive. The academic study of religion itself has long regarded it as a component of older, exotic, that is, primitive, forms of religion. Local devotions, then, were reckoned as forerunners of the great and general devotions, and belong rather to → magic than to religion, rather to → polytheism than to monotheism. Nothing is thereby gained for an understanding of the individual devotion. Further, even in the formation of theory, a preference for the abstract and inward form of divine reverence denies the circumstance that local attachment and the variety of a devotion is precisely one of the individual devotion's most important tasks. Expressed in this task is the religious habitation of a group, and the shaping of its living world. It betrays "whether and how scriptural religions become effective in practical life, and are bound up with acts (ordinary and extraordinary)."[1] This test is even more true of tribal and ancient religions. In order to understand the local devotion, an approach and presentation with an orientation to phenomena is preferable.

Antiquity

3. a) The religions of the ancient civilizations, in West and East, as in India today (→ Hinduism; Indian Subcontinent), are characterized by a strong particularism, so that, among other things, a distinction is made among family, local, and national devotions; however, fleeting passages, especially between the first two concepts, are at hand. The Patriarchs of the Hebrew Bible venerate 'numina,' and other special beings, the "God of the Fathers"—a designation problematic in itself, as it implies biblical monotheism even in the earliest times—respectively in particular places marked by holy trees or sacred stones. At best, ancient local devotion in Greece can be explained, and research into it is in many respects paradigmatic for religious studies. The distinct city-states each have their god, who is frequently Zeus Polieus ("Zeus of the City"), and to whom a certain devotion is due. In Athens, for example, the sacrifice of a bull by the Buphonians was performed as a "comedy of innocence" (K. Meuli). Very importantly, the surnames (→ Name[s]) express the particularism, surely, but also the multiplicity, of the gods. "In devotion, it is the duty of the one praying to encircle the god with the surname, as it were, and to find the right, fitting name," since "each god [is] surrounded by a host of surnames, presenting a complex picture of his [or her] effect."[2] The surnames are a component of mythology (K. Kerényi), and recount an episode from the history of the god, upon which a determinate devotion will rest. The choice of surnames also betrays local differences. In Asia Minor, for example, Apollo was called Smintheus, the "mouse" god. His veneration there was determined by a particular aspect, that of the god as the one whose bow sends pestilential arrows. On the level of local devotion, one is compelled to no scholarly synthesis: the god is venerated according to the usages of place (cf. F. Graf).

Spirits, Heroes, and Saints

b) In many religions, there are special places of great effect and power, furnished with a 'god of the place' (genius loci). These may be combined into an entire 'sacred → landscape' (H. Cancic). At these places, seasonal festivities take place because it is assumed that something decisive occurred there in primitive or earlier times. When they have → graves as their midpoint, for instance those of the fathers and mothers of Israel, or of the Greek heroes, then they must be regularly visited: their inhabitants are ambivalent vis-à-vis human beings, and when their veneration is omitted they are displeased. The dead can then actually emerge from the earth, a threat that is countered by a devotion at the grave—often, such a devotion is fashioned after the devotion to the gods (meals, → Cemetery), but also after social rites (complaints). In addition, many heroes can be venerated trans-regionally, as they have graves in several places (A. Nock). We also encounter many of these conceptualizations and rituals in the → veneration of the saints in the scriptural religions. → Martyrs often stand at the focus, as happens in Christianity. But generally speaking, devotion to the saints is veneration of the powerfully effective dead, a veneration of the dead cultivated with special honor. As such, it is connected with the grave of the respective saint, a limitation that can be evaded by the veneration of images or relics. Buddhism, as well, is familiar with it, of course in such a way that the representations of the founder are met only with relations of reverence.

Modern Times

c) Although veneration of saints, important religious leaders, and their respective places (graves, in particular) are still current in a variety of religious traditions today, new forms of local cult entered the stage. Throughout the religious and cultural history of modernity, one frequently encounters a → veneration of persons characterized by an unrestrained idealization. In principle, the → idol is often simply lionized, at a variety of 'neutral' places of special convenience (concert halls, motion picture theaters, football stadiums), and is acclaimed only at his or her appearance on the scene. It is disputed whether this might be accounted a continuation of the modern project (i.e., more authenticity), or rather its end (i.e., waning autonomy).

1. Kippenberg, in: Kippenberg/Luchesi 1995, 13f.
2. Burkert 1977, 285.

Literature

Burkert, Walter, Griechische Religion der archaischen und klassischen Epoche, Stuttgart 1977 (Engl. as: Greek Religion: Archaic and Classical, Oxford 1985); Cancik, Hubert, "Rome As Sacred Landscape," in: Visible Religion 4/5 (1985/86), 250-265; Graf, Fritz, Nordionische Kulte, Rome 1985; Kippenberg, Hans G./Luchesi, Brigitte (eds.), Lokale Religionsgeschichte, Marburg 1995; Nock, Arthur D., "The Cult of Heroes," in: Stewart, Zeph (ed.), Essays on Religion and the Ancient World, Oxford 1972, 575-602.

→ Grave/Tomb, Hero/Heroism, Landscape, Martyr, Place (Sacred), Veneration of Persons/ Personality Cult, Veneration of the Saints

Martin Treml

Lord's Supper / Eucharist

Lord's Supper

1. Concepts: Lord's Supper is Paul's term for the sacred meal regularly celebrated in the first Christian communities. The word Eucharist (Thanksgiving), which was in use as early as the beginning of the second century, is the one most often applied in the Catholic Church today. In addition, from the sixth century onward the term Mass was formed for divine service with the celebration of the Eucharist. The community aspect comes to the fore in the concept of Communion. In Protestantism, the term Abendmahl (Evening

Leonardo's monumental fresco, Ultima Cena (Lat., "Last Supper"; 1495–1497), painted for the Milanese church of Saint Mary of Graces, has become one of the central icons of the modern Christian treasury of art. Reproduced by the millions, it once stamped the style of piety of generations, and today stands high in touristic favor. In the nineteenth century, the idealization of this image assumed the 'character of religious revelation' (Richard Hüttel): it became the inner concept of conservative aesthetics, which regarded itself as obligated to cultivate the values of a 'Christian West,' and here found the perfect 'meditation image' for family and home. In numberless variations and media, not only traditional religious art, but even the artistic avant-garde (Andy Warhol, "The Last Supper," 1987), promoted the painting to the status of a special kind of legacy of world culture. Although, according to Warhol, "many Last Suppers are better than one," the question must be asked whether, beyond kitsch, art, and commerce, a remnant of piety in confrontation with this image is still in any way conceivable nowadays. (Hubert Mohr) Meal) has acquired currency since Luther. In the ecumenical discourse of recent decades, agreement has been struck on the New Testament expression Lord's Supper.

New Testament

2. In primitive Christianity, the Lord's Supper was set in the context of an ordinary meal taken in common. In Corinth, unequal distribution of the victuals brought to the meal led to serious community conflict. Frequently, wealthy Christians had consumed the provisions they had brought, while poorer members of the community who arrived later had to go hungry. Paul criticized this comportment as inappropriate for the celebration of the Lord's Supper. The criticism leveled by him against reprehensible social behavior—that one ought not to celebrate that Supper 'unworthily' in this sense—was later employed in a spiritualized meaning. In his letter to the community in Corinth, Paul establishes it that Jesus himself has 'instituted' the meal (1 Cor 11:23-25). Paul alters a formula that he himself has adopted, and that has been generally used in a slightly modified form in the celebration of the Lord's Supper to this day. "The Lord Jesus, on the night when he

Beggars crowd into a Spanish palace and stage an orgy. The blasphemous climax is reached when the movement of the participants freezes, and the image that then appears resembles Leonardo's "Last Supper." As if in mockery, another middle-class showpiece, Händel's "Halleluja," from his oratorio, "Messiah," simultaneously peals on the soundtrack. Thus, catastrophically, ends the attempt of novice Viridiana, in Luis Buñuel's film of the same name, to practice Christian love of neighbor and care for the poor. Buñuel employs the image of the Lord's Supper to express his trenchant criticism of a Christian social concern that, instead of addressing the causes—exploitation, poverty, feudalistic structures—attempts to cure the symptoms. The provocation succeeded: the film received the 1961 Golden Palm award at the Cannes Film Festival. But, under pressure from the Vatican, it was forthwith proscribed in Franco Spain. Only in 1977, under democratic conditions, could it at last be shown in that country. (Hubert Mohr) was betrayed, took a loaf of bread, and when he had given thanks, he broke it and said. 'This is my body that is given for you. Do this in remembrance of me.' In the same way he took the cup also, after supper, saying, 'This cup is the new covenant in my blood. Do this, as often as you drink it, in remembrance of me.'" Reconstructing from Paul's Greek the Hebrew-Aramaic that Jesus spoke, we should read: "This is myself in the full reality of my life." Similar formulas are to be found in the first three Gospels. The Gospel of Matthew, after the words over the cup, supplies the purpose, "for forgiveness of sins." Only Luke and Paul use the injunction to repeat the celebration of this supper: "Do this in remembrance of me." In the Gospel of John (ch. 13), in the corresponding place, a meal is mentioned, but it is linked with the ritual of the washing of the feet.

In the background of the tradition of the Lord's Supper are the meal scenes depicted in the Gospels. Jesus dines 'with publicans and sinners,' works miracles of food and one of wine, relates parables of eschatological feasts, and as the Risen One gives his disciples and followers food to eat. In central position for the development of the ritual of the Lord's Supper, however, is Jesus's farewell supper before his arrest and sentencing. Jesus is celebrating the Jewish Passover in Jerusalem with his disciples. He has probably interpreted parts of the Passover rite in terms of his own coming death.

3. a) Connections: From the viewpoint of history of religion, the emergence of the Lord's Supper as a ritual can be understood as a process of

Even the modeling firm of Otto Kern used Leonardo's subject. In a 1994 campaign, with erotically stylized biblical scenes using dreamy-looking models in various degrees of upper-torso exposure, the undertaking employs advertising slogans to provoke: "Along with Jesus, we want men to learn to respect women" is the caption of a jeans ad. The third marketing stunt, presented by Heinz Wackerbarth, employs sets for the spring collection. His aim—despite a female Christ—is no longer a blasphemous confrontation, but commerce. (Benita von Behr) separation from the praxis of sacred sacrificial worship, a process that also occurred in other religions. In primitive Christianity, the bloody sacrifice of beasts was replaced, on the mythical level, as an explanation of Jesus' execution, with the sacred 'necessity' of the supplanting sacrificial lamb. On the ritual plane, instead of sacrificial flesh, merely 'harmless' substitutes, bread and wine, are served. An understanding of the supper as an anticipated funeral meal is also likely.

Church History

b) The martyr Ignatius of Antioch (d. around 110) understood the Lord's Supper as a "remedy of immortality, and an antidote that we do not die, but live forever in Jesus Christ." The Orthodox churches embrace this notion. In the Western Church, since the Fourth Council of the Lateran (1215)—under the presuppositions of contemporary philosophy—the concept of transubstantiation prevailed. Bread and wine are changed by the priest into the body and blood of Christ, retaining only the outward appearance of the bread and wine. Since the time of the Reformation, two other characterizations have been in tension with the Catholic view: While the Lutherans developed the concept of consubstantiation, Reformed theology emphasized the memorial aspect of the Lord's Supper (Memorial Supper). The meaning of consubstantiation is that, while bread and wine also remain in the Supper, the body and blood of Christ are also present 'in, with, and under' the elements, in the realization of the celebration of the meal.

Conditions for Participation

c) As ritual center of the Christian assembly and community (communio), the Lord's Supper is linked with a number of concepts and conditions. Beginning in 100 at the latest, baptism became a requirement for the reception of the Lord's Supper (Didache). Later, the moment of penance and previous confession were ordered to its celebration. Matthew's additional "for the forgiveness of sins" has been adopted in most liturgies. Emphasis on the penitential aspect comports the danger of a one-sided, individualistic interpretation of the Lord's supper ("my Savior and I"), with a suppression of the community aspect. In past centuries, exclusion from the Lord's Supper was often used as an instrument of ecclesiastical and social administration, individually as excommunication, and for whole regions as interdict. The understanding of office also enters in. In the Catholic tradition, the Eucharist can be 'confected' only by an ordained male priest. Most Protestant churches permit the realization of the Eucharist only at the hands of a minister duly ordained or designated for this purpose.

Ritual Separation

4. Current Questions: The lofty Catholic understanding of the priesthood is regarded on the Protestant side as a key impediment to ecumenical celebrations of the Lord's Supper. The history of Christianity has known various conceptualizations of offering or sacrifice with respect to the meaning of the Lord's Supper. The identity of the presider, the offering, and the recipient are points of contention among the denominations. In 1979, significant impulses for the creation of a 'Lord's Supper Movement' emerged with the publication of a joint Roman Catholic and Lutheran-Evangelical document, "The Lord's Supper." However, to this day the different understandings of this Christian ritual are a crucial obstacle for inter-Christian dialogue.

Literature

Chilton, Bruce, A Feast of Meanings: Eucharistic Theologies from Jesus Through Johannine Circles, Leiden 1994; Fitzpatrick, P. J., In Breaking of Bread: The Eucharist and Ritual, Cambridge 1993; Jones, Paul H., Christ's Eucharistic Presence: A History of the Doctrine, New York 1994; Kereszty, Roch A. (ed.), Rediscovering the Eucharist: Ecumenical Conversations, New York 2003; Kilmartin, Edward J., The Eucharist in the West: History and Theology, Collegeville 1998; Kilpatrick, George D., The Eucharist in Bible and Liturgy, Cambridge 1983; LaVerdiere, Eugene, The Eucharist in the New Testament and the Early Church, Collegeville 1996; Macy, Gary, The Banquet's Wisdom: A Short History of the Theologies of the Lord's Supper, New York 1992; McGowan, Andrew, Ascetic Eucharists: Food and Drink in Early Christian Ritual Meals, Oxford 1999; Slee, Michelle, The Church in Antioch in the First Century CE: Communion and Conflict, London 2003.

→ Christianity, Drinking/Drink, Eating/Nourishment, Memory, Ritual, Tradition

Erhard J. Wiedenmann

Love

Thematic Overview

1. The use of the word 'love' in Western European discourse—from its casual meaning of "like," to sexual "lovemaking," to the much discussed "ideal of relationship"—is closely connected, in its culturally constructed meaning, with the religious history of the concept, for example in the mass media. Most often understood as a category of emotions for positively experienced, intensive associations free of any means-end relationships, today's concept of love mixes religious models of the relation between God and human beings with those of human beings among themselves. Seemingly comparable notions in other cultures also transport distinct ethical, social, and emotional concepts of intercourse with the divine, human, or sexual other, which becomes important for different conceptualizations of → 'communication' and 'dialogue.' How a culture defines 'true love,' and the status of the individuals in a love relationship—whether it makes them 'blind' or 'seeing,' whether it is passive surrender or active decision—is characterized by the connection of the concept to religious notions of salvation and redemption, obedience and freedom, subordination and equality, knowledge and faith.

Historical Development

2. The most influential cohesive Western conceptualization of love is the interpretation of the eros of God in Plato's doctrine of Ideas.[1] Divided from idealized male friendship and familiar love (philia), and from social love flowing from religious motivation (agápe; in Lat., caritas), éros in persons is that effective corporeal and spiritual power of generation whose highest form is the soul's vision of the absolute Ideas in a "heavenly place" (in Gk., tópos ouranós). This philosophical, religious sublimation of corporality and materiality into a 'highest knowledge' sees the same power at work in sexuality as in the philosophical 'passion for understanding.'

Christianity, regarding itself as a 'religion of love,' adopts, especially in Neo-Platonism (→ Platonism), the idea of a spiritualized love, and excludes the driven, 'erotic' aspect: it is agape, as an asexual love for God, self, and neighbor (Math 22:39, after Lev 19:18), and as commanded in the form of love for one's enemies, that steps front and center. As the most important of the theological virtues of "faith, hope, love" (1 Cor 13), it is the central element of the salvific event, and of the redemption by grace of a humanity burdened with sexual original sin.

Islam and Judaism, too, see the argument of God's love for human beings in revelation, but here revelation is not conceptualized as a universal, anticipated redemption by love. Thus in Islam, love of God is clearly divided from worldly love, and especially coupled to the fear of God, observance of the commandments, and divine forgiveness. God's crucial deed of love in Judaism is the sacred covenant with the people of Israel, formulated as a marriage. It is joined with a religious duty—the responsible realization of justice. Sexual love and the celebration of beauty does not contradict the divine love (Song of Solomon), as neither does it in Islam, and is formulated in biblical Hebrew as yada', "knowing" one's partner.

Courtly Love

In the Europe of the close of the eleventh century, chivalry developed the ideal of love that goes by the name of courtly love. Influenced by the wandering troubadours of Jewish and Islamic culture, this love was especially the lyrical courtship of the unattainable lady, as ideal passionate love, modeled on the tragic love, fulfilled only in death, of "Tristan and Isolde," in the epic by Godfrey of Strasbourg (c. 1210). Likewise evading an orthodox rejection of the erotic, especially female Christian mystics of the high and late Middle Ages report their visionary personal experience of God as an experience of love, that is, of a transgressing, overwhelming encounter (mystical marriage) or merging (in Lat., unio mystica; "mystical union"; mysticism of love) with Jesus or God, expressed in a highly erotic metaphorical style. For the modern notion of love, with its orientation to the individual, it is an emotional 'interiorization' of religion that constitutes the norm.

Modern and Contemporary Religious Love

Up until recent times, marriage was not regarded as a place for passion or love. The Romeo and Juliet motif—love as a transgression of social and political bounds—is available as an exception, but is feeble as grounds for matrimony vis-à-vis a father's right, or economic and social considerations. Only the middle-class society of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, rejecting the marriage conventions and libertinage of the nobility, developed a matrimonial ideal of 'romantic love' (which, however, can be described mostly as an ideologization of the middle-class role of woman), arising simultaneously with the cultural importance of a self-sacrificing 'motherly love.' In the process of an increasing rationalization—even of religion—a pragmatic love becomes a concept critical of culture. In particular, the poets of sentimentality and early Romanticism, in the framework of a 'new culture of emotion,' draft models of a love of soul-mates that, as aesthetic religious power, joins the individual to the infinite: this is how Schleiermacher renews Protestant theology, and how Novalis connects Christian motifs (resurrection) with an exaltation of death and eros to a new form of mysticism.[2]

Love Today

3. For modern societies and individuals, the meaning of love is no longer obviously bound to religious structures. Nevertheless, the most diverse patterns of salvation and redemption are anchored in this concept. Only in the twentieth century has love become a normative quantity supplying life meaning. At the same time, however, it raises a claim on the relations of couples, a claim that, in the popular consciousness—by way of example, in the 'love stories' of the entertainment industry—has been amalgamated with notions of destiny and the ideals of the 'happy life.' Thus it has attained to a salvific character. With the new understanding of the relationship of love and sexuality, love, on the one hand, is a conceptual component of a criticism of a 'soulless,' commercialized sexuality, and on the other—frequently by way of models adopted from foreign cultures and religions—is interpreted as an element of unification between sexuality and an experience of transcendence ('cosmic love').

Love attains the status of utopian content as superior principle of a communicative solution of conflict. During the 'sexual revolution' of the 1960s, 'free love' was the model for political and individual structures ('Make love, not war'). In the principle of the 'dialogue' between potential parties to conflict (cultures, religions) as well, love plays a great role, as a power interpreted as universal, as conciliatory of contradictions, and as abolishing boundaries (vis unitiva; Lat., "unifying force"). Whether this universalistic understanding corresponds to cultural realities is an open question. Concepts of the meaning of love as ultimate foundation of life, as the experience of transcendence in the pattern of the mystics, or as model for a redemption or release from problematic secular questions, stand at the center of modern intercourse with religion. Cast adrift from or by traditional religion, and yet adherent to their patterns of interpretation, these concepts often have an orientation to foreign religions and cultures, and stand in the field of tension among scholarship (psychology, philosophy), religion, and individual experience.

1. Plato, Symposium: On Eros, ed. U. Schmidt-Berger, Frankfurt/M. 1985.
2. Novalis, Geistliche Lieder, 1802; Hymnen an die Nacht, 1800.

Literature

Ackerman, D., A Natural History of Love, New York 1994; Badinter, E., Mother Love: Myth & Reality-Motherhood in Modern History, New York 1980; Bloch, R. H., Medieval Misogyny and the Invention of Western Romantic Love, Chicago 1991; Buber, M., I and Thou, New York 1970 (Ger. [1]1923); Dover, K. J., Greek Homosexuality, Cambridge 1989 ([1]1978); Duby, G., Love and Marriage in the Middle Ages, Chicago 1994; Gay, P., The Tender Passion. Vol. 2: The Bourgeois Experience, New York 1986; Halperin, D. et al. (eds.), Before Sexuality: The Construction of Erotic Experience in the Ancient Greek World, Princeton 1990; Jantzen, G., Power, Gender and Christian Mysticism, Cambridge 1995; Luhmann, N., Love as Passion: The Codification of Intimacy; Stanford 1998 (Ger. [1]1982); Plato, Symposium. Ed. by K. J. Dover, Cambridge 1980; Seidman, S., Romantic Longings: Love in America 1830–1980, New York 1991; Solomon, R., Love: Emotion, Myth and Metaphor, Garden City 1981.

→ Emotions/Feelings, Eroticism, Ethics/Morals, Mysticism, Sexuality

Alexandra Grieser

Luck / Happiness

1. 'Having luck,' and 'being lucky,' are two different things. The former expression reflects the idea that luck befalls a person from without; it is bestowed. It is this luck that underlies a coincidence regarded as 'lucky.' Nevertheless, luck depends not only on life circumstances, but also on the individual attitude toward life and the way in which it is led. This luck, settled in the interior of the person, corresponds to the turn of phrase, 'being lucky.' Antiquity itself distinguished between the Greek eutychía (in Lat., fortuna), 'having luck,' and eudaimonía (felicitas), 'being lucky.' In English and French, a similar differentiation is made: 'luck' vs. 'happiness,' fortune/ chance vs. bonheur. In old German, the word Gelücke / Gelucke materializes only in the second half of the twelfth century, and comprises both concepts of luck (as does modern Dutch geluk). The reference to the category of time in French is noteworthy, where the etymology of bonheur is 'good hour,' while the contrary expression, malheur (etym., 'bad hour') means 'misfortune,' 'ill luck.' In the Hebrew Bible and the New Testament, the word 'luck' is not used: in its place stands the expression 'life.' Life, in turn, denotes lifetime, so that an inner relation obtains between luck and time.

2. On the basis of its incalculability, coincidence—thought of as bringing luck or misfortune—conveyed an impression of the capricious, and found its personification in a female figure: the Greek Tyché, or the Latin Fortuna.

At Japanese Shintô temples, for a few yen, paper lots for luck (o-miku-ji) can be purchased from a miko, a young unmarried woman who functions as a kind of priest's assistant. Japanese schoolgirls, in their uniforms, fasten their lots here to ask for luck in upcoming examinations. On other occasions as well, or with many near-universal problems (search for a partner, courtship), the lots are drawn in hopes of a positive influence on the prospect of a wish to be fulfilled. The lots have short phrases printed on them that can indicate Outer, coincidental luck, vouchsafed by the goddess of luck, establishes a special quality of time. For a moment, the human being is offered a chance, a prospect. According to mythology, Kairós, son of Fortuna, embodies this 'favorable moment.' When Fortuna wishes to demonstrate her good pleasure, she sends Kairos abroad. As the latter nears the one to be granted luck, the latter sees a mighty shock of hair on the young god's forehead, and now has the chance to seize the opportunity (in German, beim Schopfe packen, "grasp his hair"). One who hesitates too long is 'out of luck,' for, momentarily, Kairos begins to depart, and presents the viewer only the bald back of his head. Church authorities such as → Augustine rejected the tradition of 'fortune,' as it contradicted the profession of a divine providentia (Lat., 'providence'). In order to integrate 'fortune' into the Christian system of belief, Augustine subordinated it to divine providence, and understood it as an instrument of God. Boethius (480–524) completed the development of a Christian 'fortune,' in his work composed in 524, "The Consolation of Philosophy" (in Lat., De Consolatione Philosophiae). Boethius was the first to set the 'wheel of life' in a functional relationship to fortune. At fortune's hand, the wheel begins to spin, and earthly interests spin with it; but God drives the wheel from the center. In Christian iconography, the Wheel of Fortune appears at the close of the eleventh century.

Luck in Magic and Religion

3. Usually, human beings cannot invoke luck, but only wish it. This wish occurs on occasions that set a caesura in the course of metric time, as, for example, New Year's, or one's birthday. The wish can take on a magical character, when a four-leafed clover or a horseshoe hangs at the windshield of a car. A talisman does not enhance the technological reliability of a vehicle, but it may the driver's feeling of security, which is assimilable to magical thought.

Colloquially, an accident is synonymous with bad luck, so that someone who emerges from one unscathed is said to have had 'good luck in bad luck.' In the eyes of a believer, the other world possesses a working power; a person may submit luck to the patronage of a talisman. In Christianity, following the Platonic understanding of luck, earthly luck is upgraded to 'beatitude'—which is attained as the 'highest good' (in Lat., summum bonum), however, only in the eternal City of God of the afterlife.

States of Happiness

4. It is not only the 'favorable moment' that evinces a relation to the category of time, but inner happiness, as well. The absence of a sense of time experienced by a child, or an adult absorbed in a game, produces an inner feeling of happiness. In states of intoxication, this feeling can also be intentionally provoked, through the ingestion of psychopharmacopeia or hallucinogens (→ Intoxication/Drugs/Hallucinogens). Hallucinogenic mushrooms are ingested in the sacred rites of the Middle American peyote religion. Without the use of drugs, mystics attain to a beatific state for some moments through the ecstasies of meditation, as those of satori in Zen Buddhism (→ Emotions/Feelings; Mysticism). Often, these feelings are those of only momentary happiness. Nevertheless, religious moments of happiness stand against the horizon of overlapping expectations of happiness, and receive their meaning and importance only in life as a whole, when the question poses itself, whether life can be described as attained according to the moral bases of the religious communities. Inasmuch as the moral life is accomplished in the community, attention to one's neighbor and the common observance of social rules are conditions of quality of life, satisfaction, and happiness in life. But many religions promise 'true happiness' only in an existence eternally untroubled, in paradise, or in other places of aspiration (→ Garden/Paradise).

Pursuit of Happiness

5. The pursuit of happiness is the particular property of every human being. While the human right to pursue happiness is unknown in Europe, the case is different in the United States. In the 1776 Declaration of Independence, the formula reflects a transformation in the consciousness of the times that had been under way in Europe since the Renaissance. In place of the concept of a divine providence, the fact was recognized that the human being is capable of a self-determined life (→ Human Rights). In the eighteenth century, then, the accent shifted from a static thinking to a dynamic one. Now happiness was perceived no longer in the condition of perfection, but in the process of perfection. Correspondingly, the American Declaration of Independence guaranteed not the right to happiness, but the right to strive for happiness. The pursuit of happiness was understood then as an indispensable component of modern → civil religion in the United States. Today, at the turn of the millennium, an ideal and 'beatifying' goal sought in Western societies forsakes its religious matrix and emerges as self-realization—unless, turned altogether profane, happiness has evaporated into 'fun,' in a 'society of events.'

either a positive or a negative prospect. The one whose lot promises "Great luck" can expect the fulfillment of his or her wish for having brought the o-miku-ji here; and the one who has been received a lot with "Small bad luck" printed on it hopes to neutralize the omen precisely by way of this lot. (Benita von Behr)

Literature

Bellebaum, Alfred (ed.), Vom guten Leben. Glücksvorstellungen in Hochkulturen, Berlin 1994; Bruni, Luigino, A History of Happiness in Economics, London 2004; Cloninger, C. Robert, Feeling Good: The Science of Well-Being, New York 2004; Jiyuan Yu/Gracia, Jorge J. E. (eds.), Rationality and Happiness: From the Ancients to the Early Medievals, Rochester 2003; Kingwell, Mark, In Pursuit of Happiness: Better Living from Plato to Prozac, New York 1998; Marcuse, Ludwig, Philosophie des Glücks: Von Hiob bis Freud, Zurich ²1972; McFall, Lynne, Happiness, New York 1989; Nussbaum, Martha C., The Fragility of Goodness: Luck and Ethics in Greek Tragedy and Philosophy, Cambridge ²2001; Sanders, Willy, Glück. Zur Herkunft und Bedeutungsentwicklung eines mittelalterlichen Schicksalsbegriffs, Cologne 1965; von Eckardt, Ursula M., The Pursuit of Happiness in the Democratic Creed: An Analysis of Political Ethics, New York 1959; Williams, Bernard, Moral Luck: Philosophical Papers 1973–1980, Cambridge 1981.

→ Civil Religion, Emotions/Feelings, Ethics/Morals, Human Rights

Ingeborg Siggelkow

Luther, Martin

The Person

1. Martin Luther was born on November 10, 1483, at Eisleben, in Saxony, Germany. In 1505, to fulfill a private vow that he had made in acute fear of death and the Last Judgment, he entered the monastery of Augustinian hermits in Erfurt. His experience of failing to attain a salvific relationship to God even as a monk led him to a gradual change of attitude and the 'reformatory turn' that he later stylized in his self-interpretation as a sudden experience of breakthrough and awakening. On October 31, 1517, Luther became a public figure by posting his ninety-five theses against indulgences. His criticism soon broadened to include an attack on prevailing dogmas, and in 1520 the Pope excommunicated him; in 1521 the Emperor issued the Edict of Worms. Luther's local lord, Frederick the Wise, sheltered him in the Wartburg Castle, where he translated the New Testament into German. In the 1520s, there followed important declarations and clarifications vis-à-vis the 'left wing' of the Reformation (with the 1522 Wittenberg riots through Karlstadt; Thomas Müntzer; Peasants' War), humanism, and the Swiss Reformation. Bound to Wittenberg by an imperial edict that continued in force, Luther could exercise his influence on the Reformation in the following years practically only by writing. Toward the end of his life, in an attitude of resignation, he composed bitter tracts against the Pope and the Jews. On 18 February 1546, Luther died at Eisleben.

Teaching

2. Luther's reformatory discovery entailed a new understanding of justification. He no longer propounded the justice of God cited in Rom 1:17 as punitive; rather, the human being is declared just. Here, against all claims that human beings' redemption depends on their individual acts (justification by works), he insisted, where salvation is concerned, on the sole efficacy of God's grace (sola gratia, Lat., 'by grace alone'). On the grounds of his confrontation with the 'left wing' of the reformation, Luther gradually came to attribute a function in social intercourse to law as well—for defense against the effects of sin. This idea occurred in a context of the development of the doctrine of the two regimes, the spiritual and the secular, through which God sustains the world.

Image of Luther

3. a) Even to his contemporaries, Luther seemed like a new Elijah. It was only after his death that Melanchthon—doubtless in terms of legend—reported a demonstrative 'slapping' of the theses onto the door of the Wittenberg Castle church on 31 October 1517. This date provided the occasion for Reformation Day, in the formation of which the self-concept of Protestantism has been reflected for centuries.

As opposed to the image of Luther legitimated by Lutheran orthodoxy as an authoritative instance—yet also appealing to Luther (especially the Luther of the early years)— → Pietism exerted criticism of his person (especially Gottfried Arnold, 1666–1714).[1] Symptomatically, in Lessing's appeal to Luther as the redeemer from the yoke of tradition in the conflict over the radical bible criticism of the Wolfenbüttel fragments, the Enlightenment appropriated the reformer for itself, as herald of a criticism of tradition. A consistently theological interpretation was first established once more only by the investigations on Luther of Karl Holl, with their orientation to the proclamation of justification. The Luther Society, founded in 1918, devotes itself to the cultivation of this rediscovered religious image of Luther.

b) Along with his theological importance, Luther had long since developed a broad effect on cultural history. Through his translation of the Bible, Saxon Chancellery German stamped High German. Herder exalted this achievement in linguistic history to an interpretation of Luther's person as that of a genius. The popular nineteenth-century image of Luther was coined especially by the later Herder with the beginnings of a relation of Luther to a German national religion.[2] The Wittenberg representation of Luther, unveiled in 1821, and the 1868 Luther Memorial in Worms, show how he was more and more celebrated in national Protestantism as the one who had liberated 'his country' from Roman and 'non-German' influences (Ultramontanism).[3]

Luther's anti-Judaism, as well, was appropriated by the anti-Semitism of the Third Reich, and incorporated into a revival of his nationalistic image.[4] This use kindled debates (often abbreviating historical processes), especially abroad, as to the extent to which Luther's understanding of government and rule was to be made responsible for a German distance from the Western democratic model (Sonderweg, Ger., 'special way'). In a similar manner, in the Marxist view as it manifested itself especially in the German Democratic Republic, Luther was presented as a prince's vassal who followed orders, contrasted with revolutionary Thomas Müntzer. Only with the Luther Jubilee of 1983 did that country reach, in a framework of the 'early middle-class revolution,' a positive appraisal of Luther's role. By contrast, in the perception of the Federal Republic of Germany, it was Luther's religious role that had remained determinative. That role, however, was increasingly awash in social history; at the same time, the confessionalistic polemic was overcome by way of an ecumenical rapprochement. With the resolution of the ideological confrontations, Luther's name and figure outside the churches seem to be mainly those of a tourist attraction.

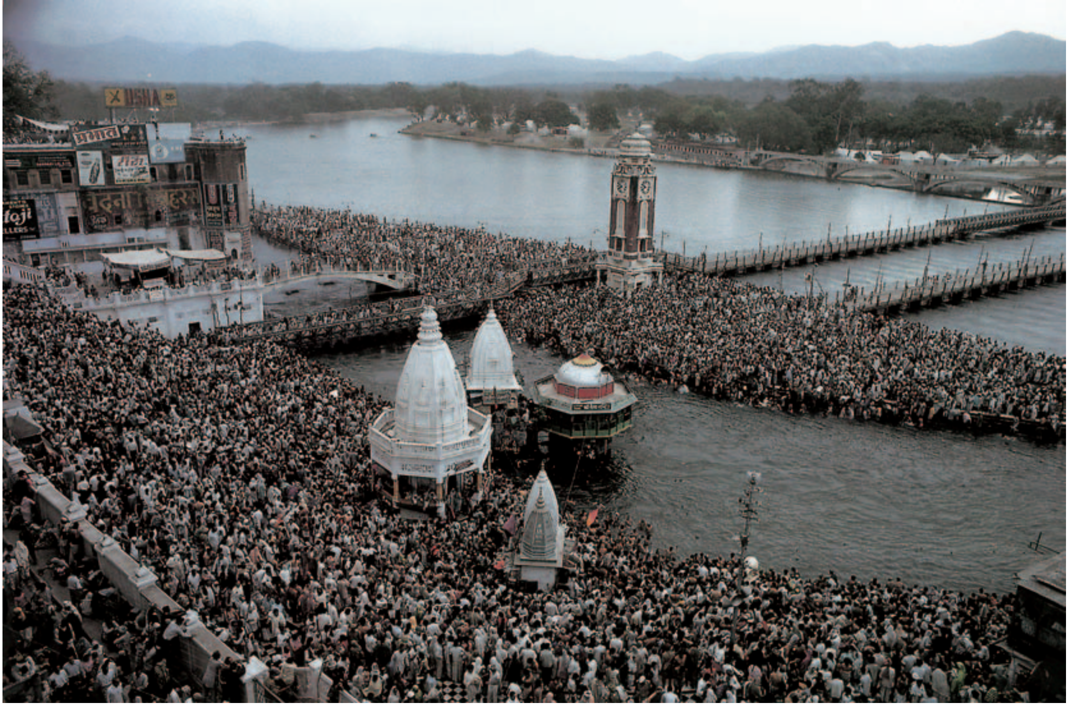
Luther in the Protestant Culture of Piety

4. Luther gives Lutheran piety a religious identity of its own, and makes it tangible. Eventually, then, not only a concentration of Reformation Jubilees on his person, but also St. Martin's day on November 11, Luther's baptismal and name day, received new meaning, in the memory of a Luther impregnated with traits of a traditional veneration of the saints. Here Luther appears not only as an eminent individual figure, but as a normative example of the Christian life. Over and again, the image of his marriage, an image that varied with the time, has been used for the stabilization of a Protestant family ethos seen as having its exemplary realization in the parsonage.

1. Bornkamm 1970, 15.
2. Ibid., 26.
3. Hofmann 1983, 516.
4. Bornkamm 1970, 168ff.

Literature

Primary Sources: Luther's Works, ed. by J. J. Pelikan and H. T. Lehmann, 56 vols., St. Louis/Philadelphia 1955ff.



Secondary Literature: Bornkamm, Heinrich, Luther im Spiegel der deutschen Geistesgeschichte, Heidelberg [2]1970; Bornkamm, Heinrich (ed.), Luther: A Profile, London 1973; Althaus, Paul, The Theology of Martin Luther, Philadelphia 1966; Ebeling, Gerhard, Luther: An Introduction to His Thought, London 1972; Hofmann, Werner (ed.), Luther und die Folgen für die Kunst, Munich 1983; Brecht, Martin, Martin Luther, 3 vols., Minneapolis 1985–1993; Oberman, Heiko A., Luther: Man Between God and the Devil, New Haven 1989; Bainton, Roland Herbert, Here I Stand: Martin Luther, Oxford 1994; Schwarz, Reinhard, Luther, Göttingen [2]1998; Lohse, Bernhard, Martin Luther's Theology: Its Historical and Systematic Development, Minneapolis 1999; Steinmetz, David C., Luther in Context, Grand Rapids [2]2002.

→ Christianity, Protestantism, Reformation

Volker Leppin

An everyday Italian scene in Milan: Archangel Michael on a transparency on the window of a pickup truck. Ever since the Book of Daniel (10:13) and the battle with the dragon in Revelation (12:7-12), Michael has been seen as the quintessential champion of good against evil. In his mythical function as Commander of the Heavenly Host, he repels all attacks on God and the faithful. From this role proceeds his everyday task, in the Christian tradition, especially in the Mediterranean region: Michael's image functions as a magic shield, against the threats of daily life, against diseases, and even against the 'dirty tricks' of today's traffic. (Hubert Mohr)

The Kumbha-mela ranks as the world's largest festival. During the month-long mela, many millions of pilgrims gather to bathe in the Ganges (the Ganga), which flows past Hardwar at the foot of the last stray Himalaya, into the Ganges. The festivities appeal to the myth of the Kumbha: as the gods agitated the ocean of milk, the Kumbha, among others, arrived, to produce from the floods the urn that bestowed the nectar of immortality, in order to bear the precious vessel to safety from the demons. It was drawn out of the water by Jayanta, the son of Indra, in the form of a crow. On the way, Jayanta set the urn down in three places: in Prayag and Hardwar on the Ganges, in Nasik at the river Godavari, and in Ujjain on the Sipra. In these four places, the bathing festival takes place. Every twelve years, the Purna-kumbha ('full urn') is celebrated, the lesser festival Ardh-Kumbha ('half urns') after six years each time. The festivals are held by turns, so that every three years a Purna-kumbha is celebrated in one of the four places. (Kirsten Holzapfel)

According to Buddhist tradition, Siddhartha Gautama achieved the redeeming insight, and became the Buddha, while sitting in meditation at the foot of a fig poplar. In the northern Indian pilgrimage place Bodh Gayā (state of Bihar) such a tree can be found today. In its shadow a seat with a red stone plate marks the place of Gautama's enlightenment. During the yearly pilgrimage feast of Tibetan Buddhists, the tree is decorated with colored prayer flags. Behind the tree is the Mahābodhi stupa ("Stupa of the Great Enlightenment"), surrounded by temples of Burmese, Chinese, Japanese, Nepalese, Taiwanese, and Tibetan Buddhists. The tree of Bodh Gayā stimulated many legends and artistic representations (as the Bodhi tree, i.e. the 'Tree of the Awakening'). (Kirsten Holzapfel)

‘Clarism’ was the private religion of painter and writer Elisàr von Kuppfer (1872–1942) and his life partner philosopher Eduard von Meyer. The two propagated the vision of a ‘clearworld,’ populated exclusively by beautiful, naked young men and butterflies, not only in their programmatic writings, but also in a construction in sacred architecture, the Sanctuarium artis Elisarion, (Lat., “Elysian Sanctuary of Art”) in Locarno-Minusio (1927–1939). Kupffer himself expressed favorite men in a monumental cycle of frescos and in oil painting. His painting, “The New Disciple” (in Ital., Il Nuovo Seguace, 291 × 141 cm including frame, tempera on wood) depicts a homoerotic initiation in a medieval Christian atmosphere: in an altar space, before a Gothic window wall, the initiand (right) swears on the (ritual) sword. A kind of backwards-facing utopia, it is an audacious blend of ‘churchliness’ with naked, ‘pagan’ corporality. The painting originally occupied a place in the great rotunda that housed the central sanctuary, and thus is a sacred image in the strict sense. (Hubert Mohr)

Greek Orthodox monks preparing icons. Their work is strictly governed by rules, which are set down in particular painting manuals (in Gk., hermeneía, items for [enabling] interpretation'). It begins with the creation of a background, on cloth that has been glued onto (usually) a wooden tablet. Then comes the sketch, in which outlines and divisions are traced according to a model or pattern. Before the actual painting is done, the layers of gold are imposed—in this case, as provided in the rule, reserved for background, auras (here, halos), and parts of the garment of the Christ. The colors are applied 'from shadow to light'—first the darkest (readily visible in the left background), then the brighter, as appropriate for the elements of the picture. After the 'chrysography' (application of gold embellishment), and drying (lasting perhaps a year), the icon receives its protective varnish, the secret of each school. Formerly, or indeed as shown here, during the act of painting, the theologically indispensable inscription is applied. The motif in the foreground shows Mary, in an attitude of prayer (orant); on her lap, Christ, painted after the 'Emmanuel' (Isa 7:14) style of image, the preexistent logos: as an 'elderly child' (H. Fischer), beardless, with a high forehead. (Hubert Mohr)

Legend has it that it was in the mountain forest of Sorte (Venezuela) that goddess Maria Lionza once overcame an anaconda in combat. Now a girl suffering from muscular atrophy, accompanied by her parents, meets with a medium there for a healing ceremony. The new Maria Lionza cult, a movement very popular in Venezuela, began during the time between the two World Wars. The Marialionzistas, who regard themselves as Catholics, believe in a Christian God as director of the world; and between him and human beings come mediating spirits, along with their leader Maria Lionza. The latter, plus Indian spirit Guaicaripuro and African spirit Negro Felipe, make up the 'three powers' (tres potencias). The spirits are impetratory partners in the problems of human beings: they counsel, assist, and heal during this ceremony of velación (Span., 'watch'; lit., 'candle ceremony'): there the spirits manifest themselves in the persons lying on the ground, who are rapt by the mediums into a state of trance and possession. At the healing ceremony, in which candles, flowers, perfumes, the music of drums, and singing are incorporated, a medium traces a diagram on the ground with talc, and the patient is laid at midpoint. Medical instruments lie ready for ritual employment. The medium in the photograph, just being possessed by a Viking spirit, will treat the child, over the course of the some one-hour-long ceremony, with a needle in the spinal area—the 'pretend operation' representing a treatment on a spiritual level. An assistant versed in religion (banco), in the foreground, watches over the progress of the ritual and the actions of the entranced medium. (Benita von Behr)

Nam June Paik, My Faust—Channel 2 (1989), Carl Solway Gallery, Cincinnati, Ohio
Material: butterfly, a 25-“quasar” 10-in. monitor, 2 Sony laser disc players, quartz geode, two fossil slabs, nautilus mussels. Antique wood frame: 266 × 127 × 81 cm.; wood pedestal: 61, 173, 122 cm. Through the frame, multiplied video images, with a Neo-Gothic-altar-like set of furniture, the artist shifts the reception of the image media ironically into the vicinity of religious image-worship. (Rolf Engelbart)

After a nine-year pause, the Bamileke, of Bafoussam in Cameroon, took up the tradition of initiation once more. The Chief of Bafoussam, who in 1975 had to give up a career as a soccer player in order to guide the destinies of his home region, was opposed to the local traditions. Under him, initiations died out in 1975, to be intensively resumed only in 1984, in order, among other things, to strengthen the social cohesion of the Bamileke, who live in large numbers in distant cities of the country or even in the United States. In the picture, a group of first initiands are seen (with headdress of medicine leaves). Higher initiates (with ginger plants in their hands) lead them, to afford them spiritual protection against bush spirits and other dangers. Initiations take place every two years and comprise nine ceremonies for different age groups, which stretch from December to March. The first initiands are, as a rule, nine or ten years old. In view of such a long interruption, however, older youth took part in this initiation, as well. Families sometimes travel long distances to their home region to celebrate the initiation festival there. (Benita von Behr)

Machine

1. Machines (from the Doric Gk. machaná, or Attic mechané), are gears with movable parts serving for a power transfer. Normally, they stand in a fixed location, although, as in the modern traffic system, they can be 'self-moving' (Gk., auto-; Lat., mobile); cf. 'locomotive' (Lat., locus, 'place'; movére, 'to move'). 'Robots' (from the Czech robota, 'compulsory labor,' 'drudgery') and 'automatic' machines (from Gk., autómatos, 'self-') comprise the core of modern technology: without them, the global → industrialization of the economy and the mechanization of the world would be inconceivable. Their success rests on a series of epochal inventions (1765, the steam engine, by James Watt; 1876, the four-stroke engine, by Nikolaus Otto—the 'Otto motor'), by which it became possible to replace human muscular strength with fossil fuels (coal, oil, natural gas) and → electricity (steam generators). 'Automatization' by machine paved the way for the → industrial society. Today's information society, on the other hand, rests no longer on the classic power machine, but on 'trans-classical machines' (computer as Turing machine), that process information on the 'input/output' model.

Deus ex Machina (Lat., 'a god from a machine'): Machines in Worship and Ritual

2. In all ages, machines have performed their functions in sacred service. In the Greek → Mysteries themselves, mechanical apparatus was introduced in order to convey overwhelming or astonishing dramatic effects. Machines are especially well suited for making gods or other mythical beings appear before the astounded believer (→ Epiphany). Thus, if archaeological findings are correctly interpreted,[1] in the oracle of the dead, the nekromanteíon, a central sacred space at Epiric Acheron was duplicated above and beneath, and a mechanical rising stage could 'bring up' figures of gods (actors?). Another much-discussed example is the 'animation of statues' in Egyptian late ancient → Hermetism and its reception in later periods.

The heyday of mechanized mythology, however, was the Renaissance and the Baroque. The explosion in architecture and art, that drew many of its impulses from the rediscovered ancient trade literature (Vitruvius), spurred the engineer-builder to supreme achievements even in permanent scenery, the presentation of rulers, and mythical, theatrical shows. Leading the way was Bernardo Buontalentis (1536–1608), with his mechanical stage setting for the allegorical 'interplays' (in Ital., intermezzi) presented with the comedy "La Pellegrina" (1589) in Florence. There, mythic elements from the Platonic cosmology, such as the 'harmony of the spheres,' were presented in theatrical fashion with a virtuosic stage apparatus. Today, in many places, the tourist can observe that sort of playful machinery as a dramaturgic aid in local sacred dramas, or at festivals. In Southern Italy and the Philippines, for example, small children dressed as angels waft about with mechanical assistance in the air over the festival. The mechanization of cult does not even stop short of the functionaries: in the Buddhist prayer room of the main cemetery of Yokoyama (Japan), an automatic priest carries out the ritual singing of four monks.[2]

However, machines in sacred services are used not only as dramaturgic devices; they can also bring fortune and wealth as potent divine attributes, as with the West African Voodoo deity Gun, which, as a sign of his might, is provided with iron machine-parts.

L'Homme machine—Mechanistic Anthropology

3. Is there a greater contrast to the religious conception of human beings than the machine? Whether the human body is in the image of God, as in Christianity, or serves as the symbol of the transitory, in the rebirth cycles of Buddhism, it is always a whole that is more than its parts. The modern European Enlightenment makes a fundamental break with this notion, and (especially with Descartes) compares machine models of the cosmic 'world machine' (in Lat., machina mundi) with the human being as a microcosmic one. This approach has the advantage of rendering all elements explainable right down to the last: they need neither God nor a soul. A similar materialistic view of humanity, which prescribes itself a radical monism (as opposed to the Platonic Christian body-soul dualism), finds its most consistent promoter in Julien Offray de La Metrie (1709–1751) and his handy, polemical L'homme machine ("The Human Being a Machine," 1748). The advantage offered by this model manifestly resides in the notion that each part of the machine (read, 'body') can be isolated, tested as to its capacity for function, and, in given cases, repaired or even replaced—altogether to the point foreseen by today's so often chided 'apparatus medicine.' To be sure, reference was rather ineluctably to rude hydraulic patterns, as later with Freud and a part of psychoanalysis, in its effort to present the physiology and (drive) dynamics of the organism; Enlightenment figure Helvétius speaks of a "millwheel moved by a waterfall (and) moving the piston";[3] and again, Gilles Deleuze and Félix Guattari have their drive machines moistly and merrily couple in their Anti-Oedipus (1972). Here, however, the materialistic image of the human being seems to bump up against a wall, where it is not enough to "situate [the human being] in the machine depot he has produced" (K. Meyer-Drawe), as it is the case with complex physiological as well as psychological medical diagnoses.

'Moloch Machine'—the Myth of the Machine

4. The introduction of machines to industrial production in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries led to a profound revision of the working world, and to the appearance of the mass status of workers. Since then, in ever-new waves, machines have replaced manual labor, and jobs are rationalized through automation. The rage of those affected by the mechanical competitors, expressed in the early nineteenth century in violent assaults on machines ('Maschinenstürme'), has subsided, it is true; but the—altogether real—fear of a reversal in (work) relations, in which the human being is a slave instead of the owner of machines, is still current in manifold mythic images. Often people refer to the biblical social myth of the 'Moloch machine' of the Bible that evokes revulsion at the sacrifice of children to the Phoenician 'god king' (Heb., malakh). That kind of demonic machine is shown in Fritz Lang's 1927 science-fiction film "Metropolis," with the pictures that he has left etched in the observer's imaginations: Lang's machine is a nightmarish monster, at once the worker-gulping vehicle of a modern cult of Baal, and the mechanized jaws of hell. Besides the scenario of alienation, from helplessness and humiliation before the machine, in "Metropolis" the ever more current fear of the uncontrollable machine came into the foreground. It was to acquire many sympathizers in the 1970s and 1980s, and dominate a discussion of the industrial use of nuclear power and the ecological debate, especially after the catastrophe in the Ukrainian atomic power factory in Chernobyl in 1986. The fear of the sorcerer's apprentice in the face of the independently thinking and acting machine is growing with the trans-classical machine, the computer. Just so, it has been composed into a mythic image by a filmmaker, Stanley Kubrick, in "2001—A Space Odyssey" (1968), with HAL, the thinking machine, that sees its own perfection placed in danger by the fallible man, and thus pursues his obliteration. The future, then, seems to imply the necessity of an ethics not only of human intercourse with machines, but also of intercourse with human beings on the part of machines having 'artificial intelligence'—if machines were to be rendered capable of autonomous activity in a certain area or scope. This, too, has been contemplated, in Isaac Asimov's Three Laws of Robotics.[4] Lurking in the wings, however, is an even deeper fear: that the machine might propagate itself, becoming its own creator. The fear that the created one rebels against its creator culminates during twentieth century in the neomyth of the 'Machines' war against man' put in nightmarish images in such films as "Blade Runner" (Ridley Scott, 1982), "Terminator" 1–3 (James Cameron, 1984, 1991 ["Judgement Day"]; Jonathan Mostow, 2003 ["Rise of the Machines"]) and the "Matrix" trilogy (Wachowski brothers, 1999–2003).

Desire Machines

5. There are machines that are more than a machine: they are companions on a journey, inventory in a domicile, objects of devotion. Computers, and automatic machines (bikes, taxis, busses), in good animistic fashion, are given names, and hung with protective amulets (→ Evil Eye; Everyday Life). Computers are more and more becoming communicating machines, conversation partners, as with Joseph Weizenbaum's therapy program "Eliza."[5] The 'personal computer' in the house today provides the long yearned for access to the Internet and cyberspace, to wish spaces with the promise of the virtual (fool's) paradise, where all longings are fulfilled to overflowing. The silly smile of perpetual beatitude, with which the computer industry advertises its products, betrays the shallowness of that industry. The computer is the perfect "machine for a bachelor society" ("Junggesellenmaschine" [H. Szeemann]), created for godlike fantasies of power, paranoid private mythologies, and lonely joys.

1. Dakaris, Sotiris, The Nekyomanteion of the Acheron, Athens 1993.
2. See the illustration in COLORS, vol. 8 (1994), thematic vol., "Religion," 33.
3. Helvétius, C. A., A Treatise on Man; his intellectual faculties and his education (1772), tr. from the French, with additional notes, by W. Hooper, London 1777.
4. Asimov, Isaak, I, Robot, 1950.
5. Bammé 1983, 30-35.

Literature

Bammé, Arno et al., Maschinen-Menschen, Mensch-Maschinen, Reinbek 1983; Berns, Jörg Jochen, Die Herkunft des Automobils aus Himmelstrionfo und Höllenmaschine, Berlin 1996; Giedion, Sigfried, Mechanization Takes Command: A Contribution to Anonymous History, New York 1948; Meyer-Drawe, Käte, "Maschine," in: Wulf, Christoph (ed.), Vom Menschen. Handbuch Historische Anthropologie, Weinheim 1997, 729-737; Strong, Roy, Art and Power: Renaissance Festivals 1450–1650, Woodbridge 1984; Szeemann, Harald, Junggesellenmaschinen (Catalogue), Bern etc. 1975.

→ Epiphany, Feasts and Celebrations, Industrial Society, Liturgy/Dramaturgy, Drama (Sacred), Work

Hubert Mohr

Machu Picchu / Cuzco

1. The capital of the extinct Inca Empire, Cuzco, lies 3,326 m above sea level, in the southern Andes of Peru. Since the invasion of Spanish mercenaries under the leadership of Francisco Pizarro in 1532, and the ensuing colonization by European powers, the plundered city continuously waned in importance. Today, however, with some 300,000 inhabitants, it is rising to the status of an important center of trade and tourism. In its vicinity, accessible by train, lie the ruins of the Inca temple-city Machu Picchu.

Cuzco—the City

2. a) Cuzco was both the strategic and political center of the Inca Empire, the Tahuantinsuyu (Aztec, "Totality of the Four World-Regions"), and the heart of its religion. That Empire comprised almost the entire region of the Andes. Under the last Incan king, Atahualpa (1527–1533), it had just reached its maximum extension at the moment of the Spanish invasion, and stretched from the provincial capital of Quito (Ecuador), far to the south in the region of today's Chile. To the west, it was bounded by the Pacific Ocean, to the east by the Amazonian rain forest. Cuzco's central space, today's Plaza de Armas (Span., "Arms Place") was the common point of contact of the four imperial provinces, and thereby of eminent importance for military and religious ceremonies. Around it lay the palaces of the Inca ruler.

The Inca Empire

b) Around 1200, the tribe of the Incas, presumably emigrating from the region of Lake Titicaca, founded a sacred, absolutist government, maintained by a priestly caste, in the Valley of Cuzco. Its members were without exception members of the Inca tribe. Beginning at least by the time of Inca king (Sapay Inka) Pachacutic (1438–1471), Inca kings had themselves honored theocratically, as sons of the sun god Inti. Besides the devotion to the god king, older, regionally distinct divinities were worshiped also, such as, 'Earth Mother' Pachamama, as well as numerous lesser deities. Many animals (panther, llama, and condor), along with mountains and springs, were elevated to the rank of 'Huacas.' Down to the present day, in the Indian Quichua language, the word huaca ('sacred,' 'holy') is used as a designation of burial places. This usage suggests a connection with a devotion to ancestors.

In Cuzco's great temple, the Coricancha ('Gold Court'), a stupendous, lavishly adorned architectural creation, distinguished by its astonishingly well-joined walls, libations and animal sacrifices (no → human sacrifices) were offered, especially a fermented maize drink sold today in Cuzco's taverns as a kind of beer.

c) In the Catholic Christianity propagated in Peru by massive mission, elements of Incan piety have survived in rudimentary syncretistic form: thus, in the festival cultures (e.g., uniting the celebration of the summer solstice with those of the feast days of Catholic saints), in the church liturgy, and in art (music, painting, for example in the "Cuzco school"). Of the innumerable temples, however, with their treasures and figures, scarcely a trace remains. It was part of the Spaniards' tactics of subjugation to build churches and monasteries on the foundations of temples.

Tourism, introduced in recent decades, seems to be connected with the fascination of Cuzco as the sacred center of a once powerful, pre-modern civilization. Like another object of spiritualized journeys in the mountains—Nepal's Katmandu—the city attracts especially young Western backpack and 'alternative' travelers.

Machu Picchu

3. a) The picturesque ruins of Machu Picchu in the subtropical rain forest of the spur of the Andes are of unique interest for this type of traveler. Presumably an abandoned settlement even before the coming of the Spaniards, it came to public knowledge only in 1911, through the work of American archaeologist Hiram Bingham. The function of the formerly inaccessible layout, today easily accessible by highways, is not precisely known. A high female proportion of skeletal remains points to a use as the dwelling of priestesses, the 'virgins of the sun,' called the Aclla (the 'Select'); at the same time, its defensibility suggests a military function.

Sacred Places

b) In the middle of the elevated temple platform is found a massive, nonrepresentational stone sculpture, the Intihuatana, whose perpendicular pinnacle indicates a function in the veneration of the sun, possibly as an astronomical measuring instrument. There were similar stones in other Incan places of worship, as well. On grounds of their archaic, monolithic, and at the same time enigmatic appearance, that admits of many interpretations, these stones offer a suitable projection screen for a romantic enthusiasm for an unadulterated lost Inca religion, close to nature. A ritual function seems to have attached to another stone sculpture at Machu Picchu, a block of stone designated as the "Sacred Stone," whose contour replicates the horizon of the mountains behind it. The 'sacred' character of these places appeals to visitors of a 'New Age' orientation who accordingly receive tailored offers of trips to be organized. Machu Picchu thereby offers a good example for the continuity of sacred places in the history of religion.

4. In view of irrecoverable, lost tradition, and the meager state of the sources (the Incas knew no historiography), a reconstruction, or, might it be, even a revival of the Inca religion, if indeed desirable, seems possible only in very limited measure. Indigenous cultures are always very consistently advertised with more commitment by the tourist industry than by descendants of the Inca—the Peruvian, Ecuadorian, and Bolivian Indians of the highlands. Based on the examples of Machu Picchu and Cuzco, the modern tourist industry raises the question whether a clear distinction can be made between the function of the locale as place of cult, and as cultural memorial. Indeed, visitors' interests are a mixture of religious and secular.

Literature

Primary Sources: Garcilaso de la Vega, el Inca, Royal Commentaries of the Incas, and General History of Peru, Austin 1966.

Secondary Literature: Bauer, Brian S., Ancient Cuzco: Heartland of the Inca, Austin 2004; Frost, Peter, Exploring Cuzco, Lima 1979 (travel guide); Walker, Charles F., Smoldering Ashes: Cuzco and the Creation of Republican Peru, 1780–1840, Durham etc. 1999; Zuidema, R. Tom, Inca Civilization in Cuzco, Austin 1990.

→ Mission, Power, Place (Sacred), South America, Tourism

Christian Lange

Macrocosm

The microcosm/macrocosm analogy regards the human being as a 'little world' and as an image of the 'big world' (the cosmos) that stands in relationship with it or is influenced by it (thus, by way of example, that certain constellations of stars determine human destiny; → Astrology). Various religions, and Weltanschauung traditions, host a conception of these chains of laws: by way of example, in → Buddhism and → Lamaism they are present in the correspondences of the cosmos or stars and the energy channels in the human body; they also prevail in ritual practice (Tantrism, Yoga), and in the Tibetan → Mandala. In the alchemical symbol of the egg God's creation is rehearsed 'in little.' The purpose of microcosm and macrocosm analogies is to evoke the aspect of totality (holism), a concept found today in alternative medicine (body/soul/mind), as well as in esoteric concepts.

→ Astrology, Esotericism, Meaning/Signification

Jutta Bernard

Magic

Origins of the Term 'Magic'

The term "magic" has served to indicate, in the history of Western culture, a variety of ideas and of practices, often related to religion and/or science. Consequently, the term has been historically defined and understood in many different ways, according to the context in which it has been used. The ancient Greek term mageía, which is at the origin of all modern words related to 'magic,' had a Persian origin, and served to indicate, since its adoption by Greek culture, religious activities considered to be exotic, unsanctioned, or forbidden. The term kept these mostly negative connotations in Roman culture, where it was translated as magia. Especially during the late Hellenistic period, however, more positive connotations of magic began to manifest themselves, as appears in contemporary documents such as Apuleius's (c. 125–170 CE) Apologia and the so-called "Greek Magical Papyri." In this context magic was used not so much to describe the practices or the beliefs of others, as had been mostly the case so far, but positively claimed and self-assumed by the authors. The rise of Christianity, however, would add new weight and contents to the negative connotations of magic, which would remain dominant in Western culture until very recent times. The subsequent conflict between negative and positive views of magic remains one of the most significant, and for a long time underestimated, aspects of Western culture.

Attempts at Definition and Their Critique

Since the second half of the nineteenth century, scholars working in the social sciences (anthropology, sociology, psychology) and in the study of religion have repeatedly tried to define the term as a more or less universal category of human thought and/or behavior, in contrast with (and often in opposition to) other broad categories such as → 'religion' and → 'science.' In so doing they have often translated into scholarly discourse some of the old polemical dichotomies that have marked the history of this notion in the West. These abstract, universal definitions of magic have been increasingly criticized after the Second World War, and especially since the 1970s, under the impact of postmodern and postcolonial theories. Scholarly notions of magic have been seen as ethnocentric and inherently biased, thereby compromising an objective understanding of the phenomena to which they would be applied. As a consequence, if magic as a strict theoretical problem has not disappeared altogether, as is shown by several recent attempts at revitalizing its use as a valid scholarly category, it seems nevertheless that it has shifted, from the center of methodological debate in the social sciences, to its margins. For instance, it is perhaps significant to note that in a recent survey of the most important terms in religious studies, magic was not included at all.[1] At the same time, however, magic has become the object of an increasingly large number of detailed historical analyses, aimed at understanding the evolution of its concept (or, rather, the constellation of concepts associated to it) in Western history. The recent development of a new field specifically devoted to the study of Western → esotericism has offered, among others, a convenient frame for the historical study of a subject that had been neglected, from that perspective, for too long. For this reason, magic still shows signs of great vitality as an object of scholarly study.

A Cornucopia of Classifications

Given the great complexity and breadth of the scholarly debate on magic during the last 130 years, and of the number of theories and definitions which have been proposed during this span of time, the following summary restricts itself to the main figures and stages of this debate. Several classifications of theories of magic have been proposed: evolutionist, intellectualist, sociological, emotionalist, functionalist, depending on the aspects on which the various definitions of magic have focused or the ways in which they have been constructed.

Edward B. Tylor

The most important authors belonging to what has been called the intellectualist school are the British Edward B. Tylor (1832–1917) and James G. Frazer (1854–1941). These two authors were also particularly influenced by the evolutionist theories of their times (→ Evolutionism; Theory of Evolution). Their theories have been defined as intellectualist because, in their view, the presence of magic could be explained in terms of processes of thought, rather than social behavior, mostly related to a primitive stage of human evolution. Tylor, often considered as the founder of modern anthropology, did not, unlike Frazer, elaborate a full-fledged theory of magic, nor did he trace a sharp distinction between religion and magic, but he dealt with the subject in several of his works, mainly in his highly influential Primitive Culture (1871). For Tylor magic is the result of a wrong association of ideas, typical (but not exclusive) of the 'primitive man.' The primitive man mistakes the subjective for the objective plan, and thinks that objects associated in his mind because of accidental similarity or analogy should also be connected in objective reality. It is mostly on the basis of these illusory connections, sometimes understood as impersonal principles or forces, that magic works in the view of 'primitive man.' The belief in spiritual beings, on the other hand, does not play a significant role in Tylor's definition of magic, and is rather at the basis of his "minimum definition of religion" (→ Animism). Tylor contrasts the magical way of thinking of the primitive man especially with the supposedly rational, scientific one of the modern man, and only to a lesser extent with the religious one. In the economy of Tylor's ideas, therefore, the distinction between magic and science was much sharper than the one between magic and religion.

James G. Frazer

Frazer systematically presents his ideas on magic beginning with the second edition of his classic The Golden Bough (1900). According to him, magic is clearly and neatly distinguished both from science and religion, and they form together a sort of triad. The distinction is not only intellectual, but also in terms of evolution. Frazer posits that magic, religion, and science belong to three successive stages of human evolution, which go from the most primitive to the present, modern and enlightened stage. Frazer's distinction between the three modes of thought is obviously inspired by Tylor. Magic is based on wrong associations of ideas, religion on the belief in spiritual entities, and science, having emancipated from both, represents a finally valid, objective view of reality. But Frazer introduces an interesting nuance in giving also a positive connotation to magic. The latter is in fact closer to science than religion (although it represents a more primitive stage on the evolutionary scale) because it recognizes the presence of natural, immutable laws governing the universe, however mistakenly primitive man understands them. Religion, on the other hand, renounces the idea of universal natural laws because it prefers to believe in the intervention of gods or other spiritual entities, whose range of action would not be limited by any natural regularity. It is interesting to notice, in this respect, that religion is supposed to deal with those entities with an attitude of veneration or submission. However, magic and religion can find themselves mixed sometimes, when the belief in spiritual beings is not accompanied by this attitude of veneration, but rather by one of coercion. In the latter case these beings are treated like inanimate agents. In this manner Frazer, who was following here the ideas of W. Robertson Smith (1846–1894), was clearly giving a scholarly coat to a distinction (veneration vs. coercion), which had been used polemically in traditional theological discourses on magic, and which would remain highly influential in subsequent scholarly discourses on magic. Frazer also elaborated and systematized the explanation of the wrong association of ideas on which magic was supposed to be based. For him magic can be of two kinds: 'contagious' (when two objects that have been in physical contact are imagined to maintain a reciprocal influence even after they are separated), or 'homeopathic' (when the reciprocal influence is a consequence of the similarity of the two objects).

Sociological Interpretations

Some early sociological interpretations of magic can be found already in the writings of the British historian of Semitic cultures, W. Robertson Smith (Lectures on the Religion of the Semites, 1889). Robertson Smith's ideas on magic influenced later, in the early years of the twentieth century, the French group of scholars gathered around the figure of Emile Durkheim (1858–1917). Durkheim himself (Les Formes élémentaires de la vie religieuse, Fr., "The Elementary Forms of Religious Life"; 1912), and more systematically his colleagues Marcel Mauss (1872–1950) and Henri Hubert (1870–1927) (Esquisse d'une théorie générale de la magie, Fr., "A General Theory of Magic"; 1904) addressed the problem of magic within the context of their largely shared ideas on religion and society. Instead of focusing on the mode of thought of individuals, like the English intellectualists, this group of French sociologists preferred to emphasize the social conditions in which the phenomenon of magic develops. According to them, religion is the expression of a social structure and serves to maintain the cohesion of a community. Religious rites are, therefore, public and directed at the common wealth of the social group. Magic, on the other hand, is practiced on a private basis, and its aims are mostly individualistic. They at best ignore, and at worst go against, the common interests of the community. Thus, magic represents an anti-social phenomenon, which can explain why it is frequently forbidden and marginalized. On the other hand, magic and religion seem to be found in any given social structure, and no chronological precedence is attributed to one over the other, as Frazer had believed.

Despite the difference of approach from the intellectualist school, it is rather easy to see that this sociological interpretation of magic is reminiscent as well of older polemical discourses on magic, mostly of a theological nature. It could be argued that, with the intellectualist and the sociological theories of magic the stage was set for all later discussions on the topic. Most of them will in fact build, often critically, on the ideas of these two different interpretations of the phenomenon.

R. R. Marett

Not only the French sociological school criticized the intellectualist theories of magic. Also in England, in the same years, the anthropologist and philosopher R. R. Marett (1866–1943) elaborated a different kind of criticism. Marett's approach has been called emotionalist, because he does not focus on the association of ideas, but on the human emotions that he sees at the origin of both magic and religion. In his view, and in opposition to Frazer's theories, in a primitive culture magic and religion do not differentiate themselves, but rather belong to a continuum. For this reason, he has preferred to use the expression 'magico-religious' in that context. However, he also gives a specific explanation of magic as distinct from religion, which applies especially to more complex cultures. Magic arises from emotional tensions that cannot be relieved by operating directly on their source, and must therefore be solved in a symbolic or ritual way.

B. Malinowski

This explanation was particularly influential and stood at the origin of functionalist theories of magic, as expressed by the Polish-born anthropologist Bronislaw Malinowski (1884–1942). Malinowski is particular important in the history of anthropology for having advocated participant observation as an indispensable tool for studying and understanding other cultures. Unlike previous anthropologists, who studied 'primitive' cultures on second-hand reports, Malinowski spent long periods of time with the groups that were the object of his research, on the Trobriand Islands (Pacific Ocean). For Malinowski magic offers the means to solve situations of emotional stress, which is provoked in primitive man by a lack of technology and, consequently, of control of the natural environment in which he lives and operates. Magic is different from religion, because, unlike the latter, it is always goal-directed. It is interesting to note that, in Malinowski's view, magic seems to acquire a positive function, because it can help both the individual and the community to overcome difficult situations in which neither science nor religion may be of help. It is of course tempting to relate this new, relatively positive vision of magic to the new approach of field-research and participant observation. Under the impact of a direct contact with the 'primitive' populations, old ideological assumptions concerning magic, obviously related to the particular history of Western culture, began perhaps to show their limits.

L. Lévy-Bruhl

Another author who must be mentioned here, more because of the influence he has had on later discourses on magic than for his direct treatment of the subject, is Lucien Lévy-Bruhl (1857–1939). Lévy-Bruhl did not produce a definite theory on magic, but he was particularly interested in understanding the functioning of primitive mentality and its difference from modern, scientific mentality. In his view primitive, or pre-logical, mentality is based on a particular way of thinking which he calls 'participation.' This way of thinking is not considered as erroneous, childlike, or pathological. It is just based on different premises, and, being consistent with those premises, cannot even be considered as 'irrational.' Participation, unlike scientific thought, is not based on causality. The mystical mind of the primitive sees a relation of identity and consubstantiality between persons and objects. The primitive can therefore believe in direct action on reality in a way that would be incompatible with normal causality.

Several authors, including the English anthropologist E. E. Evans-Pritchard (1902–1973), criticized Lévy-Bruhl for supposing that it is possible to divide humanity between those who have a pre-logical mentality and those who have a scientific one. As a consequence, late in his life he modified his theory and admitted that both mentalities could be found in all cultures, including the modern Western one. Lévy-Bruhl's ideas on pre-logical mentality represented an important step in that they helped emancipate 'primitive' man from the prejudice of being incapable of sound reasoning. He tried to understand his way of thinking on its own terms, and not only in relation to modern Western thinking, and thereby paved the way for later developments in the same direction, such as C. Lévi-Strauss's structuralism.

E. E. Evans-Pritchard

In his definition of magic, Malinowski had given universal value to his findings in the field, although they had been originally limited to a particular area of the Pacific (→ South Sea). Other authors engaged in field-research after him criticized this aspect of his work and followed a different direction. Such is the case with the aforementioned Edward E. Evans-Pritchard. In his classic study on an African population, Witchcraft, Oracles, and Magic among the Azande (1937), Evans-Pritchard defined magic only in the terms of the culture he had studied, without pretending to make any conclusions on a supposedly universal nature of magic. In that context, therefore, magic refers to and translates a set of concepts, which have already their own specificity in the culture at issue. In so doing Evans-Pritchard broke with a tradition of universal, abstract definitions of magic, which he knew very well (Theories of Primitive Religion, 1965). The influence of his ideas will begin to be felt especially after the Second World War, but since then, social scientists have found it increasingly difficult to avoid the theoretical and methodological problems posed by the use of magic as a universal category. It is noteworthy that three of the most influential anthropologists of the post-war period, C. Lévi-Strauss (b. 1908), Clifford Geertz (b. 1926), and Edmund Leach (1910–1989), despite their considerable differences on other points, have either come to the conclusion that magic as a scholarly concept should be dissolved, or have ignored the issue altogether, no doubt considering it as irrelevant for the needs of the discipline. On the other hand, recent ambitious attempts at reviving magic as a universal scholarly category, such as D. L. O'Keefe's Stolen Lightning (1982), have not been able to create a wide consensus among scholars.

Magic as Polemical Discourse

During the post-war period two authors among others, the Italian E. de Martino (1908–1965) and the American R. Styers (b. 1958), have focused on the role that discourses on magic have had for the shaping of the cultural identity of the West and for the rise of modernity, and have helped to assess the problem of magic in new, potentially very fruitful ways. In De Martino's views (Magia e civiltà, 1962) Western culture has been characterized by the recurrence of an anti-magical polemic, which, by a sort of dialectical process, has contributed creatively in defining the particular features of Western culture. De Martino sees in many of the scholarly theories of magic a continuation of this polemic under a new form. Styers, on the other hand (Making Magic, 2004), has focused more specifically on the importance of discourses of magic for the development of modernity. In his view, these discourses, in defining the illicit in three particular fields (the field of religious piety, the field of reason, and the field of sexuality), have tried to regulate them in ways meant to be compatible with the project of modernity.

Magic in Historical Research

Finally, apart from the social sciences, it is probably in the field of history that research on magic has shown the greatest vitality in the past twenty years. This scholarly output, insofar as it focuses on the history of magic in Western culture, seems to be able to avoid the problems of definition, as it finds the term magic used in an emic sense in the literature it studies. Most periods of → European history of religion have been the object of recent scholarly studies focused on magic. The Greco-Roman period in particular and the medieval period have been explored by new groundbreaking research. The period after the → Enlightenment, which has attracted so far less interest from scholars than other periods, is now beginning to be studied too in that perspective.

1. Taylor, Mark C. (ed.), Critical Terms for Religious Studies, Chicago/London 1998.

Literature

Belier, Wouter W., "Religion and Magic: Durkheim and the Année sociologique group", in: Method and Theory in the Study of Religion 7,2 (1995), 163-184; Cunningham, Graham, Religion and Magic: Approaches and Theories, New York 1999; de Martino, Ernesto, Magia e civiltà, Milan 1962; Evans-Pritchard, Edward E., "The Intellectualist (English) Interpretation of Magic," in: Bulletin of the Faculty of Arts, University of Egypt 1,2 (1933), 283-311; Idem, Theories of Primitive Religion, Oxford 1965; Hanegraaff, Wouter J., "The Emergence of the Academic Science of Magic: The Occult Philosophy in Tylor and Frazer," in: Molendjik, Arie L./Pels, Peter (eds.), Religion in the Making: The Emergence of the Sciences of Religion, Leiden 1998, 253-275; Kippenberg, Hans G./Luchesi, Brigitte (eds.), Magie: Die sozialwissenschaftliche Kontroverse über das Verstehen fremden Denkens, Frankfurt/M. 1978; Kippenberg, Hans G., Discovering Religious History in the Modern Age, Princeton 2001; Meyer, Birgit/Pels, Peter (eds.), Magic and Modernity: Interfaces of Revelation and Concealment, Stanford 2003; O'Keefe, Daniel Lawrence, Stolen Lightning: The Social Theory of Magic, New York 1982; Styers, Randall, Making Magic: Religion, Magic, and Science in the Modern World, Oxford/New York 2004; Sullivan, Lawrence E. (ed.), Hidden Truths: Magic, Alchemy, and the Occult, New York/London 1989; Tambiah, Stanley Jeyaraja, Magic, Science, Religion, and the Scope of Rationality, Cambridge 1990; Versnel, Hendrik S., "Some Reflections on the Relationship Magic-Religion," in: Numen 38,2 (1991), 177-197.

→ Amulet, Electricity, Enlightenment, Esotericism, Evil Eye, Evolutionism, Occultism, Paganism/Neopaganism, Power, Rationalism/Irrationalism, Religion, Science, Witch/ Persecution of Witches

Marco Pasi

Mandala

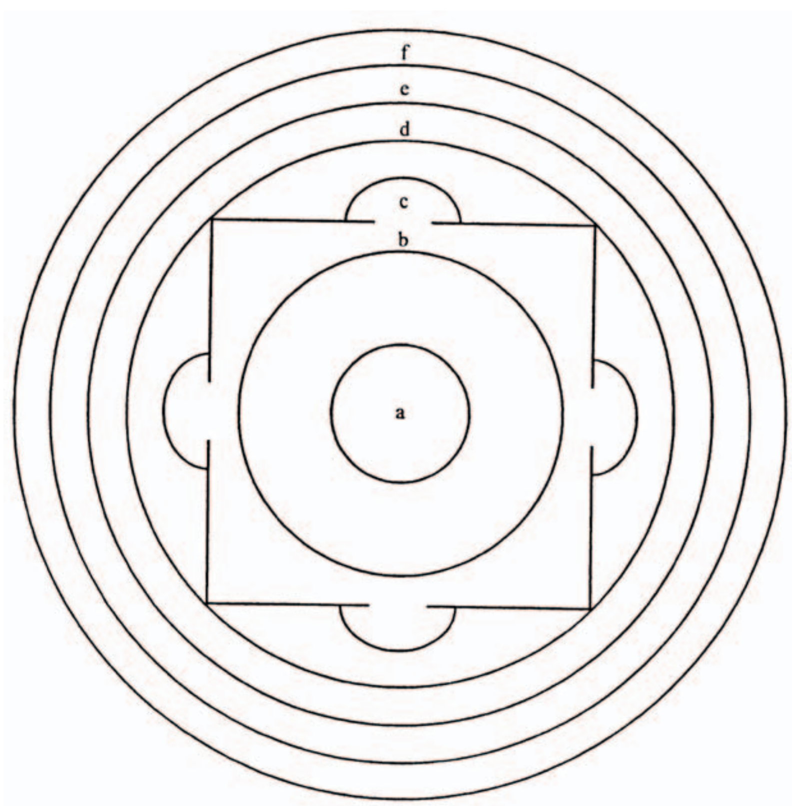
1. In its general meaning, a mandala is a circle that divides a sacred place from the profane sphere. In Tibetan Buddhism (→ Lamaism), the concept designates a diagram bringing central doctrinal content to graphic expression, and serving as an aid for meditation. Through the aspects of a mandala, viewers may recall their religious tradition, and have practical meditation experiences as well.

The basic form of the mandala consists in a concentric arrangement of circles and squares, together yielding a symmetrical, closed area. It represents a two-dimensional palace installation. There are also three-dimensional representations. Inside the three outer circles, there is a rectangle, the 'Celestial Palace.' Its basic outline resembles the shape of the universe in Tibetan cosmography, and the four palace gates correspond to the four directions of the heavens. The midpoint is formed by the 'lotus center,' whose analogy is the axis of the world, Mount Meru.

In the center, a → Buddha or bodhisattva is often to be seen, and other deities can also be represented there. Thus, there are numerous figures and symbols around the mandala, varying with particular doctrinal systems. There are not only picture-mandalas, but mandalas on the ground as spatial models made of colorful rice. Besides their ritual function, they are intended to represent the reciprocal relationship between → macrocosm and microcosm.

2. The goal of meditation consists in simultaneously rendering the particular central form of a mandala visible, and experiencing it within oneself. To this purpose, the person meditating first imagines the form within her or his body, and then visualizes an external image of it. Finally, he should recognize that all of the images have sprung from his own mind, and are ultimately empty.

Literature



Brauen, Martin, Das Mandala. Der heilige Kreis im trantrischen Buddhismus, Cologne 1992; Dagyab, Loden S., Tibetan Religious Art, 2 vols., Wiesbaden 1972; Tucci, Giuseppe, The Theory and Practice of the Mandala: With Special Reference to the Modern Psychology of the Subconscious, London 1969.

→ Buddhism, Image/Iconoclasm, Lamaism, Meditation, Tibet

Thomas Schweer

In October of 1998 the Dalai Lama visited Schneverdingen, Germany, and more than 11,000 people attended, camping in a specially erected town of tents on the Lüneburger Heath. At this occasion Tibetan monks sprinkled a sand mandala. The mandala for Avalokiteśvara, the Boddhisattva of Compassion, who is considered to be reborn in the Dalai Lama, was made in the context of an Avalokiteśvara initiation ceremony. To protect the artwork, which is made up of fine coloured dust, the monks wear dust masks.

Basic plan of a mandala
a. Lotus center
b. Palace
c. Palace gate
d. Lotus circle
e. Diamond circle
f. Flame circle

Manichaeism

1. Manichaeism is a vanished world religion that once extended from Western Europe to China. Often simplistically attached to 'Gnosis' (→ Gnosticism), Manichaeism was a major threat to the early Christian church, and many misrepresentations are the result of interreligious conflicts. The dark 'Manichean vision of the world,' for instance, is a travesty concocted by the religion's conquerors, who themselves received more from it than they admitted.

Mani

2. a) Although Manicheans themselves referred to their 'church' (Gk, ekklesia) as "Religion of Light," as 'Manichaeism' the religion is named for its founder. Mani was born in 216 CE in Babylon, and grew up among the Elchasaites, a Jewish-Christian community that especially emphasized baptism. From the content of their belief he adopted their emphasis on the Last Judgment, the notion of the cyclical return of the prophets, as well as the idea of the ensoulment of nature. He rejected, however, the Elchasaites' ritualism, separated himself from them, and developed a 'gnostic' dualistic doctrinal system, influenced to some extent by Zoroastrian dualism (→ Zoroastrianism; Dualism). He journeyed to Northwest India (today's Pakistan), and there came in contact with Buddhist thought. This multicultural and multi-religious context permeated the entire religion. Mani himself concentrated his activity on the region of the Western Sassanid Empire, but sent missionaries to Syria and Egypt, as well as to northeastern Iranian, partly Buddhist areas. For his proclamation in the Empire of the Sassanids, Mani made use of Zoroastrian concepts. This brought him into confrontation with the Zoroastrian priesthood, to which he lost. He died in captivity in 276 or 277.

Expansion

b) As a result of persecution of the Manicheans in regions of Persian influence, the religion's center of gravity shifted more to the East of the Roman Empire, or into Northeastern Iran, and from there followed a further route of expansion through Central Asia to China. The existence of a Manichean church hierarchy is attested in China from the late seventh century onward; from the mid-eighth through the ninth century, Manichaeism was the state religion under the Uigurs. In the West, Manichaeism spread through Syria and Egypt to North Africa, as well as to the parts of the Roman Empire north of the Mediterranean Sea. There it came into a situation of conflict with Christianity (→ Augustine). After Christian-motivated refutation, and political persecution, the religion disappeared in these regions in the sixth century. But Manichean dualistic thought continued to exert its influence in the 'neo-Manichean' currents (Paulicians, Bogomils, Cathari) into the High Middle Ages in Europe.

Writings

c) Some of Mani's writings have been partly preserved, such as the Middle Persian Shabuhragan, the originally Syriac Living Gospel, as well as the Book of Giants, which shows an adaptation of Jewish traditions. A series of liturgical texts (psalms, prayers) have survived in the Coptic and Iranian languages. Important texts for the Manichean doctrine are sermons (in Coptic, Iranian, Chinese), as well as the Kephalaia (Gk., "Headings, Lectures"), i.e., doctrinal addresses, in the Coptic language. In addition, the voluminous anti-Manichean writings of Augustine, and Islamic refutations of this religion, contain long citations of otherwise lost original texts.

Doctrine

3. a) The Manichean worldview is steeped in the ongoing battle of the 'Two Principles,' during the 'Three Times.' The Principles are mixed, as long as the Lord of Darkness, in an attack on the Lord of Light, is taking elements of light into his power (First Time). The intermingling of light and darkness is the point of departure for the creation of the material world and human beings, and matter is deemed evil. Humans can free the elements of light imprisoned in their own beings, through a liberating gnosis (Gk., 'knowledge'), provided they avoid everything in their way of life that is harmful to light (Second Time). The restoration of light to a divine origin occurs on an individual basis, and achieves its consummation in definitive redemption at the end of the world (Third Time). Jesus is integrated into the cosmological-anthropological myth in manifold forms. The historical Jesus plays a role only as the bringer of a religion before Mani. 'Jesus Splendor' transmits to human beings the knowledge necessary for redemption. Jesus patibilis, the 'suffering Jesus,' is a symbol of the divine light entrammeled in matter and darkness, which is itself in need of redemption.

Religious Practice

b) The rendering of the doctrine in the religious practice of the community found its weekly focus in Monday festivals, with laud of the Manichean deities, and with the instruction of believers on how they can avoid sins that would injure the divine elements of light. The choice of the weekday seems to have been made in an effort to surpass the Jewish Sabbath and the Christian Sunday. The annual climax of the liturgical year was the Bema, a festival characterized by the three elements of forgiveness of sin, a religious meal for the purification of light from matter, and a memorial of Mani's death. Manichean ethics is defined by a prominent consciousness of sin, in which prescriptions concerning food and fast, avoidance of false speech, injurious deed, and inadmissible sexuality are the central themes. The Electi (Lat.) are under obligation to observe this ethic perfectly, while the Auditores—on occasion, to the advantage of the Elect—must at times transgress it, which yields a two-level ethic, and two classes of Manicheans.

4. Thanks to Mani's multi-religious surroundings, Manichaeism was characterized from the beginning by a syncretism that was indeed advantageous for the propagation of the religion, but that had its limits. To the view of competitive religious claims, the religion's syncretistic adaptation to a given local environment fetched it the label of a → heresy (of Christianity, of Zoroastrianism, of Buddhism). This label not only unleashed external persecution, but, in China, where this process of adaptation to Buddhism had gone the furthest, a Manichean identity disappeared, an essential factor in the religion's demise.

Literature

Sources: Böhlig, Alexander (ed.), Die Gnosis, vol. 3: Der Manichäismus, Zurich 1980; Gardner, Iain (ed.), The Kephalaia of the Teacher: The Edited Coptic Manichaean Texts in Translation with Commentary, Leiden 1995; Idem/Lieu, Samuel N. C. (eds.), Manichaean Texts from the Roman Empire, Cambridge 2004; Klimkeit, Hans-Joachim, Gnosis on the Silk Road: Gnostic Texts from Central Asia, San Francisco 1993.

Secondary Literature: BeDuhn, Jason D., The Manichaean Body in Discipline and Ritual, Baltimore 2000; Hutter, Manfred et al. "Manichaeism," in: Encyclopedia of Religion, 2nd ed., vol. 8 (2005), 5659-5670 (with further bibliographical references); Klimkeit, Hans-Joachim, Manichaean Art and Calligraphy, Leiden 1982; Lieu, Samuel N.C., Manichaeism in the Later Roman Empire and Medieval China, Tübingen [2]1992; Idem, Manichaeism in Mesopotamia and the Roman East, Leiden 1994; Mirecki, Paul/BeDuhn, Jason D. (eds.), Emerging from Darkness. Studies in the Recovery of Manichaean Sources, Leiden 1997; Woschitz, Karl M. et al., Das manichäische Urdrama des Lichtes, Vienna 1989.

→ Augustine, Dualism, Gnosticism, Hermetism/Hermeticism, Light/Enlightenment

Manfred Hutter

Mantra

The word mantra (Skt., literally, 'thinking tool') stands for a multiplicity of formulaic linguistic expressions. In the Indian tradition, 'mantra' means, first, both the whole and the individual verses and hymns of the Vedic text-collections. Influenced by originally unwritten or oral traditions, belief in the power of the spoken word and its direct effectiveness is decisive for the meaning and function of the mantras. In the Hindu religions, along with Vedic mantras, mantras of other religious traditions are also applied. Recited as formulae of invocatory prayer, and whispered, or spoken in the mind, mantras are an unconditional element of the course of ritual acts. Mantras are an essential component of Hindu religiosity, whether in rituals of the → life cycle—such as initiation, marriage, or funerals—in Hindu veneration of the gods (puja), with altered states of consciousness and meditation techniques (mantra yoga), or even with religious acts performed in view of altogether practical wishes and purposes. In the traditions of Tantric Hinduism, the speech of philosophical reflection and the ritual application of mantras win great importance. Through their specific mantras, these schools distinguish themselves from Vedic ritual and relativize the efficacy of the Vedic mantras. The use of mantras is not restricted to Hinduism alone, but extends as well to religious traditions such as Jainism and Tantric Buddhism. As a result of the reception of Indian religiousness in the West, and divorced from their religious and ritual context, mantras have become very familiar.

Literature

Alper, Harvey P. (ed.), Understanding Mantras, New York 1989; Gonda, Jan, "The Indian Mantra," in: Idem, Selected Studies, vol. 4: History of Ancient Indian Religion, Leiden 1975, 248-301; Padoux, André, Vāc: The Concept of the Word in Selected Hindu Tantras, New York 1990.

→ Buddhism, Guru, Hinduism, Initiation, Lamaism, Mandala, Tantra

Jörg Gengnagel

Mao, Cult of ‘Cult of Mao’ designates the personal cult or veneration (→ Veneration of Persons/Personality Cult) of revolutionary fighter and Chairman of the Chinese Communist Party Mao Zedong (Mao Tse-tung; 1893–1976). This cult can be divided into two phases: the one practiced during Mao’s lifetime, and the one that developed after his death.

Folk Veneration and Formation of the Cult of Mao after his Death

1. Near the beginning of 1989, a ‘movement’ began in South China that quickly spread to the North, and within a few months embraced practically all → China. It is said to have had its origin in Canton, where three automobiles were involved in a serious accident. Two cars were heavily damaged, and all of its passengers lost their lives. Those riding in the third car, however, remained unscathed, and the automobile itself was undamaged. In it hung an image of Mao. In another version, a bus is said to have overturned, in which only those passengers are supposed to have survived who had been carrying Mao memorial plaques. Subsequently, taxi drivers throughout the country began to hang small images of Mao (in the form of traditional talismans) in their vehicles—similarly to the usage of many Catholics in the 1960s of attaching ‘Saint Christopher medals’ to the dashboard or the rearview mirror. (One may also recall the statuettes of the Madonna carried by, for example, buses in Malta.)

To the question of why he had hung up a Mao picture, one taxi driver responded (1993), “Because Mao has become like a divinity.”[1]

This represented only the high point of a development that had had its beginnings as early as the late 1980s. In Leiyang, in Mao’s home province of Hunan, farmers and pilgrims had by then already donated money for years, and it was finally applied in the construction of a large temple, the Sanyuan si (“Temple of the Three Springs”). Built in traditional Buddhist style, it was dedicated to the Communist troika Mao Zedong, Zhou Enlai, and Zhu De. The faithful, mostly older persons, took care to have sticks of incense burning before pictures of the three being honored. The statues had been prepared by Buddhist artists of Mount Wutaishan: that of Mao, standing, is said to have been six meters tall, those of the seated Zhou and Zu four-and-one-half meters. At the high point of this cult, toward the end of 1994, forty to fifty thousand venerators daily are said to have visited the great temple complex. Nonetheless, in May 1995 party functionaries had it closed, under the pretext that it ‘encouraged superstition.’ In rural areas, the usage had been adopted even earlier of keeping clay statuettes of Mao in homes on the family altar that had previously been reserved for the cult of the ancestors, of burning sticks of incense there, and presenting offerings.

Mao talisman: The image shows Mao at an older age, in military uniform, in a frame in the form of a temple. The ‘temple inscription,’ “May we travel in security,” is not legible. Hanging from the bottom of the frame is the character fu, meaning “luck,” “prosperity.”

2. While this Mao cult sprang up in a disorganized fashion, and presents characteristics that are clearly those of folk religion, earlier forms of the Mao cult were encouraged and controlled by the government: As early as the time of the Cultural Revolution (1966–1976), during Mao’s own lifetime, Mao was highly stylized as that of the ‘great master of learning,’ ‘great leader,’ ‘great pilot,’ and ‘supreme commander,’ while all other ‘secure values’ of the state, regarded as superstitious or otherwise undesirable, were systematically destroyed by the Red Guards. In graphic presentation, his head was frequently depicted as surrounded by a halo. As the syllable -dong in Mao Zedong’s name means ‘east,’ and it is in the east that the beneficent sun rises, the familiar song "The East is Red" could now explicitly associate Mao and the sun, where one hears:

> The East is red, the sun is rising,
> China has produced a Mao Zedong.
> Happiness and blessing he plans for all the people—
> Huhaijo!—he is the people's great redemption star![2]

Not only did Mao's picture hang in practically every home in China, but in 1966 his white bust appeared in a Protestant church in Peking, and in 1967 a sculpture of him was set up in a Buddhist temple in Shanghai. His graphic presence in the family was prominent as well, and before each meal the blessing was pronounced: "Long live Chairman Mao and the Communist Party of China." This presented a certain parallel with the traditional cult of the God of the Kitchen: as the latter was continuously present in the house, registered the sins committed in the household, and reported them to heaven, thus did Mao 'wake' or 'watch' over everything transpiring here. Mao was at that time intentionally magnified by the regime as a 'stable pillar,' in a community destabilized by the Cultural Revolution. Today, large portions of that same population, unsettled by rapid economic and cultural alterations, and by the faded presence of the Party, seek refuge with previously spurned traditional gods, such as the God of the Empire (Liu Hai), or with new ones like Mao Zedong.

Conceptualization of the Gods and Cult of the Dead

3. The Mao cult, as expressed by the taxi and bus drivers, bears the typical traits of traditional Chinese conceptualizations of the gods. In China, the worlds of humanity and of the gods, ancestors, spirits, and demons have never been divided by a fixed boundary. Furthermore, distinctions among the beings of the beyond are graduated. Under certain circumstances, a person well fed and influential in life may have gathered considerable 'energy' (ling), and—if adequately graced with offerings after death—becomes a mighty ancestor having 'effective divine power' (ling), and brings well-being upon his descendancy. If, however, the person's grave is wrongly positioned geomantically, the 'energies' cannot unfold optimally, and the deceased consequently expresses an uneasiness in the grave; or if neglected in cult, he or she can take revenge on living relatives as a demon. If this person was arrayed with great power during life, for example as a general, then that person's effectiveness after death might be more than enough for her or his own progeny, and flow out to others. When others 'favored' by this deceased person then likewise make offering to her or him out of thankfulness, the 'energy' of this person waxes, and therewith his or her beneficent potential: he or she can become a god, and acquire influence over an entire city, a whole region, or even the whole country. Extension or continuation of a cult always depends on the ling of the divine, or quasi-divine object, and this quantity is in no case constant. It can decrease in certain circumstances, and the cult fall into corresponding oblivion. (No deity is everlasting.) Mao was evidently able to amass so much power and energy in his lifetime, winning even more every day in the reverence paid him in his mausoleum, that his ling is sufficient to make him a god.

1. See Cohen 1993, 129.
2. Bauer 1971, 568.

Literature

Barmé, Geremie R., Shades of Mao: The Posthumous Cult of the Great Leader, New York 1996; Bauer, Wolfgang, China und die Hoffnung auf Glück. Paradiese, Utopien, Idealvorstellungen in der Geistesgeschichte Chinas, Munich 1971; Cohen, Alvin P., "A New Deity in the People's Republic of China: Mao Zedong," in: Journal of Chinese Religions 21 (1993), 129-130; Lynch, Michael, Mao, London 2004.

→ Ancestors, China/Japan/Korea, Political Religion, Popular Culture, Veneration of Persons/ Personality Cult

Stephan Peter Bumbacher

Marginality / Liminality

Marginality is a sociological term used to designate persons who live on the periphery of society as opposed to those who take up the central role in a society, enjoying particular privileges and access to power and influence from which marginalized persons or groups are excluded. The most influential segment of a society is not necessarily the same as the majority, nor do marginalized groups necessarily correspond to demographic minorities (e.g. blacks in the Antebellum South constituted the majority of the population, but had no access to power and were thus a marginalized group despite being the majority). Marginalized populations tend to develop a worldview and set of values that are distinct from those of the dominant group.

However, the model of society on which this concept of marginality is based is problematic because it assumes a society that is homogeneously determined by one set of traditions and in which there are very limited social dynamics. In fact, societies vary in their levels of differentiation, and in more differentiated societies, there are correspondingly more cases in which the same individual may be part of a dominant group or part of a marginalized group, depending on what aspect of the society he or she is involved in. For example, a fundamentalist Christian in the United States is part of the dominant group as long as he or she remains in the geographic region known as the Bible Belt (→ Fundamentalism). As soon as that person moves to San Francisco and interacts with liberal culture there, he or she will be in a position of marginality (→ Migration).

In the study of religion, there are two variations of marginality that are particularly relevant. The first is the role of the nonconformist, dissenter, or 'heretic.' These terms can denote entire confessional or religious groups, such as Catholics in a dominantly Protestant country or Jews in the Diaspora. For groups that find themselves in this role, Max → Weber coined the term 'pariah,' borrowing from the idea of 'untouchables' in the Indian → caste system. However, persons within one and the same religious group can be marginalized, as when priests occupy a social role 'above' the laity and therefore live as strangers in their parish.

The second relevant variation of marginality is concerned with persons who are in the process of transition from one social group to the next. These persons are seen as standing 'on the threshold' (Latin limin-) and are thus sometimes described as being in a liminal state. In 1909 van Gennep, in his work on rites of passage, designated people living in an intermediate status as being in a condition of 'neither/nor' or 'on the edge,' as being 'marginal.' In the meantime, however, Victor Turner has recognized liminal states that can be normalized as liminal within the framework of the standardizing community, which Turner refers to as communitas (→ Ritual). This type of temporary marginal community would include people on pilgrimages, in clubs and on communes who live according to their own values and laws while rejecting or even reversing the customary tokens of social status.

→ Initiation, Rites of Passage, Ritual

Christoph Auffarth

Marriage / Divorce

1. Matrimony, as a bond between one husband and one wife (monogamy), one husband and several wives (polygamy—more specifically, polygyny), or, rarely, one wife and a number of husbands (polyandry), has always reflected the religious and social norms of its respective societies, usually together with their social classes.

Sociologically, a distinction is made between endogamy (marriage within a family or group) and exogamy (marriage beyond these bounds). Homogamy is matrimony within the same social class, which for women of noble families can be an obligation. It is practiced, for instance, by the Rajputs in India, and prevailed for centuries with the Confucian elite of China, as well as with followers of the Islamic schools of law of the Hanafites and the Shafi'ites. In ancient Iran and Egypt, the ruling dynasty practiced sibling marriages, for the purpose of preserving their cultic elite social status. A natural form of birth control was endogamous polyandry, the marriage of several brothers with one woman, as practiced, for instance (at least occasionally), in pre-Islamic Arabia, as in the Himalayas and Tibet still today. This custom often included privileges for the eldest brother. Polygyny was customary with the courtly elite of the ancient East, with large harems, which also served as a status symbol. Poorer men usually had only one wife. Priests were enjoined to monogyny. In Confucianism and Hinduism, polygyny with secondary wives, and/or concubinage, was widespread among the upper class. The Pentateuch, for the upper class, attests marriage of one husband with up to four wives, along with concubinage. Monogyny, with strict marital fidelity, has been the norm in Western Judaism (Ashkenazim) since the eleventh century. In Eastern Judaism (Sephardim), polygyny continued to be available, until it was, as usually, prohibited in civil law. Islam, in sura 4:3, endorses the marriage of one husband with up to four wives, on condition of his dealing with them justly; otherwise, concubinage, with one's private slaves. But as sura 4:129 declares the just treatment of several wives to be impossible, reformers, since around 1900, have appealed to it as an endorsement of compulsory monogyny. Only social pressures would have prevented compulsory monogamy: marriage was for long the only way in which women might be cared for. In actuality, polygyny was a privilege of the courtly urban elite, who demonstrated their social prestige with large harems, on the ancient Eastern model. In Judaism, as in Islam, a polygynist was under the obligation of providing each of his wives with her own household. Many major religions maintain incest prohibitions within close kinship, and forbid marriage with persons of other beliefs. A Muslim man may marry a Jew or a Christian, as a member of a 'protected religion,' but for a Muslim woman it is forbidden to do this, because the children are to follow the religion of their father. Jews were to marry within their faith, and the same was long true for Catholics.

For centuries, marriages were nearly everywhere patrilocal—that is, the bride, usually very young, moved into the extended family of the husband, often entirely strange to her, and joined it and was subordinate there. In Hinduism, in addition, this entailed breaking off relations with her original family. In China, the husband's mother might reject the bride and send her back to her family, even before consummation of the marriage.

In Roman law, within the extended family, the husband's father was the superior, enjoying absolute power, which extended even to the right to sell the children (patria potestas, Lat., 'paternal authority'). Universally, a woman won social acceptance only through her marriage, and respect and influence only as the mother of sons.

Almost all religions categorize matrimony in their patriarchal terms. Confucianism did so in terms of its cosmological system: for the Confucian elite in China, man and wife represented the union of Yang and Yin, of the world above and the world below. They symbolize the order of the cosmos, to which the unmarried are a potential factor of disturbance. The Hebrew Bible founds the 'lordship' of the husband over the wife with the myth of original sin (Gen 3:16). The New Testament postulates the subordination of the wife to her husband by analogy with that of the community with regard to Christ (1 Cor 7:24-38). The Qur'an bases that same subordination on 'God's favoring man to woman' (sura 4:34), as well as on man's economic superiority; but the Qur'an also says that God has established 'love and mercy' between a man and his wife (sura 30:21).

Purposes of Matrimony

2. In China, a homogamous, patrilocal marriage, with exchange of bridal gifts, counted as a goal worth striving for, and as the instrument for stabilizing relations of solidarity. A man had secondary wives and/or concubines at his disposition, usually women of lower social origin, for the satisfaction of his sexuality and for the generation of additional male progeny. Buddhism endorses marriage for its laity for the generation of young Buddhists, but strictly forbids sexual promiscuity and adultery. In Hinduism, marriages were regarded as sacramental, that is, indissoluble for life, until into the twentieth century. But a man could marry several wives.

Judaism, Christianity, and Islam recommend marriage also for the regulation of sexuality. In Christianity, according to Augustine, matrimonial sexuality had to serve procreation. Thomas Aquinas added that it should be without a sense of physical passion. In Judaism, a man was permitted premarital sexual relations, a woman was not. The Qur'an imposes severe punishment for all extramarital and premarital sexual relations of husband or wife, but permits the husband concubinage with his slaves. Both Judaism and Islam place the husband under the obligation to satisfy his wife sexually, for the preservation of the family honor. The primary purposes of matrimony are companionship and the procreation of children (Gen 2:18,24; 1:28), especially male, for the maintenance of the family even in a material respect. Childlessness was regarded as God's punishment, an abundance of children as his blessing. Since women have no right to inheritance in Judaism, childlessness constitutes grounds for divorce even today, and formerly, after ten years at the most, grounds for the husband to marry a second wife. In Islamic countries this latter occurs even today, although women are heirs; but they are entitled to their own property. There is no common property in Muslim marriage according to the Shari'a law, as well as according to most modern Muslim family courts. In Judaism, the brother of a deceased husband was to marry his widow in a leviratic marriage, and a husband the sister of his deceased wife (sororatic marriage).

Prerequisites for Matrimony

3. In Judaism and Islam, as in Roman law, marriage rests on a civil contract between the bridegroom, male members of his family, and the (male) representatives of the bride. Formerly, this contract did not need to be fixed in writing. For the early Christians, the basis of matrimony was a civil consent between husband and wife, wherein the father of the bride, the 'bride-giver,' had rights of possession. From the fourth century onward, as Christianity was promoted from a tolerated cult to the state religion, the Church blessed first marriages. After the Fourth Council of the Lateran (1215), in order to prevent secret marriages, publication before the Church became obligatory. Since the Council of Florence (1419), a monogamous marriage between two baptized partners has ranked as a sacrament, and indissoluble by virtue of natural law. In the confrontation with Protestantism, the Council of Trent (1563) introduced the 'obligation of form' of marriage: that it be concluded before the pastor and two witnesses, although this soon held only for purely Catholic regions. Since Leo VI (886–912), the Eastern churches have raised the ecclesiastical blessing of a marriage to the status of an obligation. In 1529, Martin Luther declared marriage a 'secular thing.' Protestantism paved the way to the civil marriage.

Age for Marriage

Before modern times, the minimum age for marriage was universally early. In Judaism, for both girls and boys, it was twelve years, and in Islam for girls often even before menarche. Early marriages, especially for girls, were concluded in the Christian Middle Ages, too.

For centuries, in Europe as throughout the East, marriages were concluded through family mediation or by professional marriage brokers, usually under the aspect of the creation or reinforcement of social conditions, frequently with relations of possession and/or power (dynastic marriages). The prime consideration was the maintenance of hierarchical and patriarchal structures. Individual love or inclination could develop, if at all, only in a marriage, not before it. With Muslims and Christians of the Near East, as with Hindus, marriage between cousins has always been frequent, for the consolidation of familial relations (including the financial ones), and contracted by parents, often very early.

Bridal Gift

The payment of a bridal gift is an obligation, in Judaism as in pre-Islamic Arabia to the father of the bride, in Islam to the bride herself (sura 4:4). The amount is negotiated before the wedding, and is stipulated in the marriage contract. In Islam, the bridal gift rapidly became a status symbol, in virtue of which parents have been able to deny their daughter to an unpleasant suitor by claiming a high amount. Here, by contrast with legislation in the Christian West up until the 1960s or '70s, there has been no matrimonial commu-

In the region of Tsukaru, in the prefecture of Aomori in northeastern Japan, offerings are made to female dolls in cosmetics and wedding attire, as well as to photographs of young men, sometimes in military uniform. In this area one comes upon both similar and different phenomena standing in connection with the coupled images. In the Kawakura shrine of bodhisattva Jizo, shamanic rituals are held for the souls of the departed. In glass cases, frequently provided with names and addresses, there are countless 'pairings' of the kind pictured here. They represent marriages after death, celebrated for the consolation of the souls of young men who have died unmarried. This custom is limited to the region of Tsukaru, and even there achieved real popularity only in the 1970s. It may be that this relatively new manifestation is connected with the fact that, in a farming region such as Tsukaru, finding wives is a problem for men nowadays, and with this usage these men can provide their group of kin with ritual progeny. The custom does reflect ritual practices—likewise shamanic—that were, and to some extent still are, widespread along the entire Pacific coast of East Asia, as in Taiwan, and on the Korean peninsula. In these regions, it is true, the practices also serve—indeed perhaps primarily—for the consolation of the souls of deceased unmarried young women. (H. Nakamaki and D. Eikemeier)

nity of goods, so that, at least theoretically, the wife has free disposition of her possessions. However, she has been increasingly hindered in this by reason of her dwindling public experience and opportunities for education. In Judaism, the wife remains the possessor of her property, while the husband administers it, enjoys any interest from it, and at her death is her sole legatee. In Hinduism, especially in the North of India, it is customary for the father, as 'bride-giver' of his daughter, to bestow a rather large amount of property on the marriage, of which the daughter alone has disposition, but which her husband may administer, and which, for the husband's family and himself, is a condition of the marriage. With the middle and upper classes of Christian Europe, and the Jewish diaspora there, a dowry was socially obligatory for centuries, and for men often a motive or condition for the marriage.

4. Nearly everywhere, special, usually elaborate festivals (→ Feasts and Celebrations), extensions of the ancient rituals of initiation, accompany marriages. Customs differ by region, nor are they always tied to religion, but are often similar in a region with members of different religions. Generally, they depend on social status, and are intended to demonstrate this as much as the importance of the occasion. Special marriage dress for bride and bridegroom usually emphasizes the festive atmosphere. In regions and cultures in which the virginity of the bride is of importance, the sign of the surrendered virginity, a blood-stained cloth, is produced during the wedding night to the awaiting guests, usually to be greeted by women with cries of jubilation. In rural areas of Islamic countries, this practice is still observed today. In the Fifth Book of Moses, this praxis is also attested for ancient Judaism (Deut 22:15).

5. a) In Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, the → death of one of the partners means the end of the marriage. In Hinduism, widows were burned alive (sati), especially among the elite Brahman castes. The British colonial administration prohibited this (1829), but it continued until 1909, especially in Bengal, and is even occasionally revived today. Indeed, before the Hindu Widows' Re-Marriage Act of 1856, widows' position did resemble social death: unlike widowers, they were prohibited from remarrying, were

In Momostenago, in Southern Guatemala, an endangered marriage is healed. The couple kneels before the three small crosses. After the husband, some months ago, had been unfaithful to her, the wife besought help of the shamans. A penance was imposed on the husband, his wife has left him, and now he is to be restored to the condition of purity, and the marriage is to be reestablished. For the celebration of the renewal of the marriage bond (renovación), the shaman has selected a favorable date in the Mayan calendar. In the ceremony, he stands next to the couple, dressed in blue, while an assistant (right) casts sacrificial gifts into the fire. Around the fire lie readily burnable pine branches. Shells to hold the copal (the indispensable sweet-scented smoking resin) stand ready. The shaman calls the gods to witness. In conclusion, the pair is once more blessed, in the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit. The mutual presence of both indigenous and Christian elements, typical of the region, is evident here in the Mayan Quiché ritual. (Kirsten Holzapfel) afforded no social assistance, and were often imputed guilt for the death of their husbands.

b) In Judaism and Islam, divorce, in the form of the husband's unilateral rejection of his wife, was permitted, without cause and without legal intervention. In Judaism, a husband is permitted remarriage after divorce, but a wife only if her husband consents to it in writing. In Islam, the bride's representative in a matrimonial contract can stipulate her right, in certain situations, to demand divorce, for example if her husband strikes her, or marries another wife. Ordinarily, in case of divorce or rejection, the Muslim husband must restore the remaining portion of the dowry. The wife and her children have to return to her relatives, who are obligated to care for her. Muslim women could also 'ransom' themselves by returning their dowry, a usage adopted from pre-Islamic times. In Judaism and Islam, a woman could theoretically sue for divorce by submitting legal evidence of, for instance, an incurable disease of her husband, of which she has known nothing before the marriage, or of his impotence. Remarriage after a partner's death or after a divorce has always been readily available in Islamic law, and used to be practiced frequently, also by women.

Divorce

Protestantism introduced the transition to a secular marriage law, which determined the marriageable age, a matrimonial right of possession, and the possibility of divorce for husband and wife. The civil marriage was first legalized in the Code Napoléon of 1804, becoming obligatory in France in 1884, and in Prussia, in the wake of the Kulturkampf ('cultural struggle'), in 1875. Since then, the civil ceremony must precede the church wedding. At the same time, civil divorce also became legally possible. Whether and to what extent women may sue for divorce depends, everywhere, and down to the present day, on the social status of the woman.

6. Celibacy was first recommended only in the New Testament (1 Cor 8:26; 32-35). The Roman Catholic Church enjoins celibacy on all priests, the Eastern churches only on those of high rank. Buddhist monks and nuns live in celibacy, with gifts richly bestowed on male monasteries by the laity, but not on cloisters of nuns. In the Middle Ages, nuns were regarded as 'brides of Christ,' and nuns' cloisters offered unmarried women a socially acceptable existence. Islam, which orders marriage in sura 24:32, tolerates celibacy in case of social necessity, and for persons able to maintain a serious asceticism. But there were communities of celibates, usually the members of mystical brotherhoods.

Celibacy

7. Since the close of the nineteenth century, emphasis on individualism, along with increased social mobility on the part of women as a result of the women's movement, has grown in Western and Central Europe and in North America. The same can be said of the tendency to an individual choice of partners, and marriages for love. First of all in the wake of colonial policy, Western European and American lifestyles became models for the upper classes throughout the whole East. Traditional forms of marriage and of social intercourse changed. In a framework of religious stipulations interpreted in a tolerant and modern way, legislation sought to reform centuries-old usages, and deep-rooted ways of thinking, but could eliminate them nowhere immediately.

In India, the Special Marriage Act of 1872 sought to set a limit to bigamy. In 1929, and again in 1938, child marriages were prohibited by the postponement of the marriageable age for girls to fourteen years. In 1955, the Hindu Marriage Act established the marriageable age for girls at fifteen years, defined grounds for divorce for both partners, once again obliged monogyny, and prohibited social barriers based on caste.

In Communist China, building on developments occurring since the 1920s, civil marriage was made obligatory (May 1, 1950), and forbade any exchange of material values in the form of a dowry or bridal gift. While the upper class had gained individual selection of partners, marriages for love, and small families; marriages in rural areas, and among the urban proletariat, continued to be concluded on the basis of family alliances struck out of economic considerations. Social recognition of a marriage occasions great marriage festivals here, as elsewhere. On these occasions, European models for dress are normative with the upper and middle classes, as throughout nearly all of the East. Single-child marriages, compelled by the state on demographic grounds, and the fact that marriage partners live separately in order to be near their different places of employment, is leading to the dissolution of traditional structures of family and domestic hierarchy.

Arab Countries

In 1917, Ottoman Turkey, at home as well as in the Arab countries, which at that time stood under its rule, began reforms of Islamic family law. Stronger reforms were enacted in the time of the Mandate (after 1920), and after the formation of the national states in the 1950s. The marriageable age was established in consideration of the economic and demographic situation of the respective countries. In the wake of Ataturk's policy of secularization, in 1926 Turkey introduced en bloc the then-prevailing Swiss civil law. But by 1988, eight amnesty laws were promulgated for the legalization of children of polygynous marriages, certified only by the Imam, which take place mostly on the countryside. In Saudi Arabia, Islamic family law is still in force today. In Iran it was reintroduced after the overthrow of the Shah in 1979, and the reform laws of 1967 and 1975 were declared invalid. In Libya in 1977 (with subsequent modifications with regard to the marriageable age and divorce law), in Pakistan in 1979, and in the Sudan in 1983, Islamic family law was reintroduced. After Bourgiba's rise to power in Tunisia in 1956, polygyny was prohibited, and the bridal money fixed at one dinar. In all other countries, polygyny was made more difficult, and conditioned by demands on the husband that, for example, he has to proof his ability to support a second household in court. In 1994, the number of polygynous marriages ranged from two percent in Egypt to as much as twelve percent in Saudi Arabia. Wives became able to ask for divorce more easily in many Islamic countries. Only in Egypt under Sadat was an amendment introduced providing support for a woman, with children, divorced after a marriage of several years.

In → Iran, after 1979, not only marriage with eleven-year-old girls, polygyny, and the almost unlimited divorce right of the husband in terms of the Qur'an, but also the 'temporary' or 'pleasure' marriage became legal once more. The latter form of marriage, endorsed by the Shia, permits a contractually regulated heterosexual relationship for between twenty-four hours and ninety-nine years. It was founded and propagated by the ideologues of the Iranian revolution in order to release the strict determinations of Islamic law, especially after the Iran-Iraq war (1980–1988), which resulted in a surplus of women. Previously, it was used as a temporary means of support for girls, mostly from socially weak families, and was a kind of → prostitution. In the nineteenth century, Snouk Hurgronje observed the fact that it was practiced even in Sunnite Mecca, during the pilgrimage, offering women of lower-class families means of support. Egyptian author 'Abbas Mahmud al-'Aqqad (1889–1964) recommended it in the 1950s to Arab students in Europe, for the satisfaction of their sexuality in conformity with Islam.

Israel, despite the proclamation of "equal rights for all citizens, regardless of religion, race, or sex," maintained the Jewish religious marriage and divorce law, in its Declaration of Independence and in an equal-rights law for women in 1950. A contract may be struck only on the initiative of the husband. Even today Orthodox Judaism emphasizes the role of woman as mother and as guardian of traditional values. A marriage age was established for all citizens of Israel, including Muslims and Christians, after the establishment of the State in 1948. Non-Jewish citizens of Israel also observe their own family law; Muslims use a slightly modernized version of the Ottoman Turkish law of 1917. The possibility of a divorce on demand of the wife, before secular courts with agreement of religious courts, has been debated in European and American Judaism since about 1880, and remains controversial today. In Orthodox Judaism, there are a great number of 'enchained' women, whose husbands deny them permission for a divorce that would comport a right to remarriage.

Israel

Since the Second Vatican Council of 1965, the Encyclica Humanae Vitae of 1968, and the Familiaris Consortio of 1981, the Roman Catholic Church includes 'loving togetherness,' 'total fidelity,' and 'unrestricted mutual acceptance' in its sexual ethics of marriage.

In Europe today, the United States, and the large cities of the East, inclusive of Israel, the 'neo-local' marriage is customary—that is, the nuclear family with its own household and a variable distribution of duties, with the wife's growing occupational employment, personal responsibility, and experience 'on the outside.' Since the 1970s, in Western and Central Europe, new forms of cohabitation, without confessional blessing and/or state registration, have begun to prevail. The number of non-marital households has increased tenfold in the former West Germany since 1972. By 1995, their number had risen to around a million. The divorce rate has considerably increased in Germany since the 1960s. While it was formerly higher in the German Democratic Republic than in the Federal Republic, social relations in the Eastern federal lands have led it to fall sharply today in comparison with the Western lands. The Roman Catholic Church still rejects both divorce and the remarriage of divorced persons.

Europe

The ecclesiastical and civil protection of homosexual couples is the subject of controversy in the United States and West and Central Europe. For Islamic and other Eastern and Asian countries, it is a priori unthinkable.

Literature

General: Browning, Don S., Marriage and Modernization, Grand Rapids 2003; Sullivan, Andrew, Same-Sex-Marriage: Pro and Con. A Reader, New York 1997; Young, Serenity (ed.), Encyclopedia of Women and World Religion, vols. 1-2, New York 1999.—Hinduism: Chatterjee, Krishna Nath, Hindu Marriage—Past and Present, Varanasi 1972; Harlan, Lindsey/Courtright, Paul B. (eds.), From the Margins of Hindu Marriage, New York 1995; Pant, Dragulla C., Orient's Law of Marriage and Divorce, New Delhi 2002; Uberoy, Patricia (ed.), Family, Kinship and Marriage in India, Delhi 1993.—China/Confucianism: Barlow, Tani E. (ed.), Gender Politics in Modern China, Durham/London 1993; Leutner, Mechthild, Geburt, Heirat und Tod in Peking: Volkskultur und Elitekultur vom 19. Jahrhundert bis zur Gegenwart, Berlin 1989; Tang, Wenfang/Parish, William L., Chinese Urban Life under Reform: The Changing Social Contract, Cambridge 2000; Watson, Rubie R., Marriage and Inequality in Chinese Society, Berkeley 1991.—Judaism: "Marriage," in: EJ 11 (1972), 1025-1051; Liebman, Charles/Cohen, Steven M., Two Worlds of Judaism: The Israeli and the American Experience, New Haven 1990; Meiselman, Moshe, Jewish Women in Jewish Law, New York 1978; Mielziner, Moses, The Jewish Law of Marriage and Divorce in Ancient and Modern Times, and Its Relations to the Law of the State (1884), Littleton 1987.—Christianity: Demmer, K. (ed.), Christian Marriage Today, Washington 1997; Lawler, M. G. (ed.), Christian Marriage and Family: Contemporary Theological and Pastoral Perspectives, Collegeville 1996; McGee, J. Vernon, Marriage and Divorce, Nashville 1989; Olsen, G. W., Christian Marriage: A Historical Study, New York 2001; Pontifical Council for Interreligious Dialogue, Marriage and the Family in Today's World, Vatican City 1995.—Islam: Ebert, Hans-Georg, Das Personalstatut arabischer Länder. Problemfelder, Methoden, Perspektiven, Frankfurt/M. 1996; Haeri, Shahla, Law of Desire: Temporary Marriage in Iran, London 1989; Nasir, J. J., The Status of Women under Islamic Law and under Modern Muslim Legislation, London etc. [2]1994; Sonbol, A. A. (ed.), Women, the Family and Divorce Laws in Islamic History, Syracuse 1996; Walther, Wiebke, Die Frau im Islam, Leipzig [3]1997.

→ Ethics/Morals, Family/Kinship/Genealogy, Life Cycle, Sexuality

Wiebke Walther

Martial Arts

1. Martial arts, today's generic name for an entire series of Far Eastern disciplines, are centuries old in their origin, and in China and Japan were an important aspect of a comprehensive and transcendent vision of human development. Originally, it was a matter of techniques (in Jap., jutsu) of the duel and self-defense, unarmed, as some form of chi gong (in China, something like 'elaborating of energy,' a fundamental, multiplex system of bodily-spiritual exercises), such as kung-fu (properly shaolin-chuan, a fisticuffs developed by monks of the Shaolin monastery), jiu-jitsu, karate, and (more recently) judo ('gentle path,' developed in 1882), or jiu-jutsu (a modern combination of judo, karate, aikido, and ancient jiu-jitsu), or aikido (a modern defensive martial art taught since 1938). But armed techniques are also included in the concept of martial arts, such as archery (in Jap., kudo) or fencing (in Jap., kendo, laido). Tai chi chuan (Chin., 'the fist [-icuff method of battle] of the Highest Last'), a system similar to chi gong, can be practiced with or without weapons. Under the influence of Daoism and Buddhism, as historical example shows, these disciplines developed to 'ways' (in Chin., dao) of spiritual development. They then developed and embodied a cultivated, dynamic attitude toward life, an attitude approaching human ideals, a mindset transcending struggle. Especially the unarmed disciplines, historically born of emergency defense situations, rest on this ultimate readiness for peace: their principle is to redirect opponents' rage upon themselves. They usually contain the development of special spiritual abilities (in the perception of the enemy, and in the control of one's own body), on the basis of the universal 'life power' (in Chin., ch'i; Jap., ki) that has played such a focal role in Chinese life and thought. But the armed disciplines mentioned have also contributed to this paradoxical development, in another spirit.

2. The expression 'martial arts' appeared in the United States after the Second World War, as the GIs returned from Japan. Then came the 'Eastern' battles of Bruce Lee in television and on film. Finally, Eastern wisdom was discovered by the → New Age movement.

History: China

3. In → China, the connection between martial arts and the spiritual path reaches all the way back to the 'Yellow Emperor' of the third millennium BCE. Daoism and, later, Zen Buddhism left their imprints on the arts of unarmed self-defense (in Chin., wu-shu), but also on those of the waging of war. A classic example is afforded by Chinese military leader Sun Tzu, who lived in the civil war 'time of the struggling empires' (ca. fifth to third centuries BCE), and composed the work of strategy, The Art of War. According to Sun Tzu, the greatest of all virtues in the military leader is 'unfathomability': no longer to cherish and preserve any strategies whatsoever that might be determinable by the enemy, but to follow the flow of the situation and thus become unassailable. In China, a relation to force is pragmatic and pessimistic: force and violence have become unavoidable, and therefore the military leader will deal with it wisely. The greatest victory, accordingly, is the one that can be wrung from the situation without fight and struggle.

Japan

In Japan, the 'way of the warrior' appeared. Here, from the simple military manual Bujutsu, the spiritual ideal arises of 'putting an end' to all battles—the path of budo. This path lies on the foundation of Chinese Daoism and Confucianism (both gaining a foothold on Japanese soil in the fourth century) and Buddhism (since the sixth century, from Korea, and since the twelfth century, as Zen Buddhism, from China). The Samurai had discovered Zen for themselves, as early as the beginning of the thirteenth century, and integrated it into their training. Then came the historically important 1281 victory over a Mongol armada, which was attributed not only to the kamikaze ('divine winds,' typhoons), but also to the spiritual force of Zen training. This attribution occasioned the acknowledgment and influence of Zen among the ruling class. In succeeding centuries, Buddhist, Shintô, and Confucian virtues, such as a sense of justice, compassion for all beings, courage, chivalry, and loyalty, found increasing entry into the Samurai code of honor (bushido). But the Zen monks use the practice of archery as active meditation, for the purification of heart and spirit.

The life story of legendary Samurai (in Jap., ronin) Miyamoto Musashi (1584–1645) is an exemplar of the acceptance of such a warrior-ideal, spiritualized by the influence of Zen Buddhism. Musashi, who had no army, is the author of the classic Gorin-no-sho ("Book of the Five Rings"). In a celebrated 'fanfare,' he declares his posture or attitude (with a long and short sword) 'facing all sides,' a posture of invincibility: it has no manner of intent, and therefore can react spontaneously. For the survival of the 'I,' fixed emotions like fear, ambition, and rage would only cloud the vision, and therefore 'stain' a warrior's endeavor. The entire purport is to strike down the adversary at the exact moment at which he strikes, nor is the attitude of the novice other than that of the master. Musashi not only became invincible, but also became a versatile artisan, painter, and calligrapher.

4. Today, along with the classic books mentioned, we have those dealing with 'Zen in management,' or 'Zen in the art of mountain climbing.' Athletes take an interest in the 'Dao of sports.' Carlos Castaneda attained cult status in the 1970s with books in which warrior-shaman Don Juan embodies the ideal of an immaculate 'warrior' way of life. Tibetan teacher of meditation Chogyam Trungpa (1939–1987) taught the 'sacred path of the warrior'—a person who fears neither self nor others.

Martial arts seem irreconcilable with the religious principle of powerlessness ("Thou shalt not kill"), and many critics hold them in contempt.

Generally speaking, martial arts are less aggressive and destructive in proportion as they advance from pure technique to the Dao, a comprehensive manner of life embracing the spiritual dimension. Along this pathway, as Buddhism, for instance, teaches, the causes of aggression, greed, rivalry, and ignorance are overcome, in favor of a larger, more responsible view of reality: martial arts can be a valuable aspect of this representation. When there is no such comprehensive vision, of course, then—like any form of human culture—they will be abused.

Literature

Primary Sources: Musashi, Miyamoto, The Book of Five Rings, ed./trans. Victor Harris, 1995; Sun Tzu, The Art of War: Military Manual Written c. BC 510, ed./trans. Cheng Lin, World Encyclopedia Institute 1945; Trungpa, Chögyam, Meditation in Action, London 1969.

Secondary Literature: Draeger, Donn F./Smith, Robert W., Comprehensive Asian Fighting Arts, Tokyo etc. [2]1981; Fabrice, Midal, Chögyam Trungpa: His Life and Vision, Boston 2004; Hunt, Leon, Kung Fu Cult Masters, London 2003; Jones, David Evan, Combat, Ritual, and Performance: Anthropology of the Martial Arts, Westport 2002; Nelson, Randy F., The Martial Arts: An Annotated Bibliography, New York 1988; Raposa, Michael L., Meditation and the Martial Arts, Charlottesville 2003.

→ Daoism, Meditation, Zen Buddhism

Michael Schaefer

Martyr

Concept

1. The expression 'martyr' (from the Greek mártys, 'witness') denotes a person who consciously accepts death for his or her religious position and religious community, and who, after death, receives privileges, becoming also a role model for those who remain behind. The concept is familiar to Jews, Christians, and Muslims, and to other religions too—one need only recall the self-immolation of Buddhist monks during the Vietnam War. In a broader sense, as well as a secularized one, victims of political repression, and even persons who perish in natural disasters, can be described as martyrs. The concept can even be extended to include groups, peoples, and cities.

History of Jewish and Christian Martyrdom

2. The biblical conception of the meritorious activity of blood witnesses rests on the history of the three men who preferred to stride into the furnace of fire rather than pray to foreign gods (Dan 3:16ff.), as well as on the memory of the persecution of the Jews by the Seleucids in the second century BCE. By way of Jesus's crucifixion, the thought of a sacrificial death was enhanced for Christians in a special way. Persecutions quickly supervening in the second century led to the development of concepts of the character of the Christian martyr. In the same century, the Jewish assembly of scholars at Lod determined that, for Jews, martyrdom as the offering of one's life is obligatory when a believer—in the presence of a Jewish group—is compelled to the reverence of foreign gods, to forbidden sexual intercourse, or to murder. On the basis of the European persecution of Jews since the Crusades, the

During the uprising of the Palestinians against the Israeli occupation, repeated suicide bombings blasted whole buses, with bombs attached to the assailant's body. In 1996, five years after his death, relatives of bomber Yahiya Ayyash, with friends from the underground movement Hamas, gather at his grave to pray. For specially endangered persons, not only does the Qur'an promise a special reward in heaven, but a martyr's death assures the deceased and his or her relatives social recognition besides. The memorial of the dead itself becomes an expression of mingled protest, rage, and pride. (Christoph Auffarth)

Jewish concept of the martyr was developed, and then reinterpreted under conditions of the liquidation of Jews at the hands of National Socialism during the Second World War.

Ancient Christianity offered its martyrs exuberant veneration. But as early as 300, the great longing for martyrdom began to dry up. With the recognition of Christianity as a religion with equal rights, and then as the official religion of the Roman Empire, martyrdom lost much of its meaning and role in imperial territory. A specifically Christian devotion to the martyrs now appeared. Their graves became the sites of churches and chapels, and their veneration was tied up with divine service; at the same time, their bones were taken to other churches and deposited under their altars. The spread of Christianity beyond the region of the Empire, and the mission among non-Christian peoples, repeatedly occasioned new martyrdoms. In the sixteenth century, the cult of the martyrs, with its abuses, was subjected to sharp criticism on the part of the Reformation Churches, while the Council of Trent itself intervened by laying down restrictions and imposing an order. In the twentieth century, honest Christians, such as, for example, Catholic priest Max Joseph Metzger (1887–1944), suffered the death of martyrs at the hands of the National Socialist terror.

Islamic Conceptions

3. The notion of the martyr (in Arab., shahīd) sprang up in Islam, as well. In particular, a martyr is someone who falls in the course of a → Jihad. While Sunnites traditionally cultivate no special devotion to the martyrs, with the Imamite Shiites such veneration became a vital and essential element of faith: exemplars are the imams of ancient Islam, in the succession of Muhammad's cousin and son-in-law Ali (600–661). By his death in 680 at Kerbala, Ali's son al-Husain became the Shiite arch-martyr. On the date of his death, Muharram 10 in the Islamic calendar, the day of Ashura, Shiites recall his suffering with processions, and even passion plays (→ Penance/Penitent; Iran), and are themselves ready to follow his ideal. In the preparation for and execution of the Islamic revolution in Iran, this Shiite concept of martyrdom was intentionally introduced for the purpose of mass mobilization, at first for the reshaping of Iran, and then in the war with Iraq (1980–1988). The victims were honored as folk heroes. In the escalating political and military confrontations in Western Asia, as well as in North Africa, the concept of martyrdom attained comprehensive importance with militant forces—'martyrdom' in its religious and political meaning alike—so that today it has become a key concept of political and religious rhetoric in countries of an Islamic heritage. In acts of terrorism, the victims—or the self-sacrificing agents of the deeds, depending on one's viewpoint—are designated and addressed as martyrs.

Functions for the Community

4. Martyrdom is a demonstrative, voluntary and desired act of self-immolation at the hands of inimical forces. → Suicide is usually excluded; in extreme situations of conflict, however, it can be included without second thought, when there is hope that, on the occasion of such an exceptional act, a particular goal may be reached that has been proposed as religious, political, or military. The victim becomes a model and an ideal for her or his respective religious community, and can encourage other, non-fatal, forms of voluntary commitment in behalf of the community. Here the idea is publicity, and the aims—through the sensational nature of the exploit, incomprehensible to the enemy—are to impress followers and adversaries alike, to afford moral reinforcement in one's own society, and to weaken the enemy society. The martyr's society promises the martyr a special reward after death, such as immediate entry into the presence of God or paradise, sinlessness, and the status of mediator between God and the faithful. Veneration is localized at the grave, or at the place of the martyr's relics, and memorial festivals are temporally specified in terms of the actual or supposed date of the martyr's death. Legends of the life and death of the martyrs serve to elevate the memorial to trans-local and trans-temporal status in the eyes of the faithful. Usually, religious communities celebrate the readiness of their followers for martyrdom in the age of their appearance and production; but there are other occasions, as well, notably their expansion, or an existential threat; at this point corresponding forms of martyrial veneration are developed. Once the latter are consolidated, religious communities are then rather inclined to 'downplay' them, especially their extremes, to formalize them, and, on occasion, to replace them with other manifestations.

Literature

Boyarin, Daniel, Dying for God: Martyrdom and the Making of Christianity and Judaism, Stanford 1999; Brown, John, The Making of a Maryr, London 1993; Castelli, Elizabeth A., Martyrdom and Memory: Early Christian Culture Making, New York 2004; Cormack, Margaret (ed.), Sacrificing the Self: Perspectives on Martyrdom and Religion, Oxford 2002; Davis, Joyce M., Martyrs: Innocence, Vengeance, and Despair in the Middle East, New York 2003; Fenech, Louis E., Martyrdom in the Sikh Tradition: Playing the Game of Love, New Delhi 2000; Klausner, Samuel Z., "Martyrdom," in: Encyclopedia of Religion 9, 230-238; Lawson, B. Todd, "Martyrdom," in: Esposito, John L. (ed.), The Oxford Encyclopaedia of the Modern Islamic World, vol. 3, New York 1995, 54-59; Marx, Jacques (ed.), Sainteté et martyr dans les religions du livre, Brussels 1989; Reuter, Christoph, My Life Is a Weapon: A Modern History of Suicide Bombing, Princeton 2004.

→ Fundamentalism, Holy War, Jihad, Relics (Veneration of), Suicide, Veneration of the Saints

Holger Preißler

Marxism

The concept of Marxism gained currency in the last quarter of the nineteenth century, and stands for the theoretical variant and the political variant of the socialist movement originating principally with the efforts of Karl Marx (1818–1883) and Friedrich Engels (1820–1895). The Second Communist International (and after 1917, the Communist Party oriented to the Russian, and later to the Soviet Communist party) understood themselves explicitly as Marxist. Then the non-Marxist variants of the concept of socialism slipped away into a peripheral condition that attracted little attention.

There is some basis for questioning whether Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels composed their works as the foundation of a closed system with an answer to all questions. It cannot be doubted, however, that the transformation of Marxist thought into a dogmatism did not correspond to the intentions of the creators of Marxism. One must certainly distinguish between Marxism as a theory of a capitalist society, and Marxism as a dialectical theory of knowledge—although the chef d'oeuvre of Marxism, Das Kapital (Ger., "Capital"), cannot be understood without the Hegelian dialectic. The unity of theory and practice represented in Marxism is not transmitted by a moral appeal, but is presented as a necessity: subjects—with the right scientific understanding of relations—will indeed act correctly over the long term. The core of the Marxian analysis of capitalism is the demonstration that the societal wealth possible through the development of productive forces will be fully put into practice only when the producers themselves become subjects of the process of production, instead of having to act helplessly in a seemingly objective compulsion of circumstances. As part of the Enlightenment, Marxism retains no essential interest in religion. For Marx and Engels, an adequate → criticism of religion was already available in the foundational works of Ludwig Feuerbach (1804–1872).

Literature

Buhle, Paul, Marxism in the United States: Remapping the History of the American Left, London 1987; Draper, Hal, The Marx-Engels Cyclopedia, 3 vols., New York 1985–1986; Hobsbawm, Eric J. (ed.), The History of Marxism, Brighton 1982; Kain, Philip J., Marx and Modern Political Theory: From Hobbes to Contemporary Feminism, Lanham 1993; Post, Werner, Kritik der Religion bei Karl Marx, Munich 1969.

→ Capitalism, Criticism of Religion, Economy, Socialism, Work

Günter Kehrer

Mary

1. Mary, the mother of Jesus, represents a central figure in Catholic theology and practice of piety. Veneration of Mary as the Madonna emerges from mutually independent cultural horizons, in Poland (pilgrimage to Czestohowa/Czenstochau; → Orthodox Churches), and in Italy (→ Mediterranean Region). Presented as of great importance, but nearly always with reference to her Son, she meets with great reverence in the Eastern and Southern European Orthodox Churches. Finally, she is only a peripheral figure for the Protestant Churches (and Islam).

2. The Catholic Church hierarchy—for more than 1500 years now—has sponsored a doctrine of Mary with space for manifold and vigorous forms of veneration. These include invocation, Marian evening services in church, feasts, hymns, acts of dedication, processions and pilgrimages, prayers, and musical Masses. Such address is very effective in the service of a comparatively unproblematic contact with Mary. Still altogether human, she can be presented in familiar, even relaxed situations, and thus becomes more approachable than Jesus, whose manifestations are pervaded with martyrdom and crucifixion, and who, over and above this, is to be understood as divine.

Mary in the New Testament

3. The Mariology of Catholicism is exemplary with respect what an earnest theology can actually accomplish—namely, with very little material as its basis, develop a copious conceptual edifice. As Jesus's mother, Mary plays an objectively exceptional role, which this material, this group of writings neither belittles nor embroiders. An angel announces to her that she will become pregnant without sexual contact, and will bring the Messiah into the world, all of which she accepts (Luke 1:26-38). She welcomes the wise men from the East, and, with husband and newborn son, flees to Egypt before the advance of Herod's murderous minions (Matt 2). Together with Joseph, she finds Jesus after a three days' search, holding a discussion with the scripture scholars of the Temple in Jerusalem, where he had remained behind without their permission after the Passover festival that they had celebrated together; she remonstrates with him (Luke 2:41-49). Mary regards with consternation her son's later activity, and a course along which he turns from his own family (Matt 3:21). On the other hand, at the wedding in Cana, she is the person to envision the possibility of Jesus's working a miracle (John 2). Under the cross, she encounters her son once more, where Jesus entrusts her with the protection of one of his disciples (John 19:25-27). The gospels give no information about her later life, just as they remain silent as to her family extraction. This lacuna—as it was felt to be—is filled by the 'apocryphal' writings, peripheral to the New Testament: the 'hidden' books, not acknowledged as belonging to the canon of holy writ. There, material for fond legends, images, and dogmas, abounds.

Over the course of time, the most diverse groups within the high and low clergy, along with the laity, have repeatedly integrated further material for declarations on Mary into the life of faith. Behind this material stand intentions to reinforce current trends in the areas of church politics, liturgy, worship, or charity, and to see to the realization of one's own interests. Thus Mary developed into a mirror of interpretation and factor of power, in whom, depending on a given intent, different aspects were stressed such as virgin, bride, mother, Sorrowful Mother, handmaid of the Lord, immaculately conceived (not virginally, but without original sin), advocate, Mediatrix of All Graces, warrior, or queen. In principle, all of those involved have always been able to appeal here to the New Testament pronouncement, "Surely, from now on all generations will call me blessed" (Luke 1:48)—a component of the Magnificat, the canticle of Mary to God, which—particularly in its prophesying the overthrow of the mighty—falls rather outside of the framework of the rest of what is reported of her. In medieval discourse, Marian piety and theology probably exerted some influence on the formation of the concept of Shekhinah in Jewish → Kabbalah.

Marian Dogmas

4. The official Catholic Church has especially responded to the lofty content of the passages cited by the proclamation of four Marian dogmas:

(1) Mary is honored and glorified as the Mother of God (at the Council of Ephesus, in the year 431).

(2) Emphasis is placed on her perpetual virginity (baptismal profession since the fourth century, proclaimed as official title in 451 at the Council of Chalcedon, and two hundred years later endorsed by Pope Martin I).

(3) Further, it is to be taken as a fact that Mary was immaculately conceived: that is, that, from the very moment of her conception, she was free from original sin (Pius IX, after consulting the bishops, 1854).

(4) Finally, in 1950, Pope Pius XII (again, after consultation with the episcopate) declares "that it is a dogma revealed by God that the Immaculate, Ever-Virgin Mary, Mother of God, having completed the course of her earthly life, was assumed, body and soul, into heavenly glory."[1]

Private Revelations

5. It would be altogether inadequate, however, to contemplate the magisterial pronouncements of the popes on the question of Mary in isolation. The infallibility officially attaching to these pronouncements, along with their occasionally trenchant tone, expressly calls for counterweights. The "mystifying mobility and dexterity" of Catholicism (Henri Lefebvre) has therefore established the institution of 'private revelation' as a potential factor in the generation of dogma. According to Catholic understanding, for the explanation and reinforcement of the word of God in the Bible, revelations worthy of attention can be made in later times, as well. Visionary persons, for example, can feel personally called upon by Mary to intensify their life of faith, or to cultivate a special form of Marian meditation service and to ask the same of others. True, a decision on the credibility of these inspirations rests once more with the official church. But the entire process has received a moment of contingent cooperation, drama, and plebiscite, that in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries has led, for example, to the emergence of places of pilgrimage: Lourdes (1858; certified 1862), La Salette (diocese of Grenoble, 1846; certified 1851), Fatima (1917; certified 1930), or Medjugore in Herzegovina (1981, without official determination). Conceptualizations of faith drawn from the most diverse psychic needs thus materialize as current historical events that can be experienced. The public esteem aroused by these happenings (even, at times, in an anti-ecclesiastical circle) is evaluated in the Marian context as further evidence of their authenticity, particularly in fundamentalist circles with an emphatically 'eschatological vision.' The production and reproduction of pictorial presentations of Mary, still persistent today, provides her followers with an aesthetic home.

6. Although much of today's Marian veneration seems pre-modern, both in form and in the values it promotes, nevertheless, taken as a whole, it is actually a matter of a complex of religious phenomena of modern times. It emerged after Enlightenment, French Revolution, and 'secularization,' to replace the veneration of local saints (along with the veneration of relics). In parallel with the strengthening of central papal power in the area of ecclesiastical politics, the Catholic Church of the nineteenth century realized a concentration on Mary in the area of its policy with regard to piety. It did so with the intentional introduction of instruments of publicity and systems of union (founding of Marian associations). But the popular religious objects and rituals referring to her could also—despite their apparently idyllic constitution—be directed aggressively without: "Rise up, [Protestant women], mount a revolution against the men that have withheld your right from you, and even now would still withhold it! Demand pictures of Mary, demand statues of Mary in the churches, on the streets, in the public squares, demand Marian hymns, demand Marian evening services, demand the return of what you have been robbed of since Luther!"[2] This summons by a Redemptorist father, formulated in 1933, did not envisage the emancipation and equality of woman. It was rather that her appeals for an armament strategy, nourished from below in popular liturgy, were wielded on the field of confessional confrontation. Even today, Mary is not least of all a figure of identification for an ardent credence, and is repeatedly claimed as such by conservative or charismatic groups inside or on the margin of the Catholic Church (Fatima Apostolat / Blaue Armee Mariens; Engelwerk; Internationale Rundfunkgemeinschaft, Inc. / Radio Maria). Simultaneously, in the last twenty-five years, a new religious appropriation of Mary is to be cited on the part of feminist theologians, as well as in → New Age spirituality where many new revelations of Mary are intensively discussed.

1. Pius XII, Constitutio Apostolica "Munificentissimus Deus" (Lat., "Apostolic Constitution 'The Most Munificent God'")—dogmatization of the bodily assumption of Mary into heaven, in: Graber, Rudolf/Ziegenhaus, Auton (eds.), Die Marianischen Weltrundschreiben der Päpste von Pius IX. bis Johannes Paul II. (1849–1988), Regensburg [3]1997 ([1]1951), 208-209.

2. Baudenbacher, Karl Josef, Maria—Sonne und Krone der Frauen. Ein Marienbüchlein für die Frauenwelt, Paderborn 1933 (Imprimatur 1932), 56.

Literature

Beinert, Wolfgang/Petri, Heinrich (eds.), Handbuch der Marienkunde, 2 vols., Regensburg [2]1996–1997; Benko, Stephen, The Virgin Goddess: Studies in the Pagan and Christian Roots of Mariology, Leiden 1993; Besutti, Giuseppe M., Bibliografia Mariana: 1948–1989, 8 vols., Rome 1950–1993 (bibliography); Carroll, Michael P., The Cult of the Virgin Mary: Psychological Origins, Princeton 1986; Fulton, Rachel, From Judgment to Passion: Devotion to Christ and the Virgin Mary, 800–1200, New York 2002; Hall, Linda B., Mary, Mother and Warrior: The Virgin in Spain and the Americas, Austin 2004; Schäfer, Peter, Mirror of His Beauty: Feminine Images of God from the Bible to the Early Kabbalah, Princeton 2002; Shoemaker, Stephen J., Ancient Traditions of the Virgin Mary's Dormition and Assumption, Oxford 2002; Warner, Marina, Alone of All Her Sex: The Myth and the Cult of the Virgin Mary, London 1976.

→ Catholicism, Gender Stereotypes, Jesus, Hildegard of Bingen, Joan of Arc, Mysticism, Pilgrimage

Martin Schmolze

Mask

1. The mask is a means of temporary alteration of the physical appearance. It is especially the 'look' of the face, as a projecting mark of the human being's identity, which can be altered or hidden by masquerade. Thus, pleasure and vice are flaunted by masquerade, as at → Carnival; at the same time, masks serve as a means of the presentation of identities and events (→ Drama [Sacred]). Different views prevail on the question of how masquerade should ultimately be conceived. For some, the mask is a necessary component in the sense of a hollow face; others regard the definition of masquerade as also including → tattoo, makeup, and veils.

'Mask' as a Concept

2. Recent ethnological studies indicate that the overall concept of 'mask' is a Western one, under which (cultic) objects are isolated from the context of their application. On the other hand, in the contexts in which these objects are ritually presented, frequently no equivalent is found for the independent concept of mask (see Pernet 1992; Mack 1994). Thus, the expression, used in many parts of Central Africa, of makishi or nkisi refers to (a) the ceremony at which a mask is used, (b) the event of masquerade presented at the ceremony, (c) the masks themselves used at the same, and (d) that which is ritually represented (cf. Mack 1994; Kubik 1993). The concept of the mask made for the museum excludes all of the cases in which the mask has permanency only during the cultic act for which it is produced and worn. At the same time, there are cases in which masks as cultic objects represent the presence of gods during a ceremony without ever being worn. In view of such diverse practices, ethnological discussion has found a common denominator in the concept of the mask in its function of representation.

3. In a ritual framework, the mask is regarded as a means of staging → collective representations. That is, the conceptualizations embodied through masquerade (of transcendent beings and events) and the occasions of their presentation (dances, songs, gesture), as well as their interpretations, are sanctioned by the respective society or group. The circle of those to whom the production, preservation, and wearing of masks is assigned, is socially regulated, as is the transmission of the knowledge bound up with these activities. But a decisive element for the presentation, or the communicative value, of masks in the framework of a cultic occurrence is finally the behavior of those group members who count as uninitiated. The fear demonstrated (often by women) at the emergence of the masks endorses the role identity of the masked participants (often men). With regard to the staged representation, then, special knowledge and bodily techniques are required, for the masks to be able to act.

Masks in Ritual Contexts

4. As means of presentation and direction, masks find application in various ritual contexts (e.g., → initiation, cult of → ancestors, → drama, → feasts, and the healing of the sick).

a) In a context of → rites of passage, masquerade is a medium accompanying the transition from one status to another. In the initiation rituals of the Baining of Papua New Guinea, the event is contextualized for male initiands through the presentation of the creation of the world, with the appearance on the scene of various masks. After a nighttime fire dance of the masks, which represent the spirits of animals and plants of the forest (men's domain), the initiands are acquainted with the production of the masks, and with social rules. The conclusion of the initiation consists of dances by day, in which masks appear that present ancestors whose sphere of influence is the fertility of the garden (women's domain) and the establishment of social order.

Veneration of Ancestors

b) In the veneration of ancestors, masks not only represent transcendent beings, but also serve as collective material, and symbolic stores of possessions in the hands of groups, for example of kinship groups (→ Family Cult), and at the same time are a means of the self-presentation of these groups. In the ancient Roman funeral cult, the series of ancestors was presented by means of wax death masks of the departed ancestors of the current generation (in Lat., imagines maiorum), displayed by mimes in the funeral procession for a deceased family member. In one of the dance cycles comprising a part of the Potlatch of the Kwakiutl (Northwestern American coast; Canada), members of the host group of kin represent their relationship with mythical beings in masked dances. Recitals are presented that convey the origin of ceremonial privileges (masks, → dances, songs [→ Singing/Song]) of the group in terms of a primordial encounter with these beings, frequently animal in form. The history of the transformation of such a being into an ancestor is presented especially graphically, with the use of wooden 'masks of transformation,' whose half-faces, to be opened with cords, conceal one or two other masks underneath (= mythic role identities).

Masks in Sacred Drama

c) Along with the visualizing and narrative function of masquerade, its manipulation is especially striking to the eye in a context of sacred → drama, in which myths and legends are dramatized. On Bali, such presentations are part of the village and temple calendar festivals, although they can also be presented in situations of crisis, for the purpose of averting misfortune. At the center of the various stories stands the struggle between the two mythical figures Barong and Rangda. The figure of Barong embodies the life-protecting powers, and appears as an incarnation of the god Shiva, variously in the mask of a boar, a lion, or an elephant. His adversary Randa, an incarnation of the goddess Durga, represents the destructive powers. Those 'onlookers' who especially seek to participate in the healing powers of Barong are those who, during the presentation, fall into a trance. They are attended by a priest, upon whom it also devolves to address the masks of Barong that lie in front of the area of presentation and to charge them with healing powers, in a ceremony of purification and consecration. Similar masked sacred dramas are part of the monastic culture of → Lamaism in Tibet and Ladakh.

As a medium of the dramatized development and recall of historical events, masks are used in the Conquista plays of the Aymara- and Kechua-speaking Indians of Central and South America. These plays partly go back to the Passion plays introduced by Christian missionaries with personal conversion in mind, as well as to indigenous dances. In them, the story of the Spanish conquest is interpreted from an Indian viewpoint, and with the mask, a stereotyped picture of the foreign invaders, as blue-eyed and white-faced with red beards, is conveyed and preserved.

The European Christian Context

d) In the European Christian context, the concept of the mask is bound up with the wish to conceal the 'true face.' In this sense, referred to the individual wearer or personality, masquerade denotes the substitution of another identity for the 'true' one, which subsequently can be exposed. In ancient theater, the Latin persona, from which the concept of person etymologically derives, like its Greek equivalent prósopon, denoted both the obligatory mask and the role presented in the masquerade. In Greek theater, the mask was used as a means of identifying the characters presented, and served to 'reveal' to the public the identity of the dramatized figures and their role. With the criticism mounted by the Fathers of the Church against theater as part of cultic presentation in honor of Greek god Dionysus, and as an expression of polytheistic sentiments, the use and importance of the mask was gradually demonized. Corresponding to this process, the writings of the Church Fathers developed a concept of person in which the identity of the individual in relation to an almighty God was established as authentic personhood. In these terms masquerade counted as displacement, as a falsifying presentation, and was under suspicion of idolatry. The Middle Ages saw repeated prohibitions by Church and magistracy of the mask as a component of 'heathen' usage. Nevertheless, → Carnival as the day for masking, and a time of ritual transition before Lent was integrated into the medieval Church, and has remained dependent on the dates of the festal calendar of the Catholic Church to the present. This particular context of masking adopts a double form: as 'demonic mischief' (Southern Germany, Alps) of fearful effectiveness, with a deterring (apotropaic) function, although now limited to the folkloristic; and as Carnival masquerade, and a welcome means of playful disguise, anonymity, and moral license—revived some time ago in the folklore of the Venetian nobility.

Literature

Drewal, Henry J./Drewal, Margaret T., Gelede: Art and Female Power among the Yoruba, Bloomington 1983; Emigh, John, Masked Performance: The Play of Self and Other in Ritual and Theatre, Philadelphia 1996; Jedrej, M. C., "A Comparison of Some Masks from North America, Africa, and Melanesia," in: Journal of Anthropological Research 36 (1980), 220-230; Kubik, Gerhard, Makisi, nyau, mapiko. Maskentraditionen im Bantu-sprachigen Afrika, Munich 1993; Mack, John (ed.), The Art of Expression, London

1994; Napier, A. David, Masks, Transformation and Paradox, Berkeley 1986; Pernet, Henry, Ritual Masks: Deceptions and Revelations, Columbia 1992.

→ Carnival, Dance, Drama (Sacred), Fear/Dread, Initiation, Ritual, Theater, Veil

Claudia Naacke

Masses

Human Beings in Crowds and Masses

1. 'Mass,' like 'crowd,' means first of all a multitude of persons. 'Mass,' however, goes beyond 'crowd,' and denotes a 'perceptual' form of crowd, special from without as from within: a multitude arising and understood politically, religiously, or aesthetically, as an independent social condition of aggregate. This aggregate is not defined in terms of an absolute number: the community of believers itself, in its → architecture, is a (prayer) mass. Human masses make their appearance in qualitative leaps: from the individual to the → group to the mass. As criteria for 'mass,' we may establish: anonymity (the persons composing it are unacquainted with one another); bodily contact, so that the 'security distance' of the sphere of intimacy is pierced; geometric ('stochastic' or crystalline) equality—each member is an, aesthetically, quasi-identical particle of a totality (see ill.); immensity; symbolic community building, with the capacity for collective representations; emotional adjustment or intensification, up to the state of euphoria.

Modern → industrial societies are held to be 'mass societies.' Not only has the demographic explosion of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries 'made them that way'; the politicization of the (working) masses, with their culture of the demonstration, the 'total mobilization' of the marching masses of Fascism, → National Socialism, and Communism, and finally, democratic movements such as the protest and the peace movement have all contributed to the circumstance that masses are a component of the public self-expression of modern societies (→ Civil Religion). Here they are also indicative of the religious forms of modernity, although as forms of socialization they are not to be limited to these.

Cultic Masses

2. Masses are an excellent basis for making not only politics, but also for making religion. The crowd organized into a mass, then, belongs to the oldest dramaturgic means of religiousness presented as spectacle. Cultic or liturgical masses are, for one thing, masses in movement: they form a → procession on streets and roads, they use their march to stake out a claim to city space (as in the case of the Irish Order of the Orange) and (with a procession through the fields) the landscape; as emotionalized masses of mourners they accentuate society especially impressively, in state funerals or in Shiite memorial rituals of the Ashura (→ Iran). On the other hand, cultic masses come into existence as disciplined, static, 'closed' (E. Canetti) masses: in the form of a 'prayer mass' in Christian divine service, or at Islamic Friday prayer, when the mass of praying Muslims may stretch for blocks; as 'festive masses,' at the mass weddings of the Unification Church, or at Church Days in the football stadium. In polarized fashion, liturgical masses or crowds can be set over against an single person, who has been stylized, by way of a podium or a microphone, into the equivalent of the mass: then the religious superior (the preacher, the 'leader,' etc.) faces the mass of 'his' or 'her' believers (Rome, Saint Peter's Square). However, they can also demonstrate ingenious interior structures, from the gender-specific 'double mass' of men and women, to the mass in a hierarchical ladder, socially compartmentalized according to prestige. In all these cases, the transition from the practice of faith to the demonstrative proclamation of belief a fleeting one: it depends on the respective belief environment whether the mass will gather its collective energy into its own euphoric celebration, or discharge aggressively to the outside (e.g., in the pogrom).

Mass as a euphoric removal of social constrictions: Thousands of men assemble annually, in February, for the "Festival of the Naked" in the Buddhist Temple of Sai Dai Ji (Western Japan). Clad only in a loincloth, crowded in upon one another flesh to flesh, they vent their enthusiasm for wooden good-luck pieces being tossed into the crowd. Here religion makes possible an experience that transcends social conventions. Here bourgeois norms can be transcended through the medium of the mass, in which believers briefly experience a ritual exception to those norms (→ Marginality/Liminality): the distance that interferes with intimacy dissolves, and the intimacy is further enhanced by nakedness—in itself a social taboo, of course. The ritual's drive to motor activity additionally promotes the unaccustomed bodily contact among the anonymous crowd. However, a pleasure-charged 'crowd-bath' requires no Asian temple for its orgiastics: in the 'bubble-bath' of today's techno-disco, we can experience the like in an altogether profane context.

Mythical Masses

3. Not only the earth, but heaven itself is peopled by masses: YHWH, Lord of Hosts ('God Tsebaoth') commands numberless 'heavenly hosts,' his throne is surrounded by, among others, 144,000 elect (12,000 from each of the twelve tribes of Israel)[1]—even in the monotheistic religions, celestial personnel are remarkably stocked up in the non-dogmatically fixed region of the middle or intermediate beings. In early modern Christian Europe, their number had

Doubtless the most stunning and aesthetically positive example of an ornamental mass is the massive, concentric prayer mass that comes into being when, during the month of pilgrimage, one to two million Muslims travel to → Mecca in fulfillment of their religious duty and assemble around the Ka'aba. The onlooker does not know which to find more astonishing: the organizational achievement—so many persons gathered in so narrow a space—or the discipline of the believers. The geometry of this mass arises by way of the fact that, on the ground, circular lines have been drawn, upon which respective prayer areas are marked. This mass ornament comports an impressive symbolism: it is constantly directed toward the center of belief, the Black Stone. (Hubert Mohr) expanded by leaps and bounds. Even a critic of the persecution of witches like Johannes Weyer (1515–1588) calculated (in the spirit of 'many enemies, much honor') 1,111 legions of demons at 6,666 each (7,405,926 demons; by way of comfort, the number of angels who have not fallen, according to scholastic tradition, was double).[2]

The number of the gods of polytheistic religions likewise varies considerably, in terms of which mythical levels are 'measured off.' While the group of twelve deities of Homeric Olympus still find places at a table, and the thirty-three Vedic gods are still manageable (Rigveda I, 139, 11), the total number of Hindu deities is declared as an exorbitant crowd of 330 million. Of course, this looks like an exotic-minded 'rough estimate' on the part of European observers, who lump the multiplicity of local cults and religions together under an artificial pantheon and thus reinforce their polytheistic prejudice (→ Hinduism). To practice faith, gods obviously need a distinct cultic or mythic face, and divorce themselves from all speculative attempts at an anonymizing multiplication.

Perhaps more than cultic masses, mythic masses are organized in 'double masses' (Canetti): opposite the choirs of angels stand hosts of devils, opposite the hosts of the redeemed (in paradise) stands the mass of the damned (in hell). And the host of the dead, or the rowdy 'savage host,' offers the living a weird, invisible post-mortal picture of itself.

Mass as Stereotype: Prejudice and Hostile Caricature

4. Masses are dreadful: the image of the mass of persons is one of the key images of fear in the modern age (→ Modernity/Modern Age). It has its social location in the mass of workers that takes over the streets, seeking to secure its ends by demonstration or overtly seizing power by revolution. The Commune in Paris in 1870, the Russian Revolution in 1917, the Spartacus uprising in 1919 in Berlin are such examples. The legacy of the workers' movement and the communes nowadays approaches images of 'mass religions,' conjuring up the counter-image of individualistic Western society, many of them intimating its demise: collectivistic, incalculable (population explosion!), uniform—in religious terms: fanatical and fundamentalist. A current presentation of such a religious image of terror is the Shiite Islamic Revolution in → Iran, with its 'mass deployments.' It is principally those religions whose faith is practiced 'orthopractically,' in and with the community of believers (in Arab., umma), who are promptly returned the verdict of mass suggestion and 'mass delusion' from the side of enlightened modernity.

The sometimes inescapable dread that, in mass societies, persons would count not as individuals, but only as a part of the collectivity, has trumpeted nineteenth-century middle-class cultural criticism to the fray. Here, the mass was set over against the—large, solitary, genial, heroic—individual (→ Nietzsche, Le Bon; → Hero/Heroism). Where this opposition missed the mark, then the lonely one in the mass, or the big-city idler (Fr., flaneur), is praised as a special form of contemporary melancholy. Let us put it in an existentialist jargon: "The Stranger"—a work composed in 1942 by Albert Camus (→ Existentialism)—is, in the crowd, on his own, godless and 'manless.'

Mass Occurrences

5. Today the time of that manner of self-tormenting solipsism seems past. When the Pope, in Saint Peter's Square in Rome, gives his blessing Urbi et Orbi (Lat., "to the City and the Globe [of the world]") at Christmas or Easter, or when he journeys to Mexico, this is far from still being a mere liturgical rite. It is a media happening, and popular religious 'event,' that reaches a global audience quota. It thereby inserts itself into the pop culture of modernity, which is a culture of mass events. Mass religious events, such as a revival, a festival, or a procession, are religion become absolutely public and visible. Seen historically, there was a cultic organization and (self-) presentation of human masses in European modernity for the first time only during the French → Revolution. One of the implications of the 'nationalization of the masses' (G. Mosse) in the nineteenth century was that deployments of persons, sporting competitions, and mass events ('folk festivals') were staged not only by social organizations like the unions, but also by entities enjoying state encouragement (e.g., through the Gesellschaft Deutsche Nationalfeste—Ger., "Society of German National Festivals," founded in 1897 and promoted by the state). Their climax came with the political-and-religious mass aesthetics of the 'mass ornaments' of the Fascist and Communist regimes of the twentieth century: the Nuremberg National Socialist Party Days (with their virtuoso documentation in Leni Riefenstahl's 1935 "Triumph of the Will") and the May Day celebrations in Moscow, Bei-Jing, and Pjongjang.

In parallel fashion, the traditional religions organized the masses of the faithful: from the Church Days (Deutscher Evangelischer Kirchentag ["German Evangelical Church Day"] or Katholikentag ["Catholic Day"], both founded in the revolutionary year of 1848), to the 'Folk Pilgrimage,' to the 'sacred skirt' (Ger., "Heiliger Rock"; in 1810, there were c. 200,000 pilgrims; in 1844 c. one million) as a demonstration of Catholic faith, and the Marian pilgrimages to Lourdes, to the papal visitation, or—in the area of Islam—the pilgrimage to → Mecca. But charismatic preachers, like Billy Graham or Martin Luther King, Jr., also attracted masses. It seems too facile to write off this sort of mass religious event as pure ideology, or to wish to 'unmask' it from a viewpoint of religious criticism. The spectacular presentation does aim at effects of 'mass suggestion'; it is carried forward and reinforced by the participants, who can act out liminal experiences in the mass: wishes to be able to fuse together, and rites of excesses, orgiastic jubilee choirs, crying fits or euphoric community feelings. And it is surely appropriate that, as Christians believe, one more mass event awaits us all: the Last Judgment.

1. Mettinger, T. N. D., "Jahweh Zebaoth," in: van der Toorn, Karel et al. (eds.), Dictionary of Deities and Demons in the Bible, Leiden 1995, 1730-1740 (144,000 elect—signed with a seal—Rev 7:4-8, 14:1).
2. Weyer, Johann, De Praestigiis Daemonum, Inventarium, Basel 1563; Godin, Jean, Vom aussgelassenen wütigen Teuffelsheer ("De magorum daemonomania"), etc., trans. Johann Fishart, Strassburg 1591 (reprinted Graz 1973), book 5, p. 258.
3. Johnson, Gordon, Cultural Atlas of India, New York 1996; Bernstein, Pierre-Antoine/Stavrides, Guy, Welt der Paradiese—Paradiese der Welt, Zurich 1992, 298 (neither with a reference).

Literature

Canetti, Elias, Crowds and Power, London 1962 (Ger. [1]1960); Esteve, Mary, The Aesthetics and Politics of the Crowd in American Literature, Cambridge 2003; König, Helmut, Zivilisation und Leidenschaften. Die Masse im bürgerlichen Zeitalter, Reinbek 1992; Medienprojekt Tübinger Religionswissenschaft (ed.), Der Islam in den Medien, Gütersloh 1994; Mosse, George, The Nationalization of the Masses, New York 1974.

→ Civil Religion, Collective Representations, Perception, Political Religions, Prejudices/ Stereotypes, Psychoanalysis

Hubert Mohr

Master / Pupil

Concept

1. A person (who may be invested with a priestly function, but who often stands in competition with the latter) becomes a master (Lat., magister, 'director,' 'teacher,' 'leader'), in the sense of a religious teacher, (1) in the context of a determinate religious tradition, (2) for one or more other persons (pupils), (3) when the latter ascribe him a religious authority and an adequate preparation for teaching and (4) the person in question accepts the role or already professes it. "The relationship of master to pupil is deemed to obtain where the connection is a personal one, and not, or not primarily, one determined by topics to be discussed or considered; consequently, the individuality of the master and the pupil wins central importance."[1] The term 'master' can apply, for example, to a → Guru, Lama, Rabbi, Abba (Christian desert father), Shaikh (→ Order/Brotherhoods), Tsaddiq (→ Hasidism), or Staretz (Russian Orthodox Christianity). In some religions, the master is regarded as necessary for salvation (e.g., in many Indian bhakti and → tantra movements). The question of whether a pupil should go to one master, or may go to several, is answered differently in terms of each tradition.

A distinction can be made between masters who come forward as the representative of a deity, and those who take themselves as seekers along the way and just as needful of salvation as their pupils. Further, a distinction can be made as to whether the purpose of the teaching is the personal salvation of the pupil, or is accompanied by the requirement that he or she should also engage in teaching, and thus, should also become a master. Here we are dealing with charismatic relationships of government in Max → Weber's sense. In some traditions, the master is ascribed miraculous powers. Such classifications, as well as the scientific concept of master, are theoretical reconstructions of historical reality. In practice, what are at hand are mixed forms.

Forms of the Master-Pupil Relation

2. In the model of the master as religious teacher, what is primarily at stake is not the communication of knowledge, but a piercing transformation of the pupil's personhood, self-concept, and worldview. Accordingly, a close cohabitation, or at least personal proximity, between master and pupil, is honored as useful. In order that the pupil may achieve this alteration of personhood, the master introduces the pupil to the ideal life in the sense of the religious tradition at hand. In addition, the master may intentionally confront the pupil with such limit situations as may introduce or hasten such a transformation (for example, in the direction of the 'death' of the old personhood). Such limit situations include, among others, → asceticism, → meditation at places at which corpses are burned, solitude, ecstatic group experiences, the master's abrupt demolition of the pupil's trusted concepts, as, for example, in meditation on a koan in → Zen Buddhism, or—in therapeutic jargon—with the sudden subtraction of the pupil's transferences. These sorts of situations, and the successive consecration to ever 'higher stages' of knowledge, can be understood as → initiation. The the textual tradition is transmitted to the pupil through recitation, repetition, and question and answer. In many traditions bearing on the master-pupil relationship, both are understood to be required to seek each other out, and to investigate each other's suitability. Actually, however, a pupil is often assigned a master. There are various views (e.g., in rabbinical Judaism) on whether a special talent or extraction is a necessary qualification for a pupil, or whether all should be given the opportunity for religious study. The materialization of the master-pupil relationship is usually accompanied by the dissolution of everyday social conditions and contexts (Luke 14:26). The pupil surrenders himself to the master in all trust, and in general owes him absolute obedience, either because pupils cannot judge the purpose of an indication or means, or because God himself is dealing through the master. The Rabbi, for example, is to be honored more highly than one's own father, as the latter has only brought the pupil into this world, while the former will take him or her to the future world.[2] One's strife with the rabbi is strife with God.[3] Thus, a pupil is bound to revere the Tantric master (sadguru) as higher than God, since it is only in the form of the guru that God is in a position to bless and redeem the ignorant pupil.

The pupil has to support the master, wash and mend his garments, and care for him in illness. Contrariwise, the master also has duties with regard to the pupil: the rabbi is even bound to support a poor pupil with food and alms. A master should perceive the character of his pupil exactly, in order to adapt his teaching to him or her. He must prevent his pupil from succumbing to desperation along the way, and may undertake disciplinary measures against him. If the pupil turns out to be inaccessible to the master, the latter may dissolve the instructional relationship. In Buddhism, for example, the pupil is required to watch over the master as to his right conduct, and, if need be, to invoke disciplinary measures in order to lead him into the path of right conduct.[4]

Traditional texts urgently warn against false masters. The kularnava tantra gives a list of empirical characteristics of a genuine guru. It includes, for example, economic independence of the pupil, freedom from fear, pain, hatred, and pridefulness, equanimity, dissociation from women, possessions, and vices. The Buddhist monk and master should be friendly, earnest, and dignified, should himself accept instruction, and should not seduce persons to evil deeds.[5] In Judaism, the rabbi should, for example, be a teacher only as an avocation or without monetary compensation. He should teach the Torah out of love for it, and not in order to earn money.

A rapid increase in master-pupil movements, verifiable at certain times, can in some cases be understood as a reaction to increasing inaccessibility of formally organized religion; in other cases, it can be understood as flight from the world, from the occupation of familiar society and institutionalized religion by unfamiliar powers. The characteristics of a master proposed in the religions are not to be confused with historical reality, in which the personal salvation of the pupil has frequently played, for the master, no recognizable role.

1. Wach 1925, 8.
2. Mishna, Baba Metsia 2,11.
3. Babylonian Talmud, Sanhedrin 110a.
4. Vinayapitaka 4:66.
5. Nyanaponika (trans.), Die Lehrreden des Buddha aus der Angereihten Sammlung (Anguttara-Nikaya), vol. 4, Freiburg [3]1969, 24.

Literature

Siepen, Wolfgang, "Das Meister-Schüler-Verhältnis im Frühbuddhismus unter besonderer Berücksichtigung der Entwicklung in Sri Lanka," in: Dialog der Religionen 7,1 (1997), 9-26; Steinmann, Ralph Marc, Guru—Sisya—Sambandha. Das Meister-Schüler Verhältnis im traditionellen und modernen Hinduismus, Stuttgart 1986; Vinayapitaka, The Book of the Discipline (Vinaya-Pitaka), trans. I. B. Horner, London 1938ff.; Wach, Joachim, Meister und Jünger. Zwei Religionssoziologische Betrachtungen, Leipzig 1925; Weber, Max, Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Religionssoziologie, 3 vols., Tübingen 1920–1921 ([8]1988); Idem, Economy and Society, Berkeley 1978; Wilber, Ken et al. (eds.), Spiritual Choices, New York 1987.

→ Asceticism, Authority, Buddhism, Charisma, Christianity, Group, Guru, Hasidism, Hinduism, Judaism, Lamaism, Meditation, Mysticism, Order/Brotherhoods, Priest/ Priestess

Christian von Somm

Materiality

Along with the statues, apparatus, and special attire of worship, material is an important, if often little noticed, component of worship and ritual. Material used in worship can be made of inorganic matter and products as well as organic ones, which find application within ritual activities. It is applied as sacrificial material, when entrails are burned in honor of the gods, or flowers are placed on graves for ancestors; as means of purification, when the body is cleansed before prayer with water or refined aromatic oils, sand, or even bare stones; as means of painting or marking, when, as in many tribal religions, before or during an initiation, the body is daubed with ocher, soot, or mud.

Thus, materials used in worship include inorganic and organic things, as well as culturally refined natural products (agricultural products) or cultural materials such as paper:

Inorganic Materials

a) Inorganic materials become those of worship especially in the form of the four elements earth (mud baths in → Voodoo, body painting), → water, principally introduced as a means of purification (Christianity: baptism, 'holy water'; ritual washings in Islam; Mikwe ritual bath in Judaism), fire (sacrificial fire: nearly all ancient forms of religion; bonfire; solstice celebrations; → Light/Enlightenment), and air, the latter principally in the form of breath, by which, for example, in the Tridentine baptismal ritual, 'new life is breathed' (→ Breathing). Stones often become the object of worship, on account of their frequently projecting, anthropomorphic, phallic (Shiva's lingam), or otherwise bizarre shapes, or indicate points of boundary and orientation (→ Place [Sacred]; Orientation), or else are used as altar stones.

Organic Material

b) Organic material can be divided, according to its origin, into human, animal, and vegetable materials, where a distinction is to be made each time between raw materials (e.g., rye, rice) and cultural products (bread, Jap. rice wine sake). Although there seem to be no limits to cultic fantasy in a choice of the respective materials and products applied, upon closer observation their selection and placement appears to be determined by a cultural frame. This situation becomes clear especially with respect to plants and animals. Whether they or parts of them serve as sacrificial offerings (wheat, vegetables, herbs, fat, bones), as adornment (twigs, flowers), aromatic material (resins: incense and myrrh), as nourishment in the common meal (→ Eating/Nourishment; Drinking/Drink), or as hallucinatory drugs (peyote cactus in Middle America, mushrooms like the toadstool [amanita muscaria] in Northern Eurasia; → Intoxication/Drugs/Hallucinogens)—their appearance in worship is closely connected with the respective manners of subsistence of the societies to whose religions they belong. Thus, in agricultural societies, the results of the cultivation of the soil and animal husbandry is—especially in sacrificial rites—translated cultically: fat, milk, flesh, cow dung (Hinduism: Brahmanic initiation) enrich the palette of material used in worship just as do the agricultural products bread and wine. These latter even advance to the central material of the Christian practice of worship. Of the human body—aside from uncertain anthropophagic practices (→ Cannibalism)—especially, separable corporeal elements are ritually functionalized, as → hair (at the hair sacrifice in rites of initiation), or fluids and products of secretion like → blood (slitting—'subincision'—of the penis among Australian Aborigines), sperm (Gnostic groups like the Ophites), or urine (in the life reform movement).

c) In terms of the respective technological characterization of a culture, 'artificial' materials or discoveries are integrated into cult or worship: in Chinese space, paper → money is sacrificed; and, especially, the custom of the → light offering has a close orientation to respective technological possibilities, as when wood (fires), oil (lamps), beeswax, artificial wax, or even → electricity serve for the generation of light in worship.

Believers' sensory experiences in the presence of materials used in worship, when these latter are painstakingly arranged, unaccustomed, precious, or even loathsome, make up a good part of religious fascination. While the 'disappearance of matter' is regretted in the age of cyberspace, it is nonetheless very questionable whether religions can do without the elementary fascination of material, sensory perceived presences.

Literature

Buchli, Victor (ed.), The Material Culture Reader, Oxford 2002; Idem (ed.), Material Culture: Critical Concepts in the Social Sciences, 3 vols., London 2004; Kohl, Karl-Heinz, Die Macht der Dinge. Geschichte und Theorie sakraler Objekte, Munich 2003; Material Religion: The Journal of Objects, Art and Belief, ed. by S. Brent Plate, 2005ff. (Journal); McDannell, Colleen, Material Christianity: Religion and Popular Culture in America, New Haven 1995.

→ Blood, Everyday Life, Hair, Perception, Popular Culture, Relics (Veneration of), Water

Hubert Mohr

Matriarchy / Patriarchy

1. The question of gender difference (→ Gender Stereotypes), raised once more in the 1970s by the new women's movement, has kindled a discussion of possibilities for a social order outside patriarchal power relationships, and for a peaceable, control-free cohabitation of the sexes. Many women lack female models and figures of identification. In order to counter this 'lack of tradition,' historical models were sought. The concept of the matriarchy was promptly introduced, with an appeal to Basle scholar of prehistory Johann Jakob Bachofen (1815–1887), the first to inject (1861) the concept into the scholarly debate of the nineteenth century. As early as 1724, priest J. F. Lafitau had reported of certain matrilinear tribes in America, erroneously speaking of a gynecocracy (Gk., 'government by women'). An important role in the discussion was played by archaeological 'finds,' like the excavations in Anatolian Çatal Hüyük (Province of Konya), or on Crete (Knossos), which seemed to confirm the existence of matriarchal societal structures. Concepts of matriarchy are radically distinguished here from notions of cultural science like 'matrilinearity,' 'matrilocality,' and 'matrifocality,' which describe the organization of kinship in the 'succession of the mother.' But since matriarchy (from Lat./Gk., 'government by mothers/women') as a societal type is thus far sufficiently evidenced neither historically nor archaeologically, the central consideration of the concept of matriarchy should become that of a social myth within certain ideological systems. 'Matriarchy' here is diametrically opposed to 'patriarchy,' government by 'fathers' or males. Thus construed, it is part of a history of the battle of the sexes.

In distinct theories of matriarchy, matriarchal cultures are attended by the following fundamental phenomena:

- Dominant role of woman in society and politics ('matriarchy' in the strict sense)
- Descendancy, and inheritance, family, or domicile rights determined through the maternal line ('matrilinearity,' 'matriarchy').
- Veneration of female divinities in religion and mythology ('mother deities'/goddesses)

Bachofen's Theory of the Matriarchy

2. a) In quest of the matriarchy—constructs and concepts: (a) Johann Jakob Bachofen's study, Das Mutterrecht (Ger., "Maternal Law"; 1861) was immensely influential for later concepts of the matriarchy. The former interpreted phenomena of ancient religion and mythology as evidence or memorial of real historical occurrences. Bachofen sketches central figures of the feminine in three matriarchal cultural stages (that are complemented by a patriarchal stage): (1) the hetere (Gk., 'companion,' fem.) as man's sexual fantasy—stage of hetarism, or 'tellurism,' of the 'Aphroditic' ius naturale (Lat., 'natural law'); (2) the → Amazon, as sexual nightmare and augmented gradation of the hetere; and (3) the sublime and chaste mother (as sexually neutralized woman—stage of the 'matrimonial Demetric principle' and the 'matriarchy'). His history of human development follows a universal evolution: from corporeal matter—personified in the feminine element—to the pure masculine spirit; from nature to culture, from primordial promiscuity and heteric matriarchy to the gynecocracy, to what he designates as the "mild, loftier law of spiritual fatherhood").[1] At the end, for Bachofen, the spirit (i.e. man—in Christian terms, 'fatherhood') has triumphed over inferior matter (i.e. woman). Thus, his composition and work are underpinned ideologically by prevailing relations of power, and they justify the subjection of woman vis-à-vis man, and therewith consolidate a 'justified existence' of the patriarchy as the highest stage of development.

Robert Graves and the 'Genuine Myth'

b) For English author and poet Robert Graves (1895–1985), the economic and political structure of matriarchal cultures, which he places time-wise in the third millennium BCE, is secondary. His principal interest is in religion, to which he ascribes the primary role in social life. He sketches a religious system of matriarchal societies that rests on the mystical reference prevailing between the Great Goddess (as tribal mother) and her sons. The Great Goddess comes forward under three aspects—girl, nymph (nubile woman), and old woman;[2] under the influence of J. G. Frazer's scientific epic The Golden Bough (1st ed. 1890), Graves places a masculine companion piece, the 'hero,' at her side. For Graves, this 'genuine myth'—that is, the relation between goddess and sacred king—is conveyed in the patriarchy, and further encoded and distorted. As with all other concepts of the matriarchy (including those not expressly presented here), a reification of the feminine grounds Graves's position as well. The unknown 'feminine' is filled with attributes like nature, savagery, unfathomability, disorder, but also with 'feminine virtues' like motherliness and purity. The feminine, in relation to the patriarchal norm (patriarchal normality), is constantly the strange, the unknown, the other. Masculine yearnings, fears, and hopes with respect to the other sex take form in matriarchal cultures, become essential, and find their localization in the unthreatening sphere of the historical past.

Feminist Debate over Matriarchy

c) In the wake of the women's emancipation movement at the beginning of the 1970s (with forerunners since the 1920s—B. Diener-Eckstein), there arose—building, in part, on the scientific male fantasies described—independent feminist sketches of the matriarchy. The existence of an ancient or prehistoric matriarchy was considered to supply the women's movement with the evidence that female depreciation was historically and not biologically conditioned. Furthermore, the sense of a self-contained female history was thought to offer the demonstration that women—although in the remote past—were actively involved as independent agents in the shaping of society and culture, and thus that the demand for equality of rights in the shaping of today's society was justified. The reconstruction of a genuine female past led unwaveringly to a distancing from the historically produced 'male' image of the world, and to the formation and construction of an independent 'feminine image of the world.' Many matriarchal scholars, as, for example, M. Sjöö and B. Mor, describe the repression of the matriarchy by the patriarchy as the beginning of destruction, violence, and subjugation.

Feminist matriarchal research is recall of a better society, and so of an anterior utopia. It always simultaneously contains analysis and criticism of the patriarchy. With Heide Göttner-Abendroth (1980), for example, the matriarchy still described by male theoreticians as a 'primordial morass' (Bachofen) and chaos, becomes, by means of counter-mythologizing, a peaceful 'mythic time.' The development from then until now is seen as follows:

(1) The Golden Age: pure matriarchy, worship of the Goddess, peace-loving ordering of society, life in harmony with nature;

(2) the Silver Age: matriarchy, agriculture, appearance of the great goddesses of classical antiquity (Demeter, Kore, etc.);

(3) the Bronze Age: theocracy, beginning of the patriarchy, age of 'heroes,' war, and hostility among peoples;

(4) the Iron Age: extends until today: "persons are descendants without values, degenerate, cruel, unjust, ill-willed, insidious, and without respect. War and bloodshed over power or money makes the gladness of their hearts."[3]

It is striking that, with feminist matriarchal scholarship—somewhat as with Robert Graves—social structures are taken less into account, and the emphasis falls on the so-called matriarchal religions, with a Great Goddess in their myth and cult. This fact influenced the development, among some scholars in the women's movement, of sketches of a matriarchal spirituality. Out of the search for evidence of a society created and shaped by women, religion emerged as the principal motif. 'Matriarchy' became the paradigm of a spiritual lifestyle, of the quest for a new definition of reality and for a specifically feminine outline of life, in which cosmic myths, and the mystification of feminine culture as an expression of female power, play a great role. The matriarchy as a utopian place of peace, of bonding with nature, and nonviolence, are impressive vis-à-vis the life realities of women in the patriarchal society. The quest for the matriarchy, therefore, has—from the beginning—been a quest for the ideal primitive society (i.e. primitive homeland of woman), which, as shown here, is not so new, but fits into the long tradition of patriarchal myth-formation, through ideological preparation of history or historiography. The concept of a matriarchal world picture, then, is less a matter of objective facts than of a subjective claim to cultural, religious, and historical elements for the history of a 'woman culture.'

1. Bachofen 1948, 393.
2. Graves 1948.
3. Göttner-Abendroth 1980, 5.

Literature

Primary Sources: Bachofen, Johann Jakob, Das Mutterrecht (1861), Basel ³1948; Diener-Eckstein, Berta (Sir Galahad), Mütter und Amazonen, Munich ²1975 (¹1932); Gimbutas, Marija, The Language of the Goddess, London 1989; Göttner-Abendroth, Heide, Die Göttin und ihr Heros, Munich 1980; Eadem, Die tanzende Göttin, Munich 1982; Graves, Robert, The White Goddess: A Historical Grammar of Poetic Myth, London 1948.

Secondary Literature: Bannerji, Himani, Inventing Subjects: Studies in Hegemony, Patriarchy and Colonialism, London 2002; Eller, Cynthia, The Myth of Matriarchal Prehistory: Why an Invented Past Won't Give Women a Future, Boston 2000; Gewertz, Deborah, Myths of Matriarchy Reconsidered, Sydney 1988; Göttner-Abendroth, Heide, Das Matriarchat I–II, Stuttgart 1988–1991; Lanwerd, Susanne, Mythos, Mutterrecht und Magie, Berlin 1993; Lerner, Gerda, The Creation of Patriarchy, New York 1986; Röder, Brigitte et al., Göttinnendämmerung. Das Matriarchat aus archäologischer Sicht, Munich 1996; Smith, Raymond Thomas, The Matrifocal Family: Power, Pluralism, and Politics, New York 1996; Wagner-Hasel, Beate (ed.), Matriarchatstheorien der Altertumswissenschaft, Darmstadt 1992.

→ Amazons, Family/Kinship/Genealogy, Gender Stereotypes, New Age, Peace, Law, Sexuality, Witch/Persecution of Witches

Angela Schenkluhn

Meaning / Signification

1. "One who asks the meaning of life is sick," wrote Sigmund Freud in 1937 in a letter to Marie Bonaparte. Viktor Frankl's later response is, "One who does not ask the meaning of life gets sick."[1] Behind these two neat accentuations stands—among other things—the question of the transition from an unquestioning consciousness of a meaningful and meaning-filled life, to its crisis-attended questioning. The historical locus of the question of the 'meaning of life' can be broadly defined in terms of two modern conditions. The one is growing secularization; the other is a development in which "life as experienced is transformed into the product of one's own acts and of one's self-determined decisions."[2] Both premises take us back to the nineteenth century, and, indeed, the formula of the meaning of life cannot be demonstrated before the nineteenth century, as → Nietzsche and Dilthey are its first representatives. However one may see the relationship between progress and modernity, between a waxing cultural complexity and a general secularization (→ Security), the fact remains that the problems of the balance sheet of life have obviously changed: Have the parts, the portions of my life, each their own meaning? Can I calculate or hierarchize 'meaning of life' against life-meaning? Indeed, how does it stand with the question of the 'meaning of life' at all? If meaning can be 'conferred,' can it then also be 'lost'? In other words, is 'meaninglessness' the necessary counterpart of 'meaningfulness'—or, instead, is Niklas Luhmann justified in positing the simple 'impossibility of the loss of meaning,' the 'meaninglessness of the notion that existence is meaningless'?

'Pining for Meaning'

2. "In all cultivated heads," notes Paul Valéry, "the most varied ideas, and the most contrary principles of life and knowing, exist in unregulated proximity." This condition is "the essence of modernity."[3] Ever since the 1970s, publications have multiplied that are dedicated to the pluralization of the worlds of life, and plurality of lifestyles.[4] The shift of accent is obvious: it is no longer the cultural macro-level with its different systems of parts, or 'cultures,' that stands in the foreground, but only the distinct situation of a 'shifting' among 'different worlds.' Since there is no 'compulsory meta-system' (W. Welsch), uncertainties concerning orientation, malaises, and renunciation of meaning are the consequences. Such are the diagnoses, in some of their variations.

Need for and Loss of Meaning

3. 'Meaning' is especially precarious where diverse social, religious, or cultural areas, with their respective temporal and historical patterns, overlap or coincide. An ascription of meaning is obviously placed under special demands, then, when routine collapses, patterns of coherence stop working, or competing systems of interpretation result in paradoxes. This analysis presupposes that the personal agents have a horizon available of what to expect—that models of coherence exist, from whose point of departure insecurity or dependency ('contingence') can finally be specified and 'experienced.' Fundamental religious patterns of a basic assessment of contingency focus on the connection of action and passion, and result, for example, in the ancient East's 'reproaches to the gods,' and psalms of protest. At the same time, a fundamental difference between various types of religion becomes visible here: contingency in polytheistic religions is primarily attributed to a multiplicity of gods, their antagonisms, and their spontaneity, while in monotheistic religions it is dealt with by way of a complex history of the ascription of guilt. In other words, contingency in the religious context presents a complication of the problems of theodicy: after all, we find ourselves under conditions of reflections on, and systematizations of, expectation. One implication of this complementary relationship between polytheistic and monotheistic religions lies not only in variously conceived ascriptions of meaning and patterns of orientation, but—on a higher level of synthesis—in a difference among salvation histories ('soteriologies').

4. Since the seventeenth century at the latest, the tendency seems to be forming, among cultural subsystems in Europe, to develop their own systems of meaning, still limited for a time by the demand that they be compatible—at least basically—with Christian soteriology. This observation generates a series of clear conclusions as to the structures of the formation of meaning across the board. Is another sense or 'meaning,' for example, produced (or is meaning produced in a different fashion, as, for example, in a framework of the system of law) in the framework of the economic system? Does the history of nature lose its meaning if it is programmatically de-historicized (M. Schramm, W. Lepenies)? It belongs to the shifting processes of a transformation in orientation that, in the eighteenth century, the spatial pattern of presentation of the 'connection,' or of 'fullness' (Lat., plenitudo) is set at naught by the interpretation pattern of a fixation in time.[5]

Meaninglessness and the Impossibility of Meaninglessness

5. In a framework of his theory of social systems, Niklas Luhmann has developed the thesis that meaninglessness can never be achieved by the negation of meaningfulness in the framework of systems of meaning—that, in the framework of this self-referentiality, "even for it there can no longer be anything that does not appear as meaning. The discourse of 'loss of meaning,' 'endangered meaning,' 'meaninglessness of being' must then (in the modern age!) be surrendered even by this approach to theory."[6] As a consequence of his analysis of social systems through a theory of system, this thesis has won a great deal of attention, and has led to a differentiated determination of the meaning concept. Precisely in the context of a rejection of Luhmann's apodictic determination, it seemed to be helpful to describe the legitimate achievements of the concept of meaning within and outside meaning systems. Precisely then the fact can be recognized that, first, it is possible to expect "that not only distinct courses of events can be referred to an agent as attributable selections, but that even the overall connection of all 'happening' should evince order and consequence, and this in the sense of a comprehensible, and not only regular, succession. As we know, Weber has pointed out the significance, in this connection, of at least the intention of winning rational interpretations of the world, created by intellectuals. Only through them does that expectancy of meaning vis-à-vis the world arise that can be disappointed."[7] The opportunity of negating 'meaning' on the meta-level arises only with the professionalization of religion, and the systematization of interpretations of meaning. The → disenchantment of the world by sciences, and the accompanying expectation of the world to be a meaningfully ordered cosmos, then do constitute, on the level of description, the (paradoxical) possibility of attesting to distinct phenomena of meaninglessness.

Ever since Max → Weber, in such dramatic style, has spoken of a "polytheism of values"—of "the old, many gods that step out of their graves, disenchanted and hence in the form of impersonal powers, and strive for control of our life," the problem of the orienting function of sciences has remained under discussion. Weber, as Wolfgang Schluchter has shown in his Religion und Lebensführung, has stood up for "a cultural study (Kulturwissenschaft) that would be free of value judgments, and at the same time would be value-referring,"[8] inasmuch as they take into account two heterogeneities: the heterogeneity of the sphere of knowledge and the sphere of evaluation, on the one hand, and the heterogeneity of judgments upon knowledge and upon values on the other. This stance means that, despite all difficulties, a distinction must be made among orderings of value, and a decision taken for individual life. That which, with Weber, discharges into pathetic dualizations and alternatives (→ Values), is being increasingly installed as the signature of the modern age.

In an anamnesis of the situation found at the point of departure—and, at the same time, of the situation of modernity—extremely different factors and components can come under discussion. Wolf Lepenies's observation seems of special importance "that the human and social sciences forming in the eighteenth century have reinterpreted, and reduced to utility, in substantial way, that combination of boast of explanation and renunciation of orientation that distinguished the natural sciences."[9] The 'moral sciences' (in Fr., sciences morales) in France at first aroused the appearance of being able to legitimize their claim to orientation by popularization just as scientifically as the natural sciences had done for their epistemological achievement. One of the strategies of the moral sciences lay in the notion that certain areas of living, which in no sense belonged to this field of objects, should themselves be rendered scientific (on the model of the natural sciences). Comte's draft of sociology as the 'natural science of the social' is an example, even in consideration of the idea that 'science' should decidedly replace 'religion.'

Narrativity and the Conferral of Meaning

6. It is easy to overlook the fact that the nineteenth century is the horizon of time in which many sciences "seek to have [their] claim to orientation prevail by popularization."[10] The background of this new development, on the one side, is the development of scholarly scientific languages, and on the other, the growing professionalization of the sciences, which phenomenon also generated a 'laity.' That popularization of sciences can issue in religious patterns is best shown by the popularization of Darwinism in Germany, which, through Ernst Haeckel, issued in monism as a religion. In this pattern, and its inherent "orientation overshooting" (Lepenies), impossible for scholarly science to work its way out of, lurks the fundamental model that currently characterizes the relation of → 'New Age' spirituality to the natural sciences. From the viewpoint of the disciples of the New Age, the natural sciences, and precisely the 'hard' sciences, are constantly producing 'meaning,' i.e. meaning-bestowing patterns of orientation. These patterns are now called morphogenetic fields, strange attractors, or eons—which far outstrip their primary scholarly scientific connections.

Symbolization of Meaning, or Balancing Its Account?

7. On a comparable level, in the internal and external context of sciences, current complaints of loss of meaning and orientation deficits, together with a 'new confusion,' are indicators of the difficulty of dealing with ambiguity, multiplication of meaning, and complexity. Dealing with competing 'systems of interpretation of meaning' requires of their users or appliers other qualities and qualifications than an orientation to traditional religions or conservative educational traditions has demanded or would demand. Inasmuch as these outlines of meaning follow their respective cultural differentiation processes, it is necessary for a pragmatic orientation to be able to 'put them in a cultural order'—to be culturally competent.

Homo Compensator

Helmuth Plessner's image of the human individual's "eccentric positionality" (naked, unbalanced, half), which finds compensation for that 'halfness' in culture,[11] becomes, in Odo Marquard's 'thesis of compensation,' a statement about the relationship of groups of sciences in the framework of culture: the 'humanities' compensate for the 'concrete losses in life' of the hard sciences; thus they make it possible to erect a 'meaning for activity and life.' The point of departure of Marquard's conception adopts an approach of Joachim Ritter: the figure of the homo compensator, in which Marquard sees a key motif of philosophical anthropology, a motif that ultimately has accompanied that anthropology from antiquity. It is of key importance for the current line of questioning that modern variants of the concept of compensation are a legacy of the Leibnizian theodicy. Later theoreticians took up the thesis of the inevitability and 'unsurpassability' of the modernity of the humanities, developed in this framework, with alacrity.

Animal Symbolicum

In various places in his works, and compendiously in the work of his advanced age, Essay on Man (1944), Ernst Cassirer characterizes—or indeed, defines the essence of—the human being as animal symbolicum, who produces and applies the symbol, and settles it in a kind of 'symbolical grid' in a 'symbolical universe.' Adopting this observation, which has already been encountered in multiplicity and in other formulations, Hans Lenk has specified it still further, and broadened it: the human being—unlike the beasts—has the ability to generate ever more abstract symbolizations, and then to investigate and apply the symbols themselves, meta-linguistically and meta-theoretically: the human being is the meta-symbolizing being. The human being is "that being that can also reinterpret these interpretations of her and his once more, and that must interpret them constantly anew—and only thus endeavor to comprehend them."[12] Against this background, in an expansion of Lenk's approach, culture is understood by the latter actually to be able to be understood as an 'interpretative community' (H. Lenk), or "meaning community," as a play of culture, extending the various speech, image, symbol, act, and schema plays to a meta-level, that of 'meaning.'

Meaning of the Act, Meaning of Life, Meaning of the World: Competing Meaning Patterns

8. Processes generating security as elementary components of cultural developments (→ Security), the tallying-up of life and the meaning of life in complex cultures (which now finally make this possible), as well as differentiations of the sciences, along with the patterns of orientation now 'transported' into them, are extensions of a 'tallying' pluralism. The "old, many gods," it would seem, appear less in an "eternal struggle" (Max Weber's mythologizing interpretation) than in a rather opaque, complex scenario in which one must 'arrange' oneself. Over against Weber's call of resignation to find the demon and obey him, as he holds one's life-threads, and over against Freud's comprehensive malaise in culture, the protective, that is, meaning-conferring, character of culture is notoriously underestimated. The 'spider webs' of Ignaz von Born's parable, and Cassirer's 'symbolic web,' not only bind, but also, especially, support.

Various judgments of modernity, which weigh complexity and culture against one another, take their orientation in the philosophical and theological thesis, ready to hand, that 'meaning' fulfills functions of orientation only as cohesive and totalizing pattern; or conversely, that only monist and cohesive models of interpretation could truly generate meaning. A consequence of this conceptualization was the shift of meaning into the objects, an ontologization of meaning: as 'there is only one world,' ultimately there is also only one order conferring meaning. The competency or selectivity of the recipients of meaning, the users and the 'users-for-a-purpose,'—the trouble, here, of finding concepts already introduced shows this—customarily remains outside consideration. The sciences here only too eagerly accept the thesis of the professional producers of meaning that systems of meaning are to be used only in alternation and exclusively: a 'switch,' even on the descriptive level, therefore, is presented as heresy, as → conversion or → apostasy, or even as rejection of meaning. On the model of the Christian theologies, a 'singularization of meaning' is represented. For → European history of religion, on the other hand, it can be shown that a synchronous use of different systems of meaning, even of different religious systems of meaning, represents the rule, not the exception, from → Late Antiquity and the → Renaissance onward. An evolution of ideas in the stacked, closed space of supervision, as is typical with the establishment of complex cultures, potentially means, as well, "alternative play space" (R. Döbert), and produces the possibilities of a contest, or 'market,' of ideas that need not necessarily be measured only in terms of practicability and efficiency. Overlapping attributions of meaning and patterns of interpretation, a production of meaning that 'overshoots,' seem historically to materialize at those borders at which meaning has abandoned the conditions of production characterizing a 'subsistence society,' and can be 'withheld.' But this view presupposes means that can convey and 'transport' meaning: literature and art, philosophy and theology, sciences and institutions, film and television—and in some cases specialists to manage the necessary applications.

Singularization of Meaning: Religion as Exclusive System of Meaning?

9. The sciences, especially the science of religion, have paid little attention to the complex religious orientations and 'meaning competitions' typical of the European situation. This outcome, doubtless, is also connected with the fact that a successive dismembering of different areas of life was generally interpreted as → 'secularization' on the basis of Christian claims on normativeness, and this 'secularized' was excluded from the area of meaning across the board. While the other systems do still uncontestedly count as → 'religions,' the switch of systems of orientation, in terms of need or in biographical succession, is handled in the schema of apostasy and conversion. Temporary, partial, or successive switches are then to some extent automatically under suspicion of heresy. A comparative 'singularization of meaning' is also represented against modern bestowals of meaning, conferrals of meaning, histories of meaning (see above, parag. 7). P. L. Berger's 'heretical imperative' is indicative of this tradition, and is an attempt to describe—and evaluate—the deficiencies of traditional Christianity in modern society.[13] The religions of modernity, and the new religious movements, lay out compensatory strategies: over against the loss of meaning is set a 're-enchantment'; over against a 'shortage' of meaning, a post-monotheistic pluralism; over against a particularization of meaning, a world as meaningful organism; over against a diffuse meaninglessness, a narrative revival of old meaning resources.

1. Cited and contextualized in Lübbe 1994, 23f.
2. Ibid., 24.
3. Valéry, Paul, La politique de l'ésprit, in: Oeuvres, vol. 1, Paris 1957, 1018.
4. Bell, Daniel, The Winding Passage, Cambridge 1980, 329f.; Berger, Peter L. et al., The Homeless Mind: Modernization and Consciousness, New York 1973; Zapp, W., "Die Plurisierung der Lebenstile," in: Idem et al., Individualisierung und Sicherheit. Untersuchungung zur Lebensqualität in der Bundesrepublik Deutschland, Munich 1987, 16-30.
5. For this change or 'switch,' Lovejoy, Arthur O., The Great Chain of Being: A Study of the History of an Idea, Cambridge 1948; Dux, Günther, Die Zeit in der Geschichte. Ihre Entwicklungslogik vom Mythos zur Weltzeit, Frankfurt 1989; as well as Gehlen, Rolf, Welt und Ordnung. Zur soziokulturellen Dimension von Raum und Geschichte in frühen Gesellschaften, Marburg 1995, 201ff.
6. Luhmann 1996, 108.
7. Hahn 1987, 163f.
8. Schluchter, Wolfgang, Religion und Lebensführung. Studien zu Max Webers Kultur- und Werttheorie, Frankfurt/M. 1988, 350.
9. Lepenies, Wolf, "Wissenschaftskritik und Orientierungskrise," in: Lübbe, Hermann et al. (eds.), Der Mensch als Orientierungswaise? Ein interdisziplinärer Erkundungsgang, Freiburg 1982, 991.
10. Ibid., 105.
11. Plessner, Helmuth, "Die Stufen des Organischen und der Mensch," in: Idem, Gesammelte Schriften 4:385; 395.
12. Lenk, Hans, Schemaspiele. Über Schemainterpretationen und Interpretationskonstrukte, Frankfurt/M. 1995, 14f.; cf. p. 252.
13. Berger 1980.

Literature

Alt, Jürgen August, Wenn Sinn knapp wird: über das gelingende Leben in einer entzauberten Welt, Frankfurt/M. 1997; Berger, Peter L., The Heretical Imperative: Contemporary Possibilities of Religious Affirmation, Garden City 1980; Blumenberg, Hans, Die Sorge geht über den Fluß, Frankfurt/M. 1987; Bolz, Norbert, Die Sinngesellschaft, Frankfurt/M. 1997; Döbert, Rainer, "Zur Logik des Übergangs von archaischen Gesellschaften zu hochkulturellen Religionssystemen," in: Eder, Klaus (ed.), Seminar: Die Entstehung von Klassengesellschaften, Frankfurt/M. 1973, 330-363; Idem, "Sinnstiftung ohne Sinnsystem?," in: Fischer, Wolfram/Marhold, Wolfgang (eds.), Religionssoziologie als Wissenssoziologie, Stuttgart 1978, 52-72; Dux, Günter, Die Logik der Weltbilder, Frankfurt/M. 1982; Gladigow, Burkhard, "Historische Orientierungsmuster in komplexen Kulturen. Europäische Religionsgeschichte und historischer Sinn," in: Müller/Rüsen 1997, 353-372; Idem, "Der Sinn der Götter. Zum kognitiven Potential der persönlichen Gottesvorstellung," in: Eicher, Peter (ed.), Gottesvorstellung und Gesellschaftsentwicklung, Munich 1979, 41-62; Hahn, Alois, "Sinn und Sinnlosigkeit," in: Schulz, Hans Jürgen (ed.), Sinn, Kommunikation und soziale Systeme, Frankfurt/M. 1987, 155-165; Hitzler, Ronald, Sinnwelten. Ein Beitrag zum Verstehen von Kultur, Opladen 1988; Lepenies, Wolf, Das Ende der Naturgeschichte, Frankfurt/M. 1978; Lübbe, Hermann, "Erfahrungen von Orientierungskrisen in modernen Gesellschaften," in: Weidenfeld, Werner/Rumberg, Dirk (eds.), Orientierungsverlust – Zur Bindungskrise der modernen Gesellschaft, Gütersloh 1994, 13-29; Luhmann, Niklas, Soziale Systeme. Grundriß einer allgemeinen Theorie (1984), vol. 2 ("Die Sinnform Religion," 3-33), Frankfurt/M. 1996; Marquard, Odo, "Homo compensator. Zur anthropologischen Karriere eines metaphysischen Begriffs," in: Frey, G./Zelger, J. (eds.), Der Mensch und die Wissenschaften vom Menschen, Innsbruck 1983, 55-66; Müller, Klaus E./Rüsen, Jörn (eds.), Historische Sinnbildung, Reinbek 1997; Schramm, M., Natur ohne Sinn? Das Ende des teleologischen Weltbildes, Graz 1985; Schütz, Alfred, Der sinnhafte Aufbau der sozialen Welt (1932), Frankfurt/M.

1974; Wehler, Hans-Ulrich, "Geschichtswissenschaft: Aufklärung oder Sinnstiftung?," in: Niess, Frank (ed.), Interesse an der Geschichte, Frankfurt/M. 1989, 124-134.

→ History, Nature, Science, Tradition

Burkhard Gladigow

Mecca

General

1. Mecca (in Arab., al-Makka—often with the suffix al-Mukarrama, 'the Venerable') is the sacred city, and most important place of pilgrimage, of → Islam. The central sanctuary, the Ka'ba (Arab., 'cube'), a rectangular building, in whose northeastern wall the Black Stone is fixed, with its religious importance from pre-Islamic times, stands in the center of the Great Mosque. Mecca (provincial capital of the emirate of the same name) lies on the West coast of the Arabian Peninsula, in the mountainous region of the Hijāz, in today's Saudi Arabia. It is about 72 km distant from the Red Sea, and has some 300,000 inhabitants. The area of the city is relatively high (roughly 280-320 m), and lies between two nearly bare chains of hills. Although rain falls irregularly (about 100-150 mm per year), heavy rain collects in the valleys, owing to the fact that the surface is of granite. Thus, the city, and especially the ḥarām (Arab., 'holy area'), are occasionally flooded, as they were in 1942 and 1950. Dams have been built recently, in an attempt to prevent flooding. The climate is hot and dry—in July an average of 37.5°C—and natural sources of water are few. At present, a pipeline leads from the seawater desalination plant to Mecca; since 1998, its capacity has been doubled to 140 million m^3 annually, with an investment of $525 million. Non-Muslims are prohibited from entering the city.

History

2. Mecca had importance even in pre-Islamic times, as a commercial city, and doubtless also as a place of pilgrimage. In pre-Islamic times, the culture and religion were not entirely different from those of the neighboring nomads on the Arabian Peninsula, and a polytheistic religion, characterized in part by divination, was the basic religion. Meccans must have come to know Judaism and Christianity, as well, together with the so-called *Ḥanīf*s (probably monotheistic hermits). Presumably, the Ka'ba and Black Stone, as well as the other stations of today's pilgrim route, or Hajj (Arab., ḥajj), were already reckoned as sanctuaries by that time. After its capture by the Muslims in 630, → Muhammad, himself a native Meccan, made the city the key pilgrimage place and direction of prayer (in Arab., qibla). The Umayyad caliphs (→ Islam) came from a class of the Meccan nobility. Even by the time of Caliph 'Alī, however, Mecca had become politically peripheral. But its religious importance remained intact, and the 'Abbasid caliphs, especially, invested a great deal in the city. The sanctuary of the Ka'ba was subjected repeatedly to incursions by extremist, mostly antinomian groups, such as the one in 930, when the Qarmats plundered the city, murdered numerous inhabitants and pilgrims, and carried off the Black Stone to their realm in today's Bahrain, from where it was recovered only in 950. After 960, Mecca was controlled in turn by the *Šarīf*s (Arab., 'noble,' descendants of the Prophet) under the administration of the caliphs, then the Mongols, and finally the Ottomans, who maintained themselves in two kingdoms until 1924. The last Sharif had to yield to the onset of the Waḥḥābites, followers of the radically traditionalist doctrine of Muhammad ibn ʿAbdulwaḥḥāb (1703/04–1792), who especially opposed veneration of the saints and any kind of outer grandeur, and represented an extreme moralism. Since 1744, the teaching of the Waḥḥabīyya has been linked with the direct forebears of today's Saudi royal house, which was proclaimed in 1925. A confession in the proper sense does not exist there any more than do parties, unions, or elections. The foundation of the state is Islamic law (Sharia, → Islam), whose observance is also overseen by a special religious police. Since King Faisal (assassinated in 1975), first approaches have been made to a constitution or deliberative bodies, but power lies as much as ever with some 10,000 Saudi princes, especially the King.

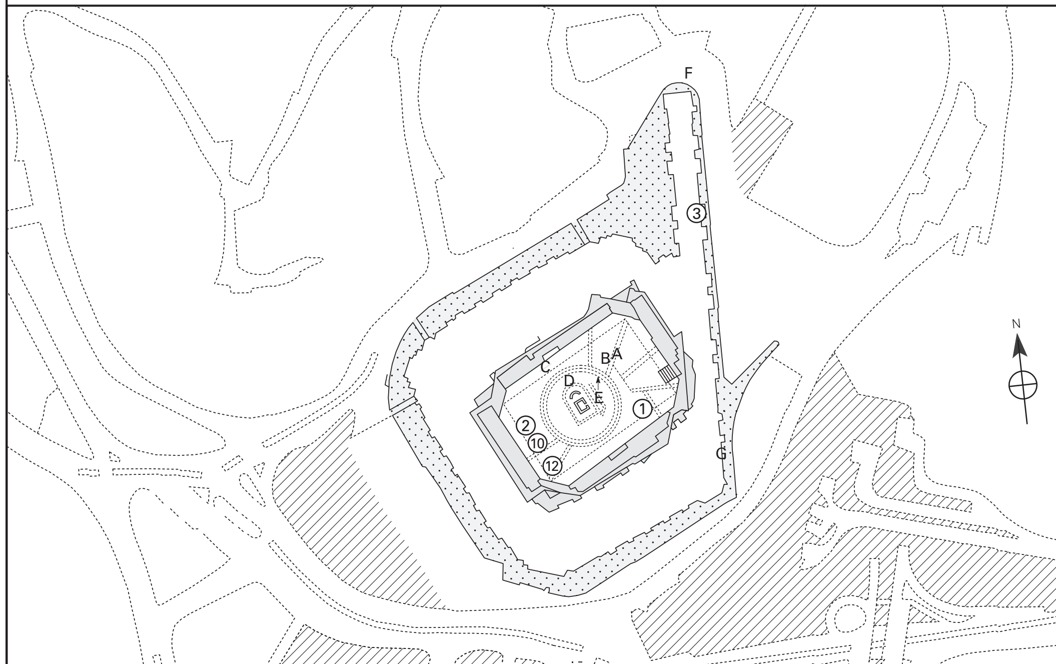
The Hajj

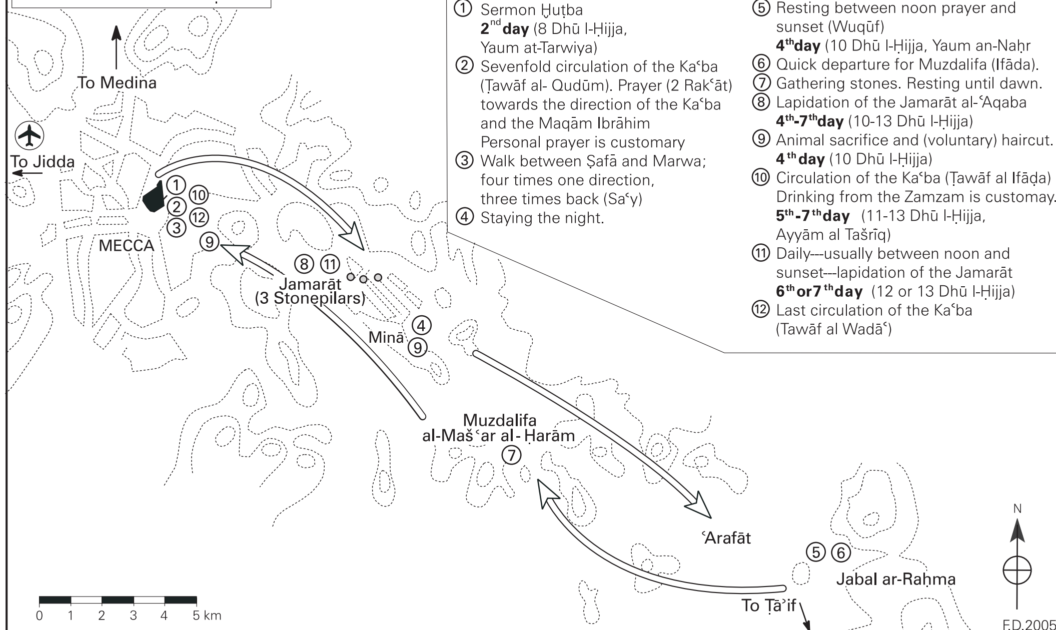
3. The Saudi government has made the organization of the pilgrimage to Mecca and Medina a government program from the beginning. Since 1986, the King has called himself "Guardian of the Holy Places." The Hajj (Arab. for pilgrimage, especially to Mecca, and then Medina) is one of the Five Pillars of Islam (sura 3:97), and is to be undertaken by every Muslim once in a lifetime. Muslims distinguish between the ʿ*umra*, in which only the holy places in Mecca are visited, and the actual Hajj. The latter generally takes place between the 7th and 13th of Ḏū l-Ḥijja (in the Muslim enumeration of the lunar months, the month of pilgrimage). The pilgrim enters upon a condition of consecration (in Arab., iḥrām), whose external sign is special dress (for men, two unsewn white sheets, around the hips and over the shoulders, no head-covering, sandals) as well as certain prescriptions of abstinence (such as from perfumes and sexual intercourse, the → hair must not be washed, combed, or cut). Important ceremonies of the pilgrimage (see also maps) are the hearing of a sermon, the sevenfold circling of the Kaʿba (ṭawāf), prayer at the maqām Ibrāhīm (Arab., "place of Abraham": according to Islamic teaching, Abraham built the Kaʿba), and the course (saʿy) from Ṣafā and Marwa, which were integrated into the area of the mosque, standing (wuqūf) at the Jabal al-Raḥma ("Mount of Grace") or ʿArafāt, the course from there to the Gal Minā, with an overnight stay in Muzdalifa (in the Qur'an, the place is al-Maš ʿar al-Ḥarām). In Minā, seven stones, ideally gathered at ʿArafāt, are cast at one of three stone pillars (in Arab., jamarāt) that symbolize the Devil. On the tenth of Ḏū l-Ḥijja, an animal sacrifice is slaughtered, with several pilgrims present, if possible. The meat is consumed, and the leftovers distributed to the poor. The organization sponsored by the Saudi government meanwhile sees to the removal of the leftovers, so that danger of disease is extensively checked. The subsequent shaving or cutting of the hair is customary, but not obligatory, as is drinking from the cistern Zamzam in Mecca. A further circling of the Kaʿba is executed, which in the meantime has been redecorated with its new brocaded cover (kiswa), whereupon the last days are spent in Mina, where, daily, seven more stones are cast at all three pillars. The Hajj closes with a 'farewell ṭawāf.' Most of the rituals could be of pre-Islamic origin, reinterpreted after the establishment of Mecca as spiritual center of Islam, and 'Islamized' by the pronouncement of certain formulae, for example with the wuqūf or ṭawāf. Pilgrims optionally pay visit to other places in Mecca, such as the birth house of the Prophet, as well as the trip to Medina to the entombment mosque.

Pilgrims to the Black Stone (al-ḥajar-al-aswad) at the Kaʿba. The Kaʿba itself, as well as the Black Stone, date from pre-Islamic times. After the conquest of Mecca in 630, the idols in and around the building were removed, and the sanctuary and cult were Islamized. Islamic legend maintains that Abraham built the Kaʿba, and that the Angel Gabriel brought the Black Stone from heaven as a sign of the Covenant with God. The Stone has a red-black color, with red and yellow particles, and consists of lava or basalt. It protrudes into the northeastern outer wall of the Kaʿba, and is held together with a silver bond: it may have been a result of the plunder by the Qarmats in 930 that it has been broken into three large pieces and a number of small ones. In their circumambulations (ṭawāf) of the Kaʿba, pilgrims press their breast against the part of the wall between the stone and the door, and try to touch and kiss the Stone. At the same time, the Stone has also become the object of antinomian attacks against religious law (as, for example, by the Qarmats), and so it is guarded by members of a special police unit (ṭawāšī, in the picture), who, especially during the month of pilgrimage, are stationed in the maṭāf (surrounding area), for the protection of the pilgrims and the sanctuary.

4. Even in the recent history of Mecca, repeated violent confrontations have occurred during the Hajj, such as, for example, 1979 violence with Iranian (and so Shiite) pilgrims, which killed 402 persons. Likewise in 1979, a group of extreme traditionalists occupied the area of the mosque, in which there were 50,000 persons just then, and proclaimed Muḥammad ibn ʿAbdallāh al-Qaḥṭānī to be the Mahdī ('messiah' of the end time). The Saudi police managed to take the armed men into custody relatively quickly, and they were beheaded in 1980. Sixteen participants in an assassination attempt by Shiite Kuwaitis in Mecca were executed in 1989.



Other events have burdened the organization of the Hajj, such as the panic in the Great Mosque in 1990, where nearly 1,500 pilgrims died, or as recently as 1997, the burning of the tents in Minā, which cost the lives of 343 persons.



The Saudi health organization, which has developed rapidly since the oil boom, is concerned that no epidemics break out during the Hajj. (The cholera that had often been introduced previously quickly subsided.) Hygienic measures have been taken, and adequate medical care of the pilgrims has been assured. The Jidda airport, connected with Mecca by an eight-lane highway, through which most pilgrims come today (87%; most of these from Indonesia), belongs to the largest in the world in area, and can accommodate 9,000 pilgrims per hour (the pilgrimage is undertaken by 1.5 to 2 million pilgrims annually), along with 6,000 other passengers, during the D̲ū l-Ḥijja. A system of four-lane circulator highways surrounds the sacred area of Mecca's center city, and connects this area by highways with the rest of the country. Four highways, and a pedestrian lane, lead to ʿArafāt alone. Since 1956, the sacred area itself has constantly been widened: from originally 3,000 square meters in three approaches before 1993, it has grown to 186,000 square meters (room for one million persons at prayer, parking lots for buses and cars), and was widened around certain minarets. The course between Marwa and Ṣafā has been attached to the complex of mosques, and roofed, the Zamzam has been overlaid with marble and completely remodeled, and steps, with ramps for wheelchairs, along with new doors, have been installed. These construction projects have driven some 125,000

MECCA: Grand Mosque (Al Masjid al-ḥarām)

- Old Kaʿba Mosque
- New Saudi Buildings
- Surfaces Torn Away (1978-88)

A. Zamzam Springs
B. Maqām Ibrāhīm (Here one may join a group led by a Muṭawwif)
C. Maṭāf (open area for circling the Kaʿba)
D. Kaʿba
E. Black Stone
F. Marwa
G. Ṣafā (wheelchairs are available here, and one may join a group under the leadership of a Muṭawwif) households and shops from center city to decaying streets, which have now been colonized as far as twenty kilometers from downtown. The old building substance of downtown, with its up to seven-story clay structures, has all but disappeared. Similar construction projects have been begun in Medina, as well.

This program is all part of the effort of the Saudi government to style Mecca, and along with it Saudi Arabia, the midpoint of the Islamic world. Stagnation in the development of the city, caused by the oil boom on the East Coast, has since been practically overcome. Since 1948, Mecca has been the site of an Islamic university and a center for Islamic education. The Islamic World League has its headquarters here, along with numerous printing and publishing houses. The standard of living is high. Eighty-five percent of the wage earners work in the tertiary sector, mainly in health institutions and establishments, the hotel industry, or as Muṭawwifīn (cooperatives of official pilgrimage leaders). State industry is essentially limited to a kiswa factory with some 200 workers, as a result of the tradition that the particular political ruling power establishes the kiswa over the holy places.

Meanwhile, the massive character of the Hajj is also seen as a problem: not only the fact that the first oil boom is long past, and now even the Ministry for Ḥajj and Waqf (religious foundations) must cut their budgets. But extravagances and untoward episodes, which repeatedly arise despite excellent organization, have led the government to suggest to the Organization of Islamic Conferences, well-established in Jidda, a contingent of pilgrims of at most 10,000 per country and year, especially in order to reduce the Iranian pilgrims. Meanwhile, Iran is permitted to send 110,000 pilgrims per year.

Literature

Bianchi, Robert R., Guests of God: Pilgrimage and Politics in the Islamic World, New York etc. 2004; Glassé, Cyril, The Concise Encyclopedia of Islam, Appendix B: Mecca and the Hajj, London 1989; Kaïdi, Hamza, Mecca and Medinah Today, Paris 1980; Parker, Ann/Neal, Avon, Hajj Painting: Folk Art of the Great Pilgrimage, Washington 1995; Peters, F. E., The Hajj: The Muslim Pilgrimage to Mecca and the Holy Places, Princeton 1994; Wensinck, A. J. et al., "Hadjdj," in: Encyclopedia of Islam[2] 3 (1979), 31-38; Winder, R. B. et al., "Makkah," Encyclopedia of Islam[2] 6 (1991), 144-187; Wolfe, Michael (ed./trans.), One Thousand Roads to Mecca: Ten Centuries of Travelers Writing about the Muslim Pilgrimage, New York 1997.

→ Islam, Local Devotion, Orientation, Pilgrimage, Place (Sacred)

Agnes Imhof

Media

Transmittal of Religion

1. Religions are complex, culturally conditioned systems of communication and symbol. Their 'messages' (of the will of God, of the gods, of the ancestors) and their signs are often accessible to and interpretable by only a few specialists. Religions therefore need to shape and develop certain strategies of transmittal. This means that, even per se, → communication has a medial aspect of conveyance of information, of coordination, and of articulation. Media (whether human or → machine) are to some extent means of assistance

In 1991, the Catholic Church in Poland had received from the state the right to use, free of charge, frequencies today occupied mostly by the private station Radio Maryja (Polish, "Radio Mary"). In the name of the Virgin Mary, Radio Maryja, which is financed entirely by donations, has long since become a platform for a Poland-centered, anti-foreign Catholic → fundamentalism. According to the station itself, it had four to five million regular listeners in 1998. The concept of 'interactive radio' includes active audience-participation, in the form of live expressions of opinion, but also prayers, etc. A newspaper and a television station have been planned.

to, and material carriers of, religious symbolic systems. By accommodation to new media, of course, cultural and religious conditions can be created anew, and they are—not infrequently accompanied by the critical voices of representatives of traditional forms of transmittal.

What functions various media adopt within a society, which interests they satisfy, and how communication, the conservation of knowledge, as well as → advertising and propaganda, or the construction of partial audiences and spaces of communication (for instance, the Church in the Middle Ages), run their course, are recurring questions, especially with reference to religion. Thus, until well into the Middle Ages, European culture appeared as an era of the medium, 'person'—religious → specialists as a medium—not of the written media. Only with the fifteenth-century invention of printing does an alteration occur that, seen historically, can be grasped as the first instance of a 'communication between human being and machine.'[1] The addressee of the 'message' is indeterminate, interpretation is left to the individual, and the book becomes an educational medium, but also one of entertainment. Simultaneously, by way of new technological media, further ways appear for receiving and storing cultural and religious knowledge. No longer is the human memory alone important for transmission; now complex material objects and processes join it. Particular achievements are externalized, and the culture of memory gradually loses its importance (→ Memory).

In the twentieth century, through the development of electronic media (mass media), we experience a further 'turnabout.' New forms of communicative networking (Internet), new information-storage systems (video tapes or diskettes), plus the pluralization of the supply of information, by cable television or satellite, present opportunities for a new form of spirituality or piety. It can be discovered, in all of its multiplicity, in the mass media, on the music and art scene, or in entertainment and the area of leisure. Thus, today we stand on the "threshold of the age of the boundless media,"[2] the media that make it possible, in principle, to navigate many areas of life with the same apparatus (e.g., on-line shopping and banking), and to develop

Using a wooden block and a block-letter method, a Buddhist monk in Nepal is producing prayer banners. In Lamaistic culture, such banners are hung in open spaces, for example at mountain passes, where the wind waves them. One frequently sees them on long strings, stretching from the tip of a stupa (Buddhist sacred architecture) to the ground. In the raw climate of the Himalayas, the printed material does not long endure, and so the banners are regularly replaced through the efforts of adherents. The five colors (yellow, red, green, blue, white) correspond to the directions of the sky. Often, additionally, the animal symbols of the directions of the sky are pictured: a horse, a peacock, bird-person Garuda, an elephant, and a lion. Activated by the wind, the banners become a medium of religious communication. The saving power of the mantras printed on them is a proclamation that will be borne further without more human intervention, freed by the wind and blown by it to all living beings. Thus the fluttering prayer banners send their blessings to all the winds. (Kirsten Holzapfel) new forms of communication, information, and entertainment (audiovisual conferences, networked games, chat rooms, cyberspace).

How, and in what guise, religions will react to these recent developments is as yet undetermined. So far, it has been the constant interest of the religions, as partial systems of society, to appropriate the respective cultural technologies—not without a critical distance, however. This can be shown with the medium of the book, as well as with the use of radio and → television.

Nevertheless, despite these facts, what has always been of outstanding importance has been first of all the human being as 'transmitter.' It has always been persons who remembered and proclaimed the information, who transmitted it through speech, and interpreted 'magical signs.' Thus, in a presentation of the relevant media for the religions, the 'primary medium,' that must not be missing, has always been the person, along with the print media and the electronic media. The medial importance of the individual person lies in the pure storage of information, and communication, as well as in a function of social regulation and worship, in the stabilization of government and in entertainment (in Lat., spectaculum).

The Religious Specialist

2. Religious → specialists are differentiated religious 'person-media' (W. Faulstich). They are characterized by their assumption of particular roles and cultic functions (→ Sacrifice)—both therapeutic and cathartic, within a society—partly in combination with charismatic capabilities (→ Charisma). Depending on the cultural context, they are priest(esse)s, shamans, prophet(esse)s, monks, nuns, and preachers, and even singers and storytellers. As a 'medium between the worlds,' they communicate, through particular techniques (e.g., → oracles, → dreams and → visions, as well as astrological interpretations; → Astrology), at one and the same time with the gods and with human beings; they are the guardians and conveyers of sacred traditions; they are the instances of formation and education; they structure the world for the members of their community; and they indicate schemata of order. Their role is frequently bound up with enormous prestige and political influence, so that they can be media of government, on the one hand; but on the other hand, as in the case of the reforming prophets, they can stand against government, worship, and priesthood, for renewal in times of crisis.

For the European Middle Ages, it is especially the preachers and mendicant monks who tread the narrow line between monastery, university, and the developing city, and open new channels of information and communication. With the monks stepping out of the monastery, and practicing new kinds of proclamation, for instance the folk sermon on the streets and in the squares, and this in the colloquial language, a new dimension of public sphere was reached by the religious message. That dimension, with its orientation to persons and groups with particular purposes, produced a connection with other media of the transmission of the faith (→ Liturgy/Dramaturgy; Book; Art/Aesthetics; Drama [Sacred]; → Procession). Along with the cult of the saints and their relics, the mendicant monks' sermons became at once the determining foundation of 'folk piety,' and again, the "key medium, in the Late Middle Ages, through which scholarly 'book-knowledge' found entry into folk culture, and theological thought patterns into the conceptual world of the laity."[3] It is precisely the suppression of 'superstition' and folk culture by the 'mission preachers' that demonstrates the sermon as a combative medium of the Church(es). In the coming of the 'television preacher' (→ Televangelism), who, today, via satellite, can at times be received at several thousand places worldwide, and in simultaneous translation, this tradition continues to an extent never reached before.

Along with the religious specialists, it is especially singers and storytellers who have always been responsible for the storage and transmission of myth and wisdom. In songs of the gods and heroes, in sagas and fables, prevailing hierarchies of values and norms transmitted a framework of orientation for human action. → Heroes represented cultural ideals. In the European Middle Ages, singers and storytellers were both the first 'live' entertainment media, and, similar to the traveling player, communications media of the first rank. Through their mobility, they were the journalists of their time, and vehicles of political report and daily critique.

The Configuring Media

3. Human individuals, as cultural beings, shape their environment anew: in creating or reshaping things, at the very same time they see new opportunities for the transmission and storage of knowledge. The configuring media are always the vehicles of two aspects, that of art and that of the medium. Culturally conditioned means of expression such as → dance or → theater not only convey cultural identity, in the form of religious traditions and myths, but also serve for the regulation of socially conditioned events, and are elements of stress management, as well as of pure entertainment. Media of the image (wall, window, icons), sculpture, the plastic arts, memorial and burial stones, and architecture preserve the social memory. The transmitting function of the configuring media is especially the product of their public character. The consequent adaptations of the religious 'proclamations' to the medium are seen in an immediate comprehensibility, generated by the multiplication of information and of its character as call and appeal. Thus, for example, the windows of medieval cathedrals, with their image cycles from the world of Christian belief, the symbols of salvation, and scenes from the Bible or the lives of the saints, became independent vehicles of transmission, whose shaping, through the accentuation of particular elements taken from the everyday reality of the onlooker, often deviated considerably from a presentation in the text. It was precisely on that account, however, that the theologians adopted them—along with murals and frescoes—for the religious instruction of a mainly illiterate audience, a project that they could more easily integrate into their concrete reality by way of the proclamations transported through the images. Only in the wake of the → Reformation did the image lose its importance, and the 'wall' as a medium moved out of the church.

Similar developments are found in liturgical plays, such as the Easter or crib plays, the Passion plays, the miracle and legend plays. If at first there was only the presentation of certain textual passages (such as the Mary's visit to the empty grave; Matt 28:1ff.; Mark 16:1ff.; Luke 24:1ff.; John 20:1ff.), eventually there is an extension of the themes and an individualization of the persons presented (e.g., weeping Mary), until entirely new details are added (e.g., purchase of ointments from the greengrocers). Furthermore, the place of execution shifts from church space to that of the square before the main gate.

Thus, the purpose maintained by the 'shaping media' was not only a simplification and a direct comprehension on the part of audiences, but also affects, pleasures, and entertainment.

4. Written media, such as the scroll, the sheet or folio, the book, the computer, are media that use writing as a tool for the storage of information and cultural knowledge. Far more powerfully than the shaping media, those just cited are first and foremost storage media with an archival function.

Writing

With the development of written signs (from the fourth millennium BCE, in several coding systems almost simultaneously in Egypt and Mesopotamia), the history of the written media began. In the course of time, these media extensively replaced the subjective/objective configuring media in their function as media of storage and communication. The new specialists, the writers, often belonged to a privileged condition—were functionaries of the administration, or with the military—and, to some extent, had cultic functions as well. (In the European Middle Ages, at least in Christian contexts, the ability to read and write was limited almost entirely to → monasticism.) Even the book's predecessors, the papyrus or parchment sheet, the codex and the scroll, became important storage media, for sacred as well as profane purposes. They stood in a connection with worship, as, for example, with the determination of sacrificial gifts to be made on the part of the faithful. The 'book house' as a part of the Temple shows a close affinity between the place of worship, library, and administration.

In particular, the scroll was suited for the preservation of lengthier sacred texts, since it subsequently was almost impossible to manipulate (for example, through the removal of textual passages). By way of its character as representation, the scroll has always found use, especially in cultic public space (e.g., still today, the scroll of the Torah in Jewish synagogues; → Book). It may be that early Christianity's address to the codex, on one side, has to do with its greater convenience for missionary journeys. But on the other, perhaps it ought also to be appraised as a form of division, and these quasi-alternatives will have to be investigated still more precisely. It is clear, however, that, with the closing of the private Roman libraries in the fourth century, and the appearance of Christian libraries, the era of the scroll medium came to an end. What had not been transcribed in codex form, no longer belonged to the canon, and gradually fell into oblivion.

The codex, consisting of several parchment pages, folded and glued together, and cut on three sides, was the Christians' preferred written medium.

Only in the Middle Ages was did the book replace the codex. Because of its configuration, like that of the book later, the codex received its own sacred character. Furthermore, its cover design communicated messages of an iconographic kind. Its history, as well as especially that of the book, was closely bound with the (Christian) monasteries, especially as the latter began to build the monastic libraries with their writing rooms (scriptoria). Beyond monastery walls, the book as communications medium had almost no importance at all.

Inside the medieval monastery, the production of writing material and writing instruments, the binding, as well as inscription, of books, was now regarded as a work 'pleasing to God.' The scriptoria were decisive for the propagation of religious content on the one hand, and on the other for the book as a medium; however, not only were the books of other monasteries copied for use in one's own monasteries, but original projects were assigned and prepared as well. But unlike the authors, the copyists must not necessarily have the benefit of literacy.

By way of → scholasticism and the university system, the function of the book as custodian of sacred tradition basically changed. Gradually, profane works came to be copied as well, especially those of antiquity. The book became a tool. Smaller formats appeared, more convenient to transport, and the book developed into a new means of education. Toward the end of the Middle Ages, book production gradually shifted to the profane area, a broad basis of commerce in books appeared, and the introduction of printing in the fifteenth century simplified the access to books even for the laity.

Secondary Media: Print Media and Photography

5. In media studies, 'secondary media' are those media that require technological apparatus for their production. These, first and foremost, are print media. Regarded functionally, they have taken over the storage and transmission services of the written media, to which a communicative element is added through the moment of 'mass production,' that concentrates less on communication with an elite inner circle.

a) Block printing was introduced in China as early as the first millennium CE, greatly simplifying the work of printing and copying. Here was a means of production that not only offered enormous economy, but also made the first 'mass editions' possible. The invention by Johannes (Gensfleisch zum) Gutenberg (1394/99–1468) of printing with movable type (typography) not only rendered the book a medium for writing, but established the basis for new communications media to develop, such as the handbill or the newspaper. It was especially the Reformed Churches that made use of printed pamphlets for mass mobilization, and to gain their objectives: oral communication no longer had the upper hand in communicative situations; rather, hopes lay with the printing of books, which was brought into connection with the decentralization and multiplication of specific audiences. Especially in → Pietism, writing and books became an essential medium (edifying literature, reading communities, or weekly papers such as the Christbote (Ger., "Christian Messenger") in Southern Germany at the end of the nineteenth century. Today, all of the churches make use of various printed testimonials, both on the level of the community (community letters, church bulletins) as well as inter-regionally, by weekly newspapers, or special pamphlets.

b) With the invention of photography in the early nineteenth century, the desire for an exact representation of reality seemed to reach fulfillment. A medium had been created that, as technique of documentation, no longer needed language, but conveyed the world 'as it is.' At first employed especially by anthropologists in their research projects, or utilized by merchants, colonial bureaucrats, and missionaries for 'those at home' as a welcome means of depicting the situation, such early pictures nevertheless show 'reality' less than they do the 'foreign,' or 'strange,' in its exoticism, savagery, or, indeed, idealization. The time it originally took to set up the background and lighting rarely allowed for much more than 'still' photographs ('posed' pictures, or portraits, and inanimate scenes), not least of all, and often, intended to serve for the justification of → colonialism and → mission (→ Evolutionism). The foreign (or foreigner) was to be presented as especially uncivilized and 'savage,' in order to emphasize the dangers of the mission, and its ensuing success. Photography—especially after the development of the 'snapshot camera'—became a mass medium in the service of → tourism, not only recalling the (vacation) world of the stranger, but also presenting it at home. Press photography, picture postal cards, and advertising posters all take advantage of religious pictorial motifs. Whether by way of pure representation or through photographic montage, religion worked in formats suitable for setting religious declarations into new connections of meaning (e.g., in an advertisement for energy-conserving lamps with a picture of a Buddhist monk, and the caption, "Many ways lead to enlightenment").

Tertiary Media—Mass Media

6. Since the 1950s, as television has entered so many Western households, one has heard the expression, 'mass media.' Like the book, painting, and plastic arts, the mass media as well are 'vehicles of religious messages,' and means of the production of meaning.

a) Religious radio stations, such as the Orthodox Jewish Qol Hai (Heb., "Voice of Life") in Tel Aviv, Vatican Radio, or Radio Maryja, the largest Catholic private station in Poland, tailor their messages for a special audience, or use the medium for purposes of propaganda, indeed to the point of political agitation. Here, demand determines content, just as with television. In 1997, Qol Hai had adopted too moderate a line to suit ultra-Orthodox listeners, and their massive criticism forced a partial revision of its presentation: religion and world reporting are now handed on from an Orthodox standpoint, and even the songs played have religious themes, presented in Hebrew or Yiddish. There was a complete prohibition of songs sung by women, or such as might bear on romantic love relationships. Radio Maryja, founded in 1991, on the other hand, has simply become the loudspeaker of its conservative audience (the 'family of Radio Maryja'). As need arises, it organizes thousands of persons for demonstrations (for example, against a policy of European integration), or organizes pilgrimages to Czestojowa. The resonance in the population is apparently so great that Polish church leadership feels constrained to practice a policy of 'putting up with it.'

But by virtue of its character as mass communication, radio (or television) can also be introduced for regulative purposes. In 1997, in Ankara, the state Office for Religious Affairs held 'standardized' sermons in 700 of the 1,100 mosques and houses of prayer, and had them broadcast by radio. The growing tendency in Turkey to revise the function of the Friday sermons as political proclamations, obviously evoked this state measure in order to fight the progressing Islamism (→ Laicism).

b) Unlike radio, the medium of → television is not 'talk-centered,' but has other means of conveying 'messages,' by virtue of its 'realism.' Nonetheless, television was at first used by the churches by and large in the conventional sense: broadcast of divine services, broadcasts of the Papal Easter blessing Urbi et Orbi [Lat., "To the City and to the World"]), not least of all on the assumption that particularly creative depiction would work on the content in a falsifying and distorting fashion. Today, church productions tread new paths, and there is less hesitation in using the mass media in more diverse ways. Thus, in 1999 in the United States, the Catholic Church started a campaign on local television and radio for vocations to the priesthood, an idea picked up in the same year by the diocese of Essen (Germany).

Computer and Internet

c) While radio and television as media of communication are preponderantly asymmetrical in their producer/consumer (listeners/viewers) relationship, the Internet offers the opportunity for an interactive participation. Forums (newsgroups, listservs, message boards, etc.), more or less stable, are created to address particular religious themes and situations. Here, in a new, unique form, the Internet offers groups the opportunity of worldwide communication on religion and religions, although preponderantly, once more, in written form. The most diverse groups avail themselves of it, whether by advertising for members, by means of 'stock markets' for sales and information, through so-called 'E-Zines' (electronic magazines), or as a platform for discussion. But the Pope, too, since 1998, has come on the Internet: an Internet camera pursues his activities, whether in divine services on Saint Peter's Square, or on his travels. In this way, believers can participate in the religious life of the head of the Roman Catholic Church while they are seated comfortably in front of their computers at home. It becomes more difficult when the new medium attempts to penetrate the sphere of ritual practice itself: according to Catholic understanding, confession over the Internet is inadmissible and invalid. Subsequently, the communications technologies are of only limited utility. 'Personal conversation' continues to be regarded as indispensable for the transmission of the faith.

1. Giesecke 1998, 39.
2. Schulze, Gerhard, in: Müller-Doohm/Neumann-Braun 1995, 370.
3. Mezger, W. (1989), cited in Faulstich 1996, 168.

Literature

De Vries, Hent/Weber, Samuel (eds.), Religion and Media, Stanford 2001; Faulstich, Werner, Medien und Öffentlichkeit im Mittelalter: 800–1400, Göttingen 1996; Idem, Das Medium als Kult. Von den Anfängen bis zur Spätantike (8. Jahrhundert), Göttingen 1997; Giesecke, Michael, Sinnenwandel, Sprachwandel, Kulturwandel. Studien zur Vorgeschichte der Informationsgesellschaft, Frankfurt/M. 1998 ([1]1992); Hoover, Stewart M./Schofield, Clark Lynn (eds.), Practicing Religion in the Age of the Media: Explorations in Media, Religion and Culture, New York 2002; Linderman, Alf, The Reception of Religious Television: Social Semeiology Applied to an Empirical Case Study, Stockholm 1996; Müller-Doohm, Stefan/Neumann-Braun, Klaus (eds.), Kulturinszenierungen, Frankfurt/M. 1995; Schultze, Quentin J., Televangelism and American Culture: The Business of Popular Religion, Grand Rapids 1995.

→ Book, Communication, Dance, Drama (Sacred), Film, Image/Iconoclasm, Language, Literature, Liturgy, Monasticism, Monument/Memorial Places, Oral Tradition, Publicity, Sermon, Society, Specialists (Religious), Televangelism, Television, Text/Textual Criticism, Theater

Jutta Bernard

Meditation

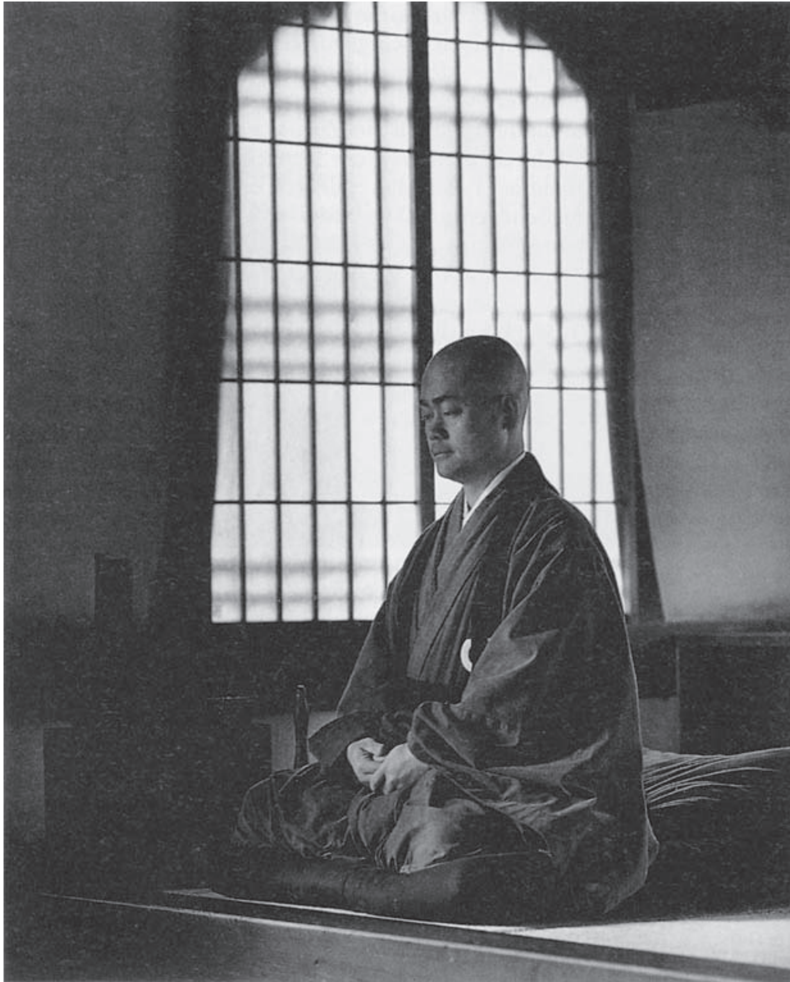
1. The concept of meditation is widespread in Western linguistic usage today. Its meaning and interpretation vary strongly. In general, what is understood by 'meditation' is a deepened consciousness of concentrated recollection, as distinct from a person's normal everyday consciousness. Frequently, the concept of meditation includes the techniques for the attainment of this special state of mind and spirit. Meditation is both, then: the way and the goal of a concrete spiritual practice.

2. Fundamentally, in Western modernity, the concept of meditation can be distinguished in terms of two different associative contexts, one religious and the other nonreligious. The latter, as a rule, refers to the everyday linguistic use of the word, and means an intensified 'reflection on' something. It comes from the lexical translation of the Latin concept meditatio.

Meditation in the Area of Religion

Extroverted vs. Introverted Meditation

3. Along with this profane understanding, in the 'world religions' (Hinduism, Buddhism, Judaism, Christianity, Islam), we find another apprehension of meditation. It could be understood as a mental or spiritual 'submersion.' In this religious context, meditation scholar Klaus Engel distinguishes an extroverted form of meditation, in which the meditation is conducted with the eyes open, from an introverted form, in which the eyes are closed. According to Engel, the "introverted forms of meditation [strive for] a 'sinking' of the soul, with the purpose of an integration of the basis of the soul, as the central experience was called in Christian language, or [an integration] of the dimension of the soul that in Indian Hindu tradition is called samadhi." To be distinguished from these 'introverted foms,' according to Engel, are "the extroverted forms of meditation, which are devoted to a development of the existing, outer directed consciousness."[1]



Jack Kornfield offers a similar, practice-oriented classification of various forms of meditation. He likewise distinguishes two basic types of meditation: the 'concentrative' meditation and the insight meditation. The umbrella concept 'concentrative meditation' means, for Kornfield, a whole class of kinds of meditation in which what is at issue is the schooling of the mind or spirit through persistent and persevering focusing on the → breath, a → mantra, a candle flame, or the like, so that all thoughts and other sensations, all distracting influences from within and without, are excluded. To be distinguished from this, according to Kornfield, is "the other heading of meditation," the schooling of the "insight" or "consciousness." The latter does not attempt to withdraw the mind from current events, in order to gather it to a particular object and thereby to release altered states. Instead, it works with what is at hand, and schools the attention to be paid to the continuous flow, from moment to moment, of all of that of which our life consists.[2]

Asian Religions

4. Both of the above classifications are strongly dependent on the historical development of meditation in the Asian religions. Among these, → 'Hinduism' and → Buddhism have always been powerfully influential.

Hinduism

a) Within 'Hinduism,' the development and formation of → yoga contributed decisively to the establishment of meditation in Indian culture. The mysticism of yoga has very ancient historical roots, dating from Vedic times

A presiding monk (jikijitsū) practices zazen (seated meditation) in Tenryuji Monastery in → Kyôto, Japan. In the zendo, the meditation hall, the monks sit in two long rows, on podia that directly face each other. The podia are covered over with straw mats (tatami), each of whose two square meters constitutes the personal living area of a monk: there he sleeps at night and meditates by day. In zazen, great value is attributed to the position of the arms, as well as to the seated posture. When meditating, monks sit with a straight, upright torso, their legs crossed on a stationary pillow, and hold their hands together. Their eyes are open, and fixed on the floor at a distance of approximately one meter in front of them. Two attendants pass back and forth between the podia with 'warning sticks' (keisaku), of which they make use if a monk has fallen asleep or into a careless position. Zazen exercises alternate with periods of walking, during which the body can relax. The length of time a seated period lasts is the time it takes a stick of incense to burn (about one-half hour). (Benita von Behr)

(c. 1500–1000 BCE). The Keshin hymn of the Rig-Veda (X, 136) includes the oldest literary testimonial to meditative practices. This text describes the typical breathing practices for the introduction of meditative states. True, while the goal of the early practices of the Keshin quite obviously was an ecstatic state (→ Trance), the meditative techniques of classical yoga are described by scholar Mircea → Eliade as a form of 'enstasy.'[3] The former, then, aim for a rapturous state of 'being outside oneself,' the latter consciously strive for a state of total 'being with oneself.'

In 'classical' yoga, meditation takes a central position. The yogic system of grammarian Patanjali, which arose about the turn of the age, knows an 'eight-limbed path of practice' (ashtanga-yoga), in which 'meditation' (dhyana) is the seventh limb. Intensive preparation for it takes place through the realization of ethical principles, through very disciplined exercises for the schooling of body and breath, through a withdrawing of the senses within, and through techniques of concentration. Meditation in Patanjali's sense, then, means the schooling of the capacity of 'pure vision.' In this state, the exercitant should experience the fact that the immortal and pure core of one's being (purusha—'the seer') is not bound to the changeable and conditioned circumstances of the outer world. The 'outer world' in this system explicitly includes the exercitant's body and → psyche.

Buddhism

b) Buddhism, which appeared in India, manifests, first of all, many parallels with the yogic system in its meditative practices. Here as well, the historical Buddha taught an 'eightfold path,' whose seventh ('perfect attention') and eighth steps ('perfect recollection') may be ascribed to the narrower context of meditation. In the practical translation of these steps, two particular methods of meditation developed: in the culture around Hinayana Buddhism, primarily the form of satipatthana meditation, and in the environment of Mahayana culture, primarily the form of vipassana meditation. The satipatthana variants direct the attention of the exercitant, successively, to the body, the senses, and the spirit—ever-finer levels of being. Vipassana meditation is concerned first and foremost, instead, with the conscious recognition of the 'three attributes of being' ('transience,' 'subjection to passion,' and the 'egolessness' of all worldly phenomena).

Zen Buddhism

Through the intermediary of Chinese culture, Buddhist meditation techniques reached Japan. Here, from the twelfth century onward, the form of Zen meditation developed. In the practice of Zen, za-zen ('sitting in submersion') holds the central place. This exercise in meditation takes no fixed object of meditation, but seeks to hold the mind in a state of awake, thought-free attention, out of which state spontaneous enlightenment (satori) is finally to emerge (→ Zen Buddhism).

Western World Religions

5. While in both Eastern religions meditation constitutes a theoretical and practical center of gravity, in the three world religions of the Western hemisphere it frequently plays only a subordinate role. In Judaism (see particularly → Kabbalah), in Christianity, and in Islam, which likewise know meditative techniques, the mystical tradition has a difficult time holding its ground vis-à-vis the prevailing theology, which, as a rule, is of a rather dogmatic orientation. This set of problems becomes evident precisely in the development of European ecclesial Christianity. The repression of the mystical theology of Bonaventura (1217–1274), or the stream of ecclesiastical banns against mystics like → Meister Eckhart, are eloquent testimonial. To the very present, there appears to be a strong ecclesial reservation with regard to meditation.

6. Today, three particular developments shift the field of the themes of meditation into a new light: an enormous amount of new applications of Eastern meditation practices in the Western industrialized world (→ New Age; Esalen Institute); a growing application of meditative practices in the area of management training; and science's reinforced exploration of meditative techniques. Meanwhile, there are a multiplicity of empirical studies on physiological and/or psychological effects of meditation.[4] A 1995 bibliography lists 1021 studies limited to the psychological area of research on meditation (C. Unger). On the other hand, the trend toward meditation for managers seldom occasions scientific reflection. Where a critical reflection takes place, it is found to be a striking fact that meditative techniques of the 'overcoming of the I,' from Asia, are introduced for the 'ego reinforcement' of Western managers. Hence, in Western culture, there are visible tendencies toward a secularization of meditative practices originally determined by religion.

1. Engel 1995, 11f.
2. Kornfield in Walsh/Vaughan 1980.
3. Eliade 1958.
4. Engel 1995, 169-249.

Literature

Carruthers, Mary J., The Craft of Thought: Meditation, Rhetoric, and the Making of Images, 400–1200, Cambridge 1998; Eliade, Mircea, Yoga: Immortality and Freedom, New York 1958; Engel, Klaus, Meditation. Geschichte, Systematik, Forschung, Theorie, Frankfurt/M. 1995; Johnson, Willard, Riding the Ox Home: A History of Meditation from Shamanism to Science, Boston 1986; Shapiro, Jr. Deane H./Walsh, Roger N. (eds.), Meditation: Classic and Contemporary Perspectives, New York 1984; Unger, Carsten, Yoga und Meditation—psychologische und psychotherapeutische Aspekte. Eine internationale Bibliographie, Ahrensburg 1995; Walsh, Roger N./Vaughan, Frances (eds.), Beyond Ego: Transpersonal Dimensions in Psychology, Los Angeles 1980.

→ Esalen Institute, Kabbalah, Mandala, Mysticism, New Age, Psyche, Yoga

Christian Fuchs

Mediterranean Region

Historical Region

1. The Mediterranean basin as a 'historical region': The Mediterranean basin offers a mosaic of societies and cultures that influence one another. The question of how far to extend the borders of this space remains open. 'Minimalists' would like to have the borders of the 'authentic' Mediterranean region coincide with those of the olive culture in the North and the date culture of the South. Here, parts of Spain and Northern Italy would no longer belong to the Mediterranean region, any more than the South of Egypt or Tripolitania. The 'maximalists,' by contrast, among them historian Fernand Braudel, reckon to the Mediterranean region not only these areas, but also a very wide belt of transitional zones. In recent years, a number of critical voices have been raised reproaching scholars of society and culture with having 'invented' the Mediterranean basin, on the foundation of their own projected fears and hopes.[1] This criticism is justified at least to the extent that there is here no temporal and spatial culture area abiding 'everlastingly,' or cultural unity stemming from a common origin. Even though the whole region was held together for a time by the Roman Empire, one ought to speak rather of a 'historical region' (J. Szücs), engaging in trade and sharing in common historical experiences. These include not least of all the common destiny of a decline.

Decline

Between 1450 and 1600, a new economic world order took shape. It was based on a specific international distribution of labor among distinct regions (Wallerstein 1974). The route taken by the capitalistic world system in question led to the dismemberment of the continents, and thus of Europe itself, into center and periphery. Now some areas depended on others, in hierarchical order, each having its own socioeconomic assignment to perform for the whole. Within Europe, the Northwestern part (England, Holland, Flanders, etc.) of the old continent took form as the effective center of the new world system. Southern Europe—especially Italy, Spain, and Portugal, which had been socio-economically dominant for centuries—developed into a large periphery, which became one of the most important suppliers of foodstuffs (wheat) and raw materials (wool for the expanding textile industry) to the center. With the fall of the Ottoman Empire, which for centuries had been a powerful and independent imperial presence in the South and East of the Mediterranean, and thus stood outside the capitalist world system, this last part of the region, which had included the Balkans and almost all of North Africa, was incorporated with responsibilities similar to those of Southern Europe, from mid-eighteenth century onward, into the world order dominated by Northwest Europe as periphery.[2]

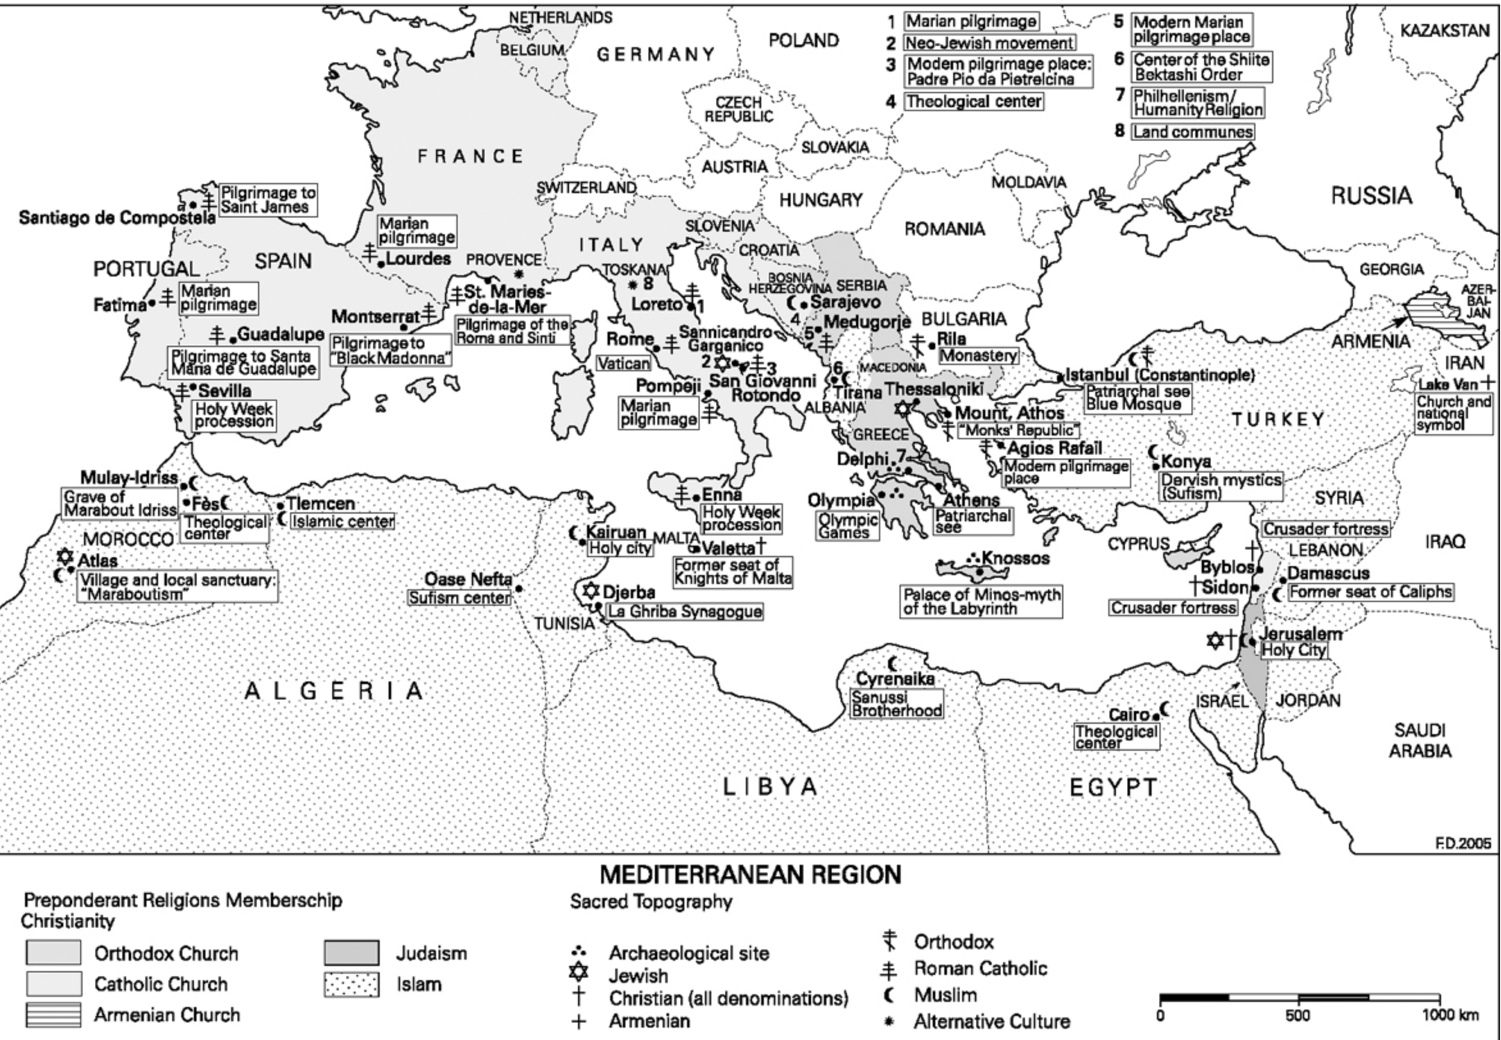
The Historical Syndrome



The members of the Mediterranean cultures—regardless of their social class—are deeply convinced that history has done them a 'bad turn.' They feel themselves to be objects, rather than subjects, of their own past: history, over the course of the centuries, has turned out to be a 'hostile' and 'treacherous' force, whose aftereffects extend to the present and the future. Political 'destabilization' and socioeconomic 'peripheralization' end by forming the two main components of a historical syndrome that Mediterranean societies interpret as an unavoidable consequence of defeat, making itself felt in all areas of social activity, including religious behavior.

2. Dominant religions and minorities in the Mediterranean region: a) Although the data from the respective national censuses are not always reliable and up to date, one may begin with the figure 400 million for the population of the greater Mediterranean region (see map), and divide it according to religious membership as follows:

Intersection of Three World Religions

The Mediterranean region, then, is the point of intersection of three 'world religions' (M. Weber): Christianity (Catholics and Orthodox), Islam (Sunnites and Shiites), and Judaism. As in scarcely any other region of the world, these three religious communities here come face to face. Their cultural memory has been stamped especially by the following 'great occurrences': the repeated conquest of → Jerusalem by Arab rulers, as well as by Western European crusaders (637 by Omar, 1099 by Godfrey of Boullion, 1187 by Saladin), the separation (schism) between Western Church and Orthodox Patriarchate (1054), the occupation of Constantinople by the Ottomans (1453), the persecution, expulsion, or forced Christianization of the (Jewish) Marranos/Conversos and the (Muslim) Moriscos after the Reconquista in Spain (from 1492) and Portugal (from 1496), the battle of Lepanto/Naupaktos between the allied Christian forces and the Ottomans (1571), and not least of all, the current bloody wars with their primary ethnic political character and secondary religious coloration in the Near East (Lebanon 1975ff., Israel 1948, 1967, 1973) and in the Balkans (→ Bosnia 1991ff. and Herzegovina, Kosovo, 1998).

b) The coexistence of these three religious communities was never unproblematic, but neither did it consist exclusively in conflict-charged confrontations. In the cities especially, Christians, Jews, and Muslims met, and social and religious relations among individuals and groups often transpired in a spirit of tolerance and mutual respect. The many multicultural

MEDITERRANEAN REGION
Preponderant Religions Memberschip
Christianity
Orthodox Church
Catholic Church
Armenian Church
Judaism
Islam
Sacred Topography
Archaeological site
Jewish
Christian (all denominations)
Armenian
Orthodox
Roman Catholic Muslim
Alternative Culture
1 Marian pilgrimage
2 Neo-Jewish movement
3 Modern pilgrimage place: Padre Pio da Pietrelcina
4 Theological center
5 Modern Marian pilgrimage place
6 Center of the Shiite Bektashi Order
7 Philhellenism/ Humanity Religion
8 Land communes
NETHERLANDS
BELGIUM
GERMANY
POLAND
KAZAKSTAN
FRANCE
CZECH REPUBLIC
SLOVAKIA
AUSTRIA
SWITZERLAND
HUNGARY
MOLDAVIA
RUSSIA
ROMANIA
SLOVENIA
ITALY
CROATIA
TOSKANA
BOSNIA HERZEGOVINA
SERBIA
GEORGIA
AZER-BAI-JAN
ARMENIA
IRAN
BULGARIA MACEDONIA ALBANIA
GREECE
TURKEY
SYRIA IRAQ
CYPRUS
LEBANON
ISRAEL
JORDAN SAUDI ARABIA PORTUGAL
SPAIN
PROVENCE
MOROCCO
ALGERIA
TUNISIA
MALTA
LIBYA
EGYPT
Santiago de Compostela
Pilgrimage to Saint James Marian pilgrimage
Lourdes
Fatima
Marian pilgrimage
Guadalupe
Pilgrimage to Santa Maria de Guadalupe
Sevilla
Holy Week procession
Montserrat
Pilgrimage to "Black Madonna"
St. Maries-de-la-Mer
Pilgrimage of the Roma and Sinti
Loreto
Rome
Vatican
Sannicandro Garganico
San Giovanni Rotondo
Pompeji
Marian pilgrimage
Sarajevo
Medugorje
Tirana
Rila Monastery Thessaloniki
Mount Athos
"Monks' Republic"
Agios Rafail
Modern pilgrimage place
Istanbul (Constantinople)
Patriarchal see Blue Mosque
Lake Van
Church and national symbol Konya
Dervish mystics (Sufism)
Delphi
Olympia
Olympic Games
Athens
Patriarchal see
Knossos
Palace of Minos-myth of the Labyrinth
Crusader fortress
Byblos
Sidon
Crusader fortress
Damascus
Former seat of Caliphs
Jerusalem
Holy City
Mulay-Idriss
Grave of Marabout Idriss
Fès
Theological center
Tlemcen
Islamic center
Atlas
Village and local sanctuary: "Maraboutism"
Kairuan
Holy city
Enna
Holy Week procession
Valetta
Former seat of Knights of Malta
Oase Nefta
Sufism center
Djerba
La Ghriba Synagogue
Cyrenaika
Sanussi Brotherhood
Cairo
Theological center
0 500 1000 km
F.D.2005

and, at the same time, pluri-religious cities of the Mediterranean region can be characterized as places of amicable proximity rather than as dangerous pockets of conflict. This 'aggregate model' prevailed well into the twentieth century, in Constantinople/Istanbul as well as in Casablanca, and then in Smyrna/Izmir, Beirut, Jerusalem, Alexandria, Djerba, Tunis, Venice, Trieste, Sarajevo, and Thessalonica. It rested on the fact that the distinct groups lived in different urban quarters (segregation), married only within the group (endogamy), and adopted clearly defined public spaces and roles (merchants, artisans, urban nobility).

National States

c) The formation of the national states, most of them only in the twentieth century, was based on the principle of one people and one religion in the territory of the state. Until well into the twentieth century, in the distinct areas of the Mediterranean region, this model occasioned forced and even violent, politically maneuvered homogenization and resettlement. With the help of population exchanges (as between Turkey and Greece after the First World War, and on Cyprus after 1974), by expulsion (e.g., of the Jews in the Maghreb after the founding of Israel, 1948), by violent 'cleansing' (as in → Bosnia-Herzegovina and in Kosovo), by genocide (as of the Christian Armenians in Turkey, 1920–1921), by the → Shoah (as in the case of the Jews in Greece during the National Socialist occupation in the Second World War), the elimination of ethnic and confessional opposition was intended to be realized within a national territory.

With the 'nationalization' of the societies and cultures of the Mediterranean region, the multicultural and pluri-confessional structure of numerous territories was dismantled or even destroyed. This frequently violent

The Christian Mediterranean countries, whether Catholic or Orthodox, comprise the region of the great processions. Holy Week, feasts of saints, and especially city patrons, or, as shown here, devotion to the Madonna—the whole year through there are occasions that call for statues, images, or symbols to be borne about by and through the local community. The Feast of the Madonna delle ethno-religious 'vestibule cleansing' impinged upon the urban context, with the result that many Mediterranean cities have now lost a coexistence of cultures and religions (for example in Thessalonica, Tunis, Smyrna/Izmir) that had been cultivated for centuries.

d) With the immigration movements since 1960, first in France and later in Italy, Spain, and Portugal, many spaces of a chiefly industrial urban character have been profoundly transformed, as the majority of the new arrivals are from the Islamic Maghreb (Tunisia, Algeria, Morocco). Now new multicultural and pluri-confessional cities have appeared, such as Marseille, Toulon, Montpellier, Perpignan, Milan, Turin, Genoa, and Lisbon. These current forms of multicultural and pluri-religious coexistence in the urban context are basically different from those of the old model. In place of segregation, separation, and endogamy, undivided living areas are the order of the day, as well as (the start of) ethno-religious cultural mixtures (creolization) and exogamy, phenomena hardly imaginable in the multicultural and pluri-confessional cities of the past. Here the migrants are different from those of the United States, who cultivate their culture and religion in specific ethno-religious agglomerations and urban quarters—in → 'ghettos' and 'urban villages.' But this difference does not mean that the Mediterranean region could host no immigrant settlements with their own respective cultures. Such concentrations of migrant populations do occur, as a rule in the city peripheries (Fr., banlieue; Ital., periferia urbana), but also in the non-redeveloped and therefore architecturally degraded zones of historical centers (such as Turin's San Salvario quarter, the poor quarters of Genoa and Marseille, or the depot quarter of Milan). They form very heterogeneous social spaces, hosting not only immigrants of diverse ethno-religious extraction, but also native members of the lower classes. Within a single city quarter, then, one may observe daily practices, ceremonies, rituals, festivities, from so many cultural backgrounds and religious traditions that, with reference to the Mediterranean region, it would be in order to regard the distinct immigrant cultures as components of a 'collage.'

Precisely on grounds of the immediate spatial proximity of ethno-religious groups so different from one another, the 'aggregate type' currently prevailing in the Mediterranean region affords sensitivity for cultural differences. This sensitivity is not, however, any guarantee that the 'politics of recognition' (Charles Taylor) makes it any easier for the culturally and confessionally 'other' to succeed in Mediterranean societies.

3. The basic forms of religious behavior in the Mediterranean region: Despite such confessional multiplicity, certain common forms of religious behavior can be observed in the Mediterranean region.

Demonstrative Character of Religious Practices

a) What strikes the foreign observer is the demonstrative character of religious practices. Some experts have therefore applied a 'psychologizing' terminology of 'extrovertedness' in speaking of Mediterranean piety or devotion. These specific manners of behavior that are so impressive, especially to Middle Europeans, in both the Christian and the Islamic or Jewish Mediterranean area, come to expression especially during occasions of a public kind, such as pilgrimages to a holy place, the feasts of city patron saints, or processions. Participants in such productions demonstrate, to God or to a saint, their dedication, loyalty, and gratitude, in the form of generous gifts (called ex voto in the Catholic Mediterranean area) or by way or rhetorical presentations, panegyrics, and poetry, and through acrobatic exercises, as Galline (Ital., "Madonna of the Chickens") is held in the Bagni quarter of the Southern Italian town of Scafati (Province of Salerno). Every year on April 11, the procession with the statue of the Madonna, together with a little group of musicians (in Ital., banda), gets under way at sunrise. On the head and at the feet of the devotional statue, chickens, doves, and, as in the picture, even a peacock are balanced (attached?), which, miraculously, do not leave the hallowed image, and at the end of the route, are sold at auction on behalf of the Madonna (read: her church). Toward evening, the church feast becomes a bacchanalia: all through the night, the tammuriata is danced—a dramatized version of the tarantella—mainly by homosexual men, and participants drink wine. The proximity to ancient Mediterranean fertility rites seems unmistakable, and yet the ritual is first and foremost a testimony to piety as it is practiced today. (A. Pisacreta and Hubert Mohr)

Beyond the coast is another—as seen from Europe—Mediterranean: the Islamic. Since the end of the seventh century, the Mediterranean area has been divided in two: the North African Maghreb countries have a stronger orientation to the East and South than to the North. Political Islamism provides headlines in Algeria and Egypt today, and their members proclaim, in French, on this graffito from the Algiers Kasbah, that 'soon an Islamic state' will come into being. A new phenomenon has arisen in Algeria: in 1989, the Islamic-oriented Front National du Salut (Fr., "National Salvation Front") party was founded, but, after its first electoral victory in 1992, was promptly outlawed—a problematic decision that has led to an extremely bloody civil war, one still being fought today. Over the foreign image of a 'veiled woman,' the picture is a subliminal testimonial to the fears on the part of the Northern Mediterranean states—especially France, where it has been exploited by the Front National of a Le Pen—of an 'inundation' by radical Islam. On the other hand, the particular example of Algeria shows that the religious option, even in the Levant and the Maghreb, is by no means negligible.

well as other displays of courage and strength. These manifestations of piety are planned and executed in such a way that their accomplishment cannot be overlooked by others: the ones performing them wish first and foremost to win social recognition of their community by their religious behavior. Piety in the Mediterranean area, then, cannot be understood as 'interiority': it belongs rather to the latent or overt 'struggle for acknowledgment' that distinguishes the everyday existence of individuals and groups, and which also, on that account, signs religious practices across the board. In large measure, it possesses an 'externally governed' character. In a framework of public and 'externally governed' forms of Mediterranean piety, the religious and secular sphere so manifestly merge and overlap that, in the concrete context in question, Durkheim's famous split into sacred and profane loses its meaning. In the tri-confessional Mediterranean area we behold, in a unique and inimitable manner, the psychological and spatial unification of procession and rock concert, pilgrimage and souvenir booth.

Honor

b) A 'struggle for recognition' is, at the same time, a 'struggle for honor.' This feature is especially true of Mediterranean societies, in which religious values and practices blend with those of a code of honor—a quasi-juridical system, guaranteed by custom, of norms, rules, conventions, and institutions, with a claim on social morality in the respective diverse religions. Here we might only recall the extraordinary value attributed to virginity that plays such a key role in Mediterranean societies, both in the moral conceptualizations of the three 'world religions,' and in the definition of female premarital honor. In such societies, the 'culture of honor' is so dominant, right up to the present, that the 'externally governed' piety prevailing here can be regarded first and foremost as a component of the strategies of activity that every individual must apply in order to preserve and guarantee personal honor, as well as the honor of one's own family and kinship group, before the 'public' (see Dodds 1966). Such religious practices, therefore, expressly founded on emphatically demonstrative behavior, are endowed in societies of honor and shame like those of the Mediterranean region with an eminent socially explosive power. The cultivation of reputation, 'façade,' and 'mask' possesses an out-and-out existential importance and meaning. By way of active and purposeful participation in public religious 'events,' the position and status of the agents can either be confirmed or altered. In the eyes of Mediterranean persons, the honor complex represents an efficient and rational control, and a defense mechanism against hostile actions that endanger the respectability and reputation of individuals and groups (→ families, kindred, clan, lineage). This 'externally governed' piety, precisely as it is closely bound up with such a system of social norms and institutions, is a counter-measure against any social defeats, degradations, and humiliations that may come upon those involved at any time. But this analysis makes it clear that the motif of the 'historical syndrome' serves for more than the interpretation of 'great occurrences.' The members of Mediterranean societies translate that motif simultaneously to the micro-level of local communities and personal social relations that do not directly belong to the private sphere.

Patron-Client Relations

c) Mediterranean societies are characterized by the patronage and clientele structures imbedded in all social areas. Collective consciousness in the Mediterranean region, then, is inscribed with the conviction that society is neither a polis nor a civitas, nor again a communitas (Gk., 'city'; Lat., 'city,' 'community'), but rather a generalized system of patron-client relations. That system can be defined as a complex of hierarchical and personalized relationships, inasmuch as performances and counter-performances of an asymmetric nature are exchanged. Thus, the patron needs the client less than the client the patron, since it is the patron who possesses more power, prestige, influence, and wealth. Excepting only family, near kinship, and friendship, patron-client relationships are regarded as the sole reliable relationships in the public area, and they prevail in the secular as well as in the religious sphere. In the eyes of Mediterranean persons, neutered—that is, de-personified—structures, such as, for example, state and bureaucracy, have shown themselves to be the tools with which a 'foreign' or 'distant' elite represses them. Even in the legitimization of patron-client relationships, then, the notion prevails of 'history as the enemy,' to be borne and tolerated, and that notion can be regarded as the ideological and discursive basis of the historical syndrome examined above.

Priests

It comes as no surprise, therefore, that the → priest is ascribed the role of a patron in the Christian Mediterranean area. He is the ecclesiastical official, and thus the person with power, and he mediates performances of the most varied kind in favor of his clients. The pastor or chaplain of a brotherhood, for example in Sicily, on Malta, and in Spain, like the other town or city notables, is regarded as an important mediator of personal favors, which must be honored with counter-favors.[3] Priests are not always liked, but they cannot be avoided when one would receive the patronage and favor of the supernatural powers.

The patron-client relation regarded as the most efficient in the area of religion, in Christian Mediterranean societies, is the relationship between the believer and the patron saint. The patron saint, like the priest, assumes the role of a person maintaining bonds between God and the human being. A special role in the patronage system is played by Saint → Mary (in Ital., Madonna; Span. Virgen, Gk. Panagia), and, as Mother of God, she is attributed extraordinary intercessory qualities.

Throughout the Christian Mediterranean area, their is a tendency for people to turn to the saints directly with their own petitions. The basis of this behavior lies in the fact that the clergy, frequently, are not acknowledged as a moral instance: in such societies, then, it is possible to be both religious and anticlerical. The Christian Mediterranean patronage-system is concretized most clearly on patronal feast days (→ Veneration of the Saints), when the most suitable opportunity is available to balance out favors received from the supernatural patrons by return gifts and testimonials of reverence.

Processions

The → procession is the high point of the patronal feasts in the Mediterranean area, especially among Catholics. This event is usually regarded as the ideal occasion for demonstrating the 'transactional devotion' of the clientele in the form of dedication and publicity. Dedication is shown by taking an active part in the procession, for example by bearing the saint's litter, or by presenting the saint with gifts, money, candles, *ex voto*s, or fireworks, demonstratively in the sight of the other participants in the procession. Publicity is achieved by the clients' exalting the out-of-the-ordinary qualities of the saintly person being honored with speeches and other vocal declarations in the course of the festivities. A high degree of familiarity attaches to the exceedingly demonstrative practices of promotion held in the Andalusian Holy Week (in Span., Semana Santa). The most impressive examples of client promotion in a patronal feast is of course found in historical documents, from times in which processions still presented a genuine problem for public order. An example would be eighteenth-century Palermo, when patronal feasts were still celebrated under the leadership of the guilds.

Marabouts

d) But the schemata of thinking bound up with the patronage system are no monopoly of the Christian Mediterranean region. Both in the Islamic societies of North Africa and the Near East, and in the Jewish societies, similar collective thought-content is in evidence, along with structural features vis-à-vis the shaping of relationships between saints and believers. The most distinctive phenomenon here is that of the maraboutic belief, which has spread from its specific Maghrebian and especially Moroccan milieu, all the way to the Islamized regions south of the Sahara, as for example, to Senegal. A 'marabout' (also called a sidi or mulay) is a 'holy man,' honored on the basis of his extraordinary or traditionalized hereditary charismatic qualities. A distinction can be made between historical or mythological 'holy men,' and living ones. Believers unequivocally prefer the latter, as their opportunities for activity fan out more broadly. As a rule, the living marabout is at once the guardian and administrator of a sanctuary, and leader of a religious brotherhood. Such 'saints' are not simple mystics who have withdrawn into world-renouncing asceticism; in an extreme case, they assume an important position in local tribal politics.

The importance of 'maraboutism' has presumably dwindled somewhat in today's Morocco, owing to the reinforcement of the monarchical central power. However, 'maraboutism' can without any doubt be regarded as a constant of the Moroccan social structure of recent centuries: every autonomous community (city, village, clan, tribe) has always had its own holy man. Some authors even speak, in this connection, of a 'maraboutic hegemony,' that reached its pinnacle in the nineteenth century.[4]

In North Africa, 'maraboutism' represents a specific conception of religion, which, in explicit or implicit fashion, rests on the personalization of the mediating relationship between God and the human being. There are no direct, practically abstract relationships between supernatural power and human beings, as original Islamic doctrine teaches that there are; rather, these relationships are personalized through mediating practices on the part of 'holy men.' Thus, the marabout represents the typical 'mediator' between clients and God as the 'actual source of patronage.'

Similar 'transactional' manifestations of piety are also observable in Judaism, as, for example, in the places of pilgrimage in the Moroccan Atlas, or at the "synagogue of the wonderworking foreigner" (La Ghriba) on the island of Djerba.

Agreement in the Christian, Islamic, and Judaic Mediterranean area does not, then, make religion appear only as a paradigm for current collective thought-content with regard to the patronage system. The 'generalized' character of patron-client relationships throughout the Mediterranean area testifies to the fact that religion has been infiltrated and reinterpreted by the patronage system—which has penetrated both the secular and spiritual spheres of that area throughout the societies of Christian, Islamic, and Jewish tradition. In terms of the deposit of social history, this system is older than these three religions. The idea that relations between saints and believers have taken the form of dyadic, asymmetrical patron-client relationships obviously goes back to pre-Judaic, pre-Christian, and pre-Islamic forms of the social organization of Mediterranean societies.

1. Herzfeld 1987, 64f.
2. Wallerstein 1989, 137ff.
3. Boissevain 1980.
4. Laroui 1977, 139f.; Berque 1978, 281ff.; Gellner 1969, 320.

Literature

Berque, Jacques, Structures sociales du Haut-Atlas, Paris 1978; Boissevain, Jeremy, A Village in Malta, New York 1980; Braudel, Fernand, Mediterranean and the Mediterranean World in the Age of Philip II, 2 vols., London 1972; Davis, John, People of the Mediterranean: An Essay in Comparative Social Anthropology, London 1977; Dodds, Eric Robertson, The Greeks and the Irrational, Berkeley/Los Angeles [5]1966; Gellner, Ernest, Saints of the Atlas, London 1969; Herzfeld, Michael, Anthropology through the Looking Glass: Critical Ethnography in the Margins of Europe, Cambridge 1987; Laroui, Abdallah, Les origins sociales et culturelles du nationalisme marocain, 1830–1912, Paris 1977; Peristiany, John G. (ed.), Honor and Shame: The Values of Mediterranean Society, London 1965; Pitt-Rivers, Julian, The Fate of Shechem, Cambridge 1977; Taylor, Charles, Multiculturalism and the 'Politics of Recognition,' Princeton 1992; Wallerstein, Immanuel, The Modern World-System, vol. 3: The Second Era of Great Expansion of the Capitalist World-Economy, 1730–1840, San Diego 1989.

→ Antiquity, Catholicism, Europe, Late Antiquity, Veneration of the Saints, Islam, Judaism, Procession

Christian Giordano

Meister Eckhart

1. In 1326, a complaint was lodged against a nearly seventy-year-old Dominican, by a long respected superior of his order, who was twice the occupant of the famous chair in Paris. When he died shortly thereafter, the judgment was made public. Declared a heretic, he was soon all but unknown. Only five hundred years later was the situation reversed: Eckhart was now the exemplar and martyr of modern piety, which posited 'God in me' in place of the prescribed God. This assessment confirmed the judgment on 'the' Church: the Inquisition was the 'true' face of institutional religion, damning the spiritual person as representative of a 'modern' individual piety. The origin of this ambiguity merits examination.

God Becomes a Human Being

2. Eckhart's principal teaching is crystallized in the pronouncement: "It means little to me that the Word became flesh for human beings in Christ, that person different from me, unless it also [became flesh] in me, that I, too, were God's son."[1] The ancient Church Fathers had offered similar ideas, but Eckhart grasps the doctrine of the birth of God in an unusually radical fashion: God must 'necessarily be driven' into persons who have abandoned their 'I,' and all things besides.[2] Every human being who lives entirely 'from God' is himself or herself the Son and no one else. The Incarnation ('God's becoming flesh') occurs at every time, in every place. Holiness is grounded not on doing, but on being. In his Latin works, Eckhart argues philosophically, and in the language of traditional theology. In the German sermons, his formulation becomes more and more incisive. Something in the human being is like unto God, and uncreated: the radiant beam of the soul, "free of all names and naked of all forms, one and simple as God."[3] In the beam of the soul, God is present "blooming and green, with his whole divinity": here he encradles his Son, and here "all things are one," as in the concealed dark of the Godhead.[4]

3. The bill of accusation charges Eckhart with wishing to know more than necessary, and perplexing the hearts of simple folk. His pupil Tauler laments that the Master has engendered 'poisoned persons,' because he has been misunderstood. Because of his censure, Eckhart's reception was scant and ambivalent. As late as the seventeenth century, he ranked not as a mystic, but as a preaching monk, who inordinately cultivated philosophy. As a philosopher, he found new honor in late Romanticism and in idealism (eighteenth and nineteenth centuries). He met the desires of the Romanticists for a 'religious philosophy,' to place against the unbelief of the Enlightenment. The power of his feeling, and the profound and sensitive quality of his speculation, went counter to the rationalistic age. Hegel's school looked on his mystical speculation as the opening phase of the development of the 'German spirit,' whose completion was to have been accomplished by Hegel himself. What was decisive was the concept of the 'German mystique,' coined by Hegelian Rosenkranz in 1831, whose principal, to this day, is seen to be Eckhart. The 'German mystique' is set over against a cold scholasticism, called 'un-German,' of orthodox ecclesiality. As the neo-scholastic Denifle, loyal to Rome, rediscovered the Latin works, he compared Eckhart with Thomas Aquinas, and concluded that the former had been a 'confused thinker,' who confounded the creaturely with the godly. This judgment added force to Eckhart's association with anti-clericalism and → pantheism, German temper and 'Germanness,' which association was later used in Nazi propaganda. Alfred Rosenberg (1938) styled Eckhart as the incarnation of the 'new, reborn Teutonic man.' At the same time, the year 1936 marked the beginning of the publication of Eckhart's Latin and German works. Furthermore, the piety of inner disposition prepared the ground for comparisons initiated by Rudolf Otto (1926) with Eastern spirituality. Eckhart's discourse of the oneness of the human person with God, and of the 'unfathomable abyss' of the Godhead, predestined him as the partner in dialogue, indeed as the guarantor, of a mysticism transcending age and culture. Thus, Eckhart can even become the anonymous Buddhist, or Hindu yogi. Marxist medievalism, on the other hand, made him the nonconformist, leftist and progressive, inspirer of plebeian movements of social revolution. Philosopher Ernst Bloch sees him as the representative of a utopia of social criticism, in a context of the breakthrough to anthropocentrism, and to a human self-fulfillment immanent to the world. Psychologist Erich Fromm takes him as the inspiration of his best-seller Haben und Sein (1980). But the master also remains the exemplar and model of the (Catholic) Christian of the future, who keeps true to the Church. If Germanist Alois M. Haas sees Meister Eckhart as the normative figure of the spiritual life (1976)—in the Church, once more (and not against the Church)—he is seeking to release him from a 'false society,' and win him back for the Church as the 'master of living' of a mystical piety. Into recent times, all unorthodox thinkers have claimed him for themselves. Historians of philosophy such as Kurt Flasch and others discover the Meister (from Lat., magister, 'teacher') as a philosopher, and founder of a new metaphysics (philosophy of divine childhood, or of Christianity, metaphysics of incarnation, metaphysics of the Gospel), and rehabilitate the Latin 'master of reading.' The popular image of Eckhart, meanwhile, whether in church or New Age milieus, continues to take its orientation in the German-speaking mystic and 'master of living' who corresponds more immediately to the growing need for individual religious experience.

The "German Spirit"

Interiority

1. LW, 3:101-102.
2. DW, 5:187.
3. DW, 1:40-41.
4. Ibid., pp. 250, 288f., 380f., 389, 490; DW, 2:470ff.; DW, 3:17f.

Literature

Works: Largier, Niklaus (ed.), Meister Eckhart: Werke I und II. Sämtliche deutschen Predigten und Traktate sowie eine Auswahl aus den Lateinischen Werken. Kommentierte zweisprachige Ausgabe, Frankfurt/M. 1993; Meister Eckhart, Die deutschen und lateinischen Werke [DW; LW], hrsg. im Auftrag der Deutschen Forschungsgemeinschaft, Stuttgart 1936ff.—English editions: Meister Eckhart: An Introduction to the Study of His Works with an Anthology of His Sermons, sel./ann./trans. by James M. Clark, London 1957; The Essential Sermons, Commentaries, Treatises and Defense, trans./introd. by Edmund Colledge and Bernard McGinn, London 1981; Selected Writings, sel. and trans. by Oliver Davies, London 1997; Wandering Joy: Meister Eckhart's Mystical Philosophy, trans./comm. by Reiner Schürmann, Great Barrington 2001.

Secondary Literature: MacGinn, Bernard, The Mystical Thought of Meister Eckhart: The Man from whom God Hid Nothing, New York 2001; Mojsisch, Burkhard, Meister

Eckhart: Analogy, Univocity and Unity, Amsterdam 2001; Ruh, Kurt, Meister Eckhart: Theologe, Prediger, Mystiker, Munich [2]1989.

→ Esotericism, Mysticism, Scholasticism

Annette Wilke

Memory

Anthropological Basis

1. The psychological function of remembering is of far-reaching anthropological importance. It is the cognitive basis for the acquisition of speech and thought, of judgments and plans, and the backbone of any construction of identity. Many of our virtues as well as our vices rely on memory. It nurtures love and gratitude as it does revenge. Anticipation and recollection, the principle of hope and the principle of recall, alike have their premise in memory. It is a further quality of the basic anthropological condition that human beings not only have their memory as an organic substrate in their limbs and head, but have also externalized it in objects and artifacts, rites and practices, arrangements of time and space. In interplay with these deposits, memory develops and wins that social and communicative character that is an essential mark of the cultural memory as contradistinguished from the neural functions. As an essential part of trans-generational communication, culture rests on experiences and techniques of the social, inter-human stabilization of a shared memory. With the objectification of the cultural memory through symbolical media, the chances of stabilizing and broadening it are at hand; but there also exists the danger of estrangement, distance, and dispossession. Materially objectified memory content runs the risk of being separated from communication and severed from living memories. An example would be → monuments that are created as supports for memory, but infrequently turn into monuments to forgetfulness.

Individual, Collective, and Cultural Memory

2. a) Individual memory has a psychological basis and is the subject of the cognitive and neurological sciences. Psychologists distinguish three kinds of memory: episodic, semantic, and procedural. Episodic memory serves to store autobiographical incidents which have personal relevance and emotional value (such as a journey abroad or a car accident); semantic memory stores general facts of knowledge (such as the multiplication table or the succession of the popes); procedural memory stores bodily skills (such as riding the bicycle or playing the organ).

b) A collective memory arises from shared experience, as is the case in a generation, a family, a school class, a church community, or a travel group. The common memory arises in such groups through face-to-face interaction and communication. The members of these groups share a common horizon of reference, which they rehearse in acts of informal recollection and more formal commemoration. (As an example, we may think of concentration-camp survivors, who meet regularly at the places of their suffering.) The theoretician of collective memory was the French sociologist Maurice Halbwachs (1877–1945), who demonstrated the intimate relationship between memory and group connection. Once this connection dissolves, memory collapses, as well. Characteristic of collective memory, therefore, is its limited temporal range. It is not, as a rule, transferred to the following generation, but fades with the members of the group in question—a problem of the first order for newly arising religious communities. One exception is the family in which a collective memory extends at most over three generations that exist simultaneously and form a group of interaction and communication. If means and media are created for transporting common memories across the magical threshold of three generations (which is at most a hundred years), collective memory is transformed into a cultural one.

c) Collective memory is distinct from cultural memory. The latter is supported by material media and repeated practices. While the individual memory is expressed in acts of intentional or spontaneous memory (mémoire volontaire et involontaire), a trans-generational collective memory can only be established by power, will, and commitment via acts of formal recall and ritual reenactment. Foundations of and occasions for such recall and reenactment are available spatially, in the form of monuments and burial places (→ Cemetery; Funeral/Burial), but also of buildings and street names—as well as temporally—in the form of cyclically recurring dates of celebration and commemoration (Reformation Day; → Christmas Eve). The distinctions among individual, collective, and cultural memory must not, however, distract from the fact that all forms interact in the same person.

Commemoration of the Dead

3. Cultural memory has its anthropological foundation in the commemoration of the dead. The burials of members of the clan, the establishment of cemeteries, the obligation to hold in memory the names of beloved ones, and to sustain for one's ancestors a reverent memorial, are cultural universals. The distinct forms of devotion to the dead are variations of a culturally regulated practice of memory, which, on the one hand, provides mourning with a rhythm, and, at the same time, contributes to the pacification of the souls of the dead, guarding against their perniciously interfering in the life of the community. In ancient → Egypt, where the 'eternalization' of individual names was the center of the cultural project, the annual 'Lovely Festival of the Valley of the Desert' was celebrated. Here the families of the departed gathered at the graves of their members, holding a festive meal in proximity and communion with the dead. The same custom survives in Islamic Egypt today. → Eating and → drinking is an elementary form of community establishment and development; at the grave, this convivial practice turns into a ritual unification of the living with the dead (→ Cemetery). The → Lord's Supper is itself celebrated with bread and wine, a ritual memorial meal that establishes the community of, first, the disciples, but then of all Christianity, on the foundation of a sensuous commemoration of the person of Christ.

The observance of pietas (Lat., 'reverent fidelity'), the duty of descendants, the reverent recall of the deceased, is the duty of the living: the maintenance of the glory of the dead, with a view to the continued existence of the departed in the memory of posterity. Fame is a secular form of self-eternalization, and has much to do with self-presentation to an audience. In ancient Egypt, pyramids, temples, and graves were addressed not only to the gods, but also to posterity, and thus served also for an eternalization in the memories of posterity. In ancient Greece and Rome, the vision prevailed that the poets were the best media of the glory of the living and the dead, and that their heroic songs and praise far surpassed in duration and effectiveness even impressive monumental memorials such as arches and pyramids that had been raised to manifest their grandeur.

The Media of Cultural Memory: Orality and Literature

4. Since stability of long duration is a criterion to distinguish cultural from collective memory, for the constitution of recording → media is of the greatest significance. Their function is to retain the memory content that is important for the group's identity, and to store it for continuous re-use. The invention of writing, of course, profoundly transformed the character of cultural memory, radically extending the capacity for its storage and indefinitely lengthening its time horizon.

In non-writing cultures, the central vehicles of cultural memory are virtuosi especially trained for their task: the ancient bards and rhapsodists, the medieval troubadours and minstrels, the shamans, and the West African griots (→ Oral Tradition). These experts bear the responsibility for seeing to it that the tribe's tradition, which is vital for the identity of the group, passes to the next generation without being impaired or lost. They avail themselves of various 'arts of memory'—mnemonic techniques, including objects such as knotted cords, rhythmic supports via drums, verse, linguistic formulae, icons, patterns, and graphic reinforcements. The most important resource of any physical mnemonic technique is repetition. This function is enhanced by → feasts and festivals, which, in their regular recurrence, provide occasions for repeated multi-medial performances of tradition, at the same time publicly incorporating the tradition as part of the community identity—while mnemonically renewing and thus stabilizing it—in every action of the performance.

In literate cultures, the problem of → tradition—that is, the problem of the transmission of the cultural endowment to the next generation—posed itself in an altogether new fashion. While writing radically broadens the opportunities for recording, its form of recording—by way of material vehicles—entails the danger that what is conveyed may petrify, be dis(re)membered from the living circulation of knowledge, and thereby become strange and deprived of relevance and reference. If writing is to stand in the service of cultural memory, and the latter not erode by reason of undirected expansion, forms of refocusing the tradition must be developed. These forms must guide the selection of what has been put down in writing, and guarantee its cultivation and enculturation. This function is performed by canonization, a process and formal institution of selecting one set of texts as especially worthy of being handed down, out of the mass of writings at hand, by combining this set in a sanctified textual corpus (→ Canon). The textual corpus is invested with an aura of truth and authenticity, which ensures that by becoming the firm nucleus of a cultural tradition, it will be constantly re-read and re-interpreted. Canonization includes two forms of tending and cultivation: that of the text and that of the meaning of the text. The former (→ Text/Textual Criticism) ensures that nothing from the textual corpus be added, subtracted, or changed. It is the basis for an unchanged conservation. The latter involves commentary. The tending of the meaning of the text produces commentary and → hermeneutics, it develops the work of interpretation, to guard against the tendency that the text become strange and meaningless over the course of time (→ Literature). Textual preservation and the cultivation of meaning are two distinct forms of organizing and sustaining cultural memory. In cultural practice, however, these are far from being mutually exclusive. To give an example: → Judaism knows the Talmudic doctrine of the Two Torahs, the one written and the other oral, both of which Moses received from God on Sinai. While in the written revelation of the Torah, the Five Books of Moses, every letter is fixed by divine revelation, this doctrine has it that the meaning of the text was revealed in the oral Torah; the unbolting of that text, as it happens, is the assignment of an ever-open commentary, continuing from generation to generation in the form of an oral conversation. A similar complementarity (and competition) of written and oral tradition was conceived in Christianity at the Council of Trent (1545–1563). There the Protestant principle of sola Scriptura (Lat., 'by Scripture alone') received its Catholic corrective in the inclusion of an oral tradition accompanying the written, scriptural vehicle and binding it to an authoritative chain of descent.

But literature and orality are related to each other in yet another way than the dual form of canonized text and (quasi-) oral traditions of interpretation. The Jewish liturgical practice of reading the whole of the Torah once each year, in weekly segments, at divine service in the synagogue, is another example of the fusion of 'textual' and 'ritual' coherence (J. Assmann 1992) of script(ure) and performance.

Primary and Secondary Religions

5. The question of media is of key importance for the constitution of cultural memory. It was not the invention of writing, but the much more specific cultural decision to entrust to this medium the core of a tradition that will confer identity, that has led to the formation of what are called 'secondary religions.' Secondary religions are distinguished from primary religions by the fact that they are founded on canonized texts. Once the seminal religious revelation is concentrated in a corpus of authorized sacred texts, the entire organizational structure of a religion is shifted. In such cases, the decentralized network of local devotions and regional rites is replaced with a single, normative text. The text that becomes the key vehicle of a religious revelation, and tradition homogenizes the reception of that revelation. With this medium, the secondary religion is severed from its sacred topography and from the regional traditions that have grown up around it. This detachment is what makes it transferable across time and space: now it is capable of mission, which likewise presupposes a form of transferability. It is true that some local cults of primary religions have also persevered through migration and colonization; as a rule, however, these have become syncretistic by having adopted elements of the new environment. By contrast, secondary religions are characterized by the fact that they preserve their tradition intact and unchanged over the course of centuries—with the help of the canonized text—in the environment of a foreign culture. They construct norms of purity, which they uphold by mobilizing counter-forces against the natural tendency of adaptation, syncretism, and hybridization.

'Contra-Present' Memory

6. In the climate of post-modernity, norms of purity are under suspicion of fanaticism, and, accordingly, 'hybridization' has been promoted to a new cultural value and program. The strong point of secondary religions, however, is not compromise and change but the preservation of tradition and identity over against the hostile forces of an alien environment. This emphasis on pure preservation of tradition is important for minority communities in a → diaspora situation. A 'counter-present' (G. Theissen) memory is established that prevails against the current and mainstream system of values and belief of the hegemonic culture. The medium of writing has not only contributed to a concentration and sharpening of religious tradition; it has also opened a cultural opportunity for the 'counter-voice.' The biblical prophets, who found no hearing with their obstinate contemporaries, received from God the injunction: "Go now, write it before them on a tablet, and inscribe it in a book, so that it may be for the time to come as a witness forever" (Isa 30:8-11). Where contemporaries are callous, a report set down in writing can still have its effect on their descendants, and thereby occasion a new kind of independence, by endorsing values and norms independent of the calculations of the opportunistic rulers of the present. In other words, the separation of political power from religious or philosophical truth that has been so vital for the development of Western culture would not have been possible without the medium of writing. Walter Benjamin's concept of 'mindfulness' [Eingedenken] has transferred the counter-present memory into the horizon of a politically committed philosophy. By secularizing certain elements of Jewish memorial culture, this mindfulness focuses, in 'anamnetic solidarity' (J. B. Metz), on the injustice and unresolved state of the victims of history, and thereby, in some sense, forms a collective correspondence to → Freud's therapeutic work on the deposit of the repressed.

Forgetting, Repressing, Forgiving

7. For any practicing Jew, Yom Kippur is a caesura—the day on which, after a phase of ten days of fasting and penance, personal moral faults are annually blotted out of the book of God's records. In this cultural context, human activity is remembered neither in inter-human relations, nor by posterity. Instead, remembering and forgetting are centrally imbedded in the memory of God, and this in twofold way: as remembering in the Book of Life, and as forgetting in the Book of Condemnation. In the book religion of Judaism, memory is bound up with writing, and forgetting with erasure.

Forgetting, as a rule, occurs via selection. By focusing on seminal events of the past, the forgetting of other events is necessarily implied. Selection is determined by what satisfies the needs and demands of a respective present. This selection, however, must be constantly updated. It is constantly guided by the requirements of a specific construction of meaning. Repressing, on the other hand, comes into play when dealing with events that are connected with shame and guilt. The relationship between guilt and memory is particularly complex: while the perpetrator's motivation to remember approaches zero, the motivation to address the issue is very high for the victim whose case is presented in juridical, social, or ethical contexts. For personal moral → guilt, the role of admonisher is adopted by → conscience. On the collective level of culture, it is → literature today that repeatedly reminds society of what it would so much prefer to forget. The Hebrew → Bible is an extraordinary example of a text that has founded an identity on the memory of the people of Israel's own guilt. By contrast with the memory of revenge, which is based on one's iniquities and the guilt of others, this impulse is self-critical, and bears on the norms of purity mentioned above, that are to be attained and maintained only in constant confrontation with those temptations of the environment that Jews comprise under the caption of 'idolatry.' Only rarely does a nation exact of itself, in self-indictment, a commemoration of the victims of its own transgressions. Thus, one will seek in vain for commemorations in the United States of the Indian tribes it has annihilated, or memorial plaques to the dead and mutilated of the atomic bombs detonated over Hiroshima and Nagasaki (Sontag 2003). German commemoration of the → Shoah is a novelty in the cultural history of memory. Such a commemoration can be equally important and difficult, for instance when a nation can recover its justice by means of a recollection of its injustice (Young 1993). The Shoah and the crimes of the National Socialist regime represent, to be sure, an outrage of guilt, and thus it has led both to a traumatization on the side of the victims, and to apathy and atrophy of the memory on the side of the perpetrators. Despite a multiplication of memorial initiatives and attempts, there is still a great distance to cover before reaching a balanced appreciation, and adequate commemoration, of this historic trauma.

Amnesty

'Forgetfulness' or pardon, however, is not to be associated only with neglect and injustice. It also bears on an occasion for a fundamental renewal of relations. From ancient times, peace treaties have always included a comprehensive injunction of forgetting all guilty acts of the past war. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, the formula for this point was 'amnesty and oblivion,' and was tantamount to prescribed, decreed forgetting. This 'forgetting' clause in peace treaties places both sides under the obligation of renouncing ascription of guilt, or punitive measures, for misdeeds in the past war. In this juridical framework of a reciprocal contract, 'forget' is tantamount to 'forgive.' After two World Wars and the Shoah, the legal formulation of amnesty and oblivion no longer possesses an unrestricted validity. After World War II and the Holocaust, the International War Crimes Tribunal in The Hague has determined that all 'crimes against humanity,' especially in the form of genocide, are excluded from any 'judicial pardon' ('amnesty').

Cultural Memory in the Present

8. The future of cultural memory is tied to the technology of storage, that is, to the archive and conditions for its media. Today, the claim to a longue durée of cultural memory is compromised by the material conditions for storing information, especially when dealing with digital data. Nowadays, the media such as newspapers, → films, radio, and → television take over the retrieval function and act as agents of recall, selecting materials from the enormous stocks of the archive and presenting them from time to time and in appropriate form. → Museums, with their picture galleries and their vast historical exhibits, but also the stage and the concert hall, as well as school and Church, are institutions that act as mediators and instigators of cultural memory. In democratic societies cultural memory gradually becomes disconnected from political and religious institutions, which means, among other things, that the duty of rote learning recedes into the background and more and more attention is paid to aesthetic forms of presentation. The function of the counter-present memory, which consists in reminding society of what it would prefer to forget, is today no longer performed by religion alone, but increasingly by art and literature, as well.

Literature

Assmann, Jan, Das kulturelle Gedächtnis. Schrift, Erinnerung und politische Identität in frühen Hochkulturen, Munich [2]1997; Burke, Peter, The Renaissance Sense of the Past, London 1969; Carruthers, Mary, The Book of Memory, Cambridge 1990; Connerton, Peter, How Societies Remember, Cambridge 1989; Halbwachs, Maurice, Les cadres sociaux de la mémoire, Paris 1975 ([1]1925); Lewis, Bernard, History—Remembered, Recovered, Invented, Princeton 1975; Margalit, Avishai, The Ethics of Memory, Cambridge 2002; Middleton, David/Edwards, David, Collective Remembering, London etc. 1990; Nietzsche, Friedrich, The Use and Abuse of History, New York 1957 (German [1]1872); Ong, Walter J., Orality and Literacy: The Technologizing of the Word, London 1982; Ricoeur, Paul, La mémoire, l'histoire, l'oubli, Paris 2000; Schacter, Daniel (ed.),

Memory Distortion: How Minds, Brains, and Societies Reconstruct the Past, Cambridge 1995; Schuhmann, H./Scott, J., "Generations and Collective Memory," in: American Sociological Review 54 (1989), 359-381; Sontag, Susan, Regarding the Pain of Others, New York 2003; Theissen, Gerd, "Tradition und Entscheidung. Der Beitrag des biblischen Glaubens zum kulturellen Gedächtnis," in: Assmann, Jan/Hölscher, Tonio (eds.), Kultur und Gedächtnis, Frankfurt/M. 1988, 170-189; Tulving, E. (ed.), Memory, Consciousness, and the Brain, Philadelphia 2000; Yerushalmi, Hayim, Zachor: Jewish Memory and Jewish History, Washington 1982; Young, James E., The Texture of Memory: Holocaust Memorials and Meaning, New Haven 1993.

→ Canon, Literature, Meaning/Signification, Media, Monument/Memorial Places, Museum, Oral Tradition, Text/Textual Criticism, Tradition

Aleida Assmann

Metaphysics

Sense of Being Human

1. The word 'metaphysics' was originally coined simply as a result of the order of certain writings of Aristotle as they were kept in libraries, where some appeared metà ta physiká, 'after the [writings pertaining to] nature.' But they form a unit, inasmuch as they all represent a 'first philosophy,' or inquiry into being as such. They investigate being's fundamental determinations, divisions, and the mutual relations of the latter. As they especially inquire into 'the beginning,' they also pose the question of God in the ancient sense.

In the stricter sense, then, 'metaphysics' denotes a discipline that has taken shape in the course of the history of European philosophy. In a broader sense, all philosophical or speculative religious systems of concept and meaning can be understood by the word 'metaphysics.' In the European philosophical traditions, catalogues of questions have been composed that a metaphysics should have to answer, pertaining to: being as such, and thereby, as well, God, world, soul, determination or freedom, and their interrelations. Formally regarded, the object of metaphysical investigations is that of questions about 'the first and the last,' or the unconditional in the relationship between world and human being.

Metaphysical systems, as speculative thought, lay claim to an across-the-board interpretation of the human being and her world (or reality). Thus, they are religious not only when they draw their formulations and argumentations from the tradition-content of a positive religion such as Christianity, but also, potentially, when they supply bestowals of meaning within modern philosophical systems that call for a certain worldview and activity on the part of human beings, and prescribe the same. Not only do religions imply and produce metaphysical systems, but the latter can modify religions, and enter into competition with them—that is, they can have the effect of founding them. Granted, the task of → religion is not limited to speculative response to 'key questions.'

The multiplicity of metaphysical systems cannot be presented here; thus, what is in order is concentration on the formal aspects of the phenomenon. 'Metaphysics' can denote (1) the conscious speculative direction of certain questions that refer to the 'meaning,' the 'unconditional,' of human reality, (2) the concrete response to these questions in terms of content; and (3) metaphysics can be understood as an indication of the inescapability of these questions, in the sense of a 'metaphysical need'[1] on the part of the human being, and hence (4) indicate implicit forms of metaphysics, for example in the form of myths, narratives, philosophies, and also religions.

2. In the history of ancient philosophy, from the pre-Socratics to Plato, Aristotle, the Stoa, and Plotinus, metaphysical questions were not only differently formulated, but also just as differently answered with respect to content. In the wake of the Christianization of ancient thought, from ancient theology (patristics), to medieval scholasticism to modern times, metaphysical answers have not only taken up the questions of ancient philosophy and logic, but are indebted to biblical stipulations as well.

Thus, in European history of religion, metaphysical investigation has played a great role in the reciprocal influence of Greek traditions of philosophy and the traditions of the scriptural religions (Judaism, Christianity, and Islam). Finally, there has developed a particular philosophical and theological discipline of metaphysics, as well as positions of a criticism of metaphysics,[2] that, in turn, go back to the traditions of ancient sophistry and skepticism.

Is Metaphysics European?

3. The designation 'metaphysics' is transferred from a modern European view to past and foreign religions, to the extent that the latter imply independent series of answers to sets of metaphysical questions. Thus, attempts can be made to develop the respective metaphysics of Chinese Daoism, Indian Upanishads, or cosmogonic myths. But even the anti-metaphysical position of Pali or Zen Buddhism can be demonstrated,[3] with particular regard to the speculative content, or the renunciation of such, respectively, in the propositions on world and human being in various religions.

Metaphysics without a Discipline?

4. In current philosophy the ability to answer metaphysical questions is disputed; however, such attempts seem to win new hearing under the heading of 'questions of meaning,' as inescapable questions posed by humanity. Is the import of Asian and other non-European meaning content, such as the return of myths and teachings of wisdom, the current expression of 'metaphysical needs'? If speculative systems, and ultimate, unambiguous answers are no longer accepted, then the renaissance of the aesthetic and the narrative come into their inheritance, and hold metaphysical questions in their consciousness in a different philosophical form. The old metaphysical themes and questions are given new raiment, and are brought into association with the reception of myths, the adoption of Asian philosophies and 'mind techniques,' and scientific interpretations of the world. Not even the criticism of the great traditions of metaphysics and their positive answers can elude the explosive power and importance of the questions.[4] Thus, the virulence of the metaphysical questions comes into view not only in a reference to 'mythical wisdom' and 'mystical visions,' but also in the skeptical and aporetical concepts of current philosophizing.[5] Nor, in the treatment of series of metaphysical questions, does current philosophy accede only to a religious heritage, but it also engages a competition with the familiar responses of the positive religions.

But the levels of discussion have shifted. Metaphysical questions concern not only the elite elements of the philosophically trained, and of religious specialists, who must find a logic in their system, but, at the hands of the mass media, universal schooling, and the book market, find propagation in the culture of the masses, and become problems of the individual quest for meaning. The popularization and pluralization of metaphysical themes, questions, and answers, can therefore be interpreted as a reflex of the general 'democratization' of proposals of meaning.

1. Schopenhauer, Arthur, "Über das metaphysische Bedürfnis des Menschen," in: Idem, Die Welt als Wille und als Vorstellung, vol. 2, chap. 17 (first ed. 1819), Darmstadt 1968, 206-243.
2. Rentsch, Thomas, et al., "Metaphysikkritik," in: HWPh 5 (1980), 1280-1294.
3. Schlieter, Jens, Buddhismus, Hamburg 1997, 71-74.
4. Wenzel, Uwe Justus, "Statt einer Einleitung. Von metaphysischen Bedürfnissen," in: Wenzel 1998, 7-22.
5. Schlette 1990, 127-144.

Literature

Burkhardt, Hans/Smith, Barry (eds.), Handbook of Metaphysics and Ontology, 2 vols., Munich 1991; Loux, Michael J./Zimmerman, Dean W. (eds.), The Oxford Handbook of Metaphysics, Oxford 2003; Schlette, Heinz Robert, Kleine Metaphysik, Frankfurt/M. 1990; Wenzel, Uwe Justus, Vom Ersten und Letzten. Positionen der Metaphysik in der Gegenwartsphilosophie, Frankfurt/M. 1998.

→ Aristotelianism, Criticism of Religion, Enlightenment, Esotericism, God/Gods/The Sacred, Platonism, Religion, Scholasticism, Science

Jürgen Mohn

Middle Ages

The understanding of the Middle Ages by later ages in Europe has passed through a number of phases. Even the term 'Middle Ages' is a modern convention. Enlightenment thinkers tended to use the expression 'the dark ages' to refer to this period, in order to set it up as a gloomy foil, making the light of the new era shine all the brighter. In the confrontation of the French Revolution of 1789, both the revolutionaries, on the one hand, and the nobility and the Church, on the other, laid claim to the Middle Ages. The Nobility and the Church, in their campaign for a restoration of their "Holy Alliance" found in that era legitimation of the order they wished to uphold, e.g. monarchy by God's (read, 'the Church's') grace, and pious obedience to authority. The revolutionaries saw the Middle Ages as proof of the state of tutelage in which the Church had too long tried to keep the French, and from which they would now deliver their nation by dismantling aristocratic privilege and expropriating church properties. The valor of the French people, in the face of what the revolutionaries described as Church intimidation, was seen in their creativity and industry in the construction of very fine church buildings and described as the development of France's own art-religion, arising as soon as anxiety about the end of the world, encouraged by the Church, had passed with the passing of the first millennium.

Nearer to our own times, the imperialists of the nineteenth century saw their own ideas reflected in the Crusades and set out to colonize under the cross. The National Socialists in Germany understood their rule as the ful-

The fifteen-hundredth anniversary of the baptism of the Frankish King Clovis was celebrated at Reims in 1996. According to tradition, King Clovis was baptized a Christian in 496. This date is taken by most schoolbooks as marking the beginning of the Christian Middle Ages and is also understood to mark the birth of France. This claim not only gives the present-day nation a sense of continuity, but also makes the secular state a Christian people. At the 1996 festival, one could observe the use of the past for the present. While the Pope's presence lent the event international attention, French laws had changed the idea behind the festival so that it became a demonstration against immigration. People demonstrated against immigration by Muslim French from the Maghreb, who they asserted were not French, because they had not been baptized as Christians, according to the tradition initiated by King Clovis. (Christoph Auffarth) fillment of a medieval dream, thus naming it the 'third' and 'thousand-year' empire (Dritte Reich).

Other periods, instead of identifying themselves with the Middle Ages, have emphasized their difference and separateness from that period. This emphasis can lead to an appreciation of medieval music and art as exotic, or to a view of the social and political structures of the Middle Ages as simply foreign. The latter view was expressed in connection with the Industrial Revolution (starting in 1800; → Industrial Society), which saw a great caesura (J. LeGoff) between themselves and the world of the Middle Ages.

In the face of these diverse views of the Middle Ages, we must be careful to avoid certain illusions. One of the most common and deceptive is that of the Middle Ages as a period of monolithic unity between → Church and state, firmly governing a homogenous and inflexibly structured society. This fiction does not take into account the opposition of imperium (empire) and sacerdotium (priesthood), Emperor and Pope, competition and conflict between whom would sooner suggest a fundamental dividedness in Western Europe. However, neither of these poles of power was a reality, but consisted more in claims to power than actual power. Although Pope Gregory VII in Dictatus Papae ("prescriptions of the Pope"; 1075) and Pope Innocent II (1215) called for papal monarchy, the local churches had a considerable degree of autonomy, arranging questions of priestly office and episcopal sees with the local nobility and their dependants. There was no homogenous, centralized system of education for priests by means of which their activities could be reliably controlled. Instead, the local nobility and the community decided the question of who might appoint priests or bishops, known as the investiture controversy. There was not even a particular need to turn to Rome for salvation, as this could be also be secured on a local level through the intercessions of the city or region's patron saint.

At the Fourth Lateran Council (1215) Pope Innocent III took steps to change this situation and shape the Catholic Church into a homogenous and orderly unit, with a monarchical structure and its own 'police,' the Dominicans. The Church, in his view, was to function in opposition to the 'sunderers,' i.e. schismatics, namely the Eastern Church (→ Orthodox Churches), the 'heretics' in Southern France (→ Heresy), called Cathari, and the → 'heathen,' i.e. all non-Christians. Innocent III also proposed that only the Roman Church had authority over individual salvation, and only priests who had been ordained directly by Rome could administer the sacraments. Despite all of these efforts, the laity insisted on being permitted to elect their own priests, so that the Church stayed in the village and was never successfully transferred to Rome. In reaction to further efforts at centralization, the national churches formed, especially in connection with the → Reformation.

Access to Salvation

With the close of → Late Antiquity, the opportunity to achieve salvation by living a holy life in the community of Christians became unavailable to the laity. In the Middle Ages, it was ascetics, monks and nuns whose 'salvific labor' could win salvation for themselves and also for the laity, who were thus in a certain position of dependence. As salvation was not considered purchasable, when non-ascetics gave monks and clerics the surplus value of the work this was not seen as payment but as an act in a 'generalized economy of → gift.' As a result, however, wealthier laypeople could gain certain advantages, such as a burial place near the altar or the sepulcher of a saint. They could also have their names inscribed in the Book of Life, a book kept by the church or monastery on the basis of Rev 20:12, so that their memories might live on with that of the monks as the names were incorporated into the monastic Mass.

The Crusades opened up direct access to individual salvation for the laity, which they could achieve through their own deeds. For example, participating in a crusade sufficed to secure the plenary remission of sin. Innocent III reacted by wooing the laity with the teaching of a temporally limited hell, one that led to heaven, namely, purgatory. Purgatory, rather than hell, could be reached by the laity if they cast themselves upon the 'salvific institution' of the Church, whose priests cultivated their souls through the sacraments, such as Confession, the Eucharist (→ Lord's Supper/Eucharist), and Last Rites.

An Apocalyptic Epoch

Internal and external calamity motivated the Church to define itself in contrast to various enemies. This effort consisted of a long process on the part of the Church as a 'persecuting society' (R. Moore) but was implemented as a means to ward off disaster.

The sense of impending doom was exacerbated in the high Middle Ages by the invasions of the Mongols (1241) and by the Plague (1346–1350), which killed as much as two-thirds of the population of Europe. Fear and blame were directed toward lepers, heretics, Jews and witches by those facing mass death and who interpreted the situation as the work of the Devil, presaging the end of the world. The specific relations of blame were investigated by the Inquisition, which sought to discern who from the above-named groups had perpetrated which devilish work specifically, and to decide how they should be punished so that society might be purified and saved from catastrophe.

The coming of the Reformation actually intensified this type of social control, although it did so according to new criteria for the identification and treatment of 'outsiders.' Only in the seventeenth century—but then very rapidly—did the fear that the work of the → Devil was to be found behind every misfortune and disease abate (K. Thomas).

This late period of apocalyptic anxiety (→ Apocalypse) was, then, a contrast to the lively, vital, and variegated early Middle Ages.

Literature

Auffarth, Christoph, Irdische Wege und himmlischer Lohn, Göttingen 2002; Bloch, Marc, The Royal Touch, London 1973; Borst, Arno, Barbaren, Ketzer und Artisten. Welten des Mittelalters, Munich 1988; Delumeau, Jean, Sin and Fear: The Emergence of Western Guilt Culture, New York 1990; Duby, George, Les trois ordres ou l'imaginaire du féodalisme, Paris 1978; LeGoff, Jacques, Pour un autre Moyen Age, Paris 1977; Idem, Time, Work and Culture in the Middle Ages, Chicago 1980; Idem, The Birth of Purgatory, Chicago 1984; Moore, Robert I., The Formation of a Persecuting Society, Oxford 1987; Raulff, Ulrich, Ein Historiker im 20. Jahrhundert: Marc Bloch, Frankfurt/M. 1995; Thomas, Keith: Religion and the Decline of Magic, London 1971.

→ Late Antiquity, Christianity, Francis of Assisi, Monarchy/Royalty, Monasticism, Papacy

Christoph Auffarth

Migration

1. Migration, the spatial mobility of individuals and groups, represents, after deliberate extension (→ Mission), the most important factor in the spread of religions. Although we meet the nineteenth- and twentieth-century movement of individuals and population groups in hitherto unheard-of numbers, the fact must not be overlooked that, even in prehistoric times, human beings traversed land and water routes into other spaces and onto other continents (for example, Aryan immigration into Indian space). Migrations, in pre-modern as well as in modern times, have comported the conveyance of goods, handwork, lifestyles, and religious notions and practices. In consequence, adaptations to new conditions occurred, and manners of life and religious traditions were often fundamentally altered. In cases in which the migrating group has not been absorbed into society at large, but has maintained its cultural peculiarity and religious identity, migration leads to the formation of local traditions. Thus, migrations have decisively contributed to the multiplicity of (principal) religious traditions in a variety of ways.

Theories of Migration

2. Even in antiquity, the migration of a people was a declaration of both the oneness and the multiplicity of human cultures and religions. The model most used in the twentieth-century study of demography and the migration, to cite causes of international migrations, is the push-pull model. Push factors—like scarcity of work, hunger and need, persecutions, or war—drive persons to emigration from their homeland. Pull factors—like the opportunity of freedom of religious practice, or the availability of employment and chances for education—represent positive attractions and can be the occasion of an immigration. The distinction between involuntary versus voluntary immigration is too schematized, however, to be able adequately to embrace both the multiple economic and sociopolitical grounds, and the individual motives of a migration. Each life situation contains different drives, upon which a reaction ensues, with greater ('proactive') or smaller ('reactive') opportunity for one's own decision (Richmond 1994). Reactive migrants are displaced persons and refugees; proactive migrants are workers, persons drawn by the presence of family members, and emigrants.

Migration Movements

3. Migration is a phenomenon to be met always and everywhere. The global expansion of colonialism, and better technology for the movements of traffic, however, further promoted the phenomenon from the mid-nineteenth century onward, so that since then a powerful increase in intercontinental migrations can be observed. Sixty to sixty-five million Europeans emigrated abroad, some seventy percent of them to North America. The number of Asian contractual workers that emigrated to Africa, North and South America, and the Caribbean is estimated at about three to four million persons. Further, by 1834 some ten million Africans were taken to the New World as slaves (→ Afro-American Religions). In the second half of the twentieth century, the purpose of the migration movements has changed: Europe has become a place of asylum and domicile for millions of refugees and emigrant workers, from Asia, Africa, and the Near East (→ Asylum). Along with the immigrants, extra-European cultures and non-Christian religions came to Europe, and essentially altered the religious landscape. Even as late as the beginning of the twentieth century, practically no religious minorities (except for the Jews) existed in Europe. However, owing to an immigration conditioned by elements of colonial history, and by economics, a plurality of religions and cultures have appeared on the scene (→ Pluralism). Thus, social tensions and conflicts have arisen that are blamed on the cultural and religious 'otherness' of the 'foreigners.' This exonerates the 'native population' from the obligation of questioning the societal distribution of power and resources, as it is immigrants who are blamed for any untoward conditions.

Migration and Religion

4. Empirically researched examples indicate a two-faced trend for immigrant religions: on the one side, it can be observed that, in the new environment, special religious orientations and connections are lost, and an adaptation to the culture and religion of the 'pulling' society ensues. This phenomenon can occur as early as the immigrants' first generation, but tends to be more evident in the second: assimilation, and the wish for integration and acceptance, can lead to the perceived obligation of cultural and religious particularity. At the same time, the danger of loss of tradition can lead precisely to the production of new, accentuated interest in one's own cultural usages, and one's own religious content and practice. In the foreign situation, religious connections shift from a latent level to the 'surface,' and are consciously perceived. However, cultural and religious exercises do not continue unchanged: certain aspects are emphasized, others extensively neglected. For example, are a vegetarian lifestyle, arranged marriages, or a religious symbol on the forehead essential or expendable components of South Asian religions? Far from the Indian subcontinent (see map at → Diaspora), different answers have been given to this question, leading to intergenerational conflict and divisions in the immigrant groups. In a minority situation, religions may see their distinct religious membership in a new light, and ethnic and religious elements such as the male Sikh's turban, or the Muslim woman's veil, may become a mark of identity, and a contested symbol where social policy is concerned. Since a legal battle in 1976, Sikhs in Great Britain have been permitted to ride motorcycles without a helmet and in a turban, while Islamic girls are not permitted to wear a veil in the state schools of France. Political and cultural openness on the part of the 'pulling' society, together with a readiness for compromise on the part of the immigrants, are important in order that a peaceful coexistence may be possible in a multi-religious and multi-ethnic society in the age of globalization and economic migration.

Literature

Cohen, Robin (ed.), The Cambridge Survey of World Migration, Cambridge 1995; Hinnels, John (ed.), A New Handbook of Living Religions, Oxford/Cambridge 1997; Richmond, Anthony H., Global Apartheid, Oxford 1994; Segal, Aron, An Atlas of International Migration, London 1993; Vertovec, Steven/Cohen, Robin (eds.), Migration, Diasporas and Transnationalism, Cheltenham 1999; Warner, R. Stephen/Wittner, Judith G. (eds.), Gatherings in Diaspora: Religious Communities and the New Immigration, Philadelphia 1998.

Journals: International Migration (since 1963); International Migration Review (since 1967).

→ Diaspora, Ghetto/Ghettoization, Identity, Prejudices/Stereotypes, Tolerance

Martin Baumann

Millenarianism / Chiliasm

Etymology

1. 'Millenarianism' is derived from the Latin mille ('thousand') and annus ('year'), and denotes the expectation of a 'thousand-year reign.' 'Chiliasm,' with the same meaning, is derived from the Greek chílioi ('thousand'). The original theological concept was taken over from other disciplines, and bound up with various kinds of expectations of 'end and revolution' in religious and social movements.

Millenarianism as a Christian Expectation of the End

2. In the history of Christianity, millenarianism can be understood in terms of Rev 20:2,7, as the expectation of a final earthly age, in which Christ, with his own, will govern the world, bringing the fulfillment of the Church and the fettering of evil. On its threshold stand fierce battles, whose beginning is recognizable through signs, and at whose end the returning Christ will emerge as Victor. At the end of this age comes the Last Judgment.

In this connection three questions arise:

- How literally are the proclamations of the Last Age to be taken?
- When does this Age begin?
- Can Christians contribute actively to its inauguration?

a) The first question was a bone of contention even in the ancient Church. Millenarianism or chiliasm denoted the positions that take the prophecies of the Hebrew Bible prophets literally, and reject, for instance, the notion of the resurrection only of souls. At a later time, this thinking became the universal opinion of the Western churches, but repeatedly faded in the face of its symbolism, so difficult to imagine. The result, from time to time, was an attempt at an allegorical interpretation, in the sense of the inward development of the individual person and/or of humanity. The speculations of Italian abbot Joachim of Fiore (1130–1202) stirred wide attention. He describes three steps in the development of human kind, which he designates 'reigns,' and which he links with, respectively, the Hebrew Bible, the New Testament, and a coming "Eternal Gospel." The first 'reign' is that of the Father, and matrimony, the second that of the Son and the priesthood. The 'Third Reign,' which he announced for the year 1260, would be that of the Holy Spirit and the monastic state. No ecclesiastical hierarchy would be needed any longer, inasmuch as, endowed with a 'spiritual intelligence,' human beings could themselves understand the inward meaning of the divine word. An angel-pope, or 'Leader,' would lead them to this condition.

b) The question of the proximity and possible dating of the dawn of the Last Age concerned Christianity after its disappointment in its early expectation of Christ's 'Parousia,' in the first century. Christianity appealed especially to Jewish doctrines on the ages. These doctrines appealed, among other things, to the vision recorded in the Book of Daniel, of the four successive reigns and their ultimate destruction (Dan 2; 7). According to these and other stage-schemata, it was possible to divide the world into three, four, five, seven, or twelve ages. The present was made the final or penultimate age, always with the Millennium impending. The shorter the remaining time spans, the more current the concrete notions of the Millennium.

In the fifth century, → Augustine identified the Millennium proclaimed in Rev 20 with the present age of the Church. The defeat of evil had already occurred, with the birth of Christ. No further age was to be awaited: the Second Coming of Christ was to be followed immediately by the Last Judgment, and therewith the end of all ages. At the same time, Augustine rejected a literal interpretation of the number "one thousand." God alone knew when the Last Judgment would arrive (City of God, 20, 30). This model prevailed in the Western church of the Middle Ages, and was taken over by the main currents of the Reformation as well. It offered the churches the opportunity to counter enthusiastic tendencies of the expectation of the Millennium, and at the same time to open up a horizon of hope and expectation.

Pre-Millenarianism vs. Post-Millenarianism

A literal interpretation of Rev 20 and similar loci thereby became the privilege of the free-church groups. Thus in anglophone contexts the distinction arose between pre-millenarianism and post-millenarianism. The former denotes a literal exposition of Rev 20: Christ would come 'before' the (still awaited) Millennium. Post-Millenarianism denotes the adoption of the Augustinian schema: the Second Coming of Christ would mark the closure of the (already present) Millennium.

c) A main reason for the reserve of church theology vis-à-vis too literal a biblical interpretation of this locus lay in its experience with radical groups that were of the opinion that one could and should assist the dawn of the Millennium by force and violence. These positions emerged with the followers of Joachim of Fiore, especially in the Franciscan Order. From about 1250 onward, they represented a radical criticism of the existing Church, which they relegated, together with secular power, to the Reign of Evil, and interpreted their own age as the threshold of the Millennium, the latter to be associated with a reform of the Church. Similar conceptions are to be found in the fifteenth century, with the Taborites, and in the age of the Reformation with, for instance, Thomas Müntzer and the Anabaptists. Thus, millenarianism offers a basis for revolutionary Christian ideologies, which seek radical change in political and societal (including ecclesial) structures.

Transfer to Non-Christian and Secular Movements

3. The term 'thousand-year reign' indicates a connection between millenarian conceptions and secular ideologies of modern times. The same holds true for Joachim of Fiore's concepts of the 'Third Reign' in → National Socialism, and of the Leader (in Ger., Der Führer; in Ital., Il Duce) in German and Italian Fascism. The history of such adoptions reaches far into the past. Comparing it to the mass political movements of the twentieth century, Norman Cohn describes the 'militant, revolutionary Chiliasm' of armed religious movements in the Middle Ages, which intended an imminent 'shattering and renewal of the world.' At the focal point, holds Cohn, stands the notion of a chosen people of the oppressed overthrowing a world tyranny, renewing the world, and thus producing a just world on earth. In this sense, anthropologists and sociologists transferred millenarianism to → charismatic movements in areas of political and social tension. These movements often arise in consequence of colonial or postcolonial dependencies, and in the interstices between traditional culture and the modern world (→ Colonialism). Apart from belief in one's own election, the most important characteristic of this millenarianism, too, is the conviction of the immediate imminence of the 'changeover.' Even the Iranian revolution of 1979 was described with this terminology (M. Riesebrodt).

Against these backgrounds, current discourse concerning a 'millennium' is conducted in connection with the dawn of the third millennium (e.g. in pronouncements by the Pontifical See), especially as an attempt to appraise the tensions proper to the expectations of a new age in European history of religion, and to integrate these and their criticism of the Church into a 'thousand-year Church year.' By contrast, millenarian groups such as, for example, → Jehovah's Witnesses, will scarcely identify with the 'jubilees' of a Christian temporal reckoning.

Literature

Amanat, Abbas/Bernhardson, Magnus T. (eds.), Imagining the End: Visions of Apocalypse from the Ancient Middle East to Modern America, London 2002; Bochinger, Christoph, "New Age" und moderne Religion, Gütersloh [2]1995 (part. pp. 222ff.); Baumgartner, Frederic J., Longing for the End: A History of Millennialism in Western Civilization, Hampshire/London 1999; Cohn, Norman, The Pursuit of the Millennium: Revolutionary Millenarians and Mystical Anarchists of the Middle Ages, rev. ed. London 1993 ([1]1957); Frykholm, Amy Johnson, Rapture Culture: Left Behind in Evangelical America, Oxford/New York 2004; Hunt, Stephen (ed.), Christian Millenarianism: From the Early Church to Waco, Bloomington 2001; Kippenberg, Hans G., "Apokalyptik/Messianismus/Chiliasmus," in: Handbuch religionswissenschaftlicher Grundbegriffe 2 (1990), 9-26; Landes, Richard (ed.), Encyclopedia of Millennialism and Millennial Movements, London/New York 2000; Riesebrodt, Martin, Pious Passion: The Emergence of Modern Fundamentalism in the United States and Iran, Berkeley 1993; Robbins, Thomas/Palmer, Susan J. (eds.), Millennium, Messiahs, and Mayhem: Contemporary Apocalyptic Movements, New York/London 1997.

→ Apocalypse, End/Eschaton, Fundamentalism, Time, Utopia

Christoph Bochinger

Minorities

Definitions

1. 'Minorities,' in political and social discourse, has a twofold meaning. For one, in a normative sense, the concept indicates the relationship between majority and minority, in which relationship the democratic pluralistic principle is to be maintained. For another, employed descriptively, the concept indicates social requirements in dealings with concrete minorities. This sense depends on the respective usage of the concept, and to what extent both usages overlap. The colloquial use of the term means first of all merely a numerically smaller group, independently of its social connection and its status. In ordinary political speech, the word 'minority' characterizes groups that are outnumbered in the democratic (parliamentarian) decision-making process. As parliamentarian opposition, the minority represents a relatively stable group, although exchangeable (political minorities). Precisely in the effort to become a majority, 'active minorities' (W. Dirks) are indispensable for a democracy. As a descriptive concept, 'minorities' are disadvantaged social groups. Generally, these are such groups as, on the basis of criteria determined by the majority, are marginalized, or made to feel marginalized. These groups can be constituted by, for instance, the homeless, the handicapped, or even foreigners. The criterion of objective and/or subjective disadvantage in society is valid also for such groups as actually constitute numerical majorities (e.g., women, black Africans and Indians in the Republic of South Africa). These groups, as well, are frequently designated as minorities. A quality of resistance to law attaches to the concept of minority that the United Nations Commission for Human Rights defined in 1950: "only those non-governing groups of a population who demonstrate stable ethnic, religious, or linguistic traditions, and wish to retain them, traditions clearly distinct from those of the rest of the population." In a framework of individual human rights, discrimination against members of such a minority on grounds of attributes determining its minority status is prohibited. Basically, the minority is conceded the right to maintain its traditions.

Ethnic and Religious Minorities

2. After the rise of the national states in the nineteenth century, the concrete circumstances in which ethnic and religious minorities live, whether of autonomy or of repression, were determined by the majority. This constellation repeated itself as, in the course of decolonialization, the erstwhile colonial powers created new 'minority problems' by way of arbitrary boundaries, collecting diverse national and religious ethnic groups in a single state (e.g., Christian minorities in Sudan). Since the collapse of the states of real socialism, which had controlled their ethnic and religious minorities with a rigorous centralism, a comparable phenomenon has now been taking place in many new Eastern European states.

Protection of Minorities and Religious Freedom

Any minority objects to discrimination and repression, in an awareness of its own national, cultural, or religious identity. The members of a minority enjoy protection not as constituting a people, with the classic right of a people to self-determination, but basically only in a framework of acknowledged individual human rights. Since 1919, a guarantee of the rights of groups has indeed been discussed in international conferences on human rights, as the old League of Nations called the world of postwar states to a defense of their minorities. However, these rights can be guaranteed in the meantime only through international accords. Furthermore, democratic and institutional measures for the protection of political minorities, such as decentralization, federalism, the removal of exclusive clauses in the voting law, restricted veto rights for minorities, as presuppositions for a general protection of minorities, turn out to be in scant supply. A status that will be constitutionally assured is of key importance for religious minorities.

Acceptance of Minorities

3. Of course, institutional acknowledgment of the duty to protect minorities says little about the acceptance of a minority on the part of the majority. In particular, the image of those minorities relegated to the margins of society is most often stamped by a stigmatizing structure of prejudice. It ascribes to minorities altogether negative characteristics across the board, often such as result from the concrete circumstances of the life imposed on them. By way of example, we may cite the bigoted picture of the greedy Jew, which continues to betray an → anti-Semitism lurking in many minds. This picture was essentially created by the imposition of the occupation of moneylender on the Jewish minority of the Middle Ages. Gypsies and Turks, today, as well, are victims of defensive, devaluating prejudices that seldom have anything to do with the real life situation of the persons thus stigmatized. The decisive element is rather a psychosocial one, one that comes all the more intensively to expression as the minorities are perceived in their 'strangeness' (skin color, religion, language) as a foreign vis-à-vis. An attitude of rejection feeds on diffuse feelings of fear of the strange, as well as, often enough, on a feeling of one's own inferiority. This attitude of rejection can actually provoke aggression against the minority.

Resentments of this kind become acute, the moment constitutionally guaranteed freedom of the practice of religion threatens to become a demonstration, or is perceived by the majority as so threatening. The 'veil dispute,' aroused by the injunction that Muslim women wear a veil, shows this;

and it shows how sensitive and tendential a laicist society can be with regard to any demonstrative blurring of the separation of religion and state (→ Laicism).

Behavioral patterns of this kind evince the permanent urgency of a responsible interaction with religious minorities, on the part of the whole of society. Demands all too unilateral, on the part of the majority, for a readiness to 'integrate' are misunderstood by the ethnic minority as a demand for their assimilation, so that their resistance seems a duty to their own identity. The result is often a reinforced resistance to any openness to the majority. Then, when the minority declines even minimal efforts at integration—any conflict-free coexistence with the majority—a definitive segregation may be in the offing. Society collapses into its distinct parts.

Literature

Barot, Rohit, Religion and Ethnicity: Minorities and Social Change in the Metropolis, Kampen 1993; Baumann, Gerd, The Multicultural Riddle: Rethinking National, Ethnic, and Religious Identities, New York 1999; International Centre for Migration Policy Development, Migrants, Minorities and Employment: Exclusion, Discrimination and Anti-discrimination in 15 Member States of the European Union, Luxemburg 2003; Kymlicka, Will, Multicultural Citizenship: A Liberal Theory of Minority Rights, Oxford 1995; Idem (ed.), The Rights of Minority Cultures, Oxford 1995; Lützenkirchen, Hans-Georg, Demokratie braucht unseren Einsatz. Ausländer—Migration—Asyl, Hilden 1995; Peach, Ceri/Vertovec, Steven, Islam in Europe: The Politics of Religion and Community, Basingstoke 1997; Taylor, Charles, Multiculturalism: Examining the Politics of Recognition, Princeton 1994.

→ Apartheid, Diaspora, Ghetto/Ghettoization, Migration, Pluralism, Prejudices/Stereotypes, Veil

Hans-Georg Lützenkirchen

Miracles

Miracles are a basically ambivalent element of religion, as they are both expected to occur or be believed in as a part of religious life and are also liable to arouse criticism and skepticism. Miracles occur outside the course of everyday existence, provoking both belief and unbelief.

Miracle Narratives

Narratives about miracles serve to substantiate the activity of an otherwise invisible God in the world, whom faith and piety require to be willing and able to intervene in a crisis or to demonstrate various divine attributes. Miracle narratives also serve as models, which help individuals to interpret their experiences and to make sense of disappointing attempts to benefit from a miracle, such as prayers for healing.

One miracle narrative appears in visitors' guides to Delphi, where people in antiquity traveled from all over the world to consult the oracle. On the site, there are large blocks of stone scattered erratically about. This feature is not very surprising, since the shrine lies immediately below a limestone cliff. According to the narrative, however, the presence of these stones can be explained by a miraculous event, which took place in 287 BCE when an army of marauding Gauls attacked the undefended shrine. Suddenly, two 'white maidens' covered the attackers with snow, and at the same time they heard the whirr of an arrow being shot from out of the temple. The enemy bolted in panic, leaving the temple treasures untouched. The Greeks were of course relieved to see the enemies flee, but questioned one remaining would-be attacker, who explained that Athena and Artemis had blocked the invaders' way, and Apollo had killed them all with his arrow. The Greeks themselves had noticed nothing but the early onset of winter, perhaps an odd noise, and pieces of rock falling, just as they noticed every year. But these phenomena became a miracle, by which the gods had rescued the shrine—after all, the enemy had disappeared, and Delphi had been spared.

Therefore one could say that miracles are, first and foremost, stories about the power of a certain god who overcomes, for example, the work of a demon or the power of some other god. Sometimes the stories are collected, as with the reports of miracles in the vestibules of temples to gods of healing which can be seen in the Greek Epidauros.

Types of Miracles

Various types of miracles can be distinguished: (1) Miracles of healing from a disease, including raising people from the dead, even when there is "already a stench" (John 11:39). (2) A cure implemented by a battle with an evil spirit usually leading to an exorcism in the course of which the evil spirit must be threatened and expelled. (3) Miracles of provision as in the feeding of the five thousand, when the physical needs of a person or group are met with divine abundance. (4) Miracles involving superhuman feats of a divine person (theios aner) such as demonstrating the ability to fly, to walk on water, or to be in two places at once. (5) Miracles which show power over nature, such as the calming of a storm, the transformation of water into wine, or a bleeding relic. (6) There are also punitive miracles, by means of which those who do not believe in miracles or in the god who performs them are punished, usually in some extreme form, which understandably motivates the persons concerned to believe in the reality of the miracle and be healed. Their difficulties make the point that those who wish to benefit from the other five types of miracles must not call the reality of the miracle into question.

Limitation and Mystery

The fact that miracles are exceptional and are not available to everyone establishes their value and explains the craving for them. There are limitations on miracles in that not everyone can work them, and that they are not to be performed indiscriminately (cf. Matt 4:1-4). The value of miracles is further protected by restrictions on publicizing them made by the wonderworker. After the wonderworker's death, miracle reports multiply, but a connection to the miracle worker, for example through his or her bones, clothing, or image, can still facilitate the longed-for miracle. But even then access to divine power is not common or easy—one must make the pilgrimage, sometimes bringing back a precious relic or bottle of holy water to be used only in emergencies.

Miracles and Legitimacy

Miracle narratives follow certain patterns, which include attributions of power to extraordinary persons and the development of miracle legends. Recognizing the legendary nature of these narratives but wishing to maintain belief in the possibility of miracles, the Catholic Church has established a juridical process of canonization by means of which such extraordinary persons can be declared holy. There are certain rules in place for this process. (1) It cannot begin less than fifty years after the person's death, so that personal friendship can hardly continue to play a role. (2) The person must have performed at least two miracles that have unambiguously occurred contra naturam (Lat., 'against nature') and can therefore not be explained away as the results of natural causes. An advocatus diaboli (Lat., 'devil's advocate') looks for defects in potential saints, so that their canonization, if and when it occurs, can be accepted as carefully considered and legitimate. Thus the person's miracles are also officially established as legitimate.

In Judaism, as in Protestantism, only God can perform miracles. Although God can appoint human beings to perform miracles as his ministers, the persons remain in their status as creatures and do not earn a special status as a result of their agency. All of the members of the congregation are considered holy, but none is able to take on divine attributes. God alone works miracles. Therefore if a miracle occurs, its legitimacy is hardly questionable for the community concerned.

Demythologization

In the nineteenth century, the natural sciences challenged the Church's support of the reality of miracles with the belief in eternal and unchangeable laws of nature. This challenge threatened the very idea of a personal God who interacts with the world. The conflict culminated in irreconcilable positions. For scientists who held that only phenomena that could be tested and repeated experimentally were real, belief in miracles was proof of the basic irrationality of religion. Religious apologists reacted by focusing on those particular miracles, which contravened the laws of nature, and claiming these as unambiguous demonstrations of the activity of God in the world.

When Catholic Croatia declared its independence from 'atheistic' Yugoslavia in 1991, there was an apparition of the Virgin Mary. This event was an addition to a series of apparitions which had taken place in the little town of Medjugorje

Attempts to negotiate this conflict have taken various forms. The Catholic process of canonization now requires medical affidavits to be filed when a person alleges to have been miraculously healed of an incurable disease by the candidate for sainthood. In this manner, scientific evidence is respected, but the possibility of a miracle is not eliminated. Theologically, Rudolf Bultmann (1884–1976) sought to solve the problem by ascribing belief in miracles to an antiquated worldview, inappropriate for modern Protestants. He claimed that miracles must be demythologized if Christianity, with its biblical accounts of miracles, is to remain credible in a modern age. For him, then, the miracle of Jesus's resurrection was to be understood not as an actual physical resurrection from the dead, but as the human → Jesus having died in the expected manner as a result of crucifixion, but the divine Jesus having 'risen again' in the preaching (kerygma) and faith of the community, so that he can be said to live on.

Debate about the reality or factuality of miracles is senseless. Scholars have revised the concept of reality to include constructs belonging to certain communities but not necessarily recognizable to others. Further, if we maintain the conclusion that miracle is a narrative genre with its own form history, then belief in miracles is a 'social fact,' which cannot be candidly and realistically refuted, or proved. Instead, it is the task of the academic study of religion to examine miracles as social facts in their historical contexts, to analyze their social functions, and to seek to grasp the diverse ways in which miracles are perceived.

starting in 1981. (→ Vision/Auditory Experience; map in → Mediterranean Region). The town soon became a favorite place of pilgrimage. While the official Church reserves its judgment, a group of Italian pilgrims, mostly women, can be seen here waiting for the next apparition. The paper that can be seen in the photograph provides reports of the earlier miracles and other apparitions of Mary elsewhere in Europe and also serves to prepare readers for what they may expect to see. After hours of waiting, the impression of having seen at least something mounts, so that the endless waiting, the assembled chairs, the necessary patience are all allowed to fulfill their purpose. (Christoph Auffarth)

Literature

Brown, Colin, Miracles and the Critical Mind, Grand Rapids 1984; Cavadini, John C., Miracles in Jewish and Christian Antiquity: Imagining Truth, Notre Dame 1999; Cotter, Wendy, Miracles in Greco-Roman Antiquity: A Sourcebook for the Study of New Testament Miracle Stories, New York 1999; Daston, Lorraine/Park, Katharine, Wonders and the Order of Nature, 1150–1750, New York 1998; Davis, Richard H. (ed.), Images, Miracles, and Authority in Asian Religious Traditions, Boulder 1998; Harline, Craig, Miracles at the Jesus Oak: Histories of the Supernatural in Reformation Europe, New York etc. 2003; Kee, Howard Clark, Medicine, Miracle and Magic in New Testament Times, Cambridge 1986; Mullin, Robert Bruce, Miracles and the Modern Religious Imagination, New Haven 1996.

→ Criticism of Religion, Nature, Relics (Veneration of), Symbol/Sign/Gesture, Veneration of the Saints

Christoph Auffarth

Mission

1. Mission Impossible (USA, 1996; direction, Brian De Palma)—a film on a troop of agents on a reprisal 'mission'; MISSION—cosmetic lozenges from Vichy; The Sojourner Mission (of the little Martian robot). 'Mission' has many meanings today—all except that of a 'sending.'

'Sending' would be the literal translation of the Latin word missio. With respect to Christian mission, the term derives from the words of Jesus in Matt 28:18-20. While the word 'mission' itself does not occur in the biblical

The words 'Buddhism' and 'mission' are not often mentioned in the same breath. This stand at the Colombo airport in Sri Lanka seeks to attract the attention of travelers with mottos running across the top of the booth. A monk is available for information, in Hindi, Tamil, English, and sometimes other languages. Contributions to cover printing costs are gladly received. Not a few tourists come to Sri Lanka for the sake of an acquaintance with a Buddhist culture. True, it usually contradicts the self-image of modern Buddhists to 'missionize' without it being requested of them. After the model of their founder, Buddhists usually leave the first step to interested parties. The airport booth represents a somewhat more aggressive step on their part. (Kirsten Holzapfel) text, it stands in Luther's Bible in several headings, as over Matthew's text in the last chapter of that gospel, just cited—the missionary commandment or order. That phrase sounds military, and, as we know, missionaries often enough conducted themselves just as if they had been wild troops of the Lord on a campaign of reprisal against paganism. Mission and European colonial expansion are closely tied. It is a matter of good tone, and politically correct, to cite mission and → colonialism in the same breath, and this gives the word a negative connotation. Mission today invariably conjures up associations like hunger for power, the annihilation of religions, the destruction of cultures. And indeed, Christianity has often enough contributed to the collapse of cultures in its battles against other religions and systems of belief. Christian 'mission' has therefore become a buzzword with the public. Of course, as the history of mission is scarcely only a history of saints, "just as little is it a history of naïve or evil persons who colonized souls so that the imperialists might have an easy time of it."[1]

Theology of Mission Today

2. If we first consider the Christian exposition of the call to mission, we are struck by the fact that the emphasis is on the biblical foundation of the eschatological meaning of the Cross and Resurrection. Mission is intended to convince, rather than force, by way of communication, in reliance on the healing power of the Gospel. Mission is preaching, instruction, medical attention, irrigation, and farming. It is neither the raw propagandizing of that which is Christian, nor the exclusive foundation and organization of the Church among non-Christians. The modern understanding of mission means "neither putting down other beliefs and convictions, nor making absolutist claims, nor bringing a 'higher culture.' Instead, mission attests the Gospel, and trusts that its power will prove itself healing and salvific in each given context."[2]

A Historical Example: the Canadian Jesuit Mission in the Seventeenth Century

3. If we turn away, for once, from the horrible deeds of mission in the South America of the Conquista, and direct our gaze to the missionary activity of the → Jesuits in the seventeenth century in Canada, we are struck by the fact that the modern understanding of communicative mission has early roots and problems. The Jesuits, who emerged from Montreal in 1625, and gained increasing influence in the region of the Hurons, were at first not understood by the Indians as representatives of a superior colonial power—here we see the difference in cultural contact with nomadic peoples on the one side, and peoples with developed states on the other. The missionaries sought out the tribes in their forests, as they were not to be reached through a local, centrally organized mission station. An important presupposition for this kind of missionary contact was the learning of the language. The Jesuits early recognized that serious attempts to convert this Indian people would have to be made in a context of a control of their idiom. Now, it was unproblematic for them to make themselves adequately understood in many areas of daily life; but it was another matter to convey an understanding of the conceptions of Christian faith. It turned out to be impossible to communicate abstract concepts of the dogmatic teaching of the faith such as → guilt, → sin, or grace. There was no other way out of this dilemma: as often happened elsewhere, the children of the 'heathen' would have to be taken from their families by force, and reared completely as Europeans, so that they would now be assimilated culturally as well as intellectually. The Jesuit missionaries in Canada opposed this attempt to broaden the religious mission to a cultural one (mission civilisatrice, Fr., 'civilizing mission'). Thus, they restricted their work of conversion to a series of formal acts, such as baptism, communion, or confession.[3] Their attempt at a communicative proclamation of the Word failed. Now the Jesuits could only share their presence with persons who approached, in the simplicity of their customs, the ascetic ideals of the Order. But does not this outcome ultimately turn the missionary situation upside down?

4. While the early missionaries were still sent into the world as pioneers of the faith, and became leading figures in the young churches that later arose, they understand themselves today as temporary helpers and experts, who take up their activity at the invitation of particular churches. This change also reflects a transformed understanding of mission, which today is tied into the overarching structure of help with development. To some extent, modern mission theologians today even ask what they can learn, with respect to the rapid increase of non-Christians, regarding evangelization in their own country from their 'brothers and sisters' abroad.

Missionary Science

5. Missionary science—usually part of systematic or practical theology—understands itself as scholarly reflection on and assistance to the encounter of the Church with persons who are foreign from a religious and cultural viewpoint. Settled in the framework of Evangelical theology, it is a very recent science, introduced as an independent discipline by Gustav Warneck (1834–1910). Warneck was the first to hold the chair of this branch of theology, beginning in 1896, in Halle (Germany).

1. Günther, Wolfgang, "Auf den Ausdruck Mission verzichten?," in: Gemeindedienst für Mission & Ökomene (Internet publication of the Evangelisch-lutherisches Missionswerk in Niedersachsen), 1997, see http://bs.cyty.com/elmbs/guenther.htm (accessed August 2005).
2. Ibid.
3. Bitterli 1976, 113ff.

Literature

Ariel, Yaakov, Evangelizing the Chosen People: Missions to the Jews in 1880–2000, Chapel Hill 2000; Bitterli, Urs, Die 'Wilden' und die 'Zivilisierten'. Grundzüge einer Geistes- und Kulturgeschichte der europäisch-überseeischen Begegnung, Munich 1976; Idem, Cultures in Conflict: Encounters between European and Non-European Cultures, 1492–1800, Stanford 1989; Brandewie, Ernest, In the Light of the World: Divine Word Missionaries of North America, Maryknoll 2000; Greer, Allan (ed.), The Jesuit Relations: Natives and Missionaries in Seventeenth-Century North America, New York 2000; Neill, Stephen, A History of Christian Missions, Harmondsworth [2]1990.

→ Christianity, Colonialism I and II, Jesuits

Gerhard Schlatter

Modernity / Modern Age

Determination of Concept and Contexts

1. As a neologism derived from the adjective 'modern' (Middle Latin, modernus, 'new,' from modo, 'right now'), 'modernity,' became a broadly familiar catchword around 1900 for avant-garde revolutions in literature (applied to naturalism by Ernst Wolff in 1886, and broadened by Hermann Bahr in 1890 to include the post-naturalistic currents) and art as an expression of an epochal new departure. Moderne (Ger., 'Modernity') was listed in the Brockhaus dictionary as early as 1902, as an "embodiment of the most recent social, literary, and artistic directions" (vol. 11, 952). In recent decades, it is true, 'modernity' is still applied as a term for aesthetic efforts at innovation, but it has predominantly had another career: stimulated by the discourse of sociology, philosophy, and historical theory, it serves as a concept for the macro-period marked by the effect of 'enlightened' thinking. In Europe and America, this period can be reckoned as beginning in the second half of the eighteenth century, with the industrial and French revolutions as the epochal events. Chief characteristics that are emphasized are autonomous reason, operating in the end-means calculation as motive force for scientific technological progress, and the accompanying social conversion: a 'progressive,' expansive → industrial society, a growing 'democratization,' social differences diminishing or becoming 'finer' (P. Bourdieu), extended education opportunities, a dwindling importance for traditional ecclesiality, new autonomy in individuals, and modernizations in lifestyle. A withdrawal can be observed from the older, and more recent, optimism of an unstoppable improvement of the human being and the world by way of a Western, 'civilized' use of reason (as continued in the earlier American modernization theories). Today the emphasis is rather on the paradoxes of complex, coexisting processes of transformation, for example with respect to the dimensions of differentiation, rationalization, individualization, and 'domestication' (Hans van der Loo and Willem van Reijen). The limits of 'instrumental' reason are demonstrated by ecological risks, growing social inequality, and persistent military threats.

Religion between 'For' and 'Against'

2. In the face of the undifferentiated use of the umbrella concept of the 'modern age,' a warning must be offered vis-à-vis certain semantic divisions—against the inflation of an emphatic Pro and a belligerent Contra. This caution is important precisely with respect to the religions, where an enmity to modernity across the board continues to obtain, often with a biting attachment to the 'divine truth' of key religious propositions, and resistance to 'libertine' thought and action. This stance is accompanied by a continuing acceptance of particular modernizations in (industrial) society—'yes' to technological progress, 'no' to sexual emancipation. Modern civilization's understanding of science and the world, the emergence of an 'obstinate' use of reason, individual autonomy, and subjective competence in activity, did indeed often provoke religious communities to a 'yes or no'—thoroughly discussed in recent debates in → fundamentalism—but was also frequently integrated into delicate and painful processes. The (fearful? fruitful?) interlacings and reciprocal effects of Christianity and the modern age have been too long considered only under the aspect of 'secularization' ('worldlification'), with the accent on the diminishing influence of traditional ecclesiality.

Protestantism

→ Protestantism is still regarded as the forerunner and motive force of modernity. From the viewpoint of the history of culture, effective impulses are being exposed:

- Luther's theology as a presupposition of → Enlightenment thought (most thinkers of the Enlightenment represented a moderate deism);
- The Calvinist teaching of predestination, as the basis for a professional ethic marked by an inner-worldly asceticism, became the constitutive component of the modern capitalist spirit and of modern culture (Max → Weber's thesis; → European History of Religion).
- Biblical exegesis in the form of historical criticism, in Protestant theology, reaching Rudolf Bultmann's concept of 'demythologization.'

But the relationship of Protestantism to the modern age spans a spectrum from broad acceptance (often subsumed under the concept of a 'cultural Protestantism'), to a predominantly 'productive relation of tension' (J. Viering), to 'fundamentalistic' opposition (especially virulent in the United States, whence fundamentalism has its name, in revival movements, and in evangelicalism).

Catholicism

The negative relationship of Catholicism to the modern age is often explained in terms of the neo-Scholastic anti-modernism of Pius X, who in 1907 published a new catalogue of modernism's 'errors' (the decree Lamentabili Sane Exitu, complemented by the encyclical Pascendi Dominici Gregis, where 'modernism,' 'agnosticism,' 'immanentism,' and an unrestrained search for reform are reproached). Thus, modernism belongs to a 'Catholic Enlightenment,' to whose currents belong, among others, reform Catholicism, liberal, and leftist Catholicism, which were concerned for a (partial) rapprochement with the modern age, and, to a certain extent, issued in the aggiornamento of the Second Vatican Council.

Non-Christian Religions

The relationship of the non-Christian religions to the conspicuous aspects of 'modernity' spans, since the first encounters with the phenomenal forms of 'Western' modernity, a spectrum reaching from enthusiastic acceptance of 'modernity,' and a radical departure from religious tradition(s), to a → reception of certain elements in an appeal to their own non-Christian roots (e.g., reform Hinduism, with its appeal to the Vedas in the reform communities of the Brahma Samaj and Arya Samaj), to a 'fundamentalistic' rejection and opposition.

Postmodernity—End of the Modern Age?

3. A series of complete changeovers in the second half of the twentieth century are interpreted as foundations of a new era, often labeled 'postmodern' or 'postindustrial.' Among them fall the revolutionary impetuses of scientific and technological, communicational, and epistemological turns. Catchwords include the revolutionary impetus of informational and genetic technology, 'reflexive' modernization, radicalized turns of 'individualization' and 'pluralization,' and farewell to the 'grand narratives,' with a transition to a plurality of heterogeneous linguistic play. Another will be a distancing from modernity's aesthetic experiments in favor of a double codification—of elite vs. popular—and an extreme pluralism of style. It is disputed whether, at the turn of the twenty-first century, certain basic patterns of the modern age are (should be) thrust forward and radically extended, or whether we have reached an 'end of the modern age.'

Literature

Delanty, Gerard, Social Theory in a Changing World: Conceptions of Modernity, Cambridge 1999; Eisenstadt, Shmuel N., Comparative Civilizations and Multiple Modernities, 2 vols., Leiden 2003; Idem (ed.), Multiple Modernities, New Brunswick 2002; Gumbrecht, Hans Ulrich, "Modern, Modernität, Moderne," in: Geschichtliche Grundbegriffe 4 (1978), 93-131; Habermas, Jürgen, The Philosophical Discourse of Modernity: Twelve Lectures, Cambridge 1987; Sachsenmaier, Dominic et al. (eds.), Reflections on Multiple Modernities: European, Chinese and Other Interpretations, Leiden 2002; Turner, Bryan S., Theories of Modernity and Postmodernity, London 1990; Van der Loo, Hans/Van Reijen, Willem, Paradoxen van modernisering: een social-wetenschappelijke benadering, Bussum [3]1997; Wehler, Hans-Ulrich, Modernisierungstheorie und Geschichte, Göttingen 1975.

→ Disenchantment/Reenchantment, Enlightenment, Fundamentalism, History, Industrial Society, Postmodernity

Michael Klöcker

Monarchy / Royalty

Fascination with Another World

Although functioning monarchies are very rare, the lives of royal families keep fascinating people. Even when royalty are the objects of scandal, they are regarded with a certain envy. We tend to project our dreams of an ideal life onto royal families. Whatever their lapses, they remain idols, as did Lady Diana, estranged wife of the heir to the British throne, who was fondly remembered as the 'Queen of Hearts' after her fatal accident in 1997.

Sacredness of the King or Queen

In modern societies with democratic institutions, the death of the head of state may be an emotional event, but the citizens all know that his or her position will be filled by someone else according to certain set protocols within a short time and the work of the state will go on. However, in monarchical societies, the death of the king or queen calls the entire social order into question and constitutes a trauma to the entire group. Anxiety on this count is the source of the tradition of wishing long life to the king or queen and the abhorrence of regicide.

One way in which societies of this type 'protect' their monarchs from instability or death is through myths about how God protects the 'sacred' king of queen. Such myths also distance the monarch from everyday political problems and encourage the view of the monarch as exceptional. This same purpose could also be served by religious legitimation of the monarch's coronation, for example by the Pope—an act, which was often a dearly purchased condition for effective rule for the German emperors.

Insignia and Gestures of Reverence

The holiness of the king or queen is made visible by way of external signs such as wearing a crown, sitting on a throne, being surrounded with mighty beasts, impressing the public with monumental architecture, and maintaining distance from others by means of stairs or other persons positioned between the throne and the 'audience' (→ Symbol/Sign/Gesture). Certain gestures are also used to demonstrate reverence for the monarch, such as kissing the feet, bowing, and gift-giving.

In many cases the signs and gestures rendered to the king or queen are the same as those rendered to God, so that an identification of the two is encouraged. God is portrayed as a king, holding the globe of the earth, guaranteeing the life of his whole people with his own life, while the earthly king is treated as if he were omniscient and almighty.

Kings have sometimes invented their own sets of gestures and insignia to portray themselves to their subjects. One favorite image is to identify oneself with the sun, although the well-known case of the French 'Sun King' is probably highly exaggerated.

The holiness of the king has also sometimes been supported through claims to divine power. For example, French kings claimed that their coronation conferred the ability to cure a certain skin disease—scrofula, which became known as 'the king's evil.' Each court historian's report between the eleventh and the nineteenth centuries heaped further pressure on the following kings, who knew they must show an ability to heal diseases, but often could not. The problem was solved by granting supplicants alms, rather than healing. The association of monarchy with holiness was maintained as long as the early → Middle Ages, however, when only kings and nobles could be declared saints.

The Waiting King

The discrepancy between exalted religious claims and human frailty, between → charisma and incompetence, between plans for reform and premature death, can cause disillusionment with actual kings during their reign, and provoke a thirst for the return of a mythologized king from the past who constitutes a transpersonal → collective representation. This legendary king is believed to be waiting, hidden across the sea or on a mountain, for the fated moment.

There are several historical examples of this phenomenon. In Jewish apocalyptic literature, the last mighty king lies where he fell in battle, on Mount Megiddo (Hebr., Har Megeddon; cf. Rev 16:16). German sagas of the Empire tell of King Frederick hidden and waiting in the Kyffhäuser, who, in keeping with his name (Fried 'peace,' Reich, 'empire') will return to rule the Empire of Peace. Even the Catholic clergy nurture dreams of an 'Angel Pope.' The Islamic Shiites await the hidden Imam Mahdi who will combine religious authority with the might of rule and government (→ Iran). The apocalyptic Messianic expectations of the religions of the Near East may be seen as the background or motive of many of these legends (→ Apocalypse), which may be both projected into the beyond or used for real political power. Other cultures as well have similar myths, which act as a bulwark against despair.

Sacred Realm and Sacred Rule

The sacralization of rule through the sanctification of the king has also played an important role in the theory of how religion emerges. Taking as his point of departure a rather curious report from Roman antiquity, James George Frazer (1854–1941) saw the beginning of belief in God in the deification of the king. The Roman myth of the golden bough reports that kings in Aricia were each chosen for only one year, at the end of which they would fight and lose a deadly battle with their successor. Accordingly, only slaves could become kings, as they were the only people who could be put forward for human sacrifice, which in this society was part of being the king. This rite, according to Frazer, is a 'survival' of an earlier time and spread across the world. Frazer held that the 'primitives' still had a sense of natural realities, of cause and effect, which they sought to exploit through magic, while people of the 'intermediate era' sank into the illusion of religion. This degeneration was vitally linked to the institution of kingship, according to Frazer. The theory is that deceased kings were exploited by priests and made into tyrannical monarchs or gods, which served to preserve the priests' own power. Although his writings on the religious aspect of kingship in various cultures are interesting, his views have been criticized for their basis in a gross oversimplification of religion and for the assumption that religion is illusory (see Smith 1978).

Sacred monarchy can more accurately be understood as a type of governing institution. It is by no means a universal stage in the 'development' of culture. Other forms of government can exist in cultures of similar age and neighboring regions, while sacred monarchy can still be found in Africa today.

Typical elements of sacred monarchy are: (1) derivation from a line of ancestors extending back to an original mother goddess; (2) limited power on the part of secular authorities whose work is construed as the terrestrial portion of a monarchical rule which embraces the whole cosmos; (3) protection and ritual testing of the seed for the next crop in cases where an agricultural society must fear for its material well-being. One can also say of sacred monarchy in general that it serves to protect the whole people from the threat of destruction, as long as this function is not undertaken by other → collective representations. When the role of the king is even partially desacralized, the acceptance of the necessity of monarchy for the protection of the people disappears, but can be re-established through increasing (re-)sacralizaton.

Literature

Ackerman, Robert, J. G. Frazer, Cambridge 1987; Auffarth, Christoph, "Königtum, Sakrales", in: Handbuch religionswissenschaftlicher Grundbegriffe 3 (1990), 386-389; Bloch, Marc, The Royal Touch, London 1973; Burke, Peter, The Fabrication of Louis XIV, New Haven 1992; Evans, Michael, The Death of Kings in Medieval England, Hambledon 2003; Frazer, James George, The Golden Bough, 13 vols., London 1911–1915; Laubscher, Matthias, "Religiöse Modelle von Staatenbildung," in: Gladigow, Burkhard (ed.), Staat und Religon, Düsseldorf 1981, 23-52; LeGoff, Jacques, Saint Louis, Paris 1996; Raulff, Ulrich, Ein Historiker im 20. Jahrhundert: Marc Bloch, Frankfurt/M. 1995; Smith, Jonathan Z., "When the Bough Breaks," in: Idem, Map Is Not Territory, Chicago 1978, 208-239.

→ Charisma, Democracy, Government/Rule/Politics/State, Papacy, Theocracy

Christoph Auffarth

Monasticism

Monastic Life

1. Monks (from Gk., monachos, 'one who lives alone' or 'lives unusually') and nuns (from Lat., nonna, 'nun,' originally from 'baby talk' for a child's nurse) are religious → specialists in the framework of a social environment that belongs to the same religion. They usually cultivate a community life in poverty, obedience, and sexual abstinence. Monks and nuns live their religion radically, and are highly regarded for this lifestyle by society, which often contributes to their material maintenance. This last is true especially for hermits (from Greek, eremos, 'solitary,' 'alone'), who withdraw, either by themselves or in colonies, into uninhabited regions. Monastic existence serves the individual seeking religious 'perfection' (i.e., a gradual or step-by-step 'perfecting'), and the effect on other persons is secondary; the decision to adopt this way of life is usually voluntary. Involvement in non-religious activity ranges from full renunciation of physical → work, and acceptance of maintenance by outsiders even for elementary needs, to master artisanry in even secular economic pursuits. Although monks almost always have contact with their human environment, they have a special role in society. They emphasize their role by special attire, style of hair and/or beard, rites of initiation (frequently with a name change), renunciation of material things, and a specific behavior regulating relations with the laity. The life of a monk is nearly always preceded by a period of trial (the 'noviceship,' or 'novitiate'). Violations of the rules are punished by the imposition of a penance—according to a fixed catalogue—or even, in certain circumstances, by total exclusion from the community. In nearly all religions, monks and nuns are the vehicles of → mysticism.

Christianity

2. The hermits and monks of the East (Egypt, Syria, Palestine), first mentioned in the third century, stand at the origin of Christian monasticism.

At the foot of the Buddhist sanctuary in Bodhnath (Katmandu/ Nepal), two Tibetan monks perform acts of Tantric cult before a divine image. Their textbook is a ritual manual (tantra) that consists of a sheaf of unbound oblong sheets kept tied up in cloth. In Tantra, the application of cultic formulae (mantra) and various sacred objects (a diamond scepter, bells, butter lamps, vessels of rice, etc.) is established with miniscule precision. It is less a matter of honoring a god than of a meditation, at which the contradictions of the phenomenal world are to be vanquished through the symbolism of the sacred objects, and by spiritual amalgamation with the divine image. Thus, the diamond scepter (vajra) symbolizes the male principle, and the bells (ghānta) the female, which the Buddha of Origin (Vajradhāra) of Tibetan Buddhism (Vajrayāna) joins in himself as representative of the redemption. (Elmar Stapelfeldt)

They justified their lifestyle as the imitation of Christ, which they saw in flight from the world and the overcoming of worldly needs. They were the contrast to, and model of, the early Christian communities. Eremitism soon became a movement, leading to the establishment of cenobite (from Gk., koinos bios, 'common life') communities. Monks living as hermits are today more of an exception.

One of the earliest monastic communities was that of Egyptian Pachomius (d. 347), who was the first to formulate rules for monastic life: common abode, work, and prayer, uniformity in food and clothing, and a strict ascetical behavior. With the seventh-century Islamic conquest of the Near East, monastic life in that region disappeared almost entirely. In the Eastern Roman Empire, on the other hand, Christian monasticism gradually spread. Powerful large monasteries, from Greece to Russia, became political, cultural, and economic centers, as, to an extent, they still are today. The Rule of Benedict of Nursia, founder of the Christian Benedictine order, composed around 540 and named for him, became the model for many monastic communities in the West, which gradually organized into → orders, named for their founders or places of foundation.

In the seventh century, by reason of its multiple relationships to royalty and to the nobility, monasticism became an important force in all areas of social and administrative life. From the beginning of the ninth century, orders originally conceived as lay communities gradually became clerical ones, actively concerned with theological matters. Monasteries became the medieval centers of spirituality and culture (libraries, translations, architecture, education of the nobility). By reason of their discipline, and the specialization of their monks in their proficiencies, orders active in the economy (e.g., the Cistercians) attained unanticipated influence and effectiveness. Although monks are expected to live in poverty personally, certain monasteries amassed enormous wealth. Criticism of this 'secularization' and command on the part of the monasteries in general, and those of the Roman church especially, extended throughout the Middle Ages up to modern times. Reformer Martin → Luther, an Augustinian monk, notably joined his criticism to a rejection of justification by works. True, he made room for a monastic life (without 'perpetual vows') as an occupation or calling, which have made Protestant monastic orders possible in the middle of the twentieth century.

The classic Catholic orders continued to exist after the Reformation, while, in Protestant regions, monasticism fell off almost completely. The → Jesuit Order, founded (1534) in a framework of the Counter-Reformation, by Ignatius Loyola, who was especially close to the popes, became Catholicism's intellectual elite. Under Napoleon, and in the time after 1815, monastic orders were suppressed, and all activity was forbidden them, or restricted to works of charity. Throughout almost all Europe, absolutist rulers dissolved the monasteries. But a revival, and renewed expansion, began as early as the nineteenth century, and still prevails. At present, monastic movements are active in many Christian confessions. Their spectrum extends from efforts to return to ancient Christian eremitism (Monastery of Mount Athos in Greece), to world-oriented movements with ecumenical purposes and a strong participation on the part of the laity (Taizé).

Buddhism, Jainism, Islam

3. In Buddhism and Jainism, monks exercise more of a key role than they do in Christianity. They are often the only specialists ('priest monks') that can satisfy believers' religious needs. Characteristic forms of the monastic life range from that of the ascetic mendicant and itinerant monk in → India, to that of temporary entry into a monastery as a stage in the life of a male, to the formation of monastic states (e.g., → Tibet). Monasteries are either materially compensated for their religious services (Japan), or maintained by lay societies affiliated with them. Even today, the monasteries of Burma and Thailand are central locations for the preservation of tradition and culture. In Islam, the Sufi brotherhoods cultivate a lifestyle that is most comparable to monastic ideals (→ Sufism). Sufis constitute a marginal group, practicing or inclined to mysticism, and are often regarded with mistrust by orthodoxy. Replacing the tendency to a bureaucratic organizational monastic form in other religions, Sufism is governed by a → master-pupil relationship.

Literature

Caner, Daniel, Wandering, Begging Monks: Spiritual Authority and the Promotion of Monasticism in Late Antiquity, Berkeley 2002; Johnston, William M. (ed.), Encyclopedia of Monasticism, 2 vols., Chicago 2000; King, Peter, Western Monasticism: A History of the Monastic Movement in the Latin Church, Kalamazoo 1999; Rousseau, Philip, Pachomius: The Making of a Community in Fourth-Century Egypt, Berkeley 1999 ([1]1985); Schwaiger, G. (ed.), Mönchtum, Orden, Klöster. Von den Anfängen bis zur Gegenwart. Ein Lexikon, Munich [2]1994.

→ Asceticism, Buddhism, Order/Brotherhoods, Mysticism, Specialists (Religious), Sufism

Stefan Rademacher

Money

1. Money is still a scientifically disputed phenomenon, and it has no generally recognized definition. Etymological derivations of the names of various kinds of money indicate cattle as an original unit of value (e.g., Lat., pecunia, from pecus, 'cow'), and thus the sacred origin of money as a substitute for the sacrifice of a bull, which was pictured on the coin. This possible origin, with its magical and mythical associations, can scarcely be recognized any longer in modern money, which has become an economic category and instrument of developed rationality. In the economic theory of money, with its value concepts, money seems to be an unproblematic technical facilitation of the exchange of goods. In other social sciences, however, money is viewed problematically, in the holistic societal context, as conditioned by culture and as altering culture.

Monetary Theory

2. Three groups of monetary theories can be considered as explicating this element of the economy. (a) Theories of money as goods: here, monies are primarily considered as goods of value (for example, gold, coins; 'metallism,' as early as Aristotle; classic economists since Locke, Marx, and others); (b) theories of convention and nominalism: monies are regarded as signs, having no intrinsic value, and accorded conventional value by agreement or by state decree (as early as Plato, Thomas Aquinas; also Locke; in the twentieth century, Knapp, for example); (c) functional theories: the value of money is that of a means of exchange, of a means for the preservation of other, intrinsic values, and as satisfying the need for liquidity in a market economy (Smith). Ethnological investigations into extra-European forms of money, such as feather money (e.g., Oceania), stone money (Micronesia), seashells (e.g., snail shells; Africa, China, India) relativize explanatory concepts in terms of the economy. Functions of money as a means of exchange and a norm of value are today rejected by economic ethnology as ethnocentric errors, as they veil the political nature of money.

Today it is the function of payment that is seen as money's primary function. Money originated within state communities, not in (international) trade. Archaic means of payment are still used today, in the persistence of a non-economic debt between transaction partners—which obligation, however, is regarded as a positive social one, and which contributes to the reproduction of a community of solidarity (H. Znoj). The obligation rests on status, → prestige, kinship, or political authority, and is sacralized and sanctioned by an imbedding in sacred ceremonies, ritual laws, and magic. This 'relationship of obligation' determines pre-state → exchange of gifts, as well.

In modern monetary conventions, on the other hand, transactions remove debt. Socialization ensues upon the state institution of the central bank. Accordingly, it is not acts of exchange, but relations of debt that found the function of money, as well as possibly indicating the religious origin of the banking system.

3. Economic research into the emergence of money substantiates its origin in the form of circulating gold and silver coins around 600 BCE in Greece. The development of money is seen in connection with the emergence of states, of trade, of a social division of labor, and of capitalism (Marx, Simmel). Laum (1924), who explains the development of money as tied to the sacrificial duties of public worship in Greece, sees the first form of money in the sacrifice of worship, the sacred exchange between God and human beings. Considered in the overall societal context, however, a religious meaning of money shows that it is not a matter of an inherent religious attribute. Instead, the religious quality of money lies in the sacrificial ritual, and social obligations. Marx, in his analysis of capitalism (1867), understands money as a modern fetish, that has become independent—that has developed a power of its own over human beings. The Marxian critique of the money fetish was then broadened to a general theory of understanding (Adorno and Horkheimer, Sohn-Rethel, Müller). According to Adorno, the fundamental principles of abstract thought are an expression of that anonymous manner of organization of societal labor in which money, and finally, capital, is produced by way of exchange. Psychoanalytic research (Freud, Roheim, Abraham) sees a connection between money and psychic structure, and sees money as a substitute for feces. The infantile exchange between mother's milk and the child's feces stands as a prototype for exchange, for the relationship between goods and money, and for the multiplication of capital (W. Harsch).

4. The fetishization of money, reflected in the history of the critique of money, has its roots in antiquity, and became a fast component of Christian teaching. The social opposition of poverty and wealth is ethicized in the Bible, where material need stands over against the spiritual wealth of the poor. The moral renunciation of money was not transferred to the Jews, who were not affected by the Church's prohibition of usury (→ Interest), and who thereby came to be seen as the main representatives of the monetary system, and later of capitalism (→ Anti-Semitism).

In non-Western religious traditions, money is not the object of this open stigmatization. It is introduced in religious sacrificial rituals (→ Sacrifice), for example as a kind of 'afterlife currency' in the veneration of the dead: in China, a seashell is laid in the mouth of the corpse. Frequently, monetary objects are used exclusively in religious sacrifice, so that religious paper money produced explicitly for ritual purposes is without purchasing power in China and Southeast Asia.

Literature

Adorno, Theodor W./Horkheimer, Max, Dialectic of Enlightenment, New York 1972 (German [1]1946); Harsch, Wolfgang, Die psychoanalytische Geldtheorie, Frankfurt/M. 1995; Laum, B., Heiliges Geld. Eine historische Untersuchung über den sakralen Ursprung des Geldes, Tübingen 1924; Ingham, Geoffrey, The Nature of Money, Cambridge 2004; Marx, Karl, Capital: A Critique of Political Economy, 3 vols., New York 1977 (German [1]1867); Needleman, Jacob, Money and the Meaning of Life, New York 1991; Schelke, Waltraud/Nitsch, Manfred (eds.), Rätsel Geld. Annäherungen aus ökonomischer, soziologischer und historischer Sicht, Marburg 1995; Sedillot, René, All the Monies of the World: A Chronicle of Currency Values, New York 1971 (French [1]1955); Znoj, Heinzpeter, Tausch und Geld in Zentralsumatra. Zur Kritik des Schuldbegriffes in der Wirtschaftsethnologie, Berlin 1995.

→ Capitalism, Economy, Exchange/Gift, Interest, Poverty, Sacrifice

Karin Kathöfer

Monotheism

1. Monotheistic conceptions of God, whose point of departure is the existence and activity of one God, have dominated the religious understanding of Christian and post-Christian Europe for long centuries. In view of the multiplicity of other, especially polytheistic, religions, however, which premise a plurality of deities, monotheistic forms present a special case in religious history. They are not actually what seems from the Western standpoint to be the obviously 'normal' one. The current situation in Europe and North America posits this state of affairs impressively. In the 1970s, the increase in the number of departures from the Church could perhaps still be the subject of the debate over 'secularization,' and interpreted as the basic question of the future of religion (what was meant, naturally, was the future of Christianity!); in the meantime, however, the popularity of a plethora of → new religions has documented a broad spectrum of the most varied notions of gods, goddesses, and other beings understood as supernatural. The monotheistic religions of Judaism and Christianity have been stable for centuries in Europe, and Islam has become very important in terms of numbers since the migration movements of the 1960s and 1970s. These three traditions therefore mark not a plural, but only a predominantly monotheistic religious landscape. But in the meantime they do present part of a many-faceted constellation of religious currents themselves, within which monotheism no longer even comes close to being the only and obvious option for notions of God. To boot, the deduction of universally valid ethical norms from the notion of a creation produced by the one God, whose continuation or perfection this God has committed to the co-responsibility of the human being (→ Cosmology/Cosmogony), is seldom characteristic of new religious movements. The shift of the overall religious constellation in the West has already had clear practical effects on society, by way of this manner of alteration of moral conceptions and of foundations of behavioral maxims.

History of the Concept

2. The word 'monotheism' is a neologism, first found (1660) with English philosopher Henry More. It began as a contrasting concept to the already rediscovered (by Jean Bodin, 1580) term 'polytheism,' which originally goes back to Philo of Alexandria. Bodin then used the word 'polytheism' to characterize the European tradition. Subsequently, 'monotheism' was introduced, in discussion and speculation in the history of religions in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, for the subject of the origin of belief in God. From then on, the emergence of monotheism was explained in either of two ways. One explanation consisted of the framework of evolutionistic models—that is, as the apex of a two- or more-membered chain of development (e.g., animism/totemism/fetishism to polytheism to monotheism; see → Evolutionism). The other explanation diagnosed it in a model running in the opposite direction, the 'decadence theory,' where primitive monotheism would have been the original religious situation of humanity—gradually being lost, however, by reason of human weakness, or else being corrupted into polytheism by the interests of power politics.

Both theoretical constructs were bound to a frankly higher estimation of monotheism vis-à-vis other forms of religion. This estimate, again, had considerable effect on (mainly theological) ordering and discussion of historically identifiable forms of monotheistic notions of God. Thus, for example, Jewish and Islamic religious polemics, along with modern European criticism of religion, cast doubt upon the justification of the Christian self-definition as a monotheistic form of religion, with reference to the dogma of the Trinity, and to the veneration of Mary and the saints. In the other direction, Christian theologians conceived the figure of Jesus of Nazareth, interpreted as the Messiah and the Son of God, as the fulfillment, in salvation history, of earlier, Jewish monotheism.

The Historical Roots—Egypt

3. a) This reciprocal relativization of the originality and priority of the other respective concepts of monotheism has therefore become important for the reconstruction of controversial historical connections among distinct monotheistic religions. Thus, one hypothesis held that the roots of biblical monotheism were grounded in the Exodus traditions of the monotheistic revolution of Egyptian Pharaoh Amenophis IV (Akhenaten). Incidentally, the most prominent representative of this model of the interpretation of history seems to have been Sigmund → Freud (Der Mann Moses und die monotheistische Religion; see Freud 1939). At the same time, this theory was seen, by Christian theologians especially, to cast very serious doubt on the independence of the Jewish tradition of monotheism, that would have had no need of such models and catalysts. The point of departure for current research in the religious history of Israel is that monotheistic conceptions of God were the upshot of a centuries-long process of development. Scarcely any importance continues to attach, then, to the assumption that Akhenaten's monotheism was adopted by Moses or other protagonists of the Exodus group in Egypt, and then further transmitted in the 'occupation of the land' in Palestine.

Iran and Zoroastrianism

b) Another example of a problematic construction of historical lines of connection between two religions categorized as monotheistic is the controversy over Iranian influences on biblical monotheism. The historical scenario is the materialization of a great empire, extending from the whole Near East to central Asia, under Achaemenid Cyrus (the Great) and his successors, from perhaps the middle of the sixth century BCE. The occupation of Babylon by the Persians in 539 thus not only signals the end of the trauma of exile for the Jews, and the beginning of a restoration of Jerusalem and the temple, but also implies a reference to various Persian kings in the books of (Second) Isaiah, Ezra, and Nehemiah. This reference is connected there with the motif of the monotheistically worshiped God of heaven. These statements are unambiguously monotheistic, but are referred to the God of Israel and a Jewish perspective. They were then invoked as a key of interpretation for apparently comparable Iranian textual passages. Thus they served as a bolster for the broadly accepted thesis of the monotheistic image of God in the Iranian religion called, after its legendary founder, → Zoroastrianism. Meanwhile, in fact, research on ancient Iran has produced evidence that polytheistic conceptualizations of God are at the basis of the ancient Iranian and Achaemenidean forms of religion. However, as long as the point of departure went according to the pattern of the biblical texts of a Zoroastrian monotheism, this pattern could work in reverse—'discovered' as an amazing analogy for the Jewish understanding of God, and this view seemed only to suggest the question of influences in the history of ideas with respect to demonstrable cultural contact between Jews and Persians in this time. The discussion of this problem of influence accordingly followed the course of similar interests and controversies, such as the debate over the Egyptian origin of biblical monotheism.

In the context of this example, however, there is a piquancy in the remarkable development from polytheistic to monotheistic notions of God traversed by Zoroastrianism—a Zoroastrianism falsely regarded for the Achaemenidean era as an analogy for Judaism—after the Islamization of Iran, and in India, especially since the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, in contact and competition with the Christianity of the British colonizers. Furthermore, the Parsi can be reliably considered ancient monotheists, based on findings in Iranian studies that date their oldest ritual texts, traditionally ascribed to 'prophet' Zarathrustra, in the first, possibly even the second, millennium BCE. Entirely on the pattern of the argumentations observed for the exemplary case of Israel, then, the conclusion can be drawn, without difficulty, from the quite early date of Zoroastrian monotheism, to the greater historical importance and originality of this religion in comparison with competitive religions such as Christianity. In North America and Europe, this recourse to the notion of a good monotheistic creator God of heaven (together with a dualistic concept of ethics and a polished ritual practice) make Zoroastrianism an astonishingly interesting religion for converts—despite the fact that, according to orthodox teaching, conversions to Zoroastrianism are actually forbidden.

Literature

Ahn, Gregor, "'Monotheismus' – 'Polytheismus'. Grenzen und Möglichkeiten einer Klassifikation von Gottesvorstellungen," in: Dietrich, Manfred/Loretz, Oswald (eds.), Mesopotamica – Ugaritica – Biblica. FS Kurt Bergerhof, Kevelaer 1993, 1-24; Assmann, Jan, Moses the Egyptian: The Memory of Egypt in Western Monotheism, Cambridge 1997; Idem, Die Mosaische Unterscheidung oder der Preis des Monotheismus, Munich/Vienna 2003; Athanassiadi, Polymnia/Frede, Michael (eds.), Pagan Monotheism in Late Antiquity, New York 1999; Freud, Sigmund, Moses and Monotheism, London 1939; Kirsch, Jonathan, God Against the Gods: The History of the War between Monotheism and Polytheism, New York 2004; Peters, F. E., The Monotheists: Jews, Christians, and Muslims in Conflict and Competition; volume I: The Peoples of God; volume II: The Words and Will of God, Princeton 2003; Porter, Barbara Nevling (ed.), One God or Many? Concepts of Divinity in the Ancient World, Chebeague 2000; Schwartz, Regina M., The Curse of Cain: The Violent Legacy of Monotheism, Chicago/London 1997; Smith, Mark S., The Origins of Biblical Monotheism: Israel's Polytheistic Background and the Ugaritic Texts, Oxford/London 2001; Stark, Rodney, One True God: Historical Consequences of Monotheism, Princeton 2001; Idem, For the Glory of God: How Monotheism Led to Reformations, Science, Witch-Hunts, and the End of Slavery, Princeton 2003; Stolz, Fritz, Einführung in den biblischen Monotheismus, Darmstadt 1996.

→ Christianity, God/Gods/The Sacred, Egypt, Islam, Judaism, Polytheism, Zoroastrianism

Gregor Ahn

Monument / Memorial Places

Public Commemoration

Monuments and memorial places are sites of public commemoration, understood as a matrix of activity, through which social groups express "a collectively shared knowledge [. . .] of the past, on which a group's sense of unity and individuality is based."[1] The group that organizes the commemoration inherits earlier → meanings attached to the event and site, as well as adding new meanings. Their activity is crucial to the presentation and preservation of commemorative forms and sites. When such groups disperse or disappear, commemoration loses its initial force, and the site may fade away entirely.

Public commemoration is therefore a process with a physical location—a site of remembrance—and a life history. It has an initial, creative phase; followed by a period of institutionalization and routinization. Such markings of the → calendar can last for decades, or be abruptly halted. In most instances, the date and place of commemoration fade away with the passing of the social groups that initiated the practice.

In the modern period, most commemorative events have a spatial representation and a geographical emplotment. Memorials or monuments are places visited on particular times in the calendar. Such dates are usually marked distinctively and separately from the religious calendar. There has been some overlap, though. Armistice Day, November 11, in countries remembering the end of the 1914–1918 war, is close enough to the Catholic feast of All Saints on November 2; in some countries with a large Catholic population, the two days occupy a semi-sacred space of public commemoration. The day marking the end of the Second World War in Europe, May 8, is also the Saint's day of → Joan of Arc. Those engaging in commemorative acts on that day may be addressing the secular celebration or the Catholic one; some celebrate the two together, either in churches, in public places, or in cemeteries.

Commemoration is an act arising out of a conviction, shared by a broad community, that the moment recalled is both significant and informed by a moral message. Moments of national humiliation are rarely commemorated, though here too there are exceptions of a hortatory kind. "Never again" is the hallmark of public commemoration on the Israeli Day of Remembrance for victims of the Nazi persecution of the Jews (→ Palestine/Israel). Where moral doubts persist about a war or public policy, commemorative moments are hard to fix. That is why there is no date commemorating the end of the Algerian War in France, or the end of the Vietnam War in the United States. There was no moral consensus about the nature of the conflict; hence there was no moral consensus about what was being remembered in public, and when was the appropriate time to remember it.[2]

Monuments and Political Power

Much of the scholarly debate about monuments and memorials concerns the extent to which they are instruments of the dominant political elements in a society. One school of opinion emphasizes the usefulness to political elites of public events and sites establishing the legitimacy of their rule.[3] Some such events are observed whoever is in power—witness Bastille Day in France or Independence Day in the United States. But other events are closely tied to the establishment of a new regime and the overthrow of an older one: November 7 was the date in the calendar marking the Bolshevik revolution and establishing the Communist regime in power in Russia. That date symbolized the new order and its challenge to its world-wide enemies. May Day similarly was a moment when labor movements, and Labor parties in power, publicly demonstrated their place in history.

This top-down approach proclaims the significance of commemoration as a grammar of national, imperial or political identity. Anzac Day, April 25, is celebrated as the moment when the Australian nation was born. It commemorates the landing of Australian and New Zealand troops as part of the British-led expeditionary force sent to Turkey in 1915. The fact that the landing was a failure does not diminish the iconic character of the date to Australians. It is the day, they hold, when their nation came of age.[4]

This functionalist interpretation of commemoration has been challenged. A second school of scholarship emphasizes the ways that public commemoration at particular memorial sites has the potential for dominated groups to contest their subordinate status. However much political leaders or their agents try to choreograph commemorative activity, there is much space for subversion or creative interpretation of the official commemorative script. Armistice Day on November 11, was, for different groups, a moment for both the celebration and the denigration of military values. Pacifists announced their message of "Never again" through their presence at commemorative ceremonies; military men used these moments to glorify the profession of arms, and to demonstrate the duty of citizens, if necessary, to give their lives for their country in a future war. The contradictions in these forms of expression on the same day were never resolved.[5]

This alternative interpretation of the political meaning of commemorative activity emphasizes the multi-vocal character of remembrance. From this point of view, there is always a chorus of voices in commemorations; some are louder than others, but they never sound alone. De-centering the history of commemoration ensures that we recognize the regional, local, and idiosyncratic character of such activities.

There is always an element of contestation in the configuration of monuments and memorials. The meaning of the site or object is never fixed, and those whose lives were directly touched by the events surrounding the memorial tend to have a proprietary attitude to it. It is 'their' monument. But what of those without a direct link to the circumstances surrounding the site, or those who use it for their own political advantage? Monuments are sites of negotiation, rarely concluded, between those who mourn in an immediate sense and those who appropriate the site in other ways and for other ends. The building of a memorial at the World Trade Center in New York City after the attacks of 2001 is a case in point.

The Business of Remembering

Commemoration is and always has been a business. Monuments and memorials cost money; require specialists' services; need funding and, over time, re-funding. There are two kinds of expenditure we can trace in the history of commemoration. The first is capital expenditure; the second is recurrent expenditure.

The land for such sites must be purchased; and an appropriate symbolic form must be designed and then constructed in order to focus remembrance activities. The first step may require substantial sums of public money. Private land, especially in urban areas, comes at a premium. Then there are the costs of architects' fees, especially when a public competitive tender is offered inviting proposals from professionals. Finally, once the symbolic form is chosen, it must be constructed out of selected materials and finished according to the architect or artist's designs.

When these projects are national in character, the process of production is in the public eye. National art schools and bodies of 'experts' have to have their say. Standards of 'taste' and 'decorum' are proclaimed. Professional interests and conflicts come into play. Much of this professional infighting is confined to national commemorative projects, but the same complex stepwise procedure occurs on the local level too, this time without the same level of attendant publicity. Local authorities usually take charge of these projects, and local notables can deflect plans towards their own particular visions, whatever public opinion may think about the subject.

Most of the time, public funding covers only part of the costs of commemorative objects. Public subscriptions are critical, especially in Protestant countries where the concept of utilitarian memorials is dominant. In Catholic countries, the notion of a 'useful' memorial is a contradiction in terms; symbolic language and utilitarian language are deemed mutually exclusive. But the Protestant voluntary tradition has it otherwise. In Protestant countries, commemorative projects took many forms, from the sacred to the mundane: in Britain there are memorial wards in hospitals, memorial scholarships in schools and universities, alongside memorial cricket pitches and memorial water troughs for horses. In the United States and in Australia there are memorial highways. The rule of thumb is that private citizens pick up most of the tab for these memorial forms. The state provides subsidies and occasional matching grants, but the money comes out of the pockets of ordinary people. The same is true in Britain with respect to a very widely shared form of public commemoration: the purchase of paper poppies, the symbol of the Lost Generation of the First World War. These poppies are worn on the lapel, and the proceeds of the sale go to aid disabled veterans and their families.

Taxpayers almost always pay for recurrent expenditure for commemorative sites. War cemeteries require masons and gardeners. The Imperial (now Commonwealth) War Graves Commission looks after hundreds of such cemeteries all over the world. The cost of their maintenance is a public charge. Private charities, in particular Christian groups, maintain German war cemeteries. Once constructed, memorial statues, cemeteries, or highways also become public property, and require public support to prevent them from decomposing. They are preserved as sites of commemorative activity.

Much of this activity is directed towards inviting the public to remember in public. The public must therefore be guided towards particular sites of remembrance. Some of them are near their homes. In Britain and France there are war memorials in every city, in every town, and in every village; it is there that Armistice Day ceremonies are held annually. Churches throughout Europe of all denominations have memorial plaques to those who died in war. Special prayers were added to the Jewish prayer book to commemorate the victims of the Nazis in the Second World War, and later, those who died during active service in the Israeli army.

Remembrance in local houses of worship or at war memorials required that the public travel a short distance from their homes to sites of remembrance. But given the scale of losses in the two world wars, and the widely dispersed cemeteries around the world in which lie the remains of millions of such men and women, the business of remembrance also entails international travel. Such voyages start as pilgrimage; many are mixed with tourism.[6] But in either case, there are train and boat journeys to take; hotel rooms to reserve; guides to hire; flowers to lay at graves; trinkets and mementos to purchase. In some places, museums have arisen to tell more of the story the pilgrims have come to hear and to share. There too money is exchanged along with the narratives and the symbols of remembrance.

This mixture of the sacred and the profane is hardly an innovation. It is merely a secular form of the kind of → pilgrimage, for example, that made San Juan de Compostela in Spain the destination of millions of men and women in the middle ages who came to honor the conventionally designated resting place of the remains of one of the original Apostles (→ Santiago de Compostela). Pilgrimage to war cemeteries is public commemoration over long, sometimes very long, distances. In 1999 thousands of Australians made the journey to Gallipoli, on the border between Asia and Europe, to be there for the dawn service on April 25, (as we have already noted) the day of the Anzac landing in 1915. Where does pilgrimage stop and → tourism take over? It is impossible to say, but in all cases, the business of remembrance remains just that—a business.

Ritual

Public commemoration is an activity defined by the gestures and words of those who come together to remember the past. It is rarely the simple reflection of a fixed text, a script rigidly prepared by political leaders determined to fortify their position of power. Inevitably, commemoration overlaps with political conflicts, but it can never be reduced to a simple reflection of power relationships.

There are at least three stages in the history of rituals surrounding public commemoration. The first we have already dealt with: the construction of a commemorative form. But the life history of monuments includes two other levels that need attention. The second is the grounding of ritual action in the calendar, and the routinization of such activities; the third is their transformation or their disappearance as active sites of memory.

One case in point may illustrate this trajectory. The date of July 1, 1916 is not a national holiday in Britain; but it marks the date of the opening of the British offensive on the River Somme, an offensive that symbolized the terrible character of industrial warfare. On that day the British army suffered the highest casualty totals in its history; on that day a volunteer army, and the society that had created it, were introduced to the full terrors of twentieth-century warfare. To this day, groups of people come to the Somme battlefields to mark this day, without national legislation to enable them to do so. Their rituals are locally defined. In France, November 11 is a national holiday, but not in Britain. Legislation codifies activities, the origins and force of which lie on the local level.

Public commemoration flourishes within the orbit of civil society. It is not so vigorous in countries where dictatorships rule; Stalinist Russia smashed civil society to a point that it could not sustain commemorative activity independent of the party and the state.[7] But elsewhere, local associations matter.

And so do families. Commemorative ritual survives when it is inscribed within the rhythms of community and in particular, family life. Public commemoration lasts when it draws on overlaps between national history and family history. Most of those who take the time to engage in the rituals of remembrance bring with them memories of family members touched by these vast events. These family connections enable people born long after wars and revolutions to commemorate them as essential parts of their own lives. For example, children born in the aftermath of the First World War told the story of their family upbringing to grandchildren born sixty or seventy years later. This transmission of childhood memories over two or sometimes three generations gives family stories a power which is translated at times into activity—the activity of remembrance.[8]

This framework of family transmission of narratives about the past is an essential part of public commemoration. It also helps us understand why some commemorative forms are changed or simply fade away. When the link between family life and public commemoration is broken, a powerful prop of remembrance is removed. Then, in a short time, remembrance atrophies and fades away. Public reinforcements may help keep alive the ritual and practice of commemoration. But the event becomes hollow when removed from the myriad small-scale social units that breathed life into it in the first place. At that moment, commemorative sites, monuments and memorial practices can be revived and re-appropriated. The same sites used for one purpose can be used for another. But most of the time, commemorative forms live through their life cycle, and like the rest of us, inevitably fade away.

This natural process of dissolution closes the circle on the life history of monuments and memorials. That cycle arises out of the needs of groups of people to link their lives with salient events in the past. When the particular need vanishes, so does the glue that holds together the social practice of commemoration. Then collective memories fade away.

We have reached, therefore, a quixotic conclusion. Public commemoration through monuments and memorials is both irresistible and unsustainable. Time and again people have come together in public, at particular memorial sites, to seek meaning in vast events in the past and try to relate them to their own smaller networks of social life. These associations are bound to dissolve, to be replaced by other forms, with other needs, and other histories. At that point, the characteristic trajectory of public commemoration—creation, institutionalization, and decomposition—comes to an end.

1. Assmann, Jan, "Collective Memory and Cultural Identity," in: New German Critique 65 (Summer 1995), 125-134, quotation p. 132.
2. Prost, Antoine, "The Algerian War in French collective memory," in: Winter/Sivan 1999, 161-176.
3. Nora 1984–1992.
4. Inglis, Ken, "World War One Memorials in Australia," in: Guerres mondiales et conflits contemporains 167 (1992), 51-58.
5. Gregory 1994; Winter 1999.
6. Lloyd 1998.
7. Merridale, Catherine, "War, Death and Remembrance in Soviet Russia," in: Winter/Sivan 1999, 61-83.
8. Winter, Jay/Sivan, Emmanuel, "Setting the framework," in: Winter/Sivan 1999, 1-40.

Literature

Gregory, Adrian, The Silence of Memory, Leamington Spa 1994; Lloyd, David, Battlefield Tourism: Pilgrimage and the Commemoration of the Great War in Britain, Australia and Canada, 1919–1939, Oxford 1998; Hoffmann, Detlef (ed.), Das Gedächtnis der Dinge: KZ-Relikte und KZ-Denkmäler 1945–1995, Frankfurt/M. 1998; Koselleck, Reinhart/ Jeismann, Michael (eds.), Der politische Totenkult: Kriegerdenkmäler in der Moderne, Munich 1994; Linenthal, Edward T., "Locating Holocaust Memory: The United States Holocaust Memorial Museum," in: Chidester, David/Linenthal, Edward T. (eds.), American Sacred Space, Bloomington/Indianapolis 1995, 220-261; Nora, Pierre (ed.), Les lieux de mémoire, Paris 1984–1992; Winter, Jay, Sites of Memory, Sites of Mourning: The Great War in European Cultural History, Cambridge 1999; Winter, Jay/Sivan, Emmanuel (eds.), War and Remembrance in the Twentieth Century, Cambridge 1999.

→ Calendar, Civil Religion, Collective Representations, Hero/Heroism, History, Memory, National Socialism, Tradition, War/Armed Forces

Jay Winter

Mormons

Foundational Myth: The Book of Mormon

1. a) The Mormon Church (official name: Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints), founded on April 6, 1830 in New York State, can be regarded as a part of the Second Great Awakening movement in the United States. Its founder, Joseph Smith (1805–1844), claimed to have been visited for the first time in 1823 by the angel Moroni, who spoke to him of the "Golden Tablets." These, Smith averred, contained the message of the Bible in all its length and perfection. Smith indicated this message in the Book of Mormon, which, along with the Bible, became the second sacred book of the "Mormons." The Book of Mormon recounts the history of two emigrations from Israel to America, the first after the events of the Tower of Babel, the second shortly before the destruction of the Jerusalem Temple by Nebuchadnezzar (588 BCE). Thus, an attempt is made to establish a direct connection between the people of Israel and the original inhabitants of America, who, however, are expressly not today's Indian peoples. Only the revelation of the Golden Tablets afforded the opportunity to reestablish the 'true Church.'

Foundation of the Church

b) The publication of the Book of Mormon in 1830 was accompanied by the founding of the Church, which, from the beginning, was strongly hierarchically ordered, with prophetical legitimization, and which called for a strong commitment on the part of its members. At first, attempts failed to find a permanent location for the church, now grown to several thousand members. An additional obstacle was the violent death of Joseph Smith in 1844, with the consequent problem of finding a successor. Then divisions ensued, and only three years later did the Mormons finally begin to found communities under the leadership of Brigham Young (d. 1877), around the Great Salt Lake in today's Utah.

Organizational Structure and Hierarchy

2. The organizational structure of the Mormons is a complex arrangement, consisting of two kinds of priesthood, one lower (the Aaronic) and one higher (the Melchizedekian). The structure provides that every male member, from the age of eleven, is entrusted with a lower priestly office, which can scarcely be actually exercised. At the summit of the higher priesthood stands the President, usually the eldest of the five-man Presidential Council. Under the Council comes the Apostolic Council, consisting of twelve members. Unlike the Catholic Church, the number of offices excludes any practical distinction between laity and priests on the level of the community. Furthermore, in recent times, some members have discussed the question of whether and which of the offices of the priesthood should be open to women.

Teaching and Religious Practices

3. In the beginning, doctrine was strongly marked by an eschatological orientation (→ End/Eschaton; Millenarianism/Chiliasm). Today, instead, what stands in the foreground is the development and ongoing perfection of persons. While in Christianity and Islam the division between God and humanity, the Creator and his creation, is so insurmountable, in the Mormon belief system human beings have an opportunity for development to which death itself puts no end. In principle, then, the souls of the dead are available to redemption even in the beyond, through the solicitude of their descendants, to the extent that their exact identity can be established. This belief explains the compilation and storing of genealogies, of which several million are kept in the corresponding institutes in Salt Lake City, and are made available to interested family researchers. Many genealogies of non-Mormons are received and maintained in these collections, since a concern is possible in the future on the part of progeny.

A further particularity emerges from the fact that revelation through the Book of Mormon is not regarded as closed. Other, future revelations, then, are admitted with the Mormons. This guarantees that the 'teaching' can be adapted to social and political circumstances. Thus, for example, in 1978 then-President Spencer W. Kimball received the revelation that the priesthood can be received by worthy, non-white males. Discrimination against dark-skinned men, based on the principle that a black skin color was a sign that lapses had been committed in an earlier life, was thereby ended.

Mission

→ Mission has a special value in the community. As early as 1837, the first missionaries went to England; later, mission was conducted especially in Scandinavia. Most of those converted in Europe emigrated to America, drawn there in part by the idea that they must cooperate in the building of a 'new Zion.'

Male Mormons who feel a special commitment are to be active as missionaries in their younger years. They go abroad for two years if possible. This progressive missionary activity is doubtless one of the reasons for the rapid growth of the community. In addition, there is the obligation to marry and to exercise concern for one's progeny—also to give the many as yet unredeemed souls a 'dwelling.' At first the Mormons permitted polygamy, with an appeal to the Hebrew Bible. But in connection with the admission of their state to the United States—and vigorous discussion in the community—polygamy was abolished. This does not exclude the retention of the old order on the part of occasional 'divergents' (→ Family/Kinship/Genealogy).

In the ritual life of the Mormons, an important role falls to the rites of the → life cycle, → baptism, marriage, 'sealing' (even of the dead), and the call to the office of priest, which in part (marriage and sealing) must take place in the Temple, from which non-Mormons are momentarily excluded. Otherwise, religious life is strongly family-oriented. Essential commandments, binding for all members, are a monthly fast day, and continual abstinence from intoxicants (alcohol and drugs) as well as from tobacco, and coffee or tea. One of the daily religious duties is → prayer.

Situation Today

4. Today, with nearly 9,600,000 members worldwide (1997), Mormons constitute one of the larger religious communities of the United States. Their lengthy concentration on Salt Late City as the new Zion, meanwhile, has receded into the background. In order to guarantee all Mormons the opportunity of living their religion, more than thirty new temples have been built since 1980. Having another source of revelation than the Bible (the Book of Mormon) makes cooperation with the other Christian churches difficult.

Literature

Sources: Skousen, Royal (ed.), The Original Manuscript of the Book of Mormon: Typographical Facsimile of the Extant Text [Joseph Smith], Provo 2001; Smith, Joseph, The Book of Mormon: An Account Written by the Hand of Mormon upon Plates Taken from the Plates of Nephi . . ., Palmyra 1830.

Secondary Literature: Barlow, Philip L., Mormons and the Bible: The Place of the Latter-Day Saints in American Religion, New York 1991; Bushman, Claudia L./Bushman, Richard L., Building the Kingdom: A History of Mormons in America, Oxford 2001; Duke, James T. (ed.), Latter-Day Saint Social Life: Social Research on the LDS Church and Its Members, Provo 1998; Eliason, Eric A. (ed.), Mormons and Mormonism: An Introduction to an American World Religion, Urbana 2001; Hutten, Kurt, Seher—Grübler—Enthusiasten, Stuttgart [11]1968; Mullen, Robert, The Latter-Day-Saints: The Mormons Yesterday and Today, Garden City 1966; O'Dea, Thomas F., The Mormons, Chicago 1957; Walker, Ronald W. et al., Mormon History, Urbana 2001.

→ Book, Hierarchy, Mission, New Religions, Revelation

Jutta Bernard and Günter Kehrer

Mountains (Five Sacred)

Traditionally, the five sacred mountains of China are:
- the Songgao, or Peak of the Center, in Henan;
- the Taishan, or Peak of the East, in Shandong;
- the Hengshan, or Peak of the South, in Hunan;
- the Huashan, or Peak of the West, in Shenxi;
- the Hengshan, or Peak of the North, in Shenxi (not to be confused with the Hengshan in Hunan; see map in → China/Japan/Korea).

While the Songgao represented the Emperor, and thus the center of the Empire, the other four mountains lie on the periphery of Old China, and 'border' the four directions of the sky. Located on them are a multiplicity of temples, mostly Daoist. From a devotional viewpoint, the mountains were relevant in two ways: they were places of the cult of the Emperor, as well as abundantly frequented places of pilgrimage for the normal believers. The official imperial cult, in which the mountain gods were offered the 'great sacrifice' (tailao), in the form of an ox, a sheep, and a hog, died out with the Empire. At the same time, the mountains are still visited today, usually by older pilgrims fulfilling a vow with a pilgrimage of thanksgiving for, e.g., the healing of a disease—a tradition attested in China for at least two thousand years.

The narrow, steep path leading from the Temple of the Dragon King to the gate of the Golden Temple, at the entrance to the area of the peak, is called, graphically, the "Comb of the Green Dragon." It symbolizes the dragon on whose back one can ascend from the mountain peak to heaven as an immortal.

The Mountains in the Cult of the Ruler

2. The five sacred mountains are first mentioned around 100 BCE. Toward the end of the age of the Striving Kingdoms (481–211 BCE), an older system of four sacred mountains (without the peak of the Center) was replaced, so as to be able to be set it in relationship with the philosophical concept of the five 'transforming phases.' The basis of this system was the idea that, to each of the five phases of transformation (they can replace one another, and thus are not the same as the Greek 'elements')—earth, wood, metal, fire, water—to these, then, one of the five colors can be assigned, as well as certain qualities, such as sweet and sour, and one of the five directions of the sky—north, south, east, west, center. The older four mountains, occasionally called 'watch mounts,' originally bounded the region of China. Their names were given to the four mightiest feudal princes, upon whom as liege lords it was incumbent to defend the kingdom. They were the 'lengthened arm,' or tool, of the gods of the mountains, who, as the supreme instance—in return for sacrifices received—were to ensure the borders. Thus, on the originally four, and later five sacred mountains, the spheres of the religious (the gods) and the political (the rule of the king or liege lord, later the Emperor) met. As the kingdom spread beyond its original borders, the five sacred mountains did maintain their meaning as the most important seats of the gods, but they lost their function as guardians of the borders. Emperor Han Wudi (141–87 BCE) took formal possession of them, and consigned them to the imperial cult. The meaning of the central peak—until now the domain of the ruler—diminished, in favor of the eastern peak, the Taishan. On it, the emperors whose rule was seen as a model offered the Feng and Shan sacrifices, the former to the sky, the latter to the earth. The importance of the Taishan also rests, in part, on the circumstance that it had been believed from very early times that the souls of the Chinese would leave the Taishan to be born, and withdraw to it once more after death.

The Five Mountains in Folk Religion

3. China's most ancient written lore, discovered only in the twentieth century—that of the oracular bones—attests a mountain cult. Thus, the kings of the Shang Dynasty (c. 1550–1050 BCE) offered a sacrifice to Mount Yüe when they hoped to receive from it the favor of rain and a good harvest. First and foremost, the mountains were sacred ground, which ordinary persons trod at their own risk.

All mountains, great and small, have gods and spirits. When the mountain is high, the god is great; when the mountain is small, the god is small. When one treads the mountain without the necessary precautions, one will surely suffer harm. Some will fall victim to acute diseases, be wounded by weapons, grow rigid with fright. Others will perceive strange sounds, see will-o'-the-wisps and shadows. High trees can be uprooted without the wind blowing; cliffs can plunge downward without cause, and strike and kill persons. (Ge Hong, 283–343, in his Baopuzi ["Master Who Grasps Simplicity"]).

Only on days designated by the oracle as favorable, and after long fasting, may one consign oneself to the mountains, for example to seek ingredients for the windlasses of immortality. One must be armed with powerful amulets, and a mirror, for spirits may at times take on a human form and deceive persons, but in the mirror they show their true form: a god will maintain his human form in the mirror, while spirits and demons will appear in it as monsters. Despite all risks, hermits have always sought the isolation of the mountains, to seek contact with the gods, in shelters, monastic dwellings, or remote systems of caves, all of which represent the earthly counterpart of the paradises of the sky, and to devote themselves completely to their religious perfectibility.

In terms of the little we know of it, the pilgrimage institution seems to have succumbed to the Cultural Revolution of 1966–1976. The Daoists who dwelt in the monasteries and temples of, for example, Huashan were driven from the mountain. In the early 1980s, however, a good half-dozen of the earlier inhabitants returned, and, with them, younger monks trained in Beijing or Sichuan. Some of the old buildings were renovated or entirely reconstructed. Many, it is true, no longer have a religious function, now serving only for tourism. No detailed information is currently available regarding the pilgrimage network; however, it would seem that, just in recent years, smaller groups, mostly of elderly persons, once again go on pilgrimage to the sacred places on the mountains.[1]

Mountains as Sacred Places

4. Mountains play an important role in many religions. They are the places of the gods, as with Mount Olympus of the Greeks, or preferred places for communication between gods and human beings—such as Sinai, on which Moses received the tablets of the law from YHWH. A mountain can also be the mythic center of the world, the 'world axis' (in Lat., axis mundi), binding earth with heaven or sky at the earth's midpoint, as with the Hindus' World Mountain Meru, around which sun, moon, and stars revolve, and on whose various 'levels' the gods dwell according to their rank.

On the one hand, mountains can be regarded positively in their mythological character. With the Chinese they are the visible concentration of the primordial cosmic energy Qi on the surface of the earth. At the same time, for example, Luther's fundamental world-image reflected an original harmonious, flat world, with mountains the 'warts and boils' that had appeared only after the Great Flood, and that had represented the collapse and demise of a paradise world. Symbolically, from the second century BCE, the Chinese have seen mountains as, for instance, bronze censers, whose fantastic ranges are populated with winged immortals. They kindled ecstatic meditation. "How elegant, this fine-tooled pot, in the form of a steep mountain! Above it is like Huashan, [below] it is held in a bronze saucer, within are aromatic materials [incense], red fire, and black smoke. Without, it is elegantly chased on all sides. Above, [the smoke] blends with the dark clouds. I contemplate the ten thousand beasts engraved on the surface. Thus, my seer's gift surpasses that of a li lou [legendary person with extraordinary vision]."[2]

For the purpose of exalting human beings nearer to the gods, artificial mountains were erected as well, in various cultures, such as the Sumerian-Babylonian temple, with its multiple 'stages' (zikkurat), or the Middle American graded pyramids (teokalli), or the Javanese temple complex of Borobudur.

1. Andersen, Poul, "A Visit to Hua-shan," in: Cahiers d'Extrême-Asie 5 (1989-90), 349-354.
2. Inscription on a censer of the first century BCE.

Literature

Source: Ware, James R., Alchemy, Medicine, and Religion in the China of A.D. 320, the Nei P'ien of K'o Hung, Cambridge 1966 (trans. of the Baopuzi neipian).

Secondary Literature: Landt, Frank A., Die fünf Heiligen Berge Chinas. Ihre Bedeutung und Bewertung in der Ch'ing-Dynastie, Berlin 1994 (with a few mistakes in details); Naquin, Susan/Yü, Chün-Fang (eds.), Pilgrims and Sacred Sites in China, Berkeley 1992; Lagerwey, John, Der Kontinent der Geister. China im Spiegel des Taoismus. Eine Reise nach Innen, Olten 1991 (good illustrations).

→ China/Japan/Korea, Daoism, Landscape, Nature, Orientation, Place (Sacred)

Stephan Peter Bumbacher

Mourning

Concepts and Foundation

1. Grief in the stricter sense is a universally human, psychophysical reaction—a painful feeling of separation and loss, coupled with specific bodily stimulation (weeping, wailing). In the broader sense, it includes complex social reactions—including, especially, ritual forms—and actions specific to each culture, vis-à-vis social or physical death. This twofold meaning is readily perceived in the English expression 'bereavement.' Generally, the word denotes the reaction to the real or symbolic loss of a meaningful object. But two aspects of the response can be distinguished: grief as the stereotypical physiological and psychological reaction of biological origin, and mourning as the conventional behavioral pattern dictated by the customs and usages of a society.

In German usage, Trauer ('grief,' 'mourning') denotes a complex reaction to the loss of a person or object, to a separation, or to the loss of a role. Sigmund → Freud's psychoanalytical viewpoint emphasized the distinction between normal grief, pathological grief, in which strong guilt feelings prevent a normal development of grief, and melancholy, a severe endogenous depression. For Freud, Trauerarbeit (Ger., 'work of grieving') meant the interior psychic process that follows a loss and is directed toward the lessening of the pain of grief. Here the subject usually manages gradually to 'detach' from the loss of the object of relation. Freud's material of observation, however, and the theory of grief emerging from it, were too Eurocentric, individual-centered, and introspective, so that it would be completely unintelligible for members of non-European and traditional cultures, in whose communities mourning means a social and religious duty to the deceased of carrying out certain mourning rituals and practices. In the original meaning of the German word Trauer, which comes from the Old High German truren, 'to let the head sink,' it is not a feeling, but the gesture that is determinative.

Rites of Mourning as 'Mourning Universals'

2. In many cultures, ritual mourning can be structurally divided as a three-phase → rite of passage, in which a rite of separation, a rite of marginality, and a rite of aggregation can be distinguished.[1] Rites of mourning are often apotropaic (from Gk., 'warding off') in nature, calculated as they are to protect the living from the power emerging from the being of the deceased. In the sense of a psychic oneness of humanity, one may speak of 'mourning universals'—meaning behavior and manners of experience in grief that can be found in all cultures, and, accordingly, must be investigated as a 'total social phenomenon' (M. Mauss). In this general sense, grieving can be apprehended as a basic figure of human behavior.

3. a) In most cultures, mourning is very closely related to religion. The Bible, for example, attests manifold structures of grief experience and behavior, which, like the ancient mourning varieties of the Greeks and Romans,[2] have functioned as models in the West. The biblical person grieves 'from head to foot,' and 'from inside to the outside.' Among the many biblical usages of mourning the dead, the following are particularly impressive.

- covering the head with ashes or earth (1 Sam 4:12; 2 Sam 1:2; Neh 9:1; Exod 27:30; Rev 18:19);
- casting oneself down and turning about in the dust (Mic 1:10; Exod 27:30); sitting in ashes (Jonah 3:6);

Comparative Presentation of Behavioral Grieving and Rites of Mourning

Individual Experiences of Grief and Behavioral Grieving	Collective Assimilating in Rites and Practices of Mourning
Impairment of Vital Functions
– Anorexia	Food taboos, fasting
– Sleep disturbances	'Watching,' 'waking' (abstinence from sleep) the deceased
– Decreased libido
– Loss of interest in life	Sexual taboos, repose from work
Disturbances of concentration and memory	Name taboos
Weeping	Tear offering, tear decoration, tear urn
Bewailing, calling to the deceased	Mourning attendants, songs of grief
Inclination to be alone, grief immobility	Lack of sociability, isolation, seclusion, mourning attire, 'veiling'
Silence and paralysis of grief	Prohibition of speech, 'silence of grief'
Self-neglect	Grief soiling (ashes, dust), prohibition of adornment, prohibition of cosmetics, disorderly or loosened hair, beard growing
Paleness	Whitening of face/body, mourning painting, mourning colors
Self-aggression – Self-injury, 'accidents'	Grief mutilation, finger maiming, grief tattooing, blood offerings, hair or beard tearing, hair cutting, rending of garments
– Suicidal tendencies	Self-sacrifice, widow suicide
Aggression against others – Destructive rage – Raptus melancholicus (Lat., 'melancholy trance')	Grief destruction, customs of destruction, sacrifice of foreigners, 'scapegoating'
Diminished enjoyment of possessions	Gift of possessions
Sense of the presence of the deceased	Impetratory prayer, memorial rites, laudatio, communio, direct address to the deceased
Fear of return, feelings of threat and guilt	Rites of protection (e.g., noise, sealing off the burial installation)
Introjection, identification	Rites of 'incorporation' (endocannibalism)
Grieving process	'Grieving out,' term of grief, purification from grief

According to: Hannes Stubbe, Formen der Trauer. Eine kulturanthropologische Untersuchung, Berlin 1985, p. 337

- wearing the saq (hairshirt) (Ps 35:13; Isa 32:11; Mal 3:14; Jonah 3:6; Matt 3:4);
- cutting the hair (Job 1:20);
- fasting (Dan 10:3 [3 weeks]; 1 Sam 31:13 [7 days]; Matt 9:15);
- wailing (2 Sam 3:33-34; 1 Macc 9:20-21; Jer 22:18, 34:5);
- rending of garments (Gen 37:34; 2 Sam 13:19; Job 1:20, 2:12);
- consoling with sympathy (John 11:19).

A special occasion for grieving in the Hebrew Bible was the loss of Jerusalem (Isa 66:10; Neh 2:1), since with it was lost not only the homeland, but the central sanctuary as the place of God's revelation, where one could sacrifice to God, call upon him, and serve him.

Like the Christianity that arose from it, Judaism developed figures and myths of consolation, to support collective as well as individual mourning, if not indeed to make it possible: a Messiah is awaited as the coming consoler of the grieving (Isa 61:2-3). In the New Testament, victory over grief and weeping is based on hope in resurrection (1 Thess 4:13-18).

Rabbinical Judaism

In Judaism, there are precisely defined prescriptions for mourning, as well as precisely defined phases of mourning, all compiled in the Talmud. The first phase, lasting, as a rule, for one day, is called Aninut (Heb., 'time of despair'), in which mourners express their painful feelings of grief, rending their garments in the region of the heart (krijah). Mourners, for whom now particular mourning restrictions become effective, recount the events surrounding the death to their community and to that of the deceased, and are taken under the direct care of the local ḫevra kaddisha ('holy fraternity'), which exists specifically for this purpose. It regulates the entire course of the mourning until after the interment, which must take place within twenty-four hours of the occurrence of death. At the burial—just as later, daily, during the year of mourning in the synagogue—the mourner intones the Kaddish, a moving ancient Aramaic prose-poem.

The second phase, that of the Shiva (Heb., 'Seven'), begins with the return to the home of the bereaved. After the meal of mourning, consisting of bread and boiled eggs, the mourner sits for seven days on mattresses or on a low chair. For the members of the community, it is a legal obligation to provide for the mourner, bringing nourishment. In this period of time, much is regulated as in the ordinary (religious) day (phenomenon of the 'inverted world'[3]), such as behavior with blessings, prayers and feast days, work restrictions, rules for food and drink, marital intercourse, and clothing, cosmetic, and hygiene restrictions. A special prohibition is that of the joyful study of the Torah.

After the Shiva begins the thirty-day third phase (Shloshim) of grieving, in which the mourner is gradually reintroduced into daily life. Mourners may neither cut their hair nor shave, may wear no new clothes, may attend no parties, and may not marry.

The ensuing eleven-month fourth phase, which completes the year of mourning (Shana, 'Year'), is observed only for deceased parents. At the end of the first year of mourning, the krijah is finally replaced with a new piece of cloth.

In Orthodox communities, these complex and exacting rites are still practiced today.

Islam

b) In Islam, after the demise of a Muslim, readings from the Qur'an (preferably the sixth sura) accompany the washing of the corpse and its deposition in the bier. In Arabic countries, the lament for the dead, and a kind of dance of death (with the striking of one's face), often by hired 'mourning wives,' play a special role. The ensuing prayer of grieving, recited in the mosque, is a community obligation. For the first forty days after the burial, the feeding of the poor, seated grieving, and religious readings are required, and certain mourning restrictions must be observed. Thus, no circumcisions, engagement ceremonies, or marriages are celebrated. The time of mourning frequently ends with a 'grief hamam' (Turk., steam bath). The steam bath and the ensuing scraping of the skin are meant to wash away the pain of mourning.[4]

Grieving Today

Until around 1960, the feeling of grief was a totally neglected field of investigation. Scientific disinterest was based especially on the methodological and semantic difficulties of the concept of 'grief,' and this may also have been a reason why many psychological dictionaries and encyclopedias did not even list the concept. A further basis lies in the increasing tendency, in industrial societies, to repress this feeling and dissimulate it, as G. Gorer (Death, Grief and Mourning in Contemporary Britain) and A. Mitscherlich (Die Unfähigkeit zu trauern, 1967, with M. Mitscherlich) have shown. Thus, grief and mourning seem to have disappeared from public view. Mourning attire, in many European societies and in America, is seen less and less, even at funerals; grief is no longer 'grieved out,' the 'year of mourning' is no longer felt as binding, and remarriage of the widowed is no longer subject to any limitations. What is sometimes referred to as the 'American way of death,' as a commercialized form of → funeral and burial, and a corresponding 'prettifying' of dying and death, is ever more in vogue, even though these can occasion disturbances in the process of working through grief on the part of survivors. The present attitude toward grieving, except in traditional religious rituals, is completely 'deregulated,' in the sociological sense, and any 'ritual framework' is frequently lacking as it exists in traditional cultures and still to be observed among South American Indians or in Upper Bavaria. The growing uncertainty over how one ought to mourn was brought into connection with the growing anomie of modern society as early as Émile Durkheim, around 1900, that is, with the disappearance of generally obligatory behavior. Thus, 'normal grieving' is frequently labeled abnormal, or even a problem for psychiatry and psychotherapy. At the same time, 'great feeling' and weeping, even in public, is once more 'in' today. A 'new tearfulness' (M. Rutschky) could be observed in 1996 as a political demonstration, as Helmut Kohl shed tears in the Cathedral of Notre Dame in Paris at the death of François Mitterand, or occurring as a mass phenomenon, with exclamations, sobbing and weeping, as when Princess Diana was borne to her grave in 1997.

1. Cf. schema in Stubbe 1985, 332.
2. Ibid., 159ff.
3. Ibid., 138ff.
4. Ibid., 130.

Literature

Averill, J. R., "Grief: Its Nature and Significance," in: Psychological Bulletin 70 (1968), 721-748; Berger, A. et al. (eds.), Perspectives on Death and Dying: Cross-cultural and Multi-disciplinary Views, Philadelphia 1989; Ekman, P., The Face of Man, New York 1980; Institute of Medicine (ed.), Bereavement: Reactions, Consequences and Care, Washington 1984; Izard, C. E., The Face of Emotion, New York 1971; Lewis, M./Haviland, J. M. (eds.), Handbook of Emotions, New York 1993; Lindemann, E., Beyond Grief, New York 1979; Lutz, T., Crying: The Natural and Cultural History of Tears, New York 1999; Margolis, O. S. et al. (eds.), Acute Grief, New York 1981; Métraux, A., "Mourning Rites and Burial Forms of the South American Indians," in: América Indigena 7 (1947), 7-44; Reece, G. W., Trauma, Loss and Bereavement: A Survivor's Handbook, New York 1999; Rosenblatt, P. C., Grief and Mourning in Cross-cultural Perspective, London 1976; Stubbe, H., Formen der Trauer, Berlin 1985.

→ Ars Moriendi, Cemetery, Death and Dying, Emotions/Feelings, Funeral/Burial, Rites of Passage, Suffering, Martyr

Hannes Stubbe

Muhammad

Biographical Notes

1. Muhammad regarded himself as an Arab prophet and statesman; he is considered the founder of → Islam. In historical studies, the year 571 (Year of the Elephant) is the generally accepted year of his birth, although data vary. His birthplace was → Mecca; he belonged to the tribe of the Quraysh. Other than that he was an orphan at the early age of six, nothing certain has been handed down about his childhood. He was reared by his grandfather ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib and his uncle Abū Ṭālib (father of the later caliph Ali).

He was viewed as bearing the mark of a prophet from his early years. In his closest surroundings were followers of monotheistic tendencies, which are supposed to have influenced him. While Islamic tradition insists that, as a child, he came into no manner of contact with the pagan cults of his environment, there are nevertheless clear indications that this was not the case. Just so, it is regarded as certain that he could read and write. Presumably on account of his poverty, the young Muhammad remained unmarried until, at some twenty-five years of age, he married Khaddja, the wealthy widow of a merchant. His bride, in whose service he had found himself, was now about forty years of age. With her he had four daughters and a number of sons, all of the latter dying at an early age. Until the "Emigration" (in Arab., Hijrah) to Medina, Muhammad lived monogamously with Khadija, in Mecca. After Khadija's death, he married a total of thirteen women and had a number of female slaves. Political as well as personal motives stand in the foreground of Muhammad's frank polygynic practice after Khadija's death. The political motives included support of the widows of fallen warriors. The Islamic critique itself is confronted with Muhammad's marriage with his favorite wife, ʿĀʾisha, whom he married when she was six years old, and with whom he is said to have consummated the marriage when she was nine, which would have been very early indeed even for Bedouin relations of the time. Muhammad died in 632.

Theological Notes

2. Muhammad understood himself as an Arab prophet, called by God, who, after the falsifications of the Jews and Christians, had had revealed to him, in unfalsified form and in the Arabic language, the original book of scripture, which is kept in heaven. With Muhammad, the series of prophetical revelations is closed: he is the “Seal of the Prophets.” Theologically, however, he had to enter into a compromise for some time. The majority of the population of his home city of Mecca consisted of economically powerful polytheists, and these placed the prophet under pressure. At a certain point in time, then, matters came to the revelation of the satanic verses (Qur’an 22:51; cf. 53:19-21), in which Muhammad struck a compromise between the ancient pre-Islamic Arabic female deities and the one and only God of the patriarchs. This compromise read, according to the sources used by Arab historians, that goddesses al-Lāt, al-‘Uzza, and al-Manāt were the ‘exalted ones,’ ‘herons,’ whose advocacy was acceptable (to God).[1] From now on they were regarded as the ‘Daughters of God.’ Muhammad’s distinct consciousness of mission later led to self-criticism, and to the confession of guilt that Satan had whispered these verses to him.[2]

Political Notes

3. There is no doubt as to Muhammad’s skill as a statesman. Through the message of a new → monotheism, he succeeded in uniting the tribes of the Arabian peninsula, wrenched asunder by vengeance and feud, and in turning the aggressive energy of the Arab clans outward—which, among other things, explains the success of Arab-Islamic expansion to the North (Syria, Asia Minor), to the East (→ Iran), and to the West (North → Africa, Spain, Sicily). Through the message of the descent of the “Mother of Books” (in Arab., umm al-kitāb), the → Qur’an, in the Arabic language, the Islamic prophet gave the erstwhile polytheistic Arabian tribes a new self-awareness, and packaged their lust for war and booty. With this unification of the tribes loyal to him, and the “community order of Medina,” issued after he had left his home city of Mecca and entered Medina, Muhammad laid the groundwork for an Islamic state system. Muhammad’s Hijrah from Mecca to Medina was in the year 622, which became the first year of the Islamic calendar. As a precaution against a possible attack from Mecca, he managed to consolidate the entire city collectivity of Medina into a union for defense and offense. What is important for the history of Islam, even to the present, are the defensive treaties (in Arab., amān) that the Prophet concluded with the tribes united with him that did not convert to Islam.

Muhammad’s Reception in Modern Times

4. The most significant reception of the Prophet of Islam in modern times, in the cultural area, is the contested filming of his life by a Syrian director living in the United States, Mustafa ‘Aqqad, in 1976. The production kindled acute controversy, just as, later (1988), with British author Salman Rushdie’s novel The Satanic Verses (→ Film II; Fatwa). In Islam’s official doctrine, no veneration of Muhammad is permitted, since, unlike Jesus in Christianity, he must not be ascribed any divine qualities. Nevertheless, the instances cited above show that a reception of the historical figure of Muhammad is not unproblematic. For the believing Muslim, Muhammad is both the Prophet and the Representative of God on Earth (ḫalīfat Allāh fī’l-arḍ, therefore also a political leader, who can even be styled a ‘saint.’ This is the case especially in Indo-Islam (India and Pakistan), where Hindu and Buddhist influences are therefore supposed.

The designation, formerly common in the West, of 'Mohammedans' for 'Muslims' falsifies the case. Muslims are not followers of Muhammad, but followers of God. The false designation suggests that Muslims believe in Muhammad instead of in God or Islam. In the Islamic movements of the twentieth century, young men frequently appeal to the model of the Prophet where their clothing and bodily care are concerned, in their kayal made-up eyes (cf. the film "Bab el-Oued City," by Merzak Allouache), or in the way in which they wear their beards (→ Purification/Hygiene/Bodily Grooming).

For one component of the Islamic movements of the present, Muhammad has especially the exemplary character of a military leader and politician, even for religious murders (at the hands of such extremist terrorist movements, as, for example, the Jihād Islāmī or Jamā'at groups in Egypt, with their attempted political justification) (→ Fundamentalism). Political Islamic currents like the Palestinian Ḥamas movement appeal to early events from the time of Muhammad, and utilize them both rhetorically and politically, reforging them into an ideological position of anti-Judaism and anti-Zionism.

1. Cf. Paret 1957, 61.
2. Cf. ibid., 59ff.

Literature

Buhl, Frants, Muhammeds liv: med en inledning om forholdene i Arabien för Muhammed's optræden, Copenhagen 1903 (German trans. 1930); Cook, Michael, Muhammad, Oxford 1983; Ibn Warraq, The Quest for the Historical Muhammad, Amherst/New York 2000; Motzki, Harald, The Biography of Muhammad: The Issue of the Sources, Leiden 2000; Newby, Gordon Darnell, The Making of the Last Prophet: A Reconstruction of the Earliest Biography of Muhammad, Columbia 1989; Paret, Rudi, Mohammed und der Koran, Stuttgart 1957; Reeves, Minou, Muhammad in Europe: A Thousand Years of Western Myth-Making, New York 2000; Rubin, Uri, The Life of Muhammad, Aldershot 1998.

→ Fatwa, Film II, Fundamentalism, Islam, Qur'an

Assia Maria Harwazinski

Mummification

1. Mummification is far from being an exclusive phenomenon of ancient Egypt. But it is the mummies of → Egypt, along with gods with animal heads, pyramids, and the Sphinx, that have perhaps the greatest power of attraction on Europe. The word 'mummy' derives immediately from the Italian mummia ('mummy'), but it is originally ancient Persian, and denotes the bitumen or earth-pitch used for the preservation of a dead → body. This kind of mummification was an attempt to use the natural desiccation process to prevent the natural corruption of the corpse.

2. The special climate and geography of Egypt were favorable to mummification. Even in prehistoric times, covered corpses were buried in matting or animal skins in desert sand. Heat and low humidity removed water from the corpse: thus, it was mummified naturally. In the dynastic era, on the other hand, these natural preservatives of coffin and grave were no longer at hand. The ancient Egyptian belief insisted on the preservation of the body, if the afterlife was to be ensured also as a continued bodily existence. But it was not only persons that were mummified; → animals were thus preserved as well. Divinity, it was believed, could manifest itself in individual animals. In Greco-Roman times, entire species of animals, such as crocodiles (Sobek), cats (Bastet), ibexes (Thot), falcons (Re or Horus), or dogs (Anubis) were mummified in extensive subterranean animal cemeteries.

The technique of embalming was not regarded as important enough to be described along with the images of the gods or other representations of the beyond. Therefore, practically no traces of it are to be found in the Egyptian sources. Information on mummification is available in Greek writers Herodotus and Diodorus,[1] and it can be gathered from research on the mummies themselves. The bodies of those who had died, lying on an embalming table, were not washed where the entombment was to take place, but at the Nile or in a canal. The brain was removed with a bronze scoop, through the nose or through the opening at the rear of the head. A quantity of heated evergreen resin, beeswax, and bitumen was introduced into the empty skull, and this shortly hardened. The organs were withdrawn through the mouth, such as lungs, liver, stomach, and intestines were distributed into four canopic jars, which stood under the magical protection of the four sons of Horus. The heart alone, as the seat of thinking and feeling, had to remain in the body, or was returned to the space of the breast after mummification, or was exchanged for a stone heart-scarab, a magical substitute heart. The heart, lying in the balance at the judgment of the dead, was to testify to the correct ethical manner of life of the deceased, before Osiris, God of the Dead. The most important element of mummification consisted in the desiccation of the corpse by salt, with which the body was filled or sprinkled, for thirty-five to forty days. Treated in this manner, the texture of the body could no longer decompose. The breast and abdomen, emptied of their organs, were filled with linen or woodchips, so that the corpse could have its lifelike appearance restored. The mummified corpse was provided with protective amulets, and texts from the Book of the Dead were often folded into the great quantity of linen cloth and bindings. The mummy's head was covered with a painted mask of linen board, which on royal mummies was of gold. The face of the mask bore the traits of a deified, ageless ideal image. Only in the later Roman portraits on mummies are individual faces recognizable, which seemed to gaze upon the viewer from the sarcophagus. Some seventy days after death, the mummy was laid in one or more nested coffins. The mummy's protective covering was intended to shield it on its long, perilous journey to the worlds of the beyond. A condition for life after death was the 'mouth-opening ritual,' which reanimated the mummy. In the beyond, the ba, usually mistranslated 'soul,' and the mummified body could rejoin, all through the night, and the mummy would revive. Delivered from the swathing bands of its mummification, the departed person now dwelt in a renewed and reborn afterworld body.

3. With the advent of Christianity, the art of embalming died out in Egypt. The Christian Church rejected mummification as a sinful expression of human vanity, but permitted it in the case of canonized persons (→ Veneration of the Saints) and high dignitaries. In Europe, beginning in the early Middle Ages, embalming substances from old Egyptian mummies were applied as remedies for diseases. Later, mummies were completely ground up

According to ancient Egyptian belief, deities could manifest themselves in living animals. The latter were kept in temples, and supplied with special food, and after death received an elaborate burial. As in Greco-Roman times, not only individual animals, but whole species of animals were regarded as sacred, and subterranean cemetery galleries were built for them at temple locations. With the offering of a small bronze sculpture of a given animal, or its mummy, it was possible to obtain direct contact with the deity in question. Divinities in the form of a cat were reverenced as representing, especially, the goddess Bastet. Mummies of cats—like this 48.5-cm-long, linen-wrapped example from the Ptolemaic time (c. 250 BCE)—have been preserved in large numbers. (Benita von Behr)

The picture shows a virtual mummy, provided by the University of Hamburg. In the inner area of the skull are traces of ointment; the skull is also fixed with a rod. At the level of the linen wrapping, one finds the painted mummy-mask. In between, the "crown of justification" goes around the mummy's head, indicating a favorable verdict at the judgment seat of the dead.

and sold as powder in chemist's shops. In the seventeenth century, mummies became a dependable component of exhibits of rarities, and later, of museums. The ancient Egyptian belief in an afterlife has ultimately been set in parallel with a notion today that resembles it—that of mummies as the 'living corpses' of the horror film, that play on audience fears, skillfully summoning up death and the dead.

4. Mummification has always been a worldwide phenomenon. The best-known example other than that of the ancient Egyptians is the mummification practice of the South American Indian cultures. The Chimu of pre-Columbian Peru bore the dry mummies of their rulers about in solemn processions on festival days. In Egypt, too, at the beginning, only pharaohs must have been mummified; mummification, then, was the special exaltation of a charismatic person. Precisely this kind of → veneration of persons is found once more with the socialist figures Lenin and → Mao Tse Tung, who are be seen mummified to the present day. It is still a disputed question whether mummies may ethically be displayed in museum windows before a mass public—a fate not even the mummified man ("Ötzi") of the Bronze Age has escaped, since his discovery in the Ötztal (Alps). After all, the viewers do stand before the body of a human being, who once also numbered among the living.

1. Herodotus II, 85-89; Diodorus Siculus I, 91.
2. Amset, Hapi, Kebechsenuef, and Duamutef.

Literature

Bierbrier, Morris L. (ed.), Portraits and Masks: Burial Customs in Roman Egypt, London 1997; Corcoran, Lorelei H., Portrait Mummies from Roman Egypt (I–IV Centuries A.D.): With a Catalog of Portrait Mummies in Egyptian Museums, Chicago 1995; Drenkhahn, Rosemarie/Germer, Renate (eds.), Mumie und Computer, Hannover 2003; Germer, Renate (ed.), Mummies: Life After Death in Ancient Egypt, Munich 1997; Hornung, Erik, "Vom Sinn der Mumifizierung," in: Die Welt des Orients 14 (1983), 167-175; Racek, Milan, Mumia viva. Kulturgeschichte der Human- und Animalpräparation, Graz 1990; Taylor, John H., Mummy: The Inside Story, London 2004.

→ Body, Death and Dying, Egypt, Hereafter, Veneration of Persons/Personality Cult

Edmund Hermsen

Museum

1. Since the eighteenth century, the term 'museum' (Gk., museion, 'place of the muses') has designated publicly accessible collections of objects, as well as the physical structures to which they have been brought. Museums arise through donation or estate legacy; through the purchase of private collections; through state appropriation of feudal or ecclesiastical property, as happened in France during the French Revolution; or through the establishment of foundations, as with the great American museums.

Museums, or the history of their collections, teach us what it was that contemporary views listed as valuable and esthetically meaningful. The objects selected, and their presentation in museum space, convey to visitors a certain connection and context for the objects exhibited. Thus, museums 'privilege' certain ways of seeing and exclude others. As cultural institutions, through the presentation of their collections, museums have the intended function of influencing the public's standards and habits of knowledge.

Collections

2. The museum as a public institution was created in the eighteenth century. The history of collections, however, begins much earlier. Thus, besides relics, the churches of the Middle Ages preserved and exhibited objects connected with worship, such as chalices, ciboria, candelabra, curtains, and so on. Secular lords collected gifts, trophies, or objects with a ceremonial, religious, or profane purpose, and exhibited them in their residences. In the first half of the fourteenth century, Italy began to manifest an interest in works of antiquity. Lorenzo de Medici and Pope Julius II gathered large collections. Owing to the influence of the humanists, corresponding collections appeared in the French and English royal courts, and then, from mid-sixteenth century onward, nearly everywhere in Europe. With the increase in the number of expeditions to distant lands, besides antiques and works of art, exotic rarities of natural history, masks, and fetishes, scientific instruments, and so on, were gathered in the 'art and wonder chambers' of European princes. The latter regarded their collections as insignia of their exalted extraction and

The three-part "Isenheimer Altar" (c. 1513–1515), by Grünewald (i.e., Matthis Gothart, known as Nithart), is one of the most important sacred images of Christian Europe. Its importance does not lie, however, in any particular amount of sacred reverence that it has received, as if, for example, it had represented the destination of a pilgrimage. It was simply a part of the high altar for the church of the Antonite monastery at Isenheim, near Colmar. Instead, its meaning lies in the artistic value ascribed to it over and above its ritual use. The current arrangement is the result of a twin secularization: in 1793, during the French → Revolution, the paintings were withdrawn from religious use, and transferred to Colmar, where they are to be found in the disused monastery church of Unterlinden in Colmar (Alsace), which since 1849 has served as a museum. It is still viewable today, for a fee, in its new location. The visitors' posture reflects this act of withdrawal from sacred use. They are relaxed, even casual, as their intent is to visit a museum strictly for its art—as tourists, and not as believers. (Hubert Mohr) social position, and access was a favor bestowed only on certain scholars, artists, and travelers.

The first publicly accessible collection was that of the University of Oxford, which has been at the disposition of students since 1683. Foundations that have created the modern concept of museum include—as the first state foundations—the British Museum in London (1753), and the Museum Fridericianum ["Museum of Frederic"], in Kassel (1769–1776).

The turn from a courtly and dynastic policy, in the context of the French Revolution, is a key premise of the development of the Enlightenment middle-class idea of the museum. Museums ought then to serve both aesthetic experience (→ Art Religion) and the perfecting of morality—a conception that also came to expression in Wilhelm von Humboldt's plan for the New Museum, opened in Berlin in 1830 as a place of 'educating the citizen.' But the museum's growing cultural importance was also a result of the dynamic development of the arts and sciences of the nineteenth century. New historical collections appeared, of, for instance, primitive and ancient art, as well as objects of folk art. These were now no longer regarded as curiosa, but as scientifically instructive cultural relics. The concept of the historically constructed identity of a country was simultaneously decisive for the development of these formative goals, so that museums began to be assigned the additional function of serving the self-presentation of the nation, with the presentation and multiplication of their collections. In the great museums of the nineteenth century, "the nation" becomes "at once subject and object. It offers itself a permanent hero worship, by celebrating its past under all possible aspects."[1]

'Museum Policy in Germany

An example is the edifice today called the Pergamon Museum (1906–1930), on the Museum Isle of Berlin. The three-winged installation was conceived for the housing of the Pergamon Altar—which had been transported from Turkey in 1878—for the Mesopotamian Collection. The same great work was also to afford the central interest of a "German Museum," where visitors would be expected to see both the culture of Mesopotamia and that of Greek antiquity—the latter represented by the Pergamon Altar—as if they had constituted the prehistory of German 'High Culture.'[2] The meaning and importance of museums as 'places of consecration,' that is, of places having been dedicated and consecrated, is revealed not only in the nineteenth-century typical architecture of a museum as an architecture of representation, and in the presentation of the objects exhibited in halls displayed as 'sacred spaces.' It is also revealed in contemporary commentaries. The Pergamon hall is described as "a sacred island in the ocean of modern metropolitan life,"[3] the museum building as a "worthy complement to the Acropolis in Athens," and Berlin as "one of the world's prime destinations of the pilgrimage to art."[4]

Along with representing the nation, the 'museum policy' of Germany also served the popularization of colonial politics. By exhibiting objects of foreign cultures that had previously been used in sacred connections, these objects were 'rendered profane,' and received a new aesthetic importance. This re-forming of sacred objects into objects of art as an example of colonial appropriation of foreign resources is the subject of a new marketability, with numerous buyers of Russian icons and Asian sculptures, for example.

The German case can be regarded as representative for Western countries: As of 1969, there were 673 museums in the Federal Republic of Germany; by 1988, the number had grown to 2,400. A new type of museum characterized by growing mobility and flexibility has replace the old, permanently installed nineteenth-century type. Museums are being transformed into foci of exhibition and collection; they present conferences and lectures, they show films, they produce books, and, more and more, they maintain their own shops, and their own spaces for imagination and installation. They are concerned with a mix of instruction and entertainment, as, for example, the simulation of an earthquake in the Museum of London for Natural History in 1996. At the same time, tendencies toward a 'resacralization' are observable, when, for instance, the installation of a Buddhist meditation room in a museum offers a particular content of awareness to be transmitted, instead of a simple communication of information (Hamburg Museum of Art and Commerce, 1995).

At the moment, museums are registering an increase of 2-4 million visitors annually.

1. Pomian, Krzysztof, Der Ursprung des Museums. Vom Sammeln, Berlin 1993, 70.
2. Gaethgens, Thomas W., Die Berliner Museumsinsel im Deutschen Kaiserreich, Munich 1992.
3. Wenk, Silke, Auf den Spuren der Antike. Theodor Wiegand, ein deutscher Archäologe, Bendorf 1985, 50.
4. Gaethgens, o.c., 84; 108.

Literature

Berry, Nancy/Mayer, Susan (eds.), Museum Education: History, Theory and Practice, Reston 1989; Bouquet, Mary/Porto, Nuno (eds.), Science, Magic and Religion: The Ritual Process of Museum Magic, New York 2005; Crane, Susan A. (ed.), Museums and Memory, Stanford 2000; Martin, Jean-Hubert (ed.), Altäre—Kunst zum Niederknien, Düsseldorf 2001 (exhibition catalogue); Sherman, Daniel J./Rogoff, Irit (eds.), Museum Culture: Histories, Discourses, Spectacles, Minneapolis 1994.

→ Art/Aesthetics, Enlightenment, History, Materiality, Memory, Monument/Memorial Places, Reception

Insa Eschebach

Music

Terminology

1. For antiquity and parts of the Middle Ages, music is first of all a theoretical science that brings cosmic and anthropological structures (in Lat., musica mundana and humana) into association with the acoustical laws of tonic systems. Beginning in the thirteenth century, actually audible acoustical events shifted to the center of the concept of music (musica instrumentalis). Modern Western musical aesthetics narrows the concept to autonomous artistic work. On the other hand, recent musical anthropology and psychology understand first of all events of sound that refer to the conscious formation of one or more of the parameters of → rhythm, melody, harmony, and tone. The concept of music as musical act also includes the production, preservation, propagation, and reception of such musical phenomena. Finally, under the concept of music, there are also spiritualized, mythic, philosophical, and theological idioms of music to consider, which in a given case can completely preclude an actual tonal event.

Places of Music in Life

2. Music, in the history of humanity, has its place in religion. It is also a phenomenon of the worlds of work, politics, pedagogy, and art, dance, and entertainment, an acoustical structuring of space (background music, muzak at the supermarket), advertising, film, and healing (musical therapy). At present, the styles of pop music, governed by the music industry, from 'teen hits' to techno, punctuate the cultural world of many people. Over against a passive consumption of music by the majority, stand multiple manners of active music-making (choruses, bands, orchestras, etc.).

Places, Times, and Dimension of Religious Music

3. In the history of music and religion, various religious dimensions of music interpenetrate. They replace one another not in the sense of a linear development of religious music, but exist in contiguity, or die away for a time, only to reappear stronger than before.

a) In the early history of music and religion, the magical dimension of music plays a special role. By means of particular drumbeats, or vocal or instrumental sounds, evil spirits or forces of nature are supposed to be overcome, or good spirits summoned, for the purpose of intercommunication, in order to mollify them, or to expel them by way of exorcism (as with spells for promoting fertility, love, power, protection, good hunting, and good weather). Relics of a practice involving magical sounds have recently been found among the current usages of Central Europe (e.g., bells on Shrove Tuesday costumes).

b) The ecstatic, or consciousness-transcending, dimension of music marks African and South American religious music, parts of Islamic mysticism, and musical areas of the charismatic and Pentecostal churches. The same description would be valid for the phenomena of Afro-American rock and pop music, with its analogy to religion—or even the techno-raves of the 1990s. Delivered from the pressures of the everyday, this dimension affords people the opportunity both for a specific experience of community, and for consciousness-altering, boundary-transcending experiences (→ Trance). As musical causes and reinforcers of trance, let us cite only the constancy and monotony of a rhythm or tempo, with or without volume changes and stresses or accents. In the shamanic trance, through active musical and choreographical dramatic actions (with singing and drums), the shaman initiates and accompanies a trance in the form of a journey of the soul (→ Shamanism). In the trance of possession, music shores up the identification of the possessed with the particular divinity being invoked, for example in Brazilian Candomblé, in which every deity is assigned a specific musical theme, tailored to her or his identity (→ Afro-American Religions). In Islamic dhikr—the collective public ritual of numerous orders of dervishes, from India to Morocco—singing is at once the invocation of God, and a methodical self-excitation (→ Sufism). Unlike the rhythmic trance, the varieties of mystical absorption (e.g., quiet, solitary, and externally motionless ecstasy) make significant use of musical activity such as the ringing of chime shells, or the singing of mantras, in the initial phase at most. During the meditation itself, there is ordinarily no music.

c) The integrative and communicative dimension of music becomes especially clear when divine praises are sung (or danced, to the accompaniment of rhythmic music) in common, or in a profession on the part of a cultic and celebratory community. In secular societies, → civil religion frequently generates rituals with religious analogies, which serve the formation of national community (national anthems, music at state functions, military music). In large rock and pop concerts and rave parties, loose 'cult communities of the moment' form.

d) The pastoral and therapeutic, and emotional dimension of music can be found as early as the music of David's soothing lyre as he played for Saul (1 Sam 16:14-23). Both playing music and listening to it can have a positive effect in the area of narcissistic experience. Music can stabilize one's feelings of identity and self-worth, and assist the development of experiences of emotionality in the rationalized world of the everyday. For many Europeans, religious music is associated with special memories of seasonal or biographical heights: Christmas, Passiontide, mourning, funerals. Covertly or overtly, there are religious elements in approaches to music therapy ('transpersonal music therapy' and other esoteric forms of music therapy).

e) For Judeo-Christian and Islamic cultural regions, music's rhetorical or 'logogenic' dimension is determinative. Music grows out of the linguistic contract, bears the spoken word, and finally itself becomes proclamatory acoustical discourse, and language of affect. From the emphatic recitation of prayers and sacred scripture develop psalmody, and the special type of linguistic singing known as 'cantillation.' In Judaism, as in Islam, there have been strong pressures that would limit religious music to cantillation alone, and exclude all instruments from divine service.

f) A specifically Western element is the religious or theological appreciation of the aesthetic and artistic dimension of music, an appreciation that has arisen only in modern aesthetics. The autonomous play (including the purely instrumental) of the tonic art, with its independence of external religious purposes and functions, is thought of (for the representatives of the Romantic → art religion) as a revelation of the infinite, or as a prelude to a future condition of society destined to overcome human beings' alienation.

Music as Metaphor and Symbol, as Subject of Myth and Theology

4. On the literary level, music plays an important role as religious metaphor, and as symbol, in saga, folktale, myth, and in philosophical and theological literature. The sounds and rhythms of nature are brought into association with music-making by spirits. In many sacred texts and myths, the origin of music is referred to a deity, or to a primitive divine sound. According to the ancient Indian sound myth, the 'thought of creation' that is Brahma manifests itself in the rhythm and swaying of sound, and emits all of the things of the world. From a later time, we have the conceptualization of the dancing god Shiva, who produces this primitive swaying of creation by his rhythmic drumming. In ancient Greece, accepting Eastern and Babylonian traditions, Pythagoras developed the idea of a harmony of the spheres, by analogy with the construction of the scale of overtones or particular intervals. Out of this theory grew the simultaneous aesthetic appeal to emulate and reproduce the universal celestial harmony in terrestrial life (and in music). Plato took up this idea, and developed a musical ethos. Through the Fathers of the Church, the notion of the harmony of the spheres was handed down all the way to modern times. The great composers and musical theorists of the Renaissance and Baroque understood music as a replica of the heavenly harmony, and a gift of God to be used to the glory of the Creator (with Johann Sebastian Bach as the prime exemplar). In Romanticism, the aesthetic absorption in music is promoted to 'meditation' (Johann Gottfried Herder). This religious pretension on the part of art climaxes in Richard Wagner's theory of art's religious creation across the board, and in his opera "Parsifal." Twentieth-century sketches of a theological appreciation in the twentieth century make a different approach. Recent contributions interpret music as an expression and parable of a liberated humanity and God-willed creativity, or as an article of historical culture, in a context of faith, under the effect of the Spirit of God.

Religious Music in the Present

5. As church music of the various confessions, religious music is solidly and institutionally anchored in the cultural life of Western countries today. Various strands of tradition, and directions in style, coexist in church music: ancient Christian forms of cantillation, psalmody, and hymns live in liturgical songs, in the form of Latin Gregorian chant, and in new translations, especially in the Roman Catholic office of the canonical hours and in the celebration of the Mass. In German-speaking regions, congregational singing—introduced into divine service and community life by Martin Luther—has reached all confessions. Since the time of the Reformation, it has characterized the piety of core-community milieus through hymnals. In addition, a special scene of popular contemporary Christian music (called CCM in the USA) has developed (from 'hits' to rock and 'hip-hop'). The compositions for choir and organ of past centuries, especially Johann Sebastian Bach's organ literature and cantatas, and the Masses of Franz Josef Haydn, Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, and Franz Schubert, are assigned a predominant role, both in divine service and in church concerts. This does not exclude, of course, their contiguity with baroque music, or with moderate modern compositions for liturgical use. Over against this scene stands a sophisticated and innovative avant-garde scene, with less resonance in community life.

In so-called 'serious' music, alongside Christian mysticism (Olivier Messiaen, Arvo Part, Krzysztof Penderecki) and spiritual theology (Dieter Schnebel), we have other forms of piety (cosmo-religion, Karlheinz Stockhausen; Far Eastern, Steve Reich). During the last years we have observed a tendency to the resacralization and 'metaphysical charge'[1] of music.

Since the 1970s (with impetus from the musical "Hair," 1968), a → New Age musical scene has been developing. Meditation on 'primal tones,' gong strokes, and other sounds are practiced and propagated as a method of healing. Simultaneously, the presence of religious texts, and cult-like presentations, or else those whose purpose is trance, has grown stronger in pop culture.

As the twenty-first century gets under way, Christian church-music has lost its monopoly on religious music. As a result, religious music is providing scholarly research, as well as theological evaluation and religious education, with new vistas upon a broad field of manifold relations between music and religion.

1. Wilson, Peter Niklas, "Sacrale Sehnsüchte," in: De la Motte-Haber 1995, 253-66 (citation: p. 263).

Literature

Avorgbedor, Daniel K. (ed.), The Interrelatedness of Music, Religion and Ritual in African Performance Practice, Lewiston 2003; Berendt, Joachim-Ernst, The World Is Sound: Nada Brahma. Music and the Landscape of Consciousness, Rochester 1991; Bubmann, Peter, Urklang der Zukunft. New Age und Musik, Stuttgart 1988; Idem, Von Mystik bis Ekstase. Herausforderungen und Perspektiven für die Musik in der Kirche, Munich 1997; Bubmann, Peter (ed.) Menschenfreundliche Musik. Politische, therapeutische und religiöse Aspekte des Musikerlebens, Gütersloh 1993; de la Motte-Haber, Helga (ed.), Musik und Religion, Laaber 1995; Ellington, Ter, "Music," in: Encyclopedia of Religion 10 (1987), 163-172; Godwin, Joscelyn, Music, Mysticism and Magic: A Sourcebook, London 1987; Idem, Harmonies of Heaven and Earth: Mysticism in Music from Antiquity to the Avant-Garde, Rochester 1995; Hirtler, Eva, Die Musik als scientia mathematica von der Spätantike bis zum Barock, Berlin 1995; Laade, Wolfgang, Musik der Götter, Geister und Dämonen. Die Musik in der mythischen, fabulierenden und historischen Überlieferung der Völker Afrikas, Nordasiens, Amerikas, und Ozeaniens, Baden-Baden 1975; Landels, John G., Music in Ancient Greece and Rome, New York 2001; Pfrogner, Hermann, Musik. Geschichte ihrer Deutung, Freiburg 1954; Rouget, Gilbert, Music and Trance: A Theory of the Relations between Music and Possession, Chicago 1985; Sendrey, Alfred, Music in the Social and Religious Life of Antiquity, Rutherford 1974; Stroh, Wolfgang Martin, Handbuch New Age Musik, Regensburg 1994; Spencer, Jon

Michael, Theological Music: Introduction to Theomusicology, New York 1991; Sullivan, Lawrence E. (ed.), Enchanting Powers: Music in the World's Religions, Cambridge 1997; Tomlinson, Gary, Music in Renaissance Magic: Toward a Historiography of Others, Chicago 1993.

→ Art/Aesthetics, Dance, Perception, Rhythm, Singing/Song, Trance

Peter Bubmann

Mysteries

The Concept

1. Mysteries are 'mysterious'—it sounds banal, and suggestive of a detective story: a "mystery thriller." Nevertheless, the expression indicates an important characteristic. The topic is cults, which comprise the secret actions (rites), narratives (myths), or teachings accessible to or comprehensible by the initiated alone. There are 'private parties,' which seek to guarantee the participants special experiences. They are not exhausted by the fact of → secrecy, to be sure, though the 'secret,' the mysterion, aroused much curiosity. Mysteries are often conducive to the formation of groups, they unite a crowd of 'elect,' who join a deeper knowledge (eschatology, afterlife, the origins of humanity, etc.), with a highly emotional, often highly dramatic ritual experience (alone or in the group)—be it in formal religious communities (mysteries of Mithras, anthroposophy) or—as in Eleusis—informally, as vehicles of a special message or expectation of salvation: "Many are the narthex bearers, but few the Bacchae."[1] Thus, rites of admittance seem to have been specially and impressively fashioned (→ Initiation; there seems to have been no pubertal initiation, however). Indeed, a major element in the attractiveness of mystery cults seems to have been reducible, throughout, to the fact that, at least from time to time, believers could step out of their role as onlookers, and be—rather as in the experimental theater of the twentieth century—actively drawn into the (cultic) event and experience.

Finally, as well: mystery cults are a phenomenon of → European history of religion, and, consequently, are closely connected with Greek and Roman societies in antiquity, and later with → paganism's approaches to religion. A search for comparable phenomena outside Europe will yield particular traits, surely—secret societies and cults, rites of initiation and purification, sacred drama—but no comparable cultic complex. Likewise, any determination of content has turned out to be inadequate: mysteries were not, as was long believed, concerned with dying and rising gods (the thesis of the Religionsgeschichtliche Schule: R. Reitzenstein, J. Leipoldt). Nor are they the forerunners of Christian feasts, although influences in late antiquity are not to be disallowed out of hand.

The Ancient Mysteries

2. The ancient mysteries were first of all special cults ('Sonderkulte') of a polytheistic landscape. Although they were celebrated in particular places (→ Local Devotion), as in Eleusis or on Samothrace, their clientele came from a wider area. If, as in the cult of Isis or Mithras, they consisted of a network of sacred places and dependent communities of worship, they reached a mobile clientele (merchants, nautical personnel, soldiers), and developed an expansive dynamics of group formation, a dynamics that surpassed traditional transmission modes of cult such as subjugation or colonization. To that extent, the ancient mystery cults are a step along the path to universal, globally adoptable and comprehensible religious organizations. A model in antiquity itself was constituted by the "Great Mysteries" of Eleusis, probably itself a bronze-age agrarian cult, connected with the cultic myth of Demeter and Kore, and in classical times part of the Athenian state cult. The two-stage initiation took place in secret. Pariticpants had 'revealed' to them a formula (in Gk., sýnthema) and rites, whose public disclosure was prohibited under pain of death. The complex ritual consisted of a kind of Gesamtkunstwerk (Ger., 'synthesis of the arts'), in which initiands were presented with 'sacred doctrines' (hieroí lógoi), symbolic actions, calculated sensory and emotional alterations (night vs. light, fear vs. joy), and an apparently overpowering 'spectacle' (in Gk., epópteia) to conclude the second initiatory step.

The mystery cults of classical Greece can be understood as including, for example, those of the Kabiroi on Samothrace, those of Hades on Acheron in Epeiros, or those of Dionysus. But these must be distinguished from cults that found propagation with Hellenism and the Roman Empire. There were Eastern and 'Orientalizing' cults, partly imported (Cybele/Magna Mater—Lat., 'Great Mother'—from Anatolian Pessinus), and partly newly arisen from the situation of a multi-religious society, where old myths and traditions were adapted for the new clientele. The cults that often developed their effectiveness only in the well-advanced imperial age (second to fourth centuries CE) bear a certain vigorous imprint from their situation of competition with Christianity—and not the other way around, as was once believed (on which point see W. Burkert). Like all pagan cults, the mystery cults survived Christianization, but not the dissolution of the Roman Empire.

Mysteriosophy

3. With Plato at the latest, mystery cults became the object of philosophical reflection and speculation. Images and formulae from the language of the mysteries became independent. The Eleusinian light presentation, with its 'spectacle,' cultivated philosophical mysticism with magnetic metaphors. By way of the Neoplatonism of → late antiquity, many images and initiatory experiences (in Gk., teletaí) entered European history as 'mysteriosophy,' such as the Ineffable, or the union of theory (in Gk., theoría, 'contemplation') and practical life.

In the twentieth century, it was Rudolf Steiner who, from a point of departure in the Theosophical Society, once more undertook the elaborated attempt to call to life an 'occult science,' with his Anthroposophy, which decidedly appealed to the ancient mysteries, from Egypt to Rome (cycles of lectures Das Christentum als mystische Tatsache, 1901; Ägyptische Mythen und Mysterien, 1908). Between 1910 and 1913 he wrote four 'mystery dramas' that are still regularly performed today.

Art Mysteries

4. The ancient mysteries were religious works of holistic art, spectacles that laid claim to the believer's eye (apparitions of light, cult of Isis; dances), ear (gongs and noises, Eleusis), sense of taste (barley soup of kykéon, Eleusis; sacrificial meals, cult of Mithras), indeed the entire body (bath in the sea, Eleusinian mysteries; see Hermann Nitsch). Their special achievement consisted in their translation of religious messages into suggestive actions.

It is scarcely surprising, then, that mystery cults—or what were taken for such—had their own career, and in the dramatic arts especially. The stage was the place where they survived, in their fantastic shape and further development. Euripides's tragedy The Bacchae (after 405 BCE) marked the image of the mysteries of Dionysus so powerfully, that, to this day, the scholarly world is unable to separate fact (the lesser element) from fiction (the greater) in this piece.

Substitutions, taken from the repertory of the cult of Dionysus, also stand at the center of the twentieth-century attempts of the artistic avant-garde to revive mystery cults in modern times. From the Munich literary circle of Kosmiker (Ger., "Cosmics") around 1900 (see ill. at → Antiquity), to Hermann Nitsch's "Orgies Mystery Theater," in Prinzendorf in Austria ("Six-Day Play," 1998; see ill. at → Blasphemy), the effort continues. 'Mysteries,' in this case, serve to equip an imaginative 'night-side' of classical antiquity, a paganizing 'side' on a collision course with Christianity and German classicism, adopted from the Altertumswissenschaft ('study of classical antiquity'; cf. F. Nietzsche, Die Geburt von Tragödie, Ger., "The Birth of Tragedy," 1872; Erwin Rohde, Psyche, 1890–1894; Jane Harrison, Prolegomena to the Study of Greek Religion, 1903; Albrecht Dieterich, Mithrasliturgie, 1898). Mysteries are intended as the framework, and territory of fantasy, of the drive-laden, 'de-sublimated' (in the terms of popular psychoanalysis) boundary-crossing, be it for the orgiastic 'basic excess' (Ger., 'Grundexzeß,' Nitsch) or for the 'return to the mothers'—e.g. to the cult of the Magna Mater (cf. Alfred Schuler's "Cosmics")—or be it for the 'primitive' experience of a pre-civilization (as Mark Rothko's expression has it: the modern reception of ancient myths must be "more primitive and more modern than the myths themselves"[2]).

The fascination exerted by mystery cults on those who take part in them does not, however, appear to arise first and foremost from the fact that they permit 'license for breach of taboo' (as the bourgeois prejudice would have it, and the bourgeois shock at the avant-garde suggests). Nor it is nutured not only by the sense of possessing an exceptional wisdom. Rather, their fascination emerges from the fact that they stage 'simple forms' (A. Jolles) emphatically, along with employing religious means to do so. Thus, the core rite in Eleusis consisted in showing the initiate, in the 'vision' just mentioned, a single, 'cropped off' ear of grain; the cult of Isis afforded believers the sensory feeling of bathing in purposely fetched water of the Nile; naked, Nitsch's actors are dashed with the blood and lymph of newly slain lambs and bulls, which they eviscerate barehanded; they tread grapes in vats, in traditional fashion. These are all fragments of nature, and demonstrative gestures, isolated, by means of extravagant ritual, from the natural or social environment, and charged with meaning. By means of aesthetic reduction—reinforced to the exclusivity of an ars reservata (Lat., 'reserved art')—a subtle archaism is celebrated, for a cultivated urban audience whom the mystery cults offer exotic 'thrills' and a sensory 'more.' Thus participants found themselves in the priviledged position of a spiritual elite, endowed with an exclusive glance at a better world.

1. Plato, Phaedo, 69c (= Orphicorum Fragmenta, ed. O. Kern, fragment 5). Cf. Matt 22:14: "For many are called, but few are chosen."
2. Sandler, I., The Triumph of American Painting, New York 1970, 68.

Literature

Sources: Iamblichus, De mysteriis, transl. with notes by E. C. Clarke, J. M. Dillon, J. P. Hershbell, Leiden 2004; Nitsch, Hermann, Das Orgien Mysterien Theater. Mani-feste—Aufsätze—Vorträge, Salzburg 1990; Richardson, N. J. (ed.), The Homeric Hymn to Demeter, Oxford [2]1979.

Literature: Burkert, Walter, Ancient Mystery Cults, Cambridge 1987; Clinton, Kevin, Myth and Cult: The Iconography of the Eleusinian Mysteries, Stockholm/Athens 1992; Cosmopoulos, Michael B. (ed.), Greek Mysteries: The Archaeology and Ritual of Ancient Greek Secret Cults, London 2003; Stärk, E., Hermann Nitschs "Orgien Mysterien Theater" und die "Hysterie der Griechen", Munich 1987.

Series: Etudes préliminaires aux religions orientales dans l'empire Romain [EPRO], Leiden 1961ff.

→ Antiquity, Drama (Sacred), Esotericism, Freemasonry, Mysticism, Secrecy

Hubert Mohr

Mysticism

Definition

1. Definition: Mysticism is an umbrella concept for (1) experiences in which boundaries are dissolved—those of the subject, such as in a vacuum of thought, or in ecstasy; those of the object, so that dualities are removed; those of space, to experience the infinite in the finite; those of time, when the 'timeless, everlasting now' replaces successive time. 'Mysticism' also denotes (2) the concepts, teachings, and literary genres that contemplate, recount, or describe this immanent transcendence, or transcendent immanence. Historical, cultural, and biographical contexts mark intention, experience, and interpretation. The intensity and quality of the experience are dependent on whether the transcendence in question is unprepared, and occurs spontaneously, or whether it is induced by techniques; on whether it occurs punctually, regularly, or permanently; on whether it is perceived purely mentally, or expresses itself in strong affects; on whether it is accompanied by (para-) sensory phenomena, such as visions, or even psychosomatic alterations, including permanent marks on the body, like stigmata.

Historical Denotation

2. History of the concept and of its reception: a) Any attempt at a definition of mysticism must be deficient, not only on grounds of the broad spectrum of phenomena seen as mystical, but also on grounds of the historical transformations of the concept. First of all, it denotes the 'closing' (in Gk., muein) of the eyes and lips in the act of initiation into the Greek mystery religions, lest their secret knowledge be betrayed. In Christianity, 'mysticism' acquires the meaning of experiential knowledge of God (in Lat., cognitio Dei experimentalis)—especially, extraordinary 'experiences of God,' understood as a special manifestation of grace, experiences occurring in rapture, visions, and ecstasy, whose purpose is a union with God in love and knowledge (unio mystica, Lat., 'mystical union'). An acquaintance with Eastern teachings whose preferred theme is the one Being 'behind' all that is, in combination with Romantic medievalism, led to a universalization of the concept: it even became possible to speak of an a-religious mysticism. In Romanticism's veer from the Renaissance belief in reason and progress, mysticism became (1) a religion of emotion, of profound inner sensation, and (2) a pantheistic philosophical monism of union. The Romantic rediscovery of mysticism forms the image of mysticism in modern times, and fosters a modern individual piety. Mysticism becomes the expression of a spirituality joining East and

Beyond the Historical Religions

West, a philosophia perennis (Lat., 'eternal philosophy') uniting humanity in a religion beyond institution and historical transformation, a content of all that is deepest and best in the religions.

Experience before Theology

b) Romanticism's image of mysticism characterizes attempts at systematization on the part of early religious science. According to psychologist of religion William James (1902), mystical states are primarily pantheistic and optimistic; far from being knowable in words and concepts ('ineffability'), they are determined by feeling and knowledge, and therefore lead not to a 'faith' open to rational discussion; rather, they transmit subjective insights of unconditional value ('noetic quality'). James holds mystical states to be the root of all religion. For religious scholar Rudolf Otto, as well (1917, 1926), the ultimate foundation of religion is mystical. Each individual religion is 'a priori' preceded by the primitive religious feeling of each individual, and the object of its relation (the numinous); these are the basic data of all religion, inexpressible because they are mystical. The 'essence' of mysticism is held to lie in the preponderance of "irrational and numinous moments" as the "reference object of religious feeling."[1] Thus, 'mysticism' becomes a spongy synonym for any kind of vigorous piety. Typologizations in religious studies such as Friedrich Heiler's distinction (1919) between monistic (mystical) and dualistic (prophetical) religions, and Robert C. Zaehner's differentiation (1957) between monistic (natural) and theistic mysticism challenged Christian apologetics: Christianity is held to be characterized by its prophetical/ethical commitment, while Eastern religions deny the world: redemption by grace plays out against a self-redemption, preferably by psycho-techniques.

"In Its Source, All Is One"

c) Romantic reception retains its effect in definitions of contemporary mysticism, both in the form of: "a primitive religious phenomenon, in which the experience of God occurs in immediate intuition,"[2] and in the form of "a phenomenon that apparently occurs in all religions and cultures, differing, to be sure, in its forms of expression, but everywhere alike at in its core: knowing by experience that everything is somehow connected, that, in its source, all is one" (B. Borchert).[3] Dorothee Sölle, as well (1997), points up a popular understanding of mysticism when she observes that mysticism must not be judged from confessional viewpoints, but that the expression from the Upanishads "Tat tvam asi" ("You are that") joins "a fundamental experience of all mysticism into one."[4] Catholic Carmelite Bruno Borchert and Protestant political theologian Dorothee Sölle are witnesses to the current rediscovery of mysticism in church and theology, expressed as well in numerous publications, especially those on woman's mysticism. In scholarly discourse, the conviction of the existence of a 'universal mysticism' is both called into question and once more maintained.

Cultural Criticism

3. Mysticism as counterculture: a) Beginning with Romanticism, interest in an autonomous 'universal mysticism,' one not bound to any institution or confession, has involved a cultural criticism. Mysticism corresponded to the Romantic program of restoring a lost sense of sentiment, and of the unity of life, to the coldly prosaic Age of Enlightenment. Sölle's statement of intent goes on to say that she refuses to submit to the pressure of modern times, to the 'disenchantment of the world,' and to make science the totalitarian God. Borchert, as well, calls for a mystical attitude and culture, which would draw on an intuitive, not a logical, insight into things. What is new is Sölle and Borchert's ethicization of mysticism as social action, in the spirit of the theology of liberation.

Criticism of Christianity

b) The rediscovery of mysticism in church circles is a 'counter-mission' to the mystical 'boom' of the anti-ecclesial → New Age spirituality. Beginning in the nineteenth century, behind the interest in an autonomous mysticism, has often stood a critical attitude toward Christianity, and the need for a piety free of dogmatic tutelage and ecclesial fetters. Support is found both in → Meister Eckhart's condemnation as a heretic, and in the 'light from the East.' The history of mysticism's reception as a culture counter to church belief on the one hand, and to modernity on the other, has an unbroken line that reaches the present day. Swami Vivekananda's address to the World Parliament of Religions in Chicago (1893) presents the Vedanta and its "idea of the spiritual oneness of the entire universe" as the best remedy for the West, fallen ill with materialism.[5] German publisher Diederichs makes Christianity responsible for the misery of the modern world, and prescribes mysticism as a therapy: in 1909, Buber's Ekstatische Konfessionen (Ger., "Ecstatic Confessions") appeared.[6] In his Geschichte des Atheismus, (Ger., "History of Atheism"; 1920–1923), Fritz Mauthner passionately proclaims the 'godless mysticism' of a liberating pantheism, as over against the formulae of the God of the Christians, formulae now revealed to be devoid of content, and opposed to the 'new God, science,' useless for questions of humanity; in their place, he appeals to 'godless heretics' like Eckhart. The hippie movement sought a society of well-being through Indian wisdom, and through the use of drugs supposed to guarantee mystical experiences. In the New Age doctrine of the new Age of Aquarius, a postmodern malaise is formulated in modern times, and a mysticism of the all-one is mixed with → esotericism and a cult of the body. Beginning with Diederichs, mysticism's orientation to the present world has gained its own: a lexicon for religion (Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 3rd ed., 1960) devotes an entire article, "Neue Mystik" (Ger., "New Mysticism") to the creators of culture as the 'new mystics.'

"Universal Mysticism"?

4. The controversy over a 'universal mysticism': a) The common 'essence,' the coherent, transcultural 'nucleus' of all mysticism was seen by Rudolf Otto in the common subject of reference and in the common experience. Otto's concept of the → Holy remained imprisoned in the Judeo-Christian image of God, so that his 'Western-Eastern mysticism' was actually one-sided. R. C. Zaehner was also biased when it came to belief, since he undervalued monistic mysticism as not being in consonance with reality. Contemporary representatives of a 'universal mysticism' (such as Staal, among others) argue that the possibility of a common experience attaches to the structure of consciousness—something like a mind empty of thought and a psyche as an expansion of the inner world to the outside. Although this argument criticizes Otto and Zaehner, it, too, is based on the supposition that the experience itself is amorphous, and independent of cultural qualifications, and that the background in terms of a Weltanschauung qualifies only interpretation and enunciation: thus, it is only here that the multiplicity of mystical descriptions emerges in the distinct cultures.

b) In the late 1970s, Steven Katz began to present his ever-sharpening criticism of the notion of a 'universal mysticism.' Katz holds that insertion into a given culture and the interweaving of cultural variables and mystical experience are determinative: there is no 'pure,' immediate experience, or 'pure consciousness.' Instead, Weltanschauung and social environment have already generated the experience itself, and not only its description. Nothing can be experienced that is not already 'etched in.' Mysticism is conservative, and endorsing of tradition. Jewish and Christian patterns of experience, for example, are begotten and marked by Jewish and Christian expositions of the Song of Solomon.

Against this, it is argued that a state of consciousness in which knower, known, and knowing are eliminated cannot be explained as historically and culturally conditioned. Proponents claim that such states of consciousness are documented in Hinduism, Buddhism, and with Eckhart. Mystical experiences are relatively frequent.[7] An extreme contextualism makes it impossible to explain the new elements that mystical experiences contain right along with the conservative ones (R. Forman 1990). Jess B. Hollenback (1996) emphasizes the transcultural meaning of practices of concentration that he sees in the introduction of paranormal capacities and new knowledge. Ninian Smart (1983) holds a consciousness devoid of thought, and a feeling of joy immanent to it, to be the main criterion of all mysticism. Smart sees the purified mind as effecting the elimination of the polarity of subject and object, and that this condition explains the theistic interpretational pattern of mysticism as unio, while in traditions in which the ground of being is conceived less powerfully as 'the Other,' the term 'identity' prevails; in traditions that acknowledge neither God nor a ground of being, such as Buddhism, isolation becomes the central concept. According to philosopher Peter Sloterdijk, the conscious intellect in the state of recollection of the silence that precedes speech, and the oceanic feeling thereby experienced, are the 'universal birthright' of all persons, but it is lost in the legacy of the ego and the life of the adult.

Debate over Mysticism

5. Historical: The mediator between the ancient mysteries and Christian mysticism was Neoplatonism. 'Mysticism,' or the 'mystical,' contains an element determined by knowledge, and denotes speculative vision (theoria) and unification (henosis). Their meaning as an immediate experience of God referred to experience is first attested in Origen (third century), and stands in connection with a spiritual interpretation of scripture. Even with Meister Eckhart, 'mystical' denotes almost exclusively the allegorical sense of scripture. In addition, we find liturgical (corpus mysticum) and spiritual, contemplative areas of application. A properly mystical theory was created by Denis the Areopagite (around 500), who is considered the 'father of Christian mysticism.' His Mystical Theology draws on Neoplatonism, and deploys a unification with God by stages (purification, enlightenment, union). Besides the Dionysian theology, Bernard of Clairvaux's (twelfth century) mystical expositions of the Song of Songs were of permanent influence, and introduced a strong affective moment. They found a great echo as a bridal mysticism, and even influenced the mysticism of the Passion. Mysticism is considered to have reached its golden age in the fourteenth century. It is associated with German Dominicans Eckhart, Tauler, and Seuse. But this was also the age of lay spiritual movements, such as that of the Beguines, and of a nuns' spirituality of ecstasy and visions. Women's mystical interest affected the Dominicans. Up until the early twentieth century, there were noteworthy female authors of mystical material: in Germany, from → Hildegard of Bingen (twelfth century) and Mechthild of Magdeburg (thirteenth century), to Edith Stein (twentieth century); in the Netherlands, Hadewijch (thirteenth century); in Italy, Catherine of Siena (fourteenth century); in England, Juliana of Norwich (fourteenth to fifteenth centuries); in Spain, Teresa of Avila (sixteenth century); in France, Margarete Porète (thirteenth to fourteenth centuries), Mme. Guyon (eighteenth century), and Simone Weil (twentieth century). We find the keenest and most philosophical sketch of mysticism in Meister Eckhart, who adopts the Neoplatonic tradition oriented to knowledge. As early as his pupils Tauler and Seuse, the speculative moment became frankly secondary. This tendency continues in Ruysbroeck, and in the Devotio Moderna. It influenced Protestant mysticism and theosophy, whose golden age falls in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and among whose most important representatives are Jacob Böhme and Angelus Silesius. The Age of Enlightenment was little concerned with mysticism, and with its new revival in Romanticism and Idealism, that age divorced itself from theology. With interest in Eastern traditions, which became accessible for the first time only through translations, and the philosophical reception of mysticism in the Middle Ages, mysticism lost its insertion into social history (piety of religious orders, Franciscan poverty movement, the Beguines, Dominican nuns' pastoral care), and the mottos 'bare feeling,' 'pantheism,' and 'monism' came to determine the image of mysticism. Only in recent times was Christian mysticism rediscovered in its context.

Transcultural Constants

6. Comparative aspect: a) Mystical testimonials are found in all religions, as diverse as cosmic linguistic speculations and the → Kabbalah; unions with Christ in love, and the imitatio of the Passion, as in Christian traditions; instillation by the attributes of Allah, as in Sufism; experience of the Void, as in Mahayana Buddhism; identity with the super-personal Absolute, as in Advaita-Vedanta; shamanistic journeys to the beyond, as in tribal cultures—all of these may be understood as mystical in the sense of boundary-transcending. Prototypal transcultural constants are: (1) release of the old sense of self or ego; (2) light metaphors and light visions; (3) practices of concentration; (4) subjective interiorization of what the culture in question understands as the highest reality; (5) stylistic means like paradox and apophasis (lapse into silence); (6) images such as that of sinking in the ocean; (7) experiences of totality, in such expressions of reciprocal immanence as "I in God and God in me," or "everything is absorbed in the whole, and the whole in everything"; (8) positive feelings like joy, repose, beatitude, as well as—especially in Christian mysticism—interruption of the experience by phases of extreme desperation. It seems to be a consequence of the structure and prospects of human consciousness, and of the psyche, that certain typological patterns emerge in various cultures. Thus the quest for a mind without an object is connected with non-theistic speech, non-dualistic systems, and a mysticism of knowledge or philosophy, while affect, ecstasy, and vision tend to be theistic or object-referred, and the expansion of the inner to the outer world evokes the reciprocal experience of the inflation of the object in the subject. An ecstatic mysticism of love, a sensuous bridal mysticism (in → Sufism, → Kabbalah, Christianity, Krishnaism) presuppose a theistic and dual system, and are absent in Advaita-Vedanta, Yoga, Zen Buddhism, and Daoism. Visions are usually attached to meditative practices, and an active imagination, that bring the deity to 'real' apparition. They are found in Christianity as in Tantric traditions, but are conceived in Christianity as an irruption from above, and in Tantrism as mental projection. Just so, there are mystical linguistic speculations in dualist systems such as that of the Jewish Kabbalah, and in non-dualist systems as in Kashmiric Shivaism. Mystics of all times, male and female, have made an essential contribution to the history of piety in their respective religious traditions: vivid personal experience, deepening and reinterpretation of received conceptions of faith, interiorization and incarnation of religion. But they have not found the same acceptance in all cultures. While they took on an (often conflictive) outsiders' role in Christianity and Islam, and exerted little influence on religion, Hinduism and Buddhism are simply inconceivable without a mystical imprint.

Translation

b) The methodological difficulty in comparison consists in the fact that structural analogies, comparative categories, and translations produce commonality where it may be that none exists. Concepts like oneness, being, 'extinction,' and light are polyvalent. When Eckhart speaks of an understanding beyond the emergence of thoughts—which gives the appearance of binding him with Eastern traditions—he cannot conceive and experience this understanding otherwise than as stamped by Christianity; indeed, as locus of the oneness of the three Persons as well as the unity that is the primitive image of all being, as locus of the continuous birth of God and ongoing creation. Mystical experience is tied to cultural plausibility, and the latter is variable. Bengalese saint Ramakrishna (nineteenth century) is said to have been introduced into various traditions, and there not only to have had corresponding experiences of unification, but also to have had visions of Jesus, Mary, Kali, and Krishna, and nonetheless to have remained a burning devotee of Kali lifelong. The universality of patterns of experience, and the diversity of cultural plausibility and acceptance, come to light in a comparison precisely of this Ramakrishna with an unknown Frenchwoman, undertaken by psychoanalyst Sudhir Kakar and philosopher Catherine Clément. Seen psychologically, the Indian and his French contemporary would seem to have experienced the same states of ecstatic mysticism: but while Ramakrishna in India became an acknowledged saint, the Frenchwoman was confined to an institution as mentally ill.

7. Historical apparition and human experience: Ever since Romanticism, 'mysticism' has been applied as a universal concept, and even applied to non-religious phenomena. When mystical phenomena are observed in their historical connection, differences come to light more than a single 'universal mysticism': the latter concept stands in need of more precision. A psychological approach, on the other hand, makes it possible to continue to apply the concept transculturally. Even in Western contexts, the empty mind has become plausible today: Yugoslavian performing artist Marina Abramovic, for example, by means of passions that she herself portrays, seeks to break through to a 'purified mind.' Mysticism has marketable value, as shown by 'play' with mysticism in advertising, in the form of both direct and indirect allusions to states of rapture. Doubtless this has little to do with any inner responsibility, or the rigors and renunciations of a mystical life, and yet it may be the most arresting demonstration of a common human yearning for totality and an 'oceanic feeling' (Freud), as well as of a widespread, if, surely, diffuse, knowledge of mystical states.

1. Otto 1926, 194.
2. Richter, in: Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 3rd ed., 2, 1237.
3. Borchert 1997, 11 and passim.

4. Sölle 1997, 34; 76.
5. Cf. Halbfass 1981, 260.
6. Cf. Kippenberg 1997, 245.
7. Borchert 1997, 13; Sölle 1997, 28; 31-41; Clément/Kakar 1993.

Literature

Borchert, Bruno, Mystik. Das Phänomen—Die Geschichte—Neue Wege, Freiburg 1997; Buber, Martin, Ecstatic Confessions: The Heart of Mysticism, Syracuse 1996 (German [1]1909); Clément, Catherine/Kakar, Sudhir, La folle et le saint, Paris 1993; Fanning, Steven, Mystics of the Christian Tradition, London 2001; Forman, Robert K. C. (ed.), The Problem of Pure Consciousness, New York 1990; Halbfass, Wilhelm, Indien und Europa. Perspektiven ihrer geistigen Begegnung, Basel 1981 (Engl.: India and Europe: An Essay in Understanding, Albany 1988); Hollenback, Jess Byron, Mysticism: Experience, Response, and Empowerment, University Park 1996; James, William, The Varieties of Religious Experience: A Study in Human Nature, New York [27]1916 ([1]1902); Katz, Steven T. (ed.), Mysticism and Religious Traditions, Oxford 1983; Kippenberg, Hans G., Die Entdeckung der Religionsgeschichte. Religionswissenschaft und Moderne, Munich 1997 (Engl.: Discovering Religious History in the Modern Age, Princeton 2002); Luhmann, Niklas/Fuchs, Peter, Reden und Schweigen, Frankfurt/M. 1992; McGinn, Bernard, The Presence of God: A History of Western Christian Mysticism, 4 vols., London 1992; Otto, Rudolf, West-östliche Mystik. Vergleich und Unterscheidung zur Wesensdeutung, Munich 1971 ([1]1926) (Engl.: Mysticism East and West: An Analysis of the Nature of Mysticism, York [2]1957); Ruh, Kurt, Geschichte der abendländischen Mystik, Munich 1990ff.; Smart, Ninian, "The Purification of Conscicousness and the Negative Path," in: Katz 1983, 117-129; Sölle, Dorothee, Mystik und Widerstand, "Du stilles Geschrei," Hamburg 1997; Staal, Frits, Exploring Mysticism, Middlesex 1975; Zaehner, R. C., Mysticism, Sacred and Profane: An Inquiry into Some Varieties of Praeternatural Experience, Oxford 1957.

→ Esotericism, Hildegard of Bingen, Kabbalah, Meister Eckhart, Mysteries, Psyche, Secrecy

Annette Wilke

Myth / Mythology

"Essence" of Myth?

1. a) The 'essence' of myth resists univocal definition. Myth has a narrative structure; certain repeatable events are narrated that lie beyond space and time, and are deposited at certain nodal points of human existence. In a broader sense, myth is a recounted history (of gods and demigods) by means of which a body of knowledge is handed on that grows from generation to generation. Today, a distinction between myth and other narratives is regarded as impossible, and seen rather as a late construct. A further problem: the study of the cultures that have been researched only by way of their literature is more and more recognized as inadequate. Models obtained from Greek myths transmitted in writing are not transferable to non-writing cultures. This type of sacred narrative, myth as oral commentary on a ritual action, is simply absent from many cultures. In other cultures, myths are categorized with dreams, and expressly distinguished from reality. Furthermore, the notion (first found in Pindar) of myth as standing at the opposite pole from logos, or as a stepping-stone thereto, has today been abandoned. Rather, myth represents an early form of rationality; etiological myths are forms of high rationality. This aspect appears in the very history of the word: múthos is an artificial word from the early Greek epos, and originally meant the same as lógos: both mean 'word.' Logos is meaning-charged word, reasonable discourse; myth, even as late as the time of Sophocles, is the spoken word, or, more rarely, a hieros logos, sacred word, and finally, (untrue) narrative (fabula—Lat., 'fable'), the saga of the gods. In German, the word is attested at the beginning of the sixteenth century, as Fabel (Ger., 'fable'); only two hundred years later does it acquire the meaning of 'narrative of gods.' Today the term is popular, ever since Georges Sorel, as a timeless, methodic and scientific grasp of a phenomenon no longer existing. But this altogether contradicts ancient tradition, in which there was no 'myth' as continuous quantity: rather every myth was bound to a particular place and a particular cult. Since the Enlightenment, however, myth has no longer found any accepted organizing form or speech among Western people. It is precisely this removal, however, that provides the fascination of the hermeneutic universe.

Functions

b) Instead of the question of the 'essence' of myth, the search for the functions that mythic narratives have seems more fertile. In all tribal cultures, myth combines various fundamental functions: (1) in cult and religion, it transmits sacred truths, and decides between guilt and innocence; (2) in social history, it recounts the history of an institution, a rite, or a societal development; (3) politically, myths are the expression of a primary collective narcissism, and enable a society to present itself; finally, there are (4) the instructive or edifying function (exemplum), and (5) the aesthetic one. All of these functions have long since become disparate today; myth is the object of altogether distinct traditions of thought. There is no comprehensive history of myth as such, but only diverse concepts of myth within the specific sciences, each concept with its specific history. Today, then, we speak of an anthropological and ethnological concept of myth, a sociological one, a philosophical one, a psychological and psychoanalytic one, and one used by religious studies.

Methods

c) As important methods of the interpretation of myth, three can be classified: (1) In the functional theory, myths justify societal givens, and legitimize the status quo of the social relations in question. (2) The symbolical theory considers myth as a way of thinking, with similarities to the dream. The laws of time, nature, and society current among us are not in force. Similarities and parallels among myths from various societies suggest that they reflect universal manners of thinking (C. G. Jung). (3) The structural method analyzes myth into the elements of its content and its motifs, and clarifies how these relate to one another, so that the scholar may here have something similar to the cross-section of subterranean geological layers that reveal basic structure. A fundamental pattern found in myths is the counteraction of opposites. C. Lévi-Strauss, for example, understands myths as a composite image of opposites: nature and culture, male and female, order and chaos. In each case, our distance from myth has become unbridgeable—where we encounter myths, they are usually only 'remnants' (Taubes), for example the biblical myths of original sin or of the creation of the world. And the more recent (Gen 1) of the two creation myths itself represents a demythologizing vis-à-vis Babylonian myths of the emergence of the world. The myths of popular culture that arise in the modern age can scarcely be explained on the criteria used by the sciences (→ New Myths/New Mythologies).

Truth in Plato

2. a) 'Myth' (in the singular) is a theoretical construct on the part of the European sciences. The problem of how myths are to be interpreted (philosophically) arises with the interpretation of Homer. This difficulty becomes clear as early as Plato. It is impossible, holds the latter, to speak adequately about God when the many gods of whom Homer tells have human shape and weaknesses. Accordingly, Plato replaces these myths with a reason-oriented 'discourse upon the one divine' (theo-logia). In the poetry criticism of the Republic, Socrates observes, in a discussion of questions of upbringing, that children are first told 'myths'; these myths, as the 'Untrue,' are set over against the 'True.' In the Symposium, truth is of mythical origin, but is consigned to philosophy. In the Phaedrus, Plato leaves the question of truth open, but in an almost ironical tone, indicates difficulties that are anything but slight, and that recommend restraint on the part of the interpreter. Meanwhile, Plato himself has recounted myths in his Dialogues, which have no clear reference to a cult, and are logically expounded. Myths are presented in the ancient tradition in cultic manifestations, and then, in poetical variation, in tragedy, and thus philosophical truth is withdrawn from the regions of the sacred, to become accessible for everyday life.

Allegory

b) If, despite all, in Plato and Aristotle across the board, the relation between mythos and logos remains extensively undetermined, subsequently an ever-stronger reinforcement of this relationship is observable. Here the Stoa cultivated especially the allegorical method of rational reinterpretation, which saw in the gods personified natural powers. Subsequently, philosophers long held myths to be allegories of philosophical truths. Neoplatonism then sought to envelop ancient mythology with the concept that, under the Romans, myths had lost their cultic and justifying function. The primary goal was philosophically fixed and systematized thought. The philosophical exposition of myth in Neoplatonism made myth a metaphor with a philosophical function, that is, it made it allegory. This interpretation gradually destroyed it as a religious phenomenon. Until the nineteenth century, the ancient myths of the gods were interpreted allegorically or symbolically. In late Christian antiquity, which reckoned the pagan religions a distortion of the original religion revealed in Paradise, the use of allegory for the exposition of scripture remained an exception; but in the Middle Ages, processes of the presentation of scripture became differentiated. Even the Renaissance defended the value of pagan fables, appealing to the allegorical sense hidden behind them, so that it became valuable for Christians to read the works of pagan authors. Euhemerism, which supposed myths to contain a precipitation of historical events, saw human personalities behind the gods, figures that had especially deserved recognition, and that therefore had been elevated to divinity after death.

Natural Religion?

3. a) In the age of the Renaissance, and of the first great trans-oceanic discoveries, the traditional Christian image of the world underwent a profound crisis. The question of a 'natural religion,' lying at the basis of all religions equally, became acute, in view of the discovery of completely unknown peoples in America, and then in Japan, China, and the remote parts of India. In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, Christian missionaries investigated the sacred ceremonies of the 'savages' with the greatest attention. The myths of the other peoples were subjected to Christian Eurocentrism. The missionaries applied the principles of late antiquity, and compared Indian cults and sanctuaries with those of antiquity: thus, South American cannibalism seemed a direct descendant of the ancient bacchanalia. In the eighteenth century, ethnography broadened the horizon of a comparison of 'primitive' religions with contemporary forms. Accordingly, it was in the eighteenth century that the first approaches to a historical appraisal of the classical religions arose. From the fifteenth to the seventeenth centuries, the Greek gods and figures were matched with those of the Hebrew Bible (G. I. Vossius, 1641), after which, in 1724, Joseph François Lafitau saw the similarity between the Greek and Indian mythological narratives. Freethinkers set the religion of the 'savages' over against the Christian Church, as the pure religion of reason. For the Enlightenment, mythology belonged to the darkness of idolatry, and Greek religion was superstition. Only the loss of faith in the true, spiritual God was supposed to have led to the adoration of personified forces of nature. At most, mythology was permitted to artists, scholars, and anyone educated, as 'useful knowledge,' to be listed in dictionaries (Lessing, Hederich). A historical criticism of myth was by and large regarded as passé, and as a form of knowledge that had been replaced.

Myth in 'Art Religion'

b) Around 1800, myth could mount neither a religious claim nor a moral one; but it survived as poetical existence. The notion of myth as a poetical process is unimaginable without the antecedent phenomenon of Giambattista Vico. In 1725, in contradiction with the Enlightenment to follow, Vico stressed the independence of the aesthetic and graphic principle vis-à-vis the logical and discursive one. For him, the discourse of myth corresponded to the discourse of poetry. He saw in the mythic process an independent interpretation of reality, and developed the idea of a mythological world dictionary. In mythology, Vico saw an autonomous and, despite its primitive character, legitimate path to reality and to transcendence. With his view of myth as a testimonial to the cultural history of the first peoples, as the initial poetical awareness of humanity, Vico ensured the vitality of myth throughout a Renaissance age hostile to myth, and laid the groundwork for a reception of myth on the part of the German classicists, especially in Romanticism. Influenced by Vico, Herder then definitively withdrew myth from the Enlightenment criticism, elucidating it as graphic poetical discourse. Herder was no longer concerned with a definition of myth and truth, but only with poetical application—in short, with the rescue of the honor of myth as a poetical tool. With Herder as his point of departure, Christian Gottlob Heyne laid the foundations of the modern concept of myth; Friedrich August Wolf, Friedrich Schlegel, Friedrich Creuzer, and Wilhelm von Humboldt were his auditors. For him, myth is a form of conceptualization and expression of the childhood of the human race. Myths have definitively lost their allegorical or religious function. Nineteenth-century attempts, such as that of Creuzer, to see the religious phenomenon in myth once more as primary, were doomed to destruction from the outset; the same holds for Richard Wagner. In the introduction to his Götterlehre (1795), Karl Philipp Moritz expressly disallows any allegorical interpretation of the Greek world of the gods. With the Greek myths, holds Moritz, it is a matter of 'artistic literature,' and this literature must be "regarded as a discourse of fantasy." For him, only aesthetic, not ethical criteria, do justice to mythic literature: the presentation of the gods takes place "over and above all concepts of morality." Mythology, then, is neither simple allegory, nor the precipitant of an ancient history, but artistic literature. Only in their aesthetic function do mythological functions have a right to existence. The supreme end of mythology is beauty: the doctrine of the gods becomes aesthetics. This aesthetic interpretation of the world of the Greek gods is as near Goethe and Schiller as it was an influence on Schelling and August Wilhelm Schlegel (→ Art Religion).

The New Mythology

c) It is especially (German and English) Romanticism that renders myth altogether freely available for modernity, as may be demonstrated by the cases of William Blake and Novalis. The idea of a 'new mythology' must overcome the allegorical reduction of the mythical, and call into being the artwork of the modern age across the board. This ambition was programmatically executed in the so-called "The Oldest Systematic Program of German Idealism" (1797). Against the allegorical and euhemeristic interpretation, in the nineteenth century Friedrich Wilhelm Joseph Schelling stands out: his Philosophy of Mythology (1842) discards all Enlightenment interpretation of mythology, holding that the latter seeks philosophically to demonstrate the possibility of a real intercourse of human beings with personified principles. Walter F. Otto (1874–1958) took up again in the twentieth century the tradition of Romanticism, which had been interrupted with Schelling. Ernst Cassirer (1874–1945), as well, embraced Schelling, although he went far beyond him with the development of a new theory of consciousness, namely, the teaching of the symbolic forms. Myth, for Cassirer, appears as part of a form of life. After his emigration to the United States, Cassirer devoted himself to the investigation of myths in relation to today's societies; the fruit of these efforts toward an appraisal in terms of a critique of ideology is his last work, The Myth of the State, in which he investigates "the technology of modern political myths," in order to understand the genesis of the National Socialist state. Here there is a link with Sorel, who, it is true, more or less cynically, recognizes the fictive character of myths, but nonetheless had justified their use as an instrument of political and social control. An alternative conception was developed in the chef-d'oeuvre of Theodor W. Adorno and Max Horkheimer, Dialektik der Aufklärung (Ger., "Dialectic of the Enlightenment"; 1947). In this work, prehistoric myth survives in the modern age, in at first indistinguishable transformations, but ancient myth itself represents a primitive form of emancipating rationality: "Myth itself is Enlightenment, and: the Enlightenment collapses in mythology." The concept of myth laid down here as the correspondence of an overpowered and repressed (and thereby fearful) nature, and the theory of civilization that appeals to that concept, is increasingly called into question today. Hans Blumenberg's Arbeit am Mythos (Ger., "Work on Myth") is intended as a response—as a polemical answer to the Dialektik der Aufklärung. Blumenberg holds that myth makes possible a disempowering of archaic fears. Overcoming certain life situations and fears, myth acquires a first distance, and is incipient rationality. This work of myth can only be realized in a never-ending work on myth. Kurt Hübner attempts to reconcile myth with rationality (and indeed that of the modern natural sciences). According to Ricoeur, we cannot transpose myth into our era, but we can transform it into symbol, and analyze it in terms of what it offers us by way of material for thought. Following the later Heidegger, literature and poetry (especially Hölderlin) seem to vouch for the continued effect of myth (Bröcker, Liebrucks, and others).

Myth as Enlightenment

4. a) In current discussion, the value of philosophical mythology lies in the possibility of a broadened motif of explanation of the essence of rationality, and ultimately of human culture as such. Myth becomes a sign of self-criticism on the part of modern philosophy, and the concepts of rationality that are its vehicle. To an extent, this critique issues in an anarchistic revolt against reason, equivalated with rule ('post-modernity') and itself issuing in the attempt to reach totality and immediacy. Feminism sharpens the problem to the antithesis between matriarchal myth and patriarchal reason (following Bachofen). Here as elsewhere, myth becomes an instrument for certain political interests. A further important tendency in current discussion is the stronger attention to anthropological and paleontological findings, and a regard directed toward other cultures. Anthropologists point out that the determination of myth in terms of the relation of tension between logos and mythos should be surrendered, in order that the profound difference between oral and writing cultures may lie open to description. The danger in concentration on the written fixing of myth consists in the dissolution of myth from its social and cultural environment. Myths of a given society can be meaningfully interpreted only contextually.

Return of Myth in Religion

b) The 'savage thinking' (pensée sauvage, Lévi-Strauss) of descriptive anthropology becomes the leading science for other sciences as well—astonishingly, in the case of large parts of today's theology, which is once more entering upon a study of myth. These attempts of the new theology at a rehabilitation of myth (as seen at the Sixth International Congress of Theologians, Vienna, 1987) are especially astonishing in view of the fact that, three decades before, with his reduction of theology to philosophy and hermeneutics, Rudolf Bultmann had broken with a tradition that—since the end of the eighteenth century—following Heyne, had systematically applied a rhetorical analysis of myth to the exegesis of the Hebrew Bible and, shortly thereafter, of the New Testament. Bultmann's program of 'demythologization' was only the negative side of his existentialist interpretation of the Bible. The goal of this interpretation was Jesus's 'kerygma,' his preaching, and not his miracles. Bultmann's leading science was (explanatory) natural science. Today, exposition with commentary, exegesis, has become narrative, and embraces Hebrew Bible and New Testament alike.

Unmanaged Myth

c) The meaning of myth for life—the function of myths in the present—is still broadly unexplained today. Kolakowski has made the first allusions to this serviceability of myth for life. His concern was the integration, into a comprehensive outline of the world, of the non-rational grounds controlling our activity, as these grounds manifest their urgency in the problem of death and love. It is a matter of the transformation of the coincidental (contingency) into something necessary for our biography. Our highly disenchanted, reified, rational life is ruled by mythical structures that only have other names. Does the 'rationality' of myth not contain certain essential elements that can be replaced only imperfectly, if at all, with the idea of an interpretation of the world through the sciences? Are these essential elements concealed, for example, in → art?

Literature

Blumenberg, Hans, Arbeit am Mythos, Frankfurt/M. 1979; Bolle, Kees W., "Myth," in: Encyclopedia of Religion 10 (1988), 261-273; Cassirer, Ernst, An Essay on Man: An Introduction to a Philosophy of Human Culture, New Haven 1944; Cohen, Percy S., "Theories of Myth," in: Man and World N.S. 4 (1969), 337-353; Cunningham, Adrian (ed.), The Theory of Myth: Six Studies, London 1973; Daniel, Stephen H., Myth and Modern Philosophy, Philadelphia 1990; Kirk, Geoffrey Stephen, Myth: Its Meaning and Functions in Ancient and Other Cultures, London/Berkeley 1975; Lincoln, Bruce, Discourse and the Construction of Society: Comparative Studies of Myth, Ritual, and Classification, New York 1989; Idem, Theorizing Myth: Narrative, Ideology, and Scholarship, Chicago 1999; Olson, Allan M. (ed.), Myth, Symbol and Reality, London 1980; Reynolds, Frank/Tracy, David (eds.), Myth and Philosophy, Albany 1990; Ricoeur, Paul, "Myth and History," in: Encyclopedia of Religion 10 (1988), 273-281; Rogerson, J. W., Myth in Old Testament Interpretation, Berlin 1974; Strenski, Ivan, Four Theories of Myth in Twentieth-Century History: Cassirer, Eliade, Lévi-Strauss and Malinowski, Basingstoke 1987; Williamson, George S., The Longing for Myth in Germany: Religion and Aesthetic Culture from Romanticism to Nietzsche, Chicago/London 2004.

→ Collective Representations, Fairytale, New Myths/New Mythologies, Reception, Religion

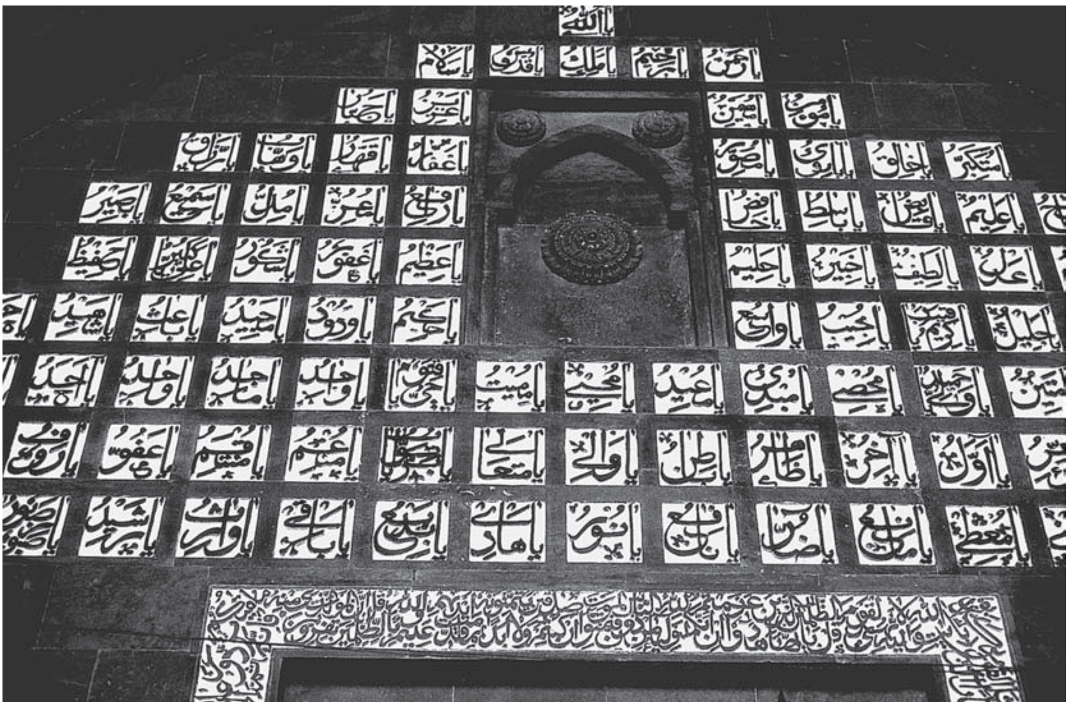
Christoph Jamme

Name(s)

Definition

The expression name indicates a certain category of words that serve to designate persons and groups (peoples, classifications of peoples, families), localities (countries, places, mountains, rivers), things (animals, plants, stars, days of the weak, months and seasons, institutions, colors) and events (Waterloo, Bethlehem) in their individuality and singularity. Proper names (nomen proprium) refer to individual objects. This distinguishes them from appellatives (and: classifications, nomen appellativum), which denote an entire kind ('angels,' 'devils'). A distinction can be made between given name and surname—the epithet usually has a concretizing function—and, on a borderline between proper name and appellative, 'titulature' (designations of profession, rank, or function). Names behave as do other linguistic signs, although they are of course far less subject to historical developments. Their etymological opacity frequently immunizes them, partially or wholly, from the processes of linguistic alteration, so that their development is halted—especially in the case of names of gods. Not infrequently, this makes them valuable witnesses of earlier conditions and states. Their function as names, meanwhile, remains untouched, as long as they continue to be the vehicles of the identification of objects to be named.



Names of Gods

(Proper) names include personal names, which are split into professional or given names and surnames or family names, and under these, again, divine names, form a special category. Second only to the graphic representation, the latter are the essential point of references for traditional notions of the gods, and therefore play an immensely important role in the area of religion. Of course, in 'aniconic' ('pictureless') cults, they acquire special importance. To address the intended god, in the rituals of these cults, requires the most precise designation possible, along with appertaining epithets. The intended perfect ascription of as many functions as possible is one of the bases of divine polynymity, which pierces the principle of relation to a single object. In prayers and hymnic formulas, it can be left entirely to the discretion of the deity invoked to choose its own favorite name from amongst the multiplicity of denominations proposed.

Names in Magic and Charms

Names enable users of a language to produce a special relationship to a non-speaking reality. These persons largely organize their immediate environment by way of names that capture persons and (in the broadest sense) things. In the linguistic area, then, lie the presuppositions for interpreting the structure and course of the environmental event as social relationships, and for differentiating the originally undifferentiated extra-social environment into quasi-personal units (Gladigow 1975). This potential bestows a special quality on the 'denominability' of things: by the use of names, a person can 'handle' even inanimate objects on the model of their relationship to human beings. Thus, the connection of human beings to their environment is beset with the same risks as 'ordinary' social relationships (disturbed communication, unreachable correspondent, his or her hostility, and so on). Attempts to limit, or even to exclude, such uncertainties often avail themselves of the name. That it fully represent the person named, that identity be produced and guaranteed, is the basis for name sorcery and name → magic. The one who knows the name can seize and summon the one who bears it. The vocal realization of the name generally guarantees the presence of the one who is absent, and this means power of disposition—origin of the techniques of antiquity and modernity alike. Of course, using the techniques of magical actions require the most exact knowledge possible of all of the names of the

The windows of a mosque in Srinagar, in Kashmir, carry ninety-nine names of Allah. Monotheism is a basic principle of Islam, but a tradition of ninety-nine 'most beautiful' names has formed, whose hundredth is regarded as undisclosed. Theological bases are suras 7:180, 17:110, and 20:8, which aver: "He has the most beautiful names of all." Not all of them are taken directly from the Qur'an, so that traditions differ minimally. Knowledge of the ninety-nine names is looked upon as very target object. Such instrumental application of the name entails strategies of keeping it secret (→ Secrecy). The 'right' name may be known to but a few, or someone or something may have no name. If the pronunciation of a name is necessary, yet the apparition of the bearer of the name thereby accomplished is nevertheless not intended, the application of certain epithets, or a paraphrase instead of the name, is indicated. In positively applied predications ('euphemisms') are not only an avoidance of the name, it is true, but also options for a turn to the benevolent, facilitating. But on the other side, any (intentional) falsification can be regarded as an attack on the person, and thus can lead to hostile reactions on the part of the bearer of the name.

When the name fully represents the particular person named, she or he becomes the object of interpretations (histories of origin—etiologies—etymologies), to be 'explained' in terms of essential characteristics of the one named. At the same time, this interpretive effort can again present an attempt to overcome the arbitrary nature of the relation between names and the named. Applied to divine names, this procedure leads not infrequently to theological (in the sense of appertaining to the one, sole, received religion) pronouncements pertaining to or revealing the true essence of a god. Abstractions of the names of God are sufficient for the demand for linguistic transparency: shady or purposely shaded names, such as Demeter, Poseidon, Janus, and—from the Indo-Iranian area—Vishnu and Yima correspond to Dike ('Justice'), Eros ('Love'), Fortuna ('Luck'), Sri Laksmi ('Luck'), and Ahura Mazda ('Wisdom').

3. Name and name-bearer (the object named) are bound by an altogether close tie, of a sort that, without their names, things possess no existence—simply are not. This relationship holds especially for personal names. Thus, human beings ordinarily have a name only when they are a person. Profound alterations in the characteristics of a person, then, are ordinarily accompanied by a change of name. Initiation, marriage, death, reception into cultic groups, accession to an office, are the principal occasions for discarding the old name and adopting a new one. On the other side, loss of status as a person can entail the loss of (the right to) a name. In Rome, the name of the person executed for high treason was blotted out of all public and private records (damnatio memoriae), and the person that committed suicide was buried in an unmarked grave. But the highly placed person can be nameless in internal social relationships: for example, the husband was not addressed by name by his wife, of the master by his servant, or the ruler by his subjects.[1] Such hierarchies are also frequently grounds for divine namelessness: Judaism did not dare even to pronounce the name YHWH. However, namelessness can also be an extreme form of the name taboo—Indian Rudra, a terrible form of Shiva, is only designated as 'that God'—or can have its cause in an exclusive relationship between God and venerators. (Numerous examples of 'nameless Gods' are produced by mystery and chthonic cults, and even the one God of monotheistic systems is nameless.)[2] On the other hand, theory of culture repeatedly argued that namelessness can also mean 'pre-culture' or 'non-culture.' important. Their recitation is of key importance for meditation with the subha (a prayer cord similar to the rosary, with ninety-nine beads), and especially in the dikr (trance ceremonies) of many orders of dervishes (→ Sufism). The theological branch of the Waḥḥabīya (→ Mecca), on the other hand, rejects the teaching of the names of God as heretical innovation. (Agnes Imhof)

Choice of Name

4. The conceptualization of the experience of identity depending somehow on the correlation of name and named raises the choice of a personal name to the status of an extraordinarily important matter. In some cultures the point in time and the procedure for the ritual conferral of a name are exactly determined. The former usually lies at the end of the phase of the 'uncleanness' caused by the birth, which in the Indo-Germanic area could last nine (full) days (whence the name dies lustricus, 'day of purification,' for the day on which the name is conferred). And, naturally, the name itself is the object of multiple interventions: wealth and success should be promised by it, and woe repelled; it should not only identify, but also (or especially) characterize—desired qualities are bestowed, relations to exemplars and norms of social value are produced. However, the choice of a forename is also powerfully determined by the currents of time. Each group has its vogue—Germanic, biblical, French, or American names. Since early medieval times, the forename has been bestowed in conjunction with baptism, and it has customarily been the name of a saint—a usage that has been preserved from the sixteenth century to the present in the bestowal of two (or more) forenames. It was this religious meaning of the naming that was the basis, until the most recent past, in strict Christian families, of celebrating the birth of the child on the saint's name day rather than on the child's birthday, the latter being regarded as a pagan usage and approved by the Church only in the fifth century.

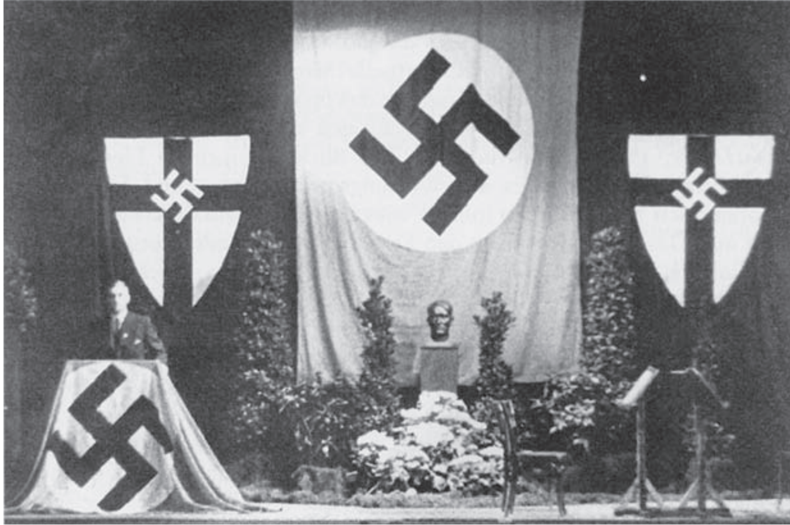
The circumstance that names can be ordered to determinate languages, and thereby to determinate 'traditions,' can in certain contexts lead to the stigmatization, discrimination, and wholesale exclusion of their bearers, for example when members of minorities are recognizable and identifiable by their environment merely on the basis of their names (e.g, Jewish citizens in the "Third Reich" or foreigners). Here as well, by way of a name change, for instance by marriage, or through the surrender of the original name, a new identity (as it were) can be acquired (cf. parag. 3).

1. Hirzel, Rudolf, Der Name. Ein Beitrag zu seiner Geschichte im Altertum und besonders bei den Griechen, Leipzig 1918, 26f.
2. Cf. Graf 1996, 1827–1829.

Literature



Bering, Dietz, Der Name als Stigma. Antisemitismus im deutschen Alltag 1812–1933, Stuttgart 1992 ([1]1988); Bremmer, Jan, "Heroes, Rituals and the Trojan War," in: Studi Storico-Religiosi 2 (1978), 5-38; Gladigow, Burkhard, "Götternamen und Name Gottes," in: von Stietencron, Heinrich (ed.), Der Name Gottes, Düsseldorf 1975, 13-32; Idem, "Zur Konkurrenz von Bild und Namen im Aufbau theistischer Systeme," in: Brunner, Hellmut et al. (eds.), Wort und Bild, Munich 1979, 103-122; Graf, Fritz, "Namen von Göttern im klassischen Altertum," in: Eichler, Ernst (ed.), Namenforschung. Ein internationales Handbuch zur Onomastik, 2. Teilband, Berlin 1996, 1823-1837; Mitterauer, Michael, Ahnen und Heilige. Namengebung in der europäischen Geschichte, Munich 1993.

→ Family/Kinship/Genealogy, God/Gods/The Sacred, Initiation, Kabbalah, Magic, Socialization /Upbringing

Thomas Oberlies

National Socialism

1. It is a characteristic of the modern age to have separated, ever since the Enlightenment, the political sphere from the religious (→ Secularization). Laicistic state entities justify their rule by reasonable laws and free elections,

Not coincidentally, this National Socialist Celebration Room (Gelsenkirchen, Germany) resembles the interior of a church. As in a cathedral, the setting is intended to stimulate absorption and contemplation, the interior decoration the mood for meditation. The clear confrontation of community and symbol is supposed to correspond to a 'racial configuration.' The principle of the 'Führer' is to be applied in architecture, as well. The result for National Socialist dramaturges was a drive toward a central perspective, and axial symmetry. Busts of Hitler symbolized the significance of the 'Führer' for salvation history. Many persuaded National Socialists even had 'little Hitler altars' in their dwellings, replacing the Christian 'God's little corner.'

not by the divine right of the powers. At the same time, however, politics in the age of mass societies has appealed to a new legitimatization, with the help of which it has expressed → collective representation and identities that were often religious in tone. Several political systems with a total claim on the enlightenment of the world and of human existence, as well as to the unconditional sacrificial readiness of the belief of their followers, thus demonstrate numerous similarities to religious systems, that they are also designated as → political religions. Besides the Communist → veneration of persons, it is especially National Socialism that ranks as such a soteriology, or doctrine of salvation.

National Socialism as Political Religion

2. The ideology and governmental practice of the National Socialist regime was described as 'political religion' even by its contemporaries.[1] Distanced regard from abroad was struck by the numerous correspondences that this political movement had with traditional religions. The common basis of such observations was a transformed concept of religion, in terms of which it was no longer the individual experience that mainly mattered, but the social dimension, and therewith the ritual side of the sacred (Émile Durkheim, Max Weber), which had rediscovered the terrible and fascinating, irrational moment of religious experience (Rudolf Otto, Das Heilige, Ger., "The [Idea of the] Holy"; 1917; → Holy). However, National Socialism demonstrated religious traits not only with respect to formal elements, such as rituals and symbols, or operative mechanisms and functions, but also with reference to its content. This content especially concerned the myth of redemption and salvation that was developed vis-à-vis the 'Führer' during the 'Third Reich.'[2]

Is National Socialism Indeed a Religion?

For an appraisal of whether and to what extent National Socialism understood itself, and sought to be understood, as a religion, it is especially the speech and behavior of the leading politicians that are normative. This evidence was very contradictory, however. Hitler, like Goebbels, described the National Socialist movement in religious categories, in both public and private enunciations. They refrained, however—presumably out of tactical considerations—from officially approaching it as a profession of faith, and thereby setting it in competition with the two official churches. But in contrast with the official designation stood the unmistakable religious practice of the regime. And this ought to be kept in mind in any judgment as to whether National Socialism is a religion, since the true intentions of those in command are difficult to determine.

a) In order to make this judgment—even independently of the self-image of the leaders—a clear definition is in order as to what is to be understood by a religious system or political religion. Anything but agreement prevails in the area of research. Accordingly, National Socialism is variously designated in this respect. The spectrum of appraisals extends from 'anti-religion,' 'substitute religion,' and 'pseudo-religion' to political, national, or secular religion. In any determination in this respect, it will be crucial to understand whether a given author understands only those systems as religious that are commonly designated as 'high religions,' such as Christianity, Islam, or Hinduism. After all, it is easy to see that National Socialism—despite all borrowings—was not a component of the Christian religion. It only made use of Christian language, rites, and symbols, and was in competition with the official churches, whose destruction was anticipated in the long run. From the churches' viewpoint, National Socialism can be appositely described as an anti- or non-religion, and thus as part of the secularization process.

Beyond question, however, the parallels of the Nazi regime with a religious system are striking. Among the characteristics of a religion is a doctrine of belief confessed by a community, and expressed by it in devotional practice. It is concerned to express contingent experiences in terms of divine intervention, and history as salvation history. A faith community often complements the celebration of its ceremonies with architecture (→ Architecture [Sacred]), and embellishes it with the symbols of its belief (→ Symbol/Sign/Gesture). All of these elements can be shown for National Socialism.

Faith Longings and Salvation History

b) On countless Nazi Party occasions, it was 'faith in Germany' and the 'resurrection of the Reich' that were solemnly confirmed. Party pronouncements contained proclamations, community confessional formulae, acts of consecration, and prayers, whose liturgical formulations allowed no doubt as to the intent of religious and metaphysical meaning. In Hitler's political understanding, as well, faith played the key role. He understood his party as a faith movement that, unlike the interest of the labor movements, would satisfy the yearnings for belief of the uprooted masses. Numerous followers underwent a conversion experience, subsequently offering their 'Führer' the tribute of a faith conviction that they otherwise would accord to a religious messiah. His rhetoric was characterized by an unambiguously religious tinge, as in the following speech of May 1, 1935: "My will . . . is your faith. My faith, to me—just as it is to you—is everything in this world. But God's highest gift to me in this world is my people! In you rests my faith. You I serve with my will, and I give you my life! This is our common profession."[3]

As content of this doctrine of faith, a new salvation history was proclaimed: the resurrection of the Reich by the effort and spirit of a small, heroic, elite. The underlying sacralization of the state, and the interpretation of a soldierly death, as a fruitful sacrifice, had become patriotic common property even before 1914. The National Socialists appealed to this established interpretation, and claimed it for their own followers, who had lost their lives in the attempted coups or election struggles of the 1920s. They became 'blood witnesses of the movement,' and 'martyrs for the Third Reich.' It was especially Josef Goebbels (1897–1945) who, as head of Reichspropaganda, strove to invest the slain Party members with a status that had been constructed after the example of the life and death of Jesus. He actually used Bible quotations word for word. For example, in the military paper Der Angriff (Ger., "The Assault"), he wrote, about deceased SA-leader Horst Wessel: "A Christian and a Socialist! One who cried out, by his deeds, 'Come to me, I will redeem you!' . . . There is something divine at work in [Wessel], that makes him to be and act thus, and no differently. Someone must become an example, and offer himself in sacrifice! . . . He has drunk the cup of sorrows to the dregs. This suffering I drink to my Fatherland! Lift him once more, the dead man, and show him to all the people. And call, and call: 'See what a man'!"[4]

This messianic movement has a racist core. The 'deification of the Aryan' functions only through its pendant, the demonization of the Jews. The hostile image of 'the Jews,' drawn from religion, attributes to them the principle of evil—decomposition, destruction, and debacle. To the Aryan, on the other hand, is ascribed the divine principle of the creative and the good. In his book Mein Kampf (Ger., "My Struggle"; 1924/25), Hitler had described 'the Aryan' as 'light of the world,' and 'likeness of the Lord,' and assigned him the task in salvation history to redeem the world from evil in the form of the Jew.[5] The struggle with the Jew is the 'work of the Lord'; a mixture of the → races, on the other hand, is simply Original Sin as, in the long run, it threatens the fall of humanity. However, in view of this apocalyptic situation of crisis, he has sent the chosen people, the Germans, a savior, to avert the blend of blood that skulks. In the eschatological, final struggle, he will convey the world to an ideal condition. Only victory over the Antichrist—identical with the annihilation of Judaism—makes possible the creation of a new Reich that will last a thousand years, as we know from the prophecy.[6] This secular conceptualization of history as salvation history radicalized Christian apocalyptic. It was no longer from God that believers expected redemption. They initiated it themselves, by slaying the Antichrist. In this concept of a struggle of life and death, the victory of the 'Aryan' and the annihilation of the Jews amounted to the same thing. Hitler saw his historical mission in rendering real this mythical world-image. The war had occasioned the necessary premise, the external conditions for genocide (→ Shoah).

Rites and Cults

c) The formal profile of the National Socialist rites was not overly inventive. It went back to old, established traditions, to which new meanings were ascribed. Thus, those in charge availed themselves, without let or hindrance, of the received ceremony of the workers' movement, the youth movement, the middle class, and the military. With like unscrupulosity, ceremonies were borrowed from the Christian churches. Immediately after seizing power, the regime established its own festal calendar, comparable to that of the ecclesiastical year. The National Socialist year featured, in order, the "Day of the Seizure of Power" (May 30), the "Day of the Proclamation of the Party Program" (February 24), "Heroes' Memorial Day" (March 16), the Birthday of the Führer (April 20), National Labor Day (May 1), Mothers' Day in the same month, the Summer Solstice (June 21), the Reich Party Day in September, Harvest Thanksgiving in October, and, finally, the Day of the Martyrs of the Movement (November 9). The movement also sought eventually to assimilate the high church days: Easter and Christmas were to be celebrated as the Germans' popular or folk festivals, and Pentecost as "High May." Thus, no month passed without a great festal event. Some of these feast days were referred to stations within National Socialist 'salvation history.' On these days, on dates distributed throughout the year, the heroic founding myth of the Third Reich was ritually staged. Its 'salvific events' extended from the 'birth of National Socialism' in the graves of the First World War (Heroes' Memorial Day), to the 'salvation proclamation' (of the Party program), to the mysterious 'sacrifice' of the sixteen 'blood witnesses' of the failed putsch attempt of 1923, which was seen as finally leading to the 'resurrection of the Reich' on the day of the seizing of power.

Festal Calendar

The Cultic Image

d) This succession of feasts alone makes it clear how earnestly the National Socialist ideology addressed a part of the Western religious heritage: the question of meaning in human suffering and death (→ Suffering; Theodicy). After the First World War, with its experience of suffering and death many millionfold, this question had become an urgent social problem. The churches, in times of increasing secularization, seemed no longer able to solve it. Consequently, in the postwar years, numerous groups arose that offered a spiritual answer to this question of meaning. Their spectrum ranged from popular and neo-pagan faith communities, to the 'inflation saints' (U. Linse)—bearded, wandering preachers traversing the land. Sects like these seized hold of the war generation's strong inclination to found secular communities that would attempt to rescue the myths of the trenches and inject them into daily life, and thus to make a contribution to the nation's mystical regeneration. In order to distinguish himself from these sectarians, Hitler, as late as 1938, publicly denied the cultic character of National Socialist events. His polemics, however—both against popular 'backwardness,' with its predilection for mysticism, the occult, and the Teutonic, and against the churches—were limited to the naming of those events, changing nothing of the cultic praxis. Rather, National Socialist propagandists laid great emphasis on the rediscovered connection between celebration and cultic actions. Now they inserted 'acts of commitment,' such as the dedication of flags and banners, into political celebrations and formulae. Constant repetition would anchor them as permanent rites, and in this manner "solemn forms of a liturgical character would develop whose effectiveness and value would then extend over centuries."[7] The National Socialist celebratory style was to correspond to the religious sensibility of the Nordic, Teutonic person, and yet, at the same time, avoid anything dusty or antiquarian.[8]

Aesthetics of Cult

e) The ceremonies of the Nazi cult that staged the heroic myth of salvation were celebrated in symbolically charged surroundings. The festal places and celebratory spaces established to this end visually and aesthetically underscored the rituals. Their symbolical arrangement of space was to 'sensualize' the enunciations of the myth and enhance the solemnity of the proclamations. With this architectural conception, the modern emancipation of art from a cultic connection would be at least partially rescinded. Hitler demanded programmatically that "the architectural creations [of the 'Third Reich'] project throughout future millennia, like the cathedrals of our past."[9] On feast days, the architecture was additionally decorated with flags, drapery, Eagles, and Swastikas or Rune symbols. Pylons and burning lamps filled the streets, and indicated 'sacred spaces' within the city. Alongside the visual elements of celebration, the musical framing of the events played an essential role. Fanfares marked the beginning and end of a solemn hour; drum rolls dramatized the highpoint with flag rites and honor paid to the dead. Marching music did justice to the military nature of the event. Community singing was intended to make participants of the people. A profession of faith, concert music, and dramas in song served cultural needs. Beethoven formed the content of solemn, heroic music on such occasions. The National Socialist style of celebration was a commingling of various traditions. Besides solemn Christian and civil traditions, it was especially the workers' movement, with its flags and protest marches, that afforded examples of how public space could be filled meaningfully, and how experiences of community could be generated. With the elaborate festal decoration, Teutonic symbols, and a reduced classicism were applied, with their orientation toward the antiquity of the Roman Empire, and prioritizing triumphant military symbols (standards, triumphal marches). These older configurations were combined with the insertion of the most modern means of communication and technical refinements. Overall, the result was a Nazi liturgy that was not unitary but depended partly on the inclinations of the Nazi politician who happened to be in charge. The intent of the major events planned under Goebbels' directorship was to overwhelm a modern big-city audience, whereas the 'celebrations of life' of Alfred Rosenberg and Heinrich Himmler long excluded church influences, and sought to introduce Teutonic folk customs styled 'ancient' instead, in a circle like that of an extended family. These usages were first and foremost aimed at the country population or the SS community, and rarely emerged from the uncultured and kitschy folklore.

Christianity and National Socialism

f) In one perspective, the National Socialists, with their state cult, stood in competition with the established religious system of Christianity. At the same time, they endeavored to utilize it for their own ends. Thus, within the Evangelical Church they fostered a movement that called itself German Christians, whose orientation was to folk ideology, and who strove for an inter-confessional German national church. Unified by the National Socialist idea of 'positive Christianity' as its lowest common denominator, this movement at first found great positive response even among ministers. In 1933, a Nazi-controlled National Synod chose Hitler's trusted lieutenant Ludwig Müller as 'Reich Bishop.' In 1934, against this development, under the leadership of the "Ministers' Emergency Union," a "Confessing Church" appeared, that, even by persecution and repressive sorties, the regime was unable to destroy.

As contradistinguished from this politicization of a church already present—which likewise occurred in the Third Reich with areas of folk religion—a political religion indeed frequently adopted an orientation to such systems of belief as were already at hand, but without identifying with them and their institutions. Instead, the Nazi regime expressly emphasized separation of church and state, and this precisely in connection with public solemnities. This stance was not contrary to an adoption of Christian rituals and symbols. The latter offered the advantage of their trustworthiness in the eyes of participants, who were mostly of a Christian heritage, as well as the advantage of accouterment with the worth of tradition. Furthermore, the union of (Protestant) church and secular power enjoyed a long tradition in Germany. The concordat concluded in 1933 with the Catholic Church left no doubt in the eyes of the faithful as to the lawfulness of the new government. Thus, no critical distance was taken from the religious practices of the Nazi regime, either from the side of the official churches, or on the level of the church people. Owing to the problem of the confessional split in Germany, the population was especially open to the National Socialist proposal of a new national unity likewise based on religion, a proposal whose content was so diffuse in content as to seem to either unify the confessions or transcend their differences. To contemporaries without deep confessional ties, National Socialism rituals offered the opportunity of expressing religious sentiment, experiencing the comfort of a community, and accepting the offer of meaning for their lives. This made up a great part of the power of attraction of the Nazi system.

Sacralization of Politics in Comparison: Fascism

3. Many scholars conceive the sacralization of politics as a trait of various political systems of the twentieth century, including especially the Socialism of the former Soviet Union. Emilio Gentile determines/designates Italian Fascism as “the first political movement [. . .] to present itself as a religion.”[10] However, this interpretation is not uncontested. In view of the uninterrupted presence and importance of the Catholic Church in Italy, the unifying force and extent of Fascist rituals must be relativized. It is striking that Mussolini often used religious metaphors and liturgical language; however, a compromise with the Church was necessary in order to govern Italy (1929 concordat, with the symbolical building of the Via della Conciliazione to the Vatican), and this prevented an independent Fascist repertoire of forms from developing adequately. Fascism was still dependent on the participation of ecclesiastical dignitaries and the blessing of the official Church. It was different in the ‘Third Reich,’ as well as in the state cult of the Soviet Union.

The Scholarly Discussion

4. The perception and interpretation of National Socialism as a religious system by no means meet with unanimous agreement in scholarship.

a) Scholars who reject the concept of religion in connection with National Socialism stress that biblical language and religious propositions “were severed from their original meaning-connection, in National Socialist cult, and were introduced into a new, but constructed and artificial one,” with the result that its properly religious character was lost.[11] Hermann Lübbe claims that National Socialism only has the apparent quality of the religious. On the surface, the National Socialist system does unambiguously exhibit religious traits, Lübbe admits. However, totalitarian regimes confront this similarity to religion and church with their manifest hostility to the Church. They have gotten into, or have found themselves in, a situation of competition with religions as to claim and legitimization. And the churches had come to feel that the Christian religion was to be displaced by an anti-religion.[12] Over against phenomenological similarities with established religions, critics point out the claim of so many political religions to be based on science—thus, on “scientific materialism and Marxist theory, or on race theories as part of modern biology. They share an aversion from traditional religion flowing from a rationalistic or scientific tradition,” and consequently belonged to the secularization process.[13]

b) Claus-Ekkehard Bärsch has indicated that a classification of National Socialism as a ‘pseudo-’ or ‘substitute religion’ offends scholars of Christian tradition especially, because it seems to them that the ascription of religious qualities to National Socialism would seem to imply a positive appraisal, if not indeed a justification, of the Nazi system, or else—in the other direction, possibly a devaluation of their own religion.[14] But here, according to Bärsch, critics overlook the fact that denying National Socialism the quality of religion runs the risk of ignoring its function of bestowal of meaning, and hence of failing to offer an adequate explanation of its power of attraction. More recent studies in history or religious studies have therefore attempted to develop the religious dimension of National Socialism in respect of distinct aspects (C.-E. Bärsch, Y. Karow, S. Behrenbeck). These demonstrate that National Socialism succeeded in satisfying the religious needs of its followers: its myths, rites, and symbols fulfilled the same conditions and functions, and had a comparable quality of feeling and experience to those of a traditional religion. Correctly, then, National Socialism is interpreted in the categories of religious studies, as it exhibits similarities of phenomena, content, and function. For the most part, to be sure, the faithful, like the founders, recognized the religious meaning and mechanics of the National Socialist hero-cult only unconsciously, and without reflection. Accordingly, the Nazi ideology is to be designated an 'implicit religion' (J. Waardenburg). The concept of the secular[15] or 'political religion' points to the twin makeup of a similar symbolical system: its myths, rituals, and signs hold a secular and political, as well as a religious and metaphysical, meaning-content. They promise the fulfillment of a human yearning for salvation, completeness, and redemption, and at the same time are introduced as instruments of a political practice of legitimization and government. This arrangement in no way excludes personal faith and belief on the part of those who govern. As beneficiaries of the exploitation of religious needs, they may even share them. Thus they become all the more credible. Their interest in religious forms and content, however, is of a political, not of a theological nature. The concept, 'political religion,' therefore brings to fitting expression the historical condition of National Socialist government.

1. Schoeps, Hans Joachim, Jüdischer Glaube in unserer Zeit. Prolegomena zur Grundlegung einer systematischen Theologie des Judentums, Berlin 1932; cf. Lease, Gary, "Nationalsozialismus und Religion. Eine Mythologie unserer Zeit," in: Zeitschrift für Religions- und Geistesgeschichte 40,2 (1988), 97-111; Voegelin, Eric, Die politischen Religionen, Vienna 1938 (reprinted Munich 1993); de Rougemont, Denis, Journal aus Deutschland 1935–1936, Vienna 1998.

2. Cf., as immediate testimonial of the time: Guardini, Romano, Der Heilsbringer in Mythos, Offenbarung, und Politik, Stuttgart 1940.

3. Domarus 1965, 503; for religious rhetoric, see Cancik 1980.

4. Goebbels, in: Der Angriff 6 (March 1930).

5. Hitler, Mein Kampf, 3rd ed., 1933, 431; 70.

6. Cf., in detail, Cohn, Norman, The Pursuit of the Millennium: Revolutionary Millenarians and Mystical Anarchists of the Middle Ages, New York 1985 ([1]1957); Rhodes, James M., The Hitler Movement: A Modern Millenarian Revolution, Stanford 1980; on the connection between redemption and annihilation and the magical parts of political religion, cf. Bärsch 1987, 282ff.

7. Basic directives for staging a celebration can be found in: Vorschläge der Propagandaleitung für nationalsozialistische Feiergestaltung, Sept. 1935, 1/16.

8. Dürr, Dagobert, "Die Lage," in: Unser Wille und Weg. Die parteiamtliche Propagandaschrift für die politischen Leiter der NSDAP, Dec. 1935, 399.

9. Hitler at the Reichsparteitag, Sept. 7, 1937, cited in Domarus 1965, 719.

10. Gentile, Emilio, "Der Liktorenkult," in: Petersen, Jens et al. (eds.), Faschismus und Faschismen im Vergleich, Vierow 1998, 247-261, p. 247.

11. Müller, Hans, "Der pseudoreligiöse Charakter der nationalsozialistischen Weltanschauung," in: Geschichte in Wissenschaft und Unterricht 12 (1961), 337-352, p. 342.

12. Lübbe 1995, 10ff.

13. Linz 1996, 131; Voegelin 1938 (1993, see note 1), 6f. sees the claim to scholarship, it is true, as a typical note of modern political religions, since it alone is the secularization of the soil on which these religious movements have sprouted and grown up.
14. Bärsch 1987, 282; similarly in Cancik 1980, 17.
15. Raymond Aron coined the concept 'secular religion' in 1944. Cf. Bédarida, François, "Nationalsozialistische Verkündigung und säkulare Religion," in: Ley/Schoeps 1997, 153-167.

Literature

Primary Sources: Hitler, Adolf, Mein Kampf, vol. 1: Eine Abrechnung; vol. 2: Die nationalsozialistische Bewegung, Munich [3]1933 (Engl. trans. by Ralph Manheim, London 1969); Hitler, Reden und Proklamationen 1932–1945, ed./comm. by Max Domarus, Munich 1965; Die Tagebücher von Joseph Goebbels. Sämtliche Fragmente, 4 vols. and index, ed. by Elke Fröhlich, Munich 1987.

Secondary Literature: Bärsch, Claus-Ekkehard, Erlösung und Vernichtung. Dr. phil. Joseph Goebbels. Zur Psyche und Ideologie eines jungen Nationalsozialisten 1923–1927, Munich 1987; Idem, Die politische Religion des Nationalsozialismus, Munich 1998; Behrenbeck, Sabine, Der Kult um die toten Helden. Nationalsozialistische Mythen, Riten und Symbole, Vierow 1996; Cancik, Hubert, "'Wir sind jetzt eins.' Rhetorik und Mystik in einer Rede Hitlers (Nürnberg, 11.9.1936)," in: Kehrer, Günter (ed.), Zur Religionsgeschichte der Bundesrepublik Deutschland, Munich 1980, 13-48; Idem, "'Neuheiden' und totaler Staat. Völkische Religion am Ende der Weimarer Republik," in: Idem (ed.), Religions- und Geistesgeschichte der Weimarer Republik, Düsseldorf 1982, 176-212; Goodrick-Clarke, Nicholas, Black Sun: Aryan Cults, Esoteric Nazism and the Politics of Identity, New York 2002; Idem, The Occult Roots of Nazism: Secret Aryan Cults and Their Influence on Nazi Ideology, rev. ed., London 2004; Heer, Friedrich, Der Glaube Adolf Hitlers. Anatomie einer politischen Religiosität, Munich 1968; Hockenos, Matthew D., A Church Divided: German Protestants Confront the Nazi Past, Bloomington 2004; Karow, Yvonne, Deutsches Opfer. Kultische Selbstauslöschung auf den Reichsparteitagen der NSDAP, Berlin 1997; Ley, Michael/Schoeps, Julius H. (eds.), Der Nationalsozialismus als politische Religion, Bodenheim 1997; Linse, Ulrich, Barfüßige Propheten. Erlöser der zwanziger Jahre, Berlin 1983; Linz, Juan J., "Der religiöse Gebrauch der Politik und/oder der politische Gebrauch der Religion. Ersatz-Ideologie gegen Ersatz-Religion," in: Maier, Hans (ed.), "Totalitarismus" und "Politische Religionen". Konzepte des Diktaturvergleichs, Paderborn 1996; Lübbe, Hermann (ed.), Heilserwartung und Terror. Politische Religionen des 20. Jahrhunderts, Düsseldorf 1995; Mosse, George L., Nazi Culture: Intellectual, Cultural and Social Life in the Third Reich, Madison 2003; Steigmann-Gall, Richard, The Holy Reich: Nazi Conceptions of Christianity, 1919–1945, Cambridge 2003; Tal, Uriel, Religion, Politics and Ideology in the Third Reich: Selected Essays, London 2004; Vondung, Klaus, Magie und Manipulation. Ideologischer Kult und politische Religion des Nationalsozialismus, Göttingen 1971.

→ Anti-Semitism, Apocalypse, Civil Religion, Collective Representations, Conflict/Violence, Government/Rule/Politics/State, Hero/Heroism, Paganism/Neopaganism, Political Religion, Race/Racism, Reception, Secularization, Suffering, Symbol/Sign/Gesture, Theodicy, Veneration of Persons/Personality Cult

Sabine Behrenbeck

Nativism

The concept of 'Nativism' (from Eng., 'native,' 'inborn' in the sense of 'one's own') denotes those religious movements that draw their justification from their own tradition and expressly appeal to it. This tradition can be imaginary. Nativistic currents arise mostly in a situation of colonial oppression, and can also be regarded as a reaction on the part of the colonized to structural, open → violence. The birth of a consciousness of inequality, and the feeling of an existential threat from without, can lead to a conscious and organized counterthrust to this process. Select aspects of one's own culture are then 'revitalized,' or an attempt is made to eternalize the present. Connected with this is the hope of attaining salvation (at least partially) by the elimination of the new cultural content and return to the old. Elements of one's own tradition that distinguish oneself from other cultures have an especially high symbolical meaning for a society's self-esteem. The selection of the cultural characteristics regarded as worthy of retention is common to all nativistic movements. At the end of the nineteenth century, for example, the revival of ceremonial usages and actions had great importance in the Indians' dance of the spirits, while, at the same time, products of European origin were retained that seemed to be superior to the indigenous correspondences.

→ Colonialism, Reception, South Sea/Australia

Claudia Polzer

Natural Science

1. Natural science as a subject in a dictionary bearing on religion seems to combine leading concepts of two divided 'cultures.' In a framework of European history of religion, not only have 'religion' and 'science'—at first sight—developed in irreversible distinction from each other, but especially the natural sciences have postulated an object of knowledge and sketched a method that seemed to exclude 'religion' as a 'subject.' Indeed, when both fields undertook to speak on the same matters, their propositions seemed to exclude each other ('reciprocal exclusion'), or to 'remove,' to annihilate, the objects. Thus, it belongs to the common view of the relationship between natural sciences and religion, especially the Christian religion, that, at least since the end of the Enlightenment, both instances have found themselves in a 'cognitive competition of systems,'[1] a contest for a monopoly over knowledge: with the progress of a scientific clarification of the world, religion was deprived of one object after another. The demise of positive religion under the influence of science[2] was then only a question of time. That a contest of repression has always existed between science and religion is certainly not in doubt—the manifestations of this struggle have been worked out in many ways, and lie before our eyes. However, even if religion is limited to the cognitive element of 'knowing'—and this is a limitation that neglects the other functions—the parallel, complementary, and contrary developments should not be overlooked: distinct objects are withdrawn from the area of certain religions, but not from 'religion' across the board. This effort is not one to 'reenchant' the world—nor, contrariwise, to base the 'legitimacy of modernity' on religion—but to formulate an adequate definition of 'religion,' by which even the applied sciences will find themselves engaged.

God Orders the World: Before the 'Enlightenment'

2. With a very few exceptions, before the age of Enlightenment the science of the great thinkers was not a counter-instance to religion ('religion,' here, not necessarily meaning 'Christianity,' and surely not official ecclesiastical Christianity). Rather, for them, it was only through their scientific discoveries that the divine establishment of the world became visible, and, in given instances, these discoveries provided evidence for the presence of the divine in the world. Only in the framework of the Enlightenment did science adopt the condition of a contrary instance to religion. Almost simultaneously, the natural philosophy of Romanticism marked a counter-movement that then revived Neo-Platonic, Stoic, and Hermetic components of the Renaissance sciences and their religious contexts. Especially Schelling's speculative, Romantic philosophy of nature determined the framework within which the relationship between natural science and religion was seen in the first three decades of the nineteenth century. Philosophy of nature (in German, Naturphilosophie), defined as the "eternal transformation of God" into the world, was undoubtedly the basis of the "demands for the future development of the sciences" by Carl Gustav Carus in his address to the first Convention of Scientists and Physicians (1822). Here, in all clarity, we have the reaction to the "transformation of natural science into a counter-instance of religion" (F. Tenbruck). In a framework of Romantic natural science, Galvanism and Mesmerism, magnetism and siderism, once more became coalesced in a speculative conglomerate, whose fragility finally seemed to decide the conflict between science and religion in favor of the former.

Materialism

3. In mid-century, with the 1854 'struggle over materialism' in the Society of German Researchers and Physicians, in which Vogt, Moleschott, Wagner, Ludwig Büchner, Robert Mayer, Virchow, and many others took part, Romantic science as a concept largely collapsed. True, many of their motivations and ideas can be followed up to the present, especially those that ascribe to nature a common and higher order, in sketches that resumed the pantheistic model in pure 'cosmic piety,' or saw the Gnostic dualism of 'spirit and matter' removed in a combination of nuclear physics and relativity theory.[3]

Nature as the 'developed God,' and, after the struggle over materialism and discussion on vitalism, Haeckel's postulate of a natural religion,[4] characterize a series of paradigms that deviate/decline through the positions of European history of religion, and not only of those determined by Christianity. The antitheses of Christian Aristotelianism and Hermetically tinged Neo-Platonism determine the patterns of argumentation and the schemata of plausibility. Thus, for instance, in the second half of the nineteenth century, holistic, monist, or hylozoist interpretations were represented in an appeal to a pre-dualistic phase of Greek philosophy and history of religion. The Pre-Socratics were 'discovered' under the perspective of a pre-dualistic era of European history of culture,[5] and offered patterns for the relation of life, or spirit, and matter.

Pantheism

Another concept, whose application in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries sought, in a new approach, to capture the relationship between religion and science in a positive way, is that of pantheism. The orientation of the concept, and its potential for a limitation of conflicts between established religions and scientific progress, by way of John Toland and Spinoza, overtly appeal to Stoic and Pre-Socratic cosmology and anthropology. Pantheism

(and nature mysticism as the apposite epistemology) is doubtless the religious concept, and rediscovered 'religious type,' that has yielded the dominant schema for scientists' self-interpretation over the last hundred years. "That conviction of reason, bound up with profound feeling"—Einstein summarizes his position—"that is revealed with the experiential world, forms my concept of God. So one can designate it, in the received manner of expression, as pantheistic (Spinoza)."[6]

Religious Claim of Natural Science

5. If we were to summarize the relationship between religion and science for the space of time from the Enlightenment to the present, we would observe contrary processes, that partly reinforce, and partly weaken each other. Such interferences are characteristic of European history of religion across the board.[7] On the one side, the sciences that differentiate themselves—even still, after the Enlightenment—have a religious frame of reference, and thus react in confirmation or criticism of 'religion.' On the other side, religion itself (the theologies included) is becoming the object of distinct sciences, including natural sciences. It is a special phenomenon of the most recent history of religion that popularized natural science, in the schema of popularizing science, itself creates religious patterns, viewpoints, world-images, that designate themselves as religious or religions. In this development, which, especially in the → New Age environment, is dramatically accelerating, a process "becomes retroactive" that one could characterize as a "combination of claim to explanation and renunciation of orientation"[8]—a combination that has entered the natural sciences since the Enlightenment. In the view of many 'new religions,' the most current scientific 'discoveries,' be they eons, morphogenetic fields, or rare attractors, are characterized by an 'orientation surplus' that cannot be decoded by professional science, but only by religion.

1. Tenbruck, F. H., "Wissenschaft und Religion," in: Wössner, Jacobus (ed.), Religion in Umbruch, Stuttgart 1972, 217-244.
2. Cf., e.g., Heer, Friedrich, Abschied von Himmeln und Höllen. Vom Ende des Religiösen Tertiär, Munich 1970.
3. Charon, Raymond, Der Geist der Materie, Frankfurt/M. 1982.
4. Haeckel, Ernst, Natürliche Schöpfungsgeschichte, Leipzig 1868, VIII.
5. Borsche, Tilman, "Nietzsches Erfindung der Vorsokratiker," in: Simon, Josef (ed.), Nietzsche und die philosophische Tradition, vol. 1, Würzburg 1985, 62-87.
6. Einstein, Albert, Mein Weltbild, Frankfurt/M. 1980, 18 ([1]1934; Engl. as: The World As I See It, London 1940).
7. On the patterns of interference, Tenbruck, Friedrich H., "Religion im Maelstrom der Reflexion," in: Kölner Zeitschrift für Soziologie und Sozialpsychologie 1993, 31-67; and Gladigow, Burkhard, "Europäische Religionsgeschichte," in: Kippenberg, Hans G./ Luchesi, Brigitte (eds.), Lokale Religionsgeschichte, Marburg 1995, 21-42.
8. Lepenies, Wolf, "Wissenschaftskritik und Orientierungskrise," in Lübbe, H., et al. (eds.), Der Mensch als Orientierungswaise?, Freiburg 1982, 67-106.

Literature

Barbour, Ian G., Religion in an Age of Science, San Francisco 1990; Benz, Ernst, "Theologie der Evolution im 19. Jahrhundert," in: Mann, Gunter (ed.), Biologismus im 19. Jahrhundert, Stuttgart 1973, 43-72; Bresch, Carsten et al. (eds.), Kann man Gott aus der Natur erkennen? Evolution als Offenbarung, Freiburg 1990; Cattell, Raymond B., Beyondism: Religion from Science, London 1987; Cavanaugh, Michael, Biotheology: A

New Synthesis of Science and Religion, Lanham 1995; Cohen, I. Bernard (ed), Puritanism and the Rise of Modern Science: The Merton Thesis, New Brunswick 1990; Corey, Michael A., God and the New Cosmology: The Anthropic Design Argument, Boston 1993; Crombie, Alistair C., Augustine to Galileo, 2 vols., London [2]1979; Gilkey, Langdon, Religion and Science in an Advanced Scientific Culture, Boston 1983; Gladigow, Burkhard, "Religion im Rahmen der theoretischen Biologie," in: Gladigow, Burkhard/Kippenberg, Hans G. (eds.), Neue Ansätze in der Religionswissenschaft, Munich 1983, 1-16; Idem, "'Wir gläubigen Physiker'. Zur Religionsgeschichte physikalischer Entwicklungen im 20. Jahrhundert," in: Zinser, Hartmut (ed.), Der Untergang von Religionen, Berlin 1986, 158-168; Idem, "Pantheismus als 'Religion' von Naturwissenschaftlern," in: Antes, Peter/Pahnke, Donate (eds.), Die Religion von Oberschichten, Marburg 1989, 219-239; Stark, Rodney, "On the Incompatibility of Religion and Science," in: Journal for Scientific Study of Religion 3, 3-20; Wilson, David Sloan, Darwin's Cathedral: Evolution, Religion, and the Nature of Society, Chicago/London 2002.

→ Electricity, Enlightenment, Esotericism, European History of Religion, Nature, New Age, Pantheism, Science

Burkhard Gladigow

Nature

State of the Problem

1. For the religious dimensions of the relationship between the human being and nature, between human beings and their environment, the seventeenth century offers the decisive reorientation that takes up ancient, medieval, and current positions of a Christian confessionalism. Sketching a religious history of nature also means addressing the question of how the concept of nature has been applied to the structuring of modern discourse on the human being, God, and the world. Modernity's concept of nature has become a preferred 'symbolic field' for discourse: and this field, reflected from a point of departure either in the human being (anthropocentrically) or in nature (physiocentrically), has been able to produce sketches for aesthetics, ethical norms, and finally, soteriology—not to mention the construction of certain premises 'in the name of nature.' The public experiments of the physico-theologians, the landscape gardens of a Pückler-Muskau, Alexander von Humboldt's 'nature monuments,' the canal constructions of the Saint-Simonians are elements of a many-membered, controversial discourse. And this discourse has been conducted in anything but a purely theoretical manner, or one unconcerned with praxis. Is the human being called to make nature 'better'? Or does an intervention in nature, such as the construction of a canal, irreversibly 'disturb' the divine order? Are the 'nature peoples,' defined as 'cultures with less control over nature,' actually the better forms of culture, the forms for which to strive? At the end of this process stands an eco-theology, the call to 'peace with nature,' or an eco-rigorism of the 'You are nothing, nature is everything' type.

Nature as Environment

2. Even apart from the Western discussion, determined by Christian theology, a decisive role is played by the alternatives between protection of the human being from nature, or protection of nature from the human being. The religio-historical prehistory of these alternatives is characterized by a cultural model that—such as in the framework of teachings on the appearance of culture on earth—counts the human being's defense against a hostile nature as one of his and her enduring cultural achievements. The division of the area of the wilderness (and its gods), so hostile to life, from that of human habitation, was basic for Egyptian religion, and one of the key religious duties of the Pharaoh, somewhat as the royal hunt for lions and other wild beasts in the ancient East guaranteed the safety of 'rule' and 'state' against 'hostile nature.' An iconographical element of the presentation of rule and government is the pose adopted by the conqueror against the 'hostile powers of nature.' Contrariwise, the protection of natural areas from human encroachments—as it were, a religious forerunner of the protection of nature—is conducted under polytheistic premises. The killing of an animal is permissible only in the presence of ritual cautionary measures (the Meuli-Burkert thesis); the construction of a bridge demands sacrifices of reconciliation for the river gods, digging a canal may oppose the plan of Zeus (Herodotus 1, 174), in which case it may not be dug. Only in the framework of dualistic patterns, in which the world is set over against God, and at the same time deprived of its gods, interventions in nature become completely unproblematic, for dominium terrae (Lat., 'dominion over the earth') is only the fulfillment of a divine command: "Fill the earth and subdue it" (Gen 1:26-28). According to Lynn White's vigorously disputed thesis, this injunction, along with the accompanying de-sacralization of nature, are the point of departure of the modern 'ecological crisis.' The thesis of the medieval origin of the current crisis has led to the most diverse reactions—even in the theologies. Thus, J. Moltmann has appealed to the Jewish tradition that acknowledges the world as a part of God, Gott in der Welt (Ger., "God in the World"; 1985); or we may cite R. F. Nash's The Greening of Religion.

3. The Mediterranean anticipation of European history of religion at first prescribed Christianity an area of separation among the 'nature gods.' If areas of nature were ordered to certain gods, or if those gods demonstrated a particular interest, nature was invested with 'paganism.' In Confessions, 10, 6, → Augustine questions the earth, the sea, the beasts, and receives the reply, "We are not your god. Seek above us." As he poses the same question above them, to the winds and the entire region of the air, they answer, "Anaximenes errs. We are not God." A nature piety that could address parts of nature as gods was necessarily a subversive polytheism, which Christian monotheism could therefore not integrate. In this fashion, 'imprisonment by nature' remained the distinctive criterion of polytheism until the turn of the eighteenth-nineteenth centuries: "The essence of polytheism . . . rests on the nature-prison of humanity's religious feeling and behavior, corrupted as they are by sin."[1] Stoic and Neo-Platonic patterns, which sought to decode an effect or reflection of the divine above divine nature and divine areas of nature, were much easier to receive. With John Scotus Eriugena (d. after 870) a nature mysticism colored by Neo-Platonism is a possible facet even of the Christian approach to nature.

Augustine

4. Wilderness as 'hostile' nature. In the relationship between the human being and nature, in the religious history of the modern concept of nature, untamed nature, as 'wilderness,' played a determining role all the way to the controversies of the seventeenth century. Dark, terrible, hostile—in a word, wild—nature seemed in disagreement with the picture of wise and caring creator God. Even in antiquity, this was the boundary of the concept of a natura, quae omnia suppeditat (Lat., 'nature that succors all things'),[2] helpful and nourishing nature, or the Stoic view of prónoia (Gk., 'providence') in physis (Gk., 'nature'), that supports the whole of the cosmos—and thus presents an implicit theodicy of nature in terms of the sum of its parts. Early Christianity permitted itself to be bound to this tradition; after all, it could be connected with 'Old Testament love for nature,' against 'Marcionite hatred of nature' (F. Heiler;[3] for Marcion, → Canon). Although this view was extensively successful, there remained doubts, in the most varied contexts, through the centuries, as to nature as God's good creation. With the 'Copernican turn,' with the use of telescope and microscope, with the deliverance of experimentation from the antitheses of 'natural/artificial,' and an unforeseeable extension of the view of the world, the old problem of a theological evaluation of 'wilderness' or 'hostile nature' posed itself with new keenness. Especially, mountains, deserts, and the sea—that area, then, that is held today for the most precious, unspoiled elements of nature—were evaluated variously and ambivalently. Inescapably, not only religious patterns (in the strict sense) were determinative of this ambivalence, but in the measure that the governmentally organized territories offered security in their key areas, the 'nature areas' withdrew from state control and state-guaranteed protection. Mountains, seas, deserts, moors, forests, and snowy areas are not only wild and ugly, but, especially, dangerous. This is why, for a long time, they were not traversed or crossed 'voluntarily,' for their own sake, but only when compelled by trade, pilgrimage, a military operation, or the quest for God. Even Petrarch's ascent of Mount Ventoux, "in the year 1336," is less the "beginning of a new aesthetic curiosity about the world, and a sensory experience of nature" (H. R. Jauss), than it was the self-presentation and self-interpretation of a poet on the threshold of modernity.[4] They kept aware "that the nature described by him is beset with heathenism" (R. and D. Groh)[5]—and he uses this opportunity for new goals.

Wilderness

The 'Copernican Turn'

With the Reformation, the traditionally (although not exclusively) negative appraisal of savage nature (natura lapsa—Lat., 'fallen nature,' nature after the Fall) acquires a further theological framework. The wild is not originally part of the divine creation, but principally the outcome and symbol of human sinfulness— → Luther's position as opposed to Calvin's. In the development of Reformation concepts, especially in England, the world in its entirety comes to be seen as the result of the Fall, and is now described in the metaphors of disease and decay. Nature, undeveloped by human beings—mountains, swamps, raging rivers, and unbridgeable gorges—is the presence and expression of sin in the world, possibly even an indication of an impending Last Judgment. Thomas Burnet's (1657–1735) Telluris Theoria Sacra (Lat., "Sacred Theory of the Earth"; 1681)[6] unleashed an intensive discussion with his thesis of the 'natural' world as the 'ruins of Paradise,' which developed, in a framework of the somewhat later physico-theology, arguments "that found entry into the reception of the wilderness, and formed the cornerstone of the enthusiasm for nature of the later eighteenth and nineteenth centuries."[7] It is true that the nature theologians generally placed in the foreground the utility of all parts of nature for the human being (with simultaneous emphasis on divine providentia, Lat., 'providence'). But they now extended their 'apologia for savage nature' to the aesthetic area, as well: God, whose wisdom the physico-theologians had sought to demonstrate from the works of nature, was now seen as the divine artist as well, whose works are lovely. With this slight shift in accent, a process was introduced through which nature itself moved more and more into the foreground, and its creator definitely into the background. A first step was taken toward the Romantic perception of nature.

Reformation

The Totality of Nature: the Human Being as Part of Nature

5. Critical observers of a rigoristic ecology that intends more than a 'museumization of monuments of nature,' have long since pointed out that it involves a program that can only be understood against a background of the history of Christianity. This connection was referred to by Lynn White as early as 1973, and this all the more impressively as he himself—in The Historical Roots of Our Ecological Crisis, the "Lynn White thesis" cited above—had already identified the causes of our current ecological crisis in the medieval transposition of the creation texts of the Hebrew Bible. White sees a permanent way out of the initial religious errors only in the area of religion once more. Either one must separate oneself from the Judeo-Christian tradition, and turn to a new religious attitude and behavior, such as those of animism, or else one must interpret Genesis anew, and differently, and apply it accordingly. Each way can be followed in a different context. Currently, both exegetes and 'eco-theologians' have answered White: Heike Branka and Hedwig Lamberry-Zielinski (1995) have followed the 'double history of the effect' of the thesis of dominium terrae, and shown how White's thesis that is false with regard to its historical context—the twelfth to the fourteenth centuries—can have an intensive, and plausible, echo as to content due to the context of its publication. The other path proposed by White—choosing another religion—has (independently of his thesis and its reception) already been undertaken, since Romanticism at the latest. The attempt to revitalize polytheistic religions, or to import 'nature religions,' has appealed not only to the paradigmatic foreground of pluralism, but also to a renewed view of nature as filled with 'old' gods (→ Paganism/Neopaganism). For Schiller's 1788 poem, Götter Griechenlands (Ger., "Gods of Greece")—the visible, marked turning point of a new religious orientation—'de-divinized' nature, and the solitary Christian God, are the consequences of a monotheism that now, ultimately, can be 'taken back' only in poetry. With Schiller, the 'artist's polytheism' of the Renaissance wins a new face, now—in the eighteenth century—turned against the mechanistic contrivances of the new modern world. Here, simultaneously, a further, basic eighteenth-century conflict is recognizable, soteriologically comprised in terms of a choice, natura versus scriptura: while 'the pagans' are dependent on the gods who are near to nature, and on alteration in their cults, Christians live in the security of their scripture.[9] To solve this contradiction can be designated as one of the "dreams of the eighteenth century," a return to a world "untouched by the Mosaic distinction."[10] The ongoing, ambivalent appraisal of 'paganism' reflects the impossibility or the possibility of drafting a new paganism in the form of a 'new' polytheism, that lives in the tension of Mosaic monotheism. Polytheism as an alternative (not 'overcoming the alternatives') to monotheism, or the 'polytheism of a nearness to nature,' and their claims to truth, remain to this day the competing patterns of reception and option. Thus, one may address Greek Pan today as the god who undertook an environmental ethic far earlier[11] (were it not for the downfall of ancient polytheism)—or else one may propagate the value of ancient polytheism for a philosophy of nature in general.

Gods of Greece

From Environment to Milieu: Nature as a Governing State

6. Controversies addressed on the 'symbolic field' of nature are also unmistakably waged in a religious context of European history of religion. The alternatives of a natura lapsa (Lat., 'fallen nature') and an ecological physiocentrism have soteriological dimensions along their spectrum and positive conduit. Thus, by way of a religious history of nature, both the ruin-theory of the world, and the postulate of a rescued world of the eco-system, can be historically drawn up against the 'many.' Then what is at issue is no longer only the correctness of the evidence applied in support of them but the meta-level of the religious images and models applied. If the pagan 'service of nature' so vilified in Christian dogmatics becomes a service to nature of high ecological esteem, then what are addressed thereby are especially European processes of an altered balance. In modernity, the concept of nature is the preferred vehicle not of those discourses that (like Luther) count on an impending world cataclysm, but of those producing balances that ultimately, after all, count on a continuation of the eco-system—although these latter discourses may waver with respect to its stability. Apocalyptical notations like those of the Club of Rome, or solemn oaths that the 'silent spring' is just in the offing, belong to the image of postponement (Derrida's différance), or operate with a 'maintenance imperative on the part of nature' that seems to be replacing Hegel's 'maintenance imperative on the part of the state.' If nature becomes the divine person (hypostasis) that must be rescued in its entirety, and thereby has priority over its parts ('deep ecology'), then those normative and directive processes are underway that are usually pressed with this acuity only by a religion-supported governmental state. It is not surprising, then, if a "nature state" (Meyer-Abich) should arise out of the modern social state as ideologically neutral in this respect, and as the prospective basis of a consensus—with an 'uprising on behalf of nature.' The substitution of a vulnerable anthropocentricism (without which, indeed, no soteriology emerges), by way of a physiocentricism,[12] harbors the danger of accompaniment by organizations of a theocratic spirit: the security is transferred to the whole, and a balance postponed to the End. Over against this prospect there still stands a multiply propagated 'nature ethic within the bounds of reason,'[13] which can bind pragmatics with tallying and balancing.

1. Zöckler, "Polytheismus," in Realencyclopädie für protestantische Theologie und Kirche, Leipzig 1904, vol. 3A, 539.
2. Lucretius, De Rerum Natura 3, 23.
3. Heiler, F., Erscheinungsformen und Wesen der Religion, Stuttgart 1961, 94.
4. Cf., in detail and with critical appraisal of the thesis of the turning point in the history of aesthetic experience of nature, Groh/Groh 1986, 17ff.
5. Loc. cit., 53.
6. London 1681; Part 2 1689; 1684 and 1690 a version in English: The Sacred Theory of the Earth.
7. Dirlinger 1997, 173.
8. Cf. Gladigow, Burkhard, "Polytheismus der Neuzeit," in: Köhler, B. (ed.), Religion und Wahrheit. Festschrift Gernot Wiessner, Bonn 1998, 45-59.
9. For this opposition and the eighteenth-century dream, cf. Assmann, J., "Heiden: der religiöse Unterschied," in: Merkur 558-559 (1995), 957-962.
10. Ibid., 961.
11. Hughes 1986, 7-24. On p. 22, the consideration: "What might have happened if Great Pan had not died? [. . .] It is quite possible that an explicit environmental ethics might have developed in the West much earlier than it actually did [. . .]."
12. Cf., with critical objections, Groh/Groh 1996, 137ff.
13. Loc. cit., 139, with ref. especially to Schäfer 1993.

Literature

Albanese, Catherine L., Nature Religion in America: From the Algonkian Indians to the New Age, Chicago/London 1990; Bargatzky, Thomas/Kuschel, Rolf (eds.), The

Invention of Nature, Frankfurt/M. 1994; Blumenberg, Hans, "Nachahmung der Natur. Zur Vorgeschichte der Idee des schöpferischen Menschen," in: Studium generale 10 (1957), 266-283; Brinkmann, Richard (ed.), Natur in den Geisteswissenschaften, Tübingen 1988; Bubner, Rüdiger et al. (eds.), Die Trennung von Natur und Geist, Munich 1990; Dirlinger, Helga, "Das Buch der Natur. Der Einfluß der Physikotheologie auf das neuzeitliche Naturverständnis und die ästhetische Wahrnehmung von Wildnis," in: Weinzierl, Michael (ed.), Individualisierung, Rationalisierung, Säkularisierung: Neue Wege der Religionsgeschichte, Vienna 1997, 156-185; Faivre, Antoine/Zimmermann, Rolf Christian (eds.), Epochen der Naturmystik, Berlin 1979; Frazer, James George, The Worship of Nature, London 1926; Glacken, Clarence J., Traces on the Rhodian Shore: Nature and Culture in Western Thought from Ancient Times to the End of the Eighteenth Century, Berkeley 1967; Gladigow, Burkhard, "Pantheismus und Naturmystik," in: Bubner et al. 1990, 119-143; Groh, Dieter/Groh, Ruth, Weltbild und Naturaneignung. Zur Kulturgeschichte der Natur, Frankfurt/M. 1991; Idem, Die Außenwelt der Innenwelt. Zur Kulturgeschichte der Natur 2, Frankfurt/M. 1996; Hargrove, Eugene C. (ed.), Religion and Environmental Crisis, London 1986; Hughes, J. Donald, "Pan. Environmental Ethics in Classical Polytheism," in: Hargrove 1986, 7-24; Kerényi, Karl, "Die Göttin Natur," in: Eranos Jahrbuch 14 (1946), 39-86; Lepenies, Wolf, Das Ende der Naturgeschichte, Frankfurt/M. 1978; Meyer-Abich, Klaus Michael, Revolution for Nature: From the Environment to the Connatural World, Cambridge 1993; Nash, Roderick Frazier, The Rights of Nature: A History of Environmental Ethics, Madison 1989; Newman, William R., Promethean Ambitions: Alchemy and the Quest to Perfect Nature, Chicago/London 2004; Nicholson, Marjorie Hope, Mountain Gloom and Mountain Glory: The Development of the Aesthetics of the Infinite, Ithaca 1959; Schäfer, Lothar, Das Bacon Projekt. Von der Erkenntnis, Nutzung und Schonung der Natur, Frankfurt/M. 1993; Stolz, Fritz, Religiöse Wahrnehmung der Welt, Zurich 1988; Thomas, Keith, Man and the Natural World: Changing Attitudes in England, 1500–1800, New York/Oxford 1983; Wozniakowski, Jacek, Die Wildnis. Zur Deutungsgeschichte des Berges in der europäischen Neuzeit, Frankfurt/M. 1987.

→ Animal, Bioethics, Environmentalism, Forest/Tree, Garden/Paradise, God/Gods/The Sacred, Landscape, Mountains (Five Sacred), Natural Science, Nature Piety, Water

Burkhard Gladigow

Nature Piety

Religion in Romanticism

1. Since Schleiermacher's new definition of religion as "contemplation and feeling of the universe," or as a "sense of and taste for the infinite," concepts arise that no longer seek to grasp religion only through the definitions of Christian theology—or through its attempted destruction at the hands of criticism of religion—but to ascribe it "its own province in the heart and soul" (Schleiermacher). With this new approach, possibilities open up for the injection of a romantic feeling for nature, the considerations of a 'new mythology,' and an ancient nature piety, into the current discourse on religion. In this tradition, religion is no longer the possibly imperfect result of the natural religion of reason, but is the contemplation of nature, in the broadest sense of the concept. While Hegel sees in nature religion a first step toward nature, by way of which the human being wins self-awareness, the nature mythology of the end of the nineteenth century once more appeals to the Romantic schema. In nature, especially in the great phenomena of nature, human beings are met by the 'infinite in the finite,' and in diverse fashions, they seek to grasp it in 'mythology.' Even after the collapse of 'nature mythology' as a theory of religious studies, fragments remain; but now they are conveyed by Dilthey's pantheism tractates and Rudolf Otto's specific Schleiermacher reception.

Cosmic Spirituality

2. Subsequently, nature mysticism and cosmic spirituality, world piety and nature piety entered changing associations with one another, and shaped early forms of a new piety or spirituality. At the beginning of the twentieth century, R. M. Bucke developed the "cosmic consciousness" model, after the First World War Rudolf Otto constituted religion by way of numinous experience (devoid of context), in the 1930s, almost simultaneously, Mircea → Eliade and Albert Einstein propagated a 'cosmic piety' as a new religious aim and goal. Despite similar terminology, the religious programs of Eliade and Einstein lie far apart. For Einstein, a spirituality of scientific investigation, postulated by him in many ways, ought to issue in a cosmic spirituality (→ Natural Science). With Eliade, cosmic spirituality is the discharge of 'hierophanies' hostile to history. With the newly introduced concept of 'hierophany,' the self-showing, the self-exposure of something 'Holy,' Eliade introduces a kind of 'nature spirituality' into religious studies: the → Holy is shown especially in phenomena of nature—rocks, trees, mountains; spirituality of the 'archaic human being' is won back by way of these hierophanies. The goal of his understanding of religious studies, then, is a 'return to the origin'—which modern artists, who can no longer believe in the Judeo-Christian faith, have already accomplished—a return "to 'paganism,' to the cosmic hierophanies."

3. Eliade's resonance out beyond the academe lies in this program of a 'return,' of countercultural utopias, coupling cultural criticism with the imagination of a primordial naturalness, a proximity to nature interpreted in religious terms. 'Yearning for the origin' thus becomes the utopian, escapist motto of a concrete 'soteriology' that sees a possible ideal in a pre-Christian way of life. Without appealing to Eliade directly, current neo-pagan utopias have goals similar to his: a flight from history, a partial escape from industrial society, the reestablishment of a nature-nearness interpreted in religious terms—against the Christian polemics of an 'imprisonment by nature.' The plethora of guides for 'sacred power places,' introductions to 'magical journeys' by elves, and spiritual wanderings, translates this quest: instead of a quest for the beginnings, now people seek a 'layer of nature beneath culture.'

Literature

Duerr, Hans Peter (ed.), Sehnsucht nach dem Ursprung, Frankurt/M. 1983; Einstein, Albert, The World As I See It, London 1940; Eliade, Mircea, The Myth of the Eternal Return, New York 1954; Faivre, Antoine/Zimmermann, Rolf Christian (eds.), Epochen der Naturmystik. Hermetische Tradition im wissenschaftlichen Fortschritt, Berlin 1979; Matthes, Joachim, "Auf der Suche nach dem Religiösen," in: Sociologia Internationalis 30 (1992), 129-142; Schleiermacher, Friedrich, On Religion: Speeches to Its Cultured Despisers, Cambridge 1988 (German [1]1799); Spranger, Eduard, Weltfrömmigkeit, Leipzig 1941; Taylor, Bron: "Earth and Nature-Based Spirituality: From Deep Ecology to Radical Environmentalism," in: Religion 31 (2001), 175-193; Idem: "Earth and Nature-Based Spirituality: From Earth First! and Bioregionalism to Scientific Paganism and the New Age," in: Religion 31 (2001), 225-245.

→ Environmentalism, Forest/Tree, Nature, Landscape, Mountains (Five Sacred), Paganism/Neopaganism, Pantheism, Place (Sacred), Romanticism, Wholeness/Holism

Burkhard Gladigow

New Age

The Concept

The concept 'New Age' emerged during the 1970s and 1980s as a common term for a variety of contemporary popular practices and beliefs. Among these one finds an interest in the paranormal, a belief in → reincarnation, methods of healing including varieties of self-improvement and positive thinking, messages putatively revealed from various transcendent sources (a process referred to within the New Age milieu itself as → channeling) and several forms of divination (→ astrology and the tarot in particular).

The term itself originally arose in theosophical literature (→ Theosophical/Anthroposophical Society) and was used by various → UFO cults after World War II to denote the millennialist belief that humanity soon would undergo a major evolutionary transformation of consciousness. Many of those who were involved in the first years of the New Age movement principally saw the various techniques of healing, divination, etc. as tools in this transformation. This sense of the term 'New Age' was in the later 1970s and in the 1980s largely replaced by an expanded meaning, referring to a wide array of ideas and practices, mainly united by historical links, a shared social setting, a common discourse and an air de famille. The two uses of the term have been characterized (Hanegraaff 1996, 94-103) as the New Age sensu stricto and sensu lato.

Basic Ideas of New Age Religion

Since New Age beliefs and practices are not formulated or reinforced by any widely shared authority structures, the concrete details of various healing systems or the specific views presented by various writers on astrology or the tarot can be left vague, and can differ to the point of being mutually inconsistent. In the New Age culture, several attempts have been made to construct a coherent whole from these diverse elements. More typically, perhaps, the variety of doctrines and rituals rests on shared implicit assumptions that are rarely spelled out in full. An attempt at reconstructing this underlying vision might include the following items:

1. The entire cosmos is not so much a vast set of material objects as a great, interconnected web of meaning. 2. The underlying 'stuff' of the cosmos is therefore not matter but something intangible, perhaps identifiable as consciousness or energy. 3. We humans contain a spark of this energy or consciousness within us, a resource that we can tap into in order to change reality and create our own worlds. 4. The human being is thus not only a material body, but also comprises a mind and a spiritual element. When ill, one needs to address all of these elements rather than merely treat isolated physical symptoms. 5. Each of us is embarked on a journey of spiritual development, a development that will not stop at the death of the physical body but will continue over many lives. 6. There are better ways to get to understand the world we live in and our own place in it than via the intellect. Perhaps we can gain spiritual insight in flashes of intuition. Perhaps there are prophetic states in which we can access knowledge from various highly developed beings, or from a divine part of our selves. A variety of techniques such as astrology or the tarot can also have this function. 7. Similar insights into the workings of the cosmos and into our own selves were granted to a number of ancient cultures, ranging from Egypt and India to the native Americas. 8. Such insights are confirmed by the most recent developments of Western science, especially quantum mechanics. 9. Spirituality is not a matter of accepting doctrines formulated by others, but rather a highly individual quest, that can (and perhaps should) be based primarily on personal experience. 10. We can either as individuals or collectively change the world into a better place by adopting such a spiritual vision.

A Ritualistic Form of Religiosity

Besides comprising a set of doctrinally related worldviews, the New Age is also an intensely ritualistic form of religiosity. The belief that body, mind, and spirit form a whole and should be treated as such has led to a profusion of systems of holistic ritual healing. The idea that there are states of consciousness in which it is possible to access spiritual knowledge has led to the emergence of ritualized means of reaching such states. The belief in a plan guiding our spiritual evolution has generated a variety of divinatory techniques to gain insight into this plan.

Esoteric Roots of New Age

New Agers will typically point at various exotic cultures as sources for their beliefs and practices. Egypt, India, China, Tibet, the Native Americas, even the fabled continent of → Atlantis, are often claimed to be the ultimate origins of one's own methods and creeds. More scholarly studies, on the other hand, tend to see the New Age as an eclectic combination of influences, by far the most important being various strands of Western → esotericism (Hanegraaff 1996, esp. chapters 14 and 15). The three dominant Western esoteric roots of the New Age can be identified as theosophy, the American New Thought currents, and the spiritualized psychology of Carl Gustav Jung. These currents of esotericism, which arose in the late nineteenth and early twentieth century, have been transformed into a quintessentially modern form of religiosity under the impact of various social and cultural changes that characterized modern society at the time of the emergence of the New Age, i.e. the last decades of the twentieth century. Among these characteristics of late modern society are globalization, individualism and commodification.

Eclecticism, Globalization, Commodification

In a globalized age, specific terms, concepts, and practices can be picked from anywhere on the planet, from the Native Americas to Egypt, from China to Polynesia. These are, however, lifted out of their original contexts and are radically reinterpreted in order to fit the pre-existing overall pattern and specific preoccupations of the New Age.

Individualism allows the palette of discourses and practices that arises in this manner to be used as a toolkit from which each individual New Ager can pick and combine elements ad lib. The rationale for encouraging such a mix is the characteristically modern assumption that our personal opinions and experiences are more important than the suggestions of any authority. Furthermore, an individualistic society offers few tradition-bound answers to the question how we should understand who we are and how we should live our lives. New Age self-help texts, manuals of divination as well as channeled texts are largely geared to aiding their readers to deal with such issues of → identity.

Commodification implies that New Age elements become available through the forces of the market economy. New Age books, workshops, rituals, and so forth are marketed in the same way as any other products.

New Age religiosity thereby fits so well with the preoccupations of modern, Western culture that several of its practices and beliefs have been stripped of their controversial New Age label, and have effectively been integrated into mainstream culture.

Literature

Bochinger, Ch., "New Age" und moderne Religion: religionswissenschaftliche Analysen, Gütersloh 1994; Campbell, C., "The Cult, The Cultic Milieu and Secularization," in: A Sociological Yearbook of Religion in Britain 5 (1972), 119-136; Hammer, O., Claiming Knowledge: Strategies of Epistemology from Theosophy to the New Age, Leiden 2000; Hanegraaff, W. J., New Age Religion and Western Culture: Esotericism in the Mirror of Secular Thought, Leiden 1996; Heelas, P., The New Age Movement: The Celebration of the Self and the Sacralization of Modernity, Oxford 1996; Kemp, D., New Age: An Introduction, Edinburgh 2003; Lewis, J. R./Melton, J. G. (eds.), Perspectives on the New Age, Albany 1992; Lewis, J. R. (ed.), The Encyclopedic Sourcebook of New Age Religions, Amherst 2004; Rothstein, M. (ed.), New Age Religion and Globalization, Århus 2001; Saliba, J. A., Christian Responses to the New Age Movement: A Critical Assessment, London 1999; Sutcliffe, St./Bowman, M. (eds.), Beyond New Age: Exploring Alternative Spirituality, Edinburgh 2000; York, M., The Emerging Network: A Sociology of the New Age and Neo-pagan Movements, Lanham 1995.

→ Channeling, Esalen Institute, Esotericism, Millenarianism/Chiliasm, Modernity/Modern Age, Occultism, Paganism/Neopaganism, Reception, Theosophical/Anthroposophical Society

Olav Hammer

New Myths / New Mythologies

1. Myths are attempts to comprehend the world. → Myth was still accounted a pre-scientific explanation in the nineteenth century, with its emphatic belief in progress. It now happens that myth can exist contemporaneously with science. Especially today, when science has become so complex that scientists themselves have a difficult time with a general overview, mythologic interpretations of everyday occurrences find great acceptance. Myth gives simple answers, where ratio apparently declines to. (Question: "Why do ships still disappear?" Answer: "The Bermuda Triangle has secret powers.") What is more, new myth gives answers to essential questions. (Question: "Why do the good die and the bad live?" Answer: "John F. Kennedy died because of a conspiracy that permeated all areas of society and politics, and still does"; or conversely: "Elvis isn't dead at all, he's living incognito.") As the hero triumphs over the dragon, so the hobby detective—or FBI agents Moulder and Scully, in the 'cult' series "X-Files" (USA, 1993)—fearlessly investigate the CIA, secret governments, and conspiracy. If old myth is frequently the quest for an explanation, so new myth thrives either on its obvious fictional character (as in the movies) or on the ignorance of believers.

2. The list of modern myths, which readily mature to complex and confused worldviews, is long and convoluted. Extraterrestrial → UFOs, or saviors

Cadborosaurus (sea snake)
Vancouver Island
Rocky Mountains
Bigfoot
Area 51: Secret tests with aliens that survived the Roswell UFO crash
Rachel,Nevada
UFO Crash, 1947
Roswell New Mexico
Dallas
Murder of John F. Kennedy
Case of Barney and Betty Hill (1961): Alien abduction
Whitfield, New Hampshire
Lake Champlain
Sea monster
'Philadelphia Experiment' (1943), time journey of the battleship USS Eldrige
Philadelphia
Washington
FBI, CIA, Pentagon, White House: centers of conspiracy RIP
Graceland
Tomb of Elvis Presley
Chesapeake Bay
Chessie (sea snake)
Bermuda Triangle
Lost ships (Berlitz)
Bimini, Bahamas
Palenque
Missile representation
Haiti
Zombies
Puerto Rico
Submarine UFO base
Amazonas
Akakor, extinct civilization of astronauts
Nazca Desert
Earth drawings as symbolic UFO airstrip (Däniken)
Minas Gerais/Sao Paulo
Antonia Villas Boas: first alien abduction
Easter Island
Giant statues
Nahuel Huapi
Sea monster
Canary Islands
"Plesiosaurus", "Nessie"
Loch Ness
(J.Spanuth1953)
Helgoland
Death of Lady Diana Spencer
Paris
Willendorf
Find of Venus statuette
Wiltshire
Corn circles
RIP
Rennes-le-Chateau
Grail
Prague
"Protocols of the Elders of Zion" Transsylvania
Dracula
Troy
(E.Zangger, 1992)
Ararat
Noah's Ark
Çatal Hülük
Malta
Kriti
Thera
(S.Marinatos,1976)
Pyramids
Gizeh
Valley of the Kings
Pharaoh's curse
Tunguska (1908)
Kashmir
Tomb of Jesus
Himalaya
Shangri-La
Yeti
Kongo
Living dinosaur
Zimbabwe
City of ruins: King Solomon's mines
Nan Mandol, Ponape
City of ruins
New South Wales
Tasmanian tiger
Yowie (Australian Yeti)
New Zealand South Island
Moa (giant ostrich)
Antarctica
SS Organization "Black Sun"
F.D.2005
NEW MYTHS / NEW MYTHOLOGIES
UFO
Crypto-zoology PSI
Pre-Astronautics
Lost Countries
Atlantis
Matriarchy
Biblical themes
Conspiracy theories
Fatalities
Living Dead, Zombies

from another star, belong just as authentically on that list as do the saga of → Atlantis, with its super-humans, the curse of the pharaoh, and of course heroes and warriors of justice like Superman, Batman, the rebels of "Star Wars" (George Lucas's film epic, 1977–2005), or Humphrey Bogart in "Casablanca."

Conspiracy Myths

3. Many myths work with the concept of world conspiracies (by Freemasons, Jews, Catholics, Jesuits, the CIA, the FBI, Communists, etc.). This component makes it possible for a myth, despite unambiguous refutation, to continue to be believed. There are invincible conspiracies, with power to manipulate the whole of reality. This is the basic pattern of the "X-Files," and National Socialist → anti-Semitism alike.

New Myths as Variants of Old Myths

4. New myths are often modern variants of old myths. If, in the Middle Ages, Emperor Barbarossa was still alive in the Kyffhäuser, or King Arthur in Glastonbury, this is what Elvis does, in concealment. If the gods of antiquity take to themselves the young that they love, so also are heroes (precisely the canvas for the myths) potentially immortal even today, and can die only by violence or a conspiracy (Marilyn Monroe, James Dean, John F. Kennedy, Lady Diana Spencer). And the ship-gobbling Sea of Sargasso, or the deadly magnetic mountain of the old sailors' saga, becomes the Bermuda Triangle.

Religious Messages

5. Precisely because our everyday world is so extensively 'secularized,' modern myths also carry religious messages. As traditional religions lose their importance, and decentralized piety is established (for example, in the → New Age belief), it is technological sagas that take over the function of pious legends. UFOs are space ships of a superior (or diabolical) extraterrestrial race that rescues us from the end of the world (or performs dismal genetic experiments on us), the film "E.T." (USA 1982; directed by Steven Spielberg) is modeled on the life of Christ, Lady Diana speaks from the beyond and substitutes for the traditional Marian apparitions. At the same time, myths are established that feed on doubt in the traditional religions: 'nonfiction' on alleged → 'Qumran conspiracies,' a secret Bible code (that itself might well come from extraterrestrials), or the tomb of Jesus in Kashmir, simultaneously appeal to the skepticism and the thirst for wonders of the reading public, who remain ignorant of pertinent scholarly literature, theological or historical. Thus, modern myths have not only an explanatory function, but a content meaning, as well.

An exemplar would be the myths of 'ancient astronauts,' in which the old myths and sacred books were actually delivered by visits of extraterrestrials. The ancient astronaut myth is one of the most comprehensive of modern myth-complexes, which technologize every aspect of traditional religion: the God of Exodus was a UFO, 'creation' was a genetic experiment by visitors from distant stars, 'angel' is another word for a space-traveler, apparitions of → Mary are messages from the extraterrestrials. The ancient astronaut myth, whose best-known protagonist is Swiss author Erich von Däniken (Erinnerungen an die Zukunft, Düsseldorf 1968; Eng. version: Chariots of the Gods?, London 1969), ascribes every received supernatural event in the history of humanity to astronauts, who thus become more than a technological version of the old gods. By virtue of their omnipotence and ubiquity, they become veritable new gods.

From eyewitness accounts, often third-hand, demonstrably false, or hoaxes, UFO researchers have reconstructed the crash of a flying saucer, near Roswell, New Mexico, in July 1947. Their theses were the basis for the film The Roswell Incident. A model of an extraterrestrial is today exhibited in the International UFO Museum. The reports influence fiction, and the fiction works back on conceptions of how the reported UFOs and extraterrestrials must have looked. In myth, then, the boundary between fact and fiction is blurred, and the latter influence each other reciprocally.

6. In varied and multiple ways, all of these modern and new myths dovetail with one another. Thus, the 'mutilation of cattle' stems not from perverse human beings, but by choice of the secret service, or of the extraterrestrials, who conduct the governance of the world in secret (with knowledge of 'Jewish high finance'!). These extraterrestrials are based in Puerto Rico, in the Bermuda Triangle; submarine UFOs can appear in the form of sea-monsters. The intermeshing of the most varied myths (Marilyn Monroe had to die, as did Kennedy, because they both knew too much about UFOs[1]) can occur with the help of the all-comprehensive explanatory powers of interconnected mythologemes, especially those of the above-mentioned conspiracy 'theories.'

7. In contrast with old myths, which were transmitted orally over long periods of time, modern myths—with the exception of the 'friend of a friend' stories—are conveyed by the modern communications media. The principal multipliers are media that neglect painstaking research—the Internet, TV talk-shows, tabloids, nonfiction bestsellers, and dime novels. Besides myths that exist only within their medium, and are known as fictitious (stars of comics, film divas, the virtual stars of computer games, e.g. Lara Croft in "Tomb Raider," 1994), many modern sagas lead a double life in fictional media (film, television, comics) and real discussion on social policy (e.g., the UFO conspiracy appears in the television series "X-Files," and also as foundational connection in popular nonfiction). Science fiction films and comics take up popular myths, and develop them further; this new version then influences the myth itself, as can be shown very well from Spielberg's films.

These new myths also harbor dangers: some → New Age beliefs are permeated with an extreme-right mentality, the UFO legends with traditional anti-Semitism (world conspiracy through 'high finance'). Psychically unstable persons can suffer obsessive fixations, such as the belief that they have been sexually abused by extraterrestrials. Sometimes, modern myths can even replace consensus about reality and can lead to tragic consequences—as witnessed recently, with the mass suicide of the Heaven's Gate group in 1997, after Internet rumors of UFOs in the tail of the Hale-Bopp Comet.

1. Magazin 2000, 105 (1995), 46; 106 (1995), 19.

Literature

Fort, Charles, Complete Books, New York 1974 (originally published 1918–1932, contains practically every modern myth); Meurger, Michel, Alien Abductions—L'enlèvement extraterrestre de la fiction à la croyance, Amiens 1995 (from Science Fiction to the modern belief in UFOs); Michell, John/Rickard, Robert J. M., Phenomena, London 1977 (old myths and their modern equivalents); Watson, Nigel, Supernatural Spielberg, London 1992.

→ Atlantis, Fantasy (Genre), Myth/Mythology, Popular Culture, Science Fiction, UFO

Ulrich Magin

New Religions

Difficulties of the Concept

'New religions' or 'new religious movements' is a broadly inclusive term that has emerged in academic discussions to refer to a cornucopia of religious communities entering the scene in the wake of colonialism and—particularly—modernity. The theoretical difficulties are enormous: (1) Just like the → demise of a religion, it is a normal historical and social development that new communities and new forms of religious tradition arise against a background of changing cultural circumstances. Hence, it is questionable as to what extent the notion of 'new religions' add to our understanding of a given religious landscape. (2) Often, the term has been used with a polemical tone; talking of 'new religions' presupposes that these religions do not have a historical background but 'syncretistically' put together elements of 'pure' or 'real' religions. Talking of 'new religious movements' indicates the assumption that these groups will not flourish in the way 'real religions' do but will sooner or later—depending on the cultural fashion or the changing subjective interests of their members—vanish again from the scene. Not surprisingly, therefore, both terms play a crucial role in the polemic debate about → cults (→ Anti-Cult Movements), → sects, and the → New Age.

Attempts to Classification

These difficulties notwithstanding, many scholars argue that the emergence of independent religious communities has to be studied seriously, and that there are a few characteristics that allow for a structural classification of these groups. Contrasted to reform movements that arise within a given religious tradition, new religions are categorized as the result of → religious contact. (1) In the context and aftermath of → colonialism and conquest, elements from various religious traditions blend into a new theological framework and form new religious identities. (2) Not only arising in immediate conflict and pressure, but also due to prolonged interaction between religious traditions, new religions have been formed, either as a revitalization of older currents or as a creative blending of given religious options. (3) Particularly in the West, new religions have emerged in the nineteenth and twentieth century as conscious and deliberate constructions vis-à-vis the 'traditional' religions. This development is due to processes of modernization (→ Disenchantment/Reenchantment), as well as to increasing inclusion of Eastern traditions into the worldviews of Western culture (→ Esalen Institute; New Age; Orientalism/Exotism). It is especially the third aspect that is prominent in recent scholarship, thus constructing a common denominator for a multitude of religious communities that have entered the (Western) scene during and after the counterculture of the 1960s.

Are There Better Concepts?

Given the vagueness of the concept 'new religions,' it can be argued that complex sociological and religious dynamics, which characterize both religious history in general and the development of religion in modern times in particular, should be analyzed with a more appropriate and reflective theoretical instrument. From this perspective, the term 'new religions' falls apart into such terms as → pluralism, → migration, → modernity, → secularization, → religious contact, → colonialism, → projection, or → polemics.

Literature

Arweck, Elisabeth, "New Religious Movements," in: Woodhead, Linda et al. (eds.), Religions in the Modern World: Traditions and Transformations, London/New York 2002, 264-288; Arweck, Elisabeth/Clarke, Peter B. (eds.), New Religious Movements in Western Europe: An Annotated Bibliography, Westport 1997; Barker, Eileen/Warburg, Margit (eds.), New Religions and New Religiosity, Aarhus 1998; Beckford, James A. (ed.), New Religious Movements and Rapid Social Change, London 1986; Chryssides, George D., Historical Dictionary of New Religious Movements, Lanham 2001; Dawson, Lorne L. (ed.), Cults and New Religious Movements: A Reader, Malden 2003; Lewis, James R., Peculiar Prophets: A Biographical Dictionary of New Religions, St. Paul 1999; Idem, Legitimating New Religions, New Brunswick 2003; Lewis, James R. (ed.), The Oxford Handbook of New Religious Movements, Oxford 2004; Robbins, Thomas, Cults, Converts and Charisma: The Sociology of New Religious Movements, London 1988; Wilson, Bryan R./Cresswell, Jamie (eds.), New Religious Movements: Challenge and Response, London/New York 1999.

→ Anti-Cult Movements, Denomination, Group, Modernity/Modern Age, New Age, Paganism/Neopaganism, Pluralism, Polemics, Religion, Religious Contact, Secularization, Sect, Tradition

Kocku von Stuckrad

New York

From the Dutch Colony to the City of Millions

1. a) Founded as a Dutch colony in 1626, New York was a multi-religious city from the very start. New Amsterdam—as it was called until the English colonists conquered it and renamed it as New York in 1664—had to be grateful for every inhabitant, regardless of origin. The religious history of New York has always been characterized by immigration, and remains so today. First, the great Protestant Denominations established themselves (Reformed Church, Presbyterians, Anglicans, Baptists, Methodists, Lutherans, Evangelicals). They dominated the religious and public life of the city for almost three hundred years, and long prevented the expansion of other confessions. At the same time, the contest among them has created a multiplicity of important churches and church institutions. At the beginning of the nineteenth century, social institutions arose under the roof of Protestantism that devoted themselves to an alleviation of the growing misery and helplessness of the slums. Since then, home mission and social work have been among the tasks to which all confessions in New York have assigned a great deal of weight. In 1836, Union Theological Seminary was founded by the Presbyterians. In 1892, it was opened to all Protestant confessions, since when this place of formation has left its mark on the New York pastoral calling.

b) The 1830s saw the beginnings of Catholic immigration, mostly of Irish and Germans. Between 1830 and 1865, the number of Catholics in New York grew from 15,000 to 400,000, making Catholicism the largest 'denomination' in New York. Nevertheless, anti-Catholic attitudes, especially in the schools, became a daily fact, all through the century. Bishop Hughes (1842–1864) therefore resolutely promoted the founding of Catholic schools, systematically distributed throughout the parishes of the diocese. Today, the Catholic Church still maintains more schools in poor neighborhoods than do other denominations. In 1898, with the consolidation of New York City, the latter was divided into two dioceses, the Archdiocese of New York and the Diocese of Brooklyn. Both dioceses grew until 1920: New York to 1.3 million, and Brooklyn to 800,000 members, mostly of Italian origin. In order to accommodate the cultural, linguistic, and social peculiarities of the immigrants, the new parishes were commonly organized along ethnic rather than territorial lines, a principle of organization also applied after 1870 by Baptists and Jews.

c) Between 1880 and 1910, following pogroms, 1.4 million Jews fled to the United States from Eastern Europe. Remaining in the New York port of entry were 1.1 million, including Sephardic Jews from the Balkans, Syria, and Turkey. Until then, some 17,000 Jews had lived in the city. A wealthy Jewish elite, of German origin, had appeared, with Reform Jews dominating the community. Poor, traditional Orthodox Jews, newly arrived from Eastern Europe, and settling on the Lower East Side, found it difficult to combine religion with an American lifestyle. The Jewish Endeavor Society and Young Israel began to organize the community life of the disoriented immigrants, and to draft models for Jewish integration that were adopted by Orthodox, Conservative, and Reform Jews alike. In 1887, the Jewish Theological Seminary was founded, which today remains the national center of Conservative Judaism. Since the presidency of Gershom Cohen (1972–1986), women have been admitted and ordained as rabbis.

d) During the time of the First World War, a large number of poor blacks came to New York from the Southern states. They settled in Harlem, and black Protestants took over existing churches and synagogues. As early as 1800 the Methodist Zion Church, and in 1808 the Abyssinian Baptist Church, were founded by Afro-Americans. More than fifty percent of the Baptists (who in New York alone have eleven independent congregations, and form the largest denomination after the Catholics) are Afro-Americans, who also play a significant role in all church institutions. Pastors of the Abyssinian Church have had great influence on New York social policy (e.g. Adam Clayton Powell, Sr. and Jr., Calvin O. Butts).

Changes in the Present

2. a) In the postwar era, the religious balance of power has shifted, and the hegemony of Protestantism is slowly dwindling. Except for the Pentecostalists, who have seen their membership grow steadily since the 1930s, the number of Protestants is diminishing overall, while the number of Catholics, after a decade of shrinkage, has shot upward. The key factor in this change as well has been immigration. In the late 1940s immigration from Latin American countries began. Immigrants from Africa and Asia (the Philippines and Korea) have come since the mid-1960s. In the early 1990s, the Archdiocese of New York had 2.2 million members, nearly half of them from Latin America. The Diocese of Brooklyn, reduced in 1957 to Nassau and Suffolk Counties, now serves 1.5 million members. Catholic services in New York are held in twenty-three languages.

b) Next to the Catholics, the Jews are receiving a great number of immigrants. Beginning in 1960, Sephardic Jews have come from Africa and the Near East, and in 1980 Jewish immigrants from the former Soviet Union, Iran, and Israel. And yet the greater proportion of New York Jews are of the third or fourth generation, by 1990 numbering 1.13 million. Of this number, eighty-three percent claim to be religious. Again by 1990, 437 synagogues could be counted. Through immigration from the Soviet Union, the percentage of Orthodox in New York is higher than in any other country, most of them living in Brooklyn and Queens, where a highly organized Jewish community life has formed.

c) The denomination that has grown the most rapidly in the last decades is Islam. When Malcolm X became an imam in the 1950s, many Afro-Americans converted. In the mid-1960s, Muslim immigration from all over the world began. Some 600,000 Muslims live in New York City, most of them Sunnites; between 25 and 40 percent of these are Afro-Americans. The city accommodates some sixty mosques, most of them in Brooklyn. In 1991, the Great Mosque and a culture center opened on the Upper East Side. Since the outbreak of the conflicts between black Muslims and Orthodox Jews, an Interfaith Committee regulates the social relations between the two groups.

d) Besides the large denominations in New York that have subsisted for decades now, countless religious groups have been forming, scions of all of the great world religions: Afro-American cults from Central America, Baha'i from Iran, Sufism in many hues, and much more. Not to be forgotten are the Orthodox Churches, with their foothold in New York since about 1900. Ever and again, New York's ethnic and religious communities overlap, mix, and divide, although not at the centers of society, but on its fringes.

3. New York's churches and synagogues ascribe great importance to inter-confessional dialogue. Its concentration of theological institutions has made the city the religious intellectual center of the United States. Nearly all national and international Jewish organizations have their main offices in New York. The Inter-Church Center, opened in 1958, hosts the main offices of most mainline Protestants, as well as those of the National Council of Churches, with a composition analogous to that of the World Council. New York is an open, secular city, although it has scarcely fewer churches and houses of prayer than Rome, like the synagogues and mosques all well attended on the Lord's day of the week.

Literature

Binder, Frederick M./Reimers, David M., All the Nations under Heaven: An Ethnic and Racial History of New York City, New York 1995; Brown, Karen McCarthy, Mama Lola: A Vodou Priestess in Brooklyn, Berkeley [2]2001; Carnes, Tony/Karphathakis, Anna (eds.), New York Glory: Religions in the City, New York 2001; Guest, Kenneth J., God in Chinatown: Religion and Survival in New York's Evolving Immigrant Community, New York 2003; Hödl, Klaus, "Vom Shtetl an der Lower East Side." Galizische Juden in New York, Vienna 1991; Howe, Irving/Libo, Kenneth (eds.), How We Lived: A Documentary History of Immigrant Jews in America, 1880–1930, New York 1979; Lankevich, George J., American Metropolis: A History of New York City, New York 1998; Nadel, Stanley, Little Germany: Ethnicity, Religion, and Class in New York City, 1845–1880, Urbana 1990; Orsi, Robert Anthony, The Madonna of 115th Street: Faith and Community in Italian Harlem, 1880–1950, New Haven 1985.

→ Afro-American Religions, Migration, North America

Sigrun Anselm

Nietzsche, Friedrich

Life and Work

1. Friedrich Nietzsche was born on October 15, 1844, the son of a Protestant minister. Even before the end of his studies, he was Professor of Ancient Philology in Basle. Psychosomatic complaints obliged him to lay aside his office in 1879. From then on he lived on his pension and freelance authorship, and until 1889 was usually traveling in Switzerland and Italy. As to his Weltanschauung, Arthur Schopenhauer and Richard Wagner were his first influences, from both of whom he later turned away. The unwonted breadth of his lectures, not always matched by their thoroughness, did not recoil from current biological and racial theories (→ Darwinism; Race/Racism).

Diagnostician and Critic

a) Nietzsche belongs to the 'classic' nineteenth-century figures of the criticism of religion and ideology. His contribution is twofold:

(1) As diagnostician of the crisis of Christianity: From the side of theology, he discerns a rapid, frankly public loss of relevance, as it was no longer feasible to set its debates in relation with general scientific discussion. From the side of the Church, he notes both an outer destabilization, caused by a loss of membership, particularly among the social elite, and a crisis of inner condition, with the Church having transformed its Christianity essentially into a 'gentle moralism.'[1] Here Nietzsche refers to theses of Basle religious historian Franz Overbeck.

(2) As critic in the strict sense of the word: Here he works methodically with historical and psychological means. For Nietzsche, religion can be traced back, in origin and content, part and parcel, to extra-religious motifs. Religious and moral concepts and perceptions turn out to be sublimations, 'reinterpretations' of basal affects and instincts, which in their essence present nothing but the Human, All Too Human (to cite the title of his 1878 collection of aphorisms). Diagnosis and criticism occasion his proclamation of the 'death of God': the theoretical and cultural failure of the Christian conception of life.[2]

Critique of Christianity and 'Positive' Philosophy

b) While Nietzsche first describes the Christian 'reinterpretation' always as a *mis*interpretation, he later specifies his meaning, as can be gathered from his preludes to Die Fröhliche Wissenschaft (Ger., "The Gay Science"). Persons have only a mediated access to their affects, Nietzsche holds, and it is therefore imperative that the latter be laid out and examined. But this insight leads to an intensification of his criticism of Christianity: in its interpretations, Christianity is profoundly hostile to life. By 'life,' Nietzsche signals the central concept of his philosophy, and the most effective: the 'will to power'—by which he understands life designed for and devoted to ascent, enrichment, and the overcoming of obstacles. Thus, the doctrine of sin outlaws all living drives, while that of the Christian paradise (like Buddhist nirvana) instills an obstinate breach with the ascent of life, and hatred for the present. Following the collapse of Christian-spirited main hermeneutics ('values'), Nietzsche can only conclude that, through its 'depreciation of all natural values,' Christianity has produced → nihilism. On the one hand, Nietzsche agrees with this product, as it unveils the true character of Christianity (and its secular offspring, like democracy, socialism, and liberalism, that he discerns as having the same tendency to a leveling and flattening of life). On the other hand, the goal of his 'positive' philosophy is victory over nihilism, through a "revaluation of all values"—the creation of new meaning possibilities and interpretation patterns, which are to be conformable to the character of life as power. He has set forth this goal for all to see especially in his prose poem, Also sprach Zarathustra (Ger., "Thus Spake Zarathustra"; 1883–1885). From the viewpoint of literature, this work seeks both to outdo and to parody the 'gospel' genre. As to its content, Zarathustra proclaims the "Übermensch" (Ger., "Super-Person"; → Zarathustra). The latter symbolizes humanity, which would constantly lift its life out above the momentary condition, and thereby adopts a part of the task of the discarded thought of God. Nietzsche's myth of the 'eternal return of the same' teaches the highest affirmation of the present life, while preventing the symbol of the 'Super-Person' from leading to a higher-order denial of the present. It is not only in Zarathustra that Nietzsche's usually aphoristic and unmasking language at times assumes emphatic and visionary traits, which consciously join the proclamatory tone of the New Testament.

Reception of Antiquity

c) The glass that Nietzsche supplies for an examination of his criticism of Christianity is always the 'heroic' age of classical Greek antiquity (→ Hero/Heroism).[3] Here Nietzsche finds a religiosity accommodated to the character of 'life,' an 'innocent' religiosity. It is in his first writing, Die Geburt der Tragödie aus dem Geist der Musik (Ger., "The Birth of Tragedy from the Spirit of Music"; 1872), that he develops the pair of concepts, "the Apollonian and the Dionysan."[4] These stand for, respectively, the shaping and formative, and the delirious, ecstatic side of life. It is especially with this pair of concepts that Nietzsche, for one thing, fell in line with a rather long German philhellenic tradition,[5] just as, for another, he became influential on pagan currents by way of his attempt to transpose elements of Greek religion into the present (→ Paganism/Neopaganism).

Reception

In January 1889 in Turin, Nietzsche broke down, and he lived from then on in mental derangement, with his mother. He died August 25, 1900, having no longer consciously experienced the history of his unexampled effectiveness, which massively supervened beginning in the 1890s. Nietzsche became the 'martyr and prophet' (J. Krause) of an entire generation. Still today, numerous intellectuals maintain that they owe him their experience of mental and spiritual liberation. Occasionally, even formal religious associations were founded in his memory.[6]

Arts

Nietzsche's work had struck the nerve of the cultural malaise of his time. Then he worked first as chief witness for cultural criticism, spiritual regeneration, and alternative lifestyles, as the figure who led to a 'higher life.' On occasion, especially in the plastic arts, it was possible for Nietzsche to be stylized as the embodiment of the new type of human being, and as early as around 1900 the expression 'Nietzsche cult' enjoyed currency.[7] A great deal of music was inspired by him (Richard Strauss, symphonic poem, "Also sprach Zarathustra," 1896; Gustav Mahler's Third Symphony, 1893–1896). Poetry treating religious topics (R. M. Rilke, S. George, H. Hesse) owes him an essential impetus.

Only in the 1920s did a more intensive philosophical confrontation develop (normative interpretations by K. Jaspers, K. Löwith, and M. Heidegger). → Existentialism sees the human being after the 'death of God' deposited in an absolute responsibility; postmodern philosophy (M. Foucault, G. Deleuze) since the 1970s appeals to Nietzsche's historical-genealogical method of criticism.

The Nietzschean reception by the National Socialists presents a substantive as well as a linguistic abridgment, it is true: this reception is not without all support in the texts (polyvalent concept of power; uncritical application of racial stereotypes and metaphors). It was facilitated by his sister, Elisabeth Forster-Nietzsche (1846–1935), Director of the Nietzsche Archive in Weimar, who caused the publication of a tendentious edition of Nietzsche's literary remains. Her efforts climaxed in the high-handed compilation, from notes that he had left, of a 'chef-d'oeuvre' called Der Wille zur Macht ("The Will to Power"), the plan of whose publication Nietzsche had long since rejected. Here the most prominent interpretation was that of A. Baeumler. Baeumler reduces Nietzsche's principal impetus in the area of ideological criticism (which actually could also have been directed against 'German' ideologies) to a critique of the middle class, labels his constructive foundational thought 'Teutonic,' and narrows the concept of 'power' to the political. Taken to the hilt, Baeumler's position removed all obstacles from an understanding of Nietzsche as a 'Proto-Fascist,' a view that his postwar reception has long since abandoned.[8]

Christian Theology

Christian theology usually reacted to Nietzsche's work with rejection, or with—frequently inadequate—polemics. A justification of his critique, for example in respect of the theme 'hostility toward life,' was likewise made use of early enough (Albert Schweitzer). Especially in the United States, a 'theology of the death of God' was developed (Thomas Altizer, William Hamilton; in Germany, Dorothee Sölle). Constructive engagements beyond this point could be struck, if at all, by a theology that critically assimilated the concept of interpretation.

1. Morgenröthe, no. 92 (KGA V/2, p. 81).
2. Cf. Die Fröhliche Wissenschaft, no. 343 (KGA V/2, p. 255).
3. Cf. Cancik 1995.
4. Der Geburt der Tragödie, no. 1 (KGA III/1, p. 21).

5. Cf. von Reibnitz, Barbara, Ein Kommentar zu Friedrich Nietzsche, "Die Geburt der Tragödie aus dem Geiste der Musik" (Kap. 1–12), Stuttgart 1992, 61-64.
6. Cf. Cancik 1987, 420-22.
7. Cf. ibid., 406.
8. Textual extracts of the authors named under "Philosophy," in: Guzzoni, Alfred (ed.), 100 Jahre philosophische Nietzsche-Rezeption, Hain Bodenheim 1991.

Literature

Sources: Nietzsche, Friedrich, Werke/Briefwechsel. Kritische Gesamtausgabe (KGA), ed. by Giorgio Colli and Mazzino Montinari, Berlin 1967ff. Engl. edition: The Complete Works of Friedrich Nietzsche, ed. by Ernst Behler, 20 vols., Stanford 1995ff.

Secondary Literature: Aschheim, Steven E., The Nietzsche Legacy in Germany, 1890–1990, Berkeley 1992; Cancik, Hubert, 'Der Nietzsche-Kult in Weimar. Ein Beitrag zur Religionsgeschichte der Wilhelminischen Ära,' in: Nietzsche-Studien 16 (1987), 405-429; idem, Nietzsches Antike, Stuttgart 1995; Cancik, Hubert/Cancik-Lindemaier, Hildegart, Philolog und Kultfigur: Friedrich Nietzsche und seine Antike in Deutschland, Stuttgart 1999; Hayman, Ronald, Nietzsche: A Critical Life, London 1980; Janz, Curt Paul, Friedrich Nietzsche. Biographie, 3 vols., Munich 1978; McCarthy, George E., Dialectics and Decadence: Echoes of Antiquity in Marx and Nietzsche, Lanham 1994; Safranski, Rüdiger, Nietzsche: A Philosophical Biography, London 2002; Schrift, Alan D., Nietzsche and the Question of Interpretation, New York 1990; Tanner, Michael, Nietzsche: A Very Short Introduction, Oxford 2000; van Tongeren, Paul J. M., Reinterpreting Modern Culture: An Introduction to Friedrich Nietzsche's Philosophy, West Lafayette 2000.

→ Criticism of Religion, Hero/Heroism, Modernity/Modern Age, Nihilism, Paganism/Neopaganism

Andreas Kubik

Nihilism

1. The expression nihilism (from Lat., nihil, 'nothing') is used in the broadest sense, and frequently with polemical intent, to denote a radical skepticism, as handed on in classical form by Sophist Gorgias (c. 480–380 BCE): "First, there is nothing. Second, even if there were something, it would still be unknowable for human beings; third, even if it were knowable, it could not be transmitted to our fellow human being, or made understood" (Sextus Empiricus, Adv. Matt., VII, 65ff.: DK 82, B3). Inasmuch as the reproach of nihilism was levied in connection with religious as well as political and literary tendencies, and applied to such various phenomena as idealism, → atheism, → pantheism, materialism, or pessimism, an attention to the meaning content in question is advisable. With respect to religious discourse, the following simplified list of ways of employing the concept may be distinguished: (1) the reproach, of polemical intent, that opposes an assault on received values and norms in times of social change as 'nihilistic'; (2) nihilism as a diagnosis that first of all confirms the existence of the crisis, but that, as a rule, offers a defeat of this condition; (3) an existentialist variant, that diagnoses nihilism in the form of, for example, the absurdity of human existence, and that, by and large, lists this absurdity among the foundational circumstances of human being, the conditio humana, without historical dimensions. Further, although rarely, (4) a mystical fusing with a divinity conceived as infinite and indeterminate can be designated nihilism.

2. Before F. H. Jacobi (1743–1819), only the followers of a certain Christological doctrine that had been branded heretical were called 'nihilianists' (second half of the twelfth century). The concept of nihilism first achieved importance, at least in philosophical circles, in the so-called nihilism discussions of 1799. Jacobi leveled the reproach of nihilism against the philosophical idealism of J. G. Fichte, as he considered the latter to be claiming the object of knowledge to be generated only as construction, and in reflection, and not as existing in itself. Thus the object would become merely a subjective schema, a creature of human reflection. Another understanding of nihilism is found with F. Schlegel. In his Cologne lectures of 1804/05, he referred to the fact that a number of mystics have dubbed 'nihilism' that kind of thinking according to which they sought to become one with the infinite, indeterminate God. This pantheistic manner of thought was to be encountered principally with the Indian yogis, held Schlegel. Subsequently, the concept of nihilism found application in the Western reception of → Buddhism, which was introduced at this time. Thus, scholar of religion F. Max Müller interpreted a certain form of Buddhism as nihilism, on grounds of its apprehension of → nirvana. With A. Schopenhauer, the same conceptualization is brought into connection with the rejection of the will as victory over a painful individuation.

Ivan S. Turgenev's novel Fathers and Sons (1862) had an especially popularizing effect, in which the denomination nihilists was applied to the followers of social revolutionary thought in Russia under Tsar Alexander II. Bestowed on them by their enemies, this name was intended to show them as anarchists without a belief, but was subsequently adopted by them as a self-designation.

Criticism of Culture

F. → Nietzsche understood 'European nihilism' as a prophesying or diagnosis of the spiritual condition of the West at the end of the nineteenth century. Slogans like 'God is dead,' 'revaluation of all values,' or even a 'radical rejection of value and meaning' opened a wide space of interpretation for the prevailing situation of a profoundly changing present. This diagnosis was eagerly taken up by a multi-faceted criticism of culture on the part of the conservative middle class, which, at the end of the nineteenth century, and especially after the First World War, saw itself laid open to profound social and economic changes. The proposition of the end of a culture marked by Christianity, together with a relativism of all values, were, however, interpreted as the transitional stage to a new, longed for, future age, whose contours, granted, could be indicated only in polyvalent metaphors and symbols.

M. Heidegger took up the diagnosis of nihilism, but included it in a comprehensive history of being that did its work above human beings, and consequently, unlike Nietzsche, no longer posited the prospect of any defeat of nihilism. As early as the Second World War, existentialist Albert Camus, in his figure of Sisyphus, sketched the ideal type of a heroic nihilist, who, in all of the absurdity of his existence, must be conceptualized as a happy human being (Le myth de Sisyphe; Fr., "The Myth of Sisyphus"; 1942). Subsequently, authors like S. Beckett (En attendant Godot; Fr., "Waiting for Godot"; 1952) brought onstage the feeling of a life of absurdity, without positing the prospect of its historical defeat (→ Existentialism).

The spectrum of theological reactions, to a diagnosis of nihilism during the postwar era, extended from a determined rejection of the image of the human being that—on the basis of a purely anthropologically directed humanism—was said to have been dominant since the threshold of the modern age (H. Fries, Nihilismus: Gefahr unserer Zeit; Ger., "Nihilism: The Danger of Our Times"; 1949), to the attempts of American theologians to draft a 'God is dead' theology (W. Hamilton, T. J. Altizer). Theologians frequently diagnose the present as fundamentally atheistic and 'nihilistic': whether the re-mythologizing thrust witnessed since the 1980s, or the rise of a post-materialistic sense of value, is leading to an enduring change in this diagnosis, remains to be seen.

Literature

Gawoll, Hans-Jürgen, Nihilismus und Metaphysik. Entwicklungsgeschichtliche Untersuchung vom deutschen Idealismus bis zu Heidegger, Stuttgart/Bad-Cannstatt 1989; Gillespie, Michael Allen, Nihilism before Nietzsche, Chicago 1995; Glicksberg, Charles I., The Literature of Nihilism, Lewisburg 1975; Heidegger, Martin, Der europäische Nihilismus, Pfullingen 1967; Martin, Glen T., From Nietzsche to Wittgenstein: The Problem of Truth and Nihilism in the Modern World, New York etc. 1989; Vercellone, Federico, Introduzione a il nichilismo, Rome 1992; Weiler, Winfried, Nihilismus. Geschichte, System, Kritik, Paderborn 1980.

→ Atheism, Criticism of Religion, Existentialism, Nietzsche

Georg Hartmann

Nirvana

The Sanskrit word nirvāṇa (in Pali, nibbāna) denotes the goal of Buddhist practice. The one who realizes the redeeming insight, and therewith nirvana, has been delivered from the conceptualization of an abiding ego, and has overcome greed, hatred, and delusion. For the redeemed person, there is no new karma, and no more reincarnation. The Pali Canon has little to say about nirvana. It is mostly described in negations: it has not come to be, it is imperishable, not born, deathless, neither a coming nor a going, neither endurance in being nor ceasing to be. Above all, it is the end of conditioned coming-to-be—which is inescapably transitory and perishable—and therewith the end of suffering. Concepts like joy, repose, purity, or ultimate goal likewise attempt an approach to a concept that ultimately escapes any definition. When the life of a redeemed one comes to an end, parinirvāṇa ('full extinction') supervenes. The question of a continuance after parinirvāṇa, as it does not lead to redemption, is left unanswered. In Theravada, nirvana is 'reality beyond all forms of existence.' In the Mahayana philosophy of the concept of 'emptiness' presented by the 'absolute,' an identity of saṃsāra (wandering through the various forms of being) and nirvana postulates that the seeker after salvation must experience the nirvana already latently at hand in him or her. Nirvana stands at the end of a long chain of existences, and, for Buddhist believers, the immediate goal, as a rule, is a favorable reincarnation conditioned by salutary karma.

→ Buddha, Buddhism, Salvation/Redemption, Suffering

Kirsten Holzapfel

North America

1. a) The space occupied by North America in cultural history consists of the United States of America, as well as Canada, and in many respects represents both as a unit. In the economy, business, in language to a large extent, and particularly in the area of popular culture (such as nationwide leagues in professional sports) and lifestyle, the two countries are tightly interwoven. One area, however, in which Canada and the United States are clearly distinguished is the role of religion in society.

b) The immigrant country of Canada, like the United States, is a country with Christian traditions, and, by comparison with other traditionally Christian countries, a relatively high proportion of regular churchgoers and those who believe in God. But unlike the United States, the centers of the mother churches for most white Canadians, physically as well as spiritually, are still found in Europe (Rome, Canterbury, Geneva, or Edinburgh). And the national political culture of the country is completely secularized: 'Canada' has never, either in the rhetoric of its official representatives, or in the imagination of its immigrant inhabitants, been a topos of religious occupation, but simply the land of untamed wilderness and hard physical labor.

In the United States, on the other hand, it is completely different. As Alexis de Tocqueville first arrived in the United States, on May 1, 1835, the first thing that aroused his attention was "the role of religion in this country." G. K. Chesterton observed, in his visit to the country in 1921, that the United States actually defined itself in religious terms: America is a nation "with the soul of a church."[1] Even today, all statistics and opinion polls verify the extraordinary piety of the citizens of the United States. Eighty-three percent of 'Americans' aver that their religious faith is "very important in their daily life."[2] These data give the lie, according to American political scientist Walter Dean Burnham, to one of the most popular theories of the social sciences. Burnham claims, for virtually all of the societies of the world, that a direct correlation obtains between industrial and technological development, on the one hand, and secularization of systems of belief on the other. The correlation is regular enough, Burnham goes on, to make it possible to derive one from the other. For the United States alone, he says, this does not hold. An international Gallup Poll conducted in fourteen countries in 1976 asked about the importance of religious faith in their daily life. These results compared with a development index which indicated that, were stages of material and technological development to be concluded from the statistically reported importance of religious piety, one should have to assume that the United States was at approximately the developmental level of countries like Chile, Mexico, Portugal, and Lebanon.[3] Such argumentation overlooks, of course, the particularities of piety in the United States. That religious commitment is not necessarily oriented toward 'traditional' systems of belief into which one has been born, and in which respect for the old can be drummed into one's head, at times hindering innovation. Instead, as a rule, Americans especially devoted to religious activity expressly choose their denominations themselves, thereby selecting doctrines that suit each individual.

Extraordinary Piety

Personal Choice

This indicates the historical roots and structural forms of North America's religious culture. Its believers are 'Protestant' in the Anglo-Saxon nonconformist tradition, even when they are nominally Catholics. They reflect

F.D.2005
DISTRIBUTION OF RELIGIONS IN THE UNITED STATES
1. Episcopalians
2. Lutherans
3. Presbyterians
4. Congregationalists / United Church of Christ
5. Methodists
6. Holiness churches
7. Pentecostal churches
8. Baptists
9. Other Protestants of all denominations
10. Catholics
11. Mormons
12. Other Christians of all denominations
13. Jews
14. Other religions
15. No religion or no data
States in which Baptists make up the greatest proportion ("Bible Belt")
Religious Minorities
Jews
Jehovah's Witnesses
Adventists
Orthodox
Unitarians Muslims
Mennonites
Buddhists
Hindus
National and military memorials
0 500
1000 km
Kirsten Holzapfel
Data: National Survey of Religious Identification (NSRI) 1990, www.adherents.com (accessed 7 June 2005)
WASHINGTON
OREGON
IDAHO
MONTANA
Little Bighorn River Battle of Indian resistance fighters under Crazy Horse and Sitting Bull against the Cavalry (1876)
Mount Rushmore Monumental sculptures of Presidents Washington, Jefferson, Lincoln, and [Theodore] Roosevelt
NORTH DAKOTA
SOUTH DAKOTA
Wounded Knee Military massacre of the Sioux (1890) Occupation by American Indian Movement (1973)
WYOMING
NEVADA
UTAH
COLORADO
NEBRASKA KANSAS
CALIFORNIA
San Francisco
Los Angeles
ARIZONA
NEW MEXICO
OKLAHOMA
TEXAS
MINNESOTA
IOWA
MISSOURI
ARKANSAS
LOUISIANA
WISCONSIN
MICHIGAN
Chicago
ILLINOIS
INDIANA
OHIO
TENNESSEE
MISSISSIPPI
ALABAMA
GEORGIA
FLORIDA
Miami
SOUTH CAROLINA
NORTH CAROLINA
VIRGINIA
Jamestown, Yorktown
Colonial National Historical Park (British colony 1607) MARYLAND
DELAWARE
NEW JERSEY
NEW YORK
New York
CONNECTICUT
RHODE ISLAND
MASSACHUSETS
Boston
Plymouth
Pilgrim Hall Museum (British colony 1620)
VERMONT
NEW HAMPSHIRE
MAINE
Statue of Liberty
Ellis Island, Immigration Museum
Gettysburg National Military Park, battle in War of Secession (1863) PENNSYLVANIA
Philadelphia
Independence Hall, Liberty Bell
Lincoln Memorial
Vietnam Memorial
Washington D.C.
Washington Monument
Jefferson Memorial Arlington
Military Cemetery

traditional community religious spirit less than they do the private relationship of individual citizens to God. They are as intolerant of the 'pagan' religions of the country's original inhabitants, as they are of atheism. But unlike Canada, the United States links piety with the body politic. "Loyalist Protestants may have brought Canada its work ethic, but New England Puritans have left capitalism the myth of America!"[4]

In terms of its structural history, religion in the United States can be divided into the following three phases (see parags. 2-4):

The Hegemony of Christian Protestantism

2. a) The unchallenged hegemony of Christian Protestantism and its development to a pluralistic denominationalism (by 1890): a) The Constitution of the United States introduced strict separation of church and state. In the context of the time, however, this decision reflected less a social will to secularity than it did the constitutional preclusion of a state church. There had already been state churches in the New England colonies for a century and a half: the Congregational Church of the Puritans. In Connecticut, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire, this was the only officially permitted religion. In six Middle Atlantic and Southern colonies, on the other hand (New York, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia), it was the Anglicans who had the official status of state church. The British crown had long since begun to promote religious tolerance in its North American colonies—doubtless because it was thought that religious pluralism would best undermine the political danger that could emerge from an authoritatively organized Puritan state church. Thus, in 1663, the Rhode Island colony promulgated a constitution providing for complete religious freedom—not only for the totality of the Protestant denominations, but also for Catholics and Jews—as well as the strict separation of church and state. The situation was similar in Pennsylvania. After the Duke of York had consigned the area to Quaker leader William Penn, the latter was extremely interested in finding settlers who could fill this gigantic area productively. Thus, here too, a tempting offer was made to all who might be interested: among other things, full religious freedom on the basis of certain minimal demands, such as acknowledgment of the existence of God, faith in Jesus Christ, observance of the Sabbath. For the Puritan-Congregational establishment in New England, as for its Anglican counterpart in the South, on the other hand, Rhode Island and Pennsylvania were both suspect as 'sinks of sectarianism.'

b) However, it was precisely relations in these 'sinks of sectarianism' that were to be determinative for the religious future of the United States. While a distinction was usually made between (state) church and sects in Protestant Europe, in the United States pressure from below accorded the dominations equal rights. Religious pluralism, however, did not amount to pluralism in Weltanschauung. Socially, culturally, and politico-economically, Americanized Puritanism made the determinations. But Puritanism was no longer autocratically repressive and hierarchical, as it had been in colonial times. Instead, it 'nationalized,' to some extent, the Puritan doctrine of 'election,' and granted religious tolerance to any who shared the conception of America as the 'land of promise,' into which white Americans of English extraction, 'the new children of Israel,' had escaped servitude in Egypt (Europe). Benjamin Franklin, that man of the Enlightenment, even made the recommendation that the march of the children of Israel through the Red Sea be selected as the motif of the official Seal of the United States (→ Civil Religion). In the United States, a middle-class state could dismantle the state church, since the Protestantism of the active people of the state, all on their own, could represent middle-class society in all of its modern forms. Only Catholics, Jews, black Protestants, agnostics, and atheists were at first excluded from the pluralistic community of the elect, although even they were not physically persecuted.

Awakening

c) A characteristic kind of religious movement entered North American Protestantism under the sponsorship of periodically appearing Pietistic awakening movements. Awakening communities anticipate from their members a personal encounter with Jesus (mediated, as a rule, by a charismatic itinerant preacher), which is expected to lead to an emotional → conversion experience. Belonging to the same category are the charismatic Pentecostal communities. Inasmuch as these set the miraculous and the supernatural in the foreground, some of their practices recall shamanism and other premodern forms of belief, while others are suggestive of the most modern marketing strategies. Since 'miracles' are presented, it is anticipated that persons who at first do not 'believe' (denomination, community, or individual minister) will be persuaded by the first-class quality of the offer here proposed, and will find themselves ready to make something of a lasting agreement of cooperation that will be of interest to both parties. All of these figures of Protestant piety originally stemmed from England, but came to their full development only in the United States.

d) The age of the Pietistic movements of awakening include the numerous new foundations of religious communities over the course of the nineteenth century, which do understand themselves generally as 'Christians,' but not as Protestants. They are also characterized by the motif of election. Active missionary work is almost always expected of their members. The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints (→ Mormons), → Jehovah's Witnesses, and, especially, the Church of Christian Science are communities in whose doctrines a practical reference is kept in view to the needs of the uprooted and churchless, immigrants and masses of the resettled, in terms of orientation and organization. This arrangement is feasible and actual precisely as a result of a functionally weak political state, but of a society practicing strong religious pressure.

3. The period of agnosticism and growing detachment from the Church (1890–1945): a) But Christians ready for faith also ran into perplexing countercurrents in the second half of the nineteenth century. Darwinism, and historical biblical scholarship, declared a fundamental turning point in the relation of the study of religions. Until the mid-nineteenth century, the sciences had sought to demonstrate the providence of God from their own data. How could a universe so ordered exist without the ordaining hand of God, and an originally constructive Spirit of God? Darwin showed that it was possible to think in exactly this unthinkable manner. He demonstrated that God could be replaced by the principle of coincidence, and the emergence of an 'ordered' universe finally explained plausibly nevertheless.

Agnosticism and Detachment from the Church

Darwin's theory of evolution was unsettling for American Protestants in two ways. First, it posed a basic question regarding the credibility of the Bible. Thereby it shook the critical grounds of Protestantism, which sees faith as resting on the Bible alone (sola scriptura, Lat., 'scripture alone'). Second, the theory that Spencer took from Darwin's biological maxim, and transferred to society, exactly described the practical experience of the strongly

Bible-oriented Midwestern farmer and small business people: that only the best-adapted survive—'survival of the fittest': and thus, this fact threatened their economic existence. This notion was the preaching and ideology of the large banks, railway companies, and large commercial farms, and it set the old Midwest on its ear: those who deprived them of their property justified it with the help of 'atheistic' social Darwinism.

b) Protestant theologians in the United States attempted to counter the onslaughts of Darwinism and 'relativistic' biblical scholarship. The Seminar at Princeton University, one of the most respected places of formation of young ministers, taught the doctrine of the 'infallibility of the Bible' for a long period of time—approximately at the time when the Roman Catholic Church, out of similar considerations, was proclaiming the dogma of 'papal infallibility.' Building on this precedent, it was representatives of Presbyterianism—the classic denomination of the Puritans—who, in 1910, finally proposed a list of the five 'Fundamentals.' These were the components of the Christian faith that were indispensable, and that could not be questioned (→ Fundamentalism).

In the Scopes 'monkey trial,' which took place in Tennessee in 1926, it was fundamentalism that formally won out over agnosticism. But in the national forum, it meant a heavy political defeat for the fundamentalists, and thereby for institutionalized religion itself. Over the following decade, the Great Depression and a growing interest in the secular Weltanschauung, together with the experiences of the labor movement, drove organized religion still farther to the rear. At America's entry into the war, at the beginning of the 1940s, only 64,500,000 of its citizens—almost precisely half of the population—still belonged to an organized religious community, and this number was decreasing. The United States seemed to be taking the route of other industrial nations, in which organized religion, and religious belief, became but marginal phenomena.

Re-Sacralization

4. The 're-sacralization' of society, and the spread of pluralistic denominationalism to Catholics and Jews, under the political consensus of → civil religion and that of Americanism or anti-Communism (1945 to the present): Twenty years later—after fifteen years of postwar prosperity and Cold War—the number of church members had risen once more to 114,500,000, some 63 percent of the population. The trend to worldly secularization had been reversed, and strikingly. At a series of conferences and symposia, which later gained celebrity, of religious and social scientists at the American Academy of Arts, the phenomenon was actually diagnosed as an awakening movement, the fourth in the history of the United States.[5] This new upward swing as well was essentially a result of Protestant pietist campaigns—partly planned by upper echelons, and executed by financially well supplied organizations like Youth for Christ International, with its star evangelist Billy Graham. But their missionary goals were no longer under denominational demarcation; now they were invitations on an ecumenical level. They were clearly colored with the intent of encouraging further the 'supra-party' consensus of all believing Americans, regardless of denomination, in the new imperial role of the United States in the world. 'Denomination' no longer meant a Protestant church, or even a Christian one: now it embraced Protestants, Catholics, and Jews. The function of this kind of supra-religious, pluralistic coexistence of the 'Western' confessions of faith was stated conceptually by President Eisenhower (1952–1960), noting that the American form of government will not work on the long run, unless it is connected to a deeply felt religious faith—and Eisenhower did not care what faith that would be.[6] A little later, sociologist of religion Robert Bellah coined the concept → 'civil religion.'[7]

The 'American Religion'

5. The process of the re-sacralization of the United States has further progressed in recent years along the lines of Protestant denominationalism. Meanwhile, the Roman Catholic Church, in American understanding, is the largest 'denomination.' Most of its members see themselves as members of an American denomination, and only secondarily as a part of a universalistic world church. The multiple American branches of the old Eastern Churches (→ Orthodox Churches), the Polish National Catholic Church, the various newer communities that define themselves in terms of the 'age of Aquarius' (→ New Age), theosophists, occultists, and followers of the Far Eastern religions, understand themselves in similar fashion. They all have one thing in common: an extensively subjectivistic and pragmatic attitude toward their faith, and, even in polemical contradiction, a nevertheless recognizable identity as Americans.[8]

1. Chesterton 1990, 23.
2. Rawlyk 1996, 53.
3. Burnham 1981, 133.
4. See Bercovitch 1988, 32.
5. McLoughlin/Bellah 1968, x.
6. Herberg 1955, 97.
7. McLoughlin/Bellah 1968, 3-15.
8. Cf. ibid., xvi.

Literature

Ahlstrom, Sidney, A Religious History of the American People, New Haven 1972; Bercovitch, Sacvan, "Konsens und Anarchie – die Funktion der Rhetorik für die amerikanische Identität," in: Unger 1988, 16-43; Burnham, Walter Dean, "Social Stress and Political Response: Religion and the 1980 Election," in: Ferguson, Thomas/Rogers, Joel (eds.), The Hidden Election: Politics and Economics in the 1980 Presidential Campaign, New York 1981, 133ff.; Chesterton, G. K., "What I Saw in America," in: The Collected Works of G. K. Chesterton, vol. XXI, San Francisco; Herberg, Will, Protestant—Catholic—Jew: An Essay in American Religious History, Garden City 1955; Jenkins, Philip, Mystics and Messiahs: Cults and New Religions in American History, New York 2000; Marsden, George M., Religion and American Culture, Fort Worth 1990; McLoughlin, William/Bellah, Robert N. (eds.), Religion in America, Boston 1968; Noll, Mark A., A History of Christianity in the United States and Canada, Grand Rapids 1992; Rawlyk, G. A., Is Jesus Your Personal Saviour? In Search of Canadian Evangelicalism in the 1990s, Montreal 1996; Unger, Frank (ed.), Amerikanische Mythen. Zur inneren Verfassung der Vereinigten Staaten, Frankfurt/M. 1988; Wald, Kenneth D., Religion and Politics in the United States, Washington 1992; Wills, Garry, Under God: Religion and American Politics, New York 1990; Wilson, Bryan, "Religion and the Churches in Contemporary America," in: McLoughlin/Bellah 1968, 73-110; Zaretsky, Irving I./Leone, Mark P., Religious Movements in Contemporary America, Princeton 1974.

→ California, Central America, Civil Religion, Fundamentalism, New Age, New York, North America (Traditional Religions), South America

Frank Unger

North America: Time Chart

Era 1: European prologue (1520–1607)

Date	Event	Commentary
round 1520	Spaniards begin colonization and mission in Mexico, Florida, and California	Popes, and Spanish kings such as Charles V, have seen the best warrant for the perpetual exploitation of the fabled riches of the New World in a conversion of the 'Indians.' True, there was very early intra-church criticism of the treatment of the indigenous American population, for example by Dominican Father Bartolomé las Casas (1474–1566) and Francisco de Vitoria (1483–1546).
round 1570	Jesuits begin mission work in the Chesapeake Bay

Era 2: The Protestant empire is founded (1607–1750)

Date	Event	Commentary
1607	Anglicans found a church in Jamestown, Virginia	In England's first settlement in North America, a pure trade-colony, the Church of England becomes the official state church.
1608	French missioners establish a base in Quebec	French Catholics were the first solidly settled continuous white inhabitants in Canada. They thus made an essential contribution to the particular character of the later Canadian nation.
1620	First Puritan community, in Plymouth, Massachusetts	Puritans established their own state church in New England, on the three pillars of their theology: original sin, authority of the Bible, and collective theocratic state.
1634	English Catholics Settle in Maryland	The Catholic English noble family Calvert (Lord Baltimore) successfully sought to establish refuge for English Catholics.
1638	Swedish Lutherans Settle in Delaware	The regime of the state church in New England and Virginia, where somewhat less religious freedom prevailed as in England at the same time, is slowly but surely challenged by the forces of pluralism, by Free Churches without status or connection with societal power. The basis appears for the later general character of American religious practice as independent of the state, individualistic, lay-oriented, and in the spirit of the "Awakening."
1639	Roger Williams, exiled from Massachusetts, founds the First Baptist Church, in Providence, Rhode Island
1682	William Penn Founds a Quaker Colony

<table>
<tr><td>1692/93</td><td>Witch Trials in Salem, Massachusetts</td><td>The murderous self-propulsion of the trials shakes the authority of the spiritual leadership (“Mathers Dynasty”: Increase Mather, 1639–1723; Cotton Mather, 1663–1728).</td></tr>
<tr><td>round 1740</td><td>First Great Awakening</td><td>The → Awakening movements, and their zealous ‘evangelicalism,’ had indeed thrived on European soil as well, but only in North America did they become the dominant tendency of Protestantism as such.</td></tr>
<tr><td>1763</td><td>Touro Synagogue in Newport, Rhode Island, dedicated</td><td>Smaller groups of Sephardic Jews have lived in Rhode Island and New York since c. 1750.</td></tr>
<tr><td colspan="3">Era 3: The age of the democratic awakening movements (1750–1870)</td></tr>
<tr><td>1775–1783</td><td>American War of Independence</td><td>July 4, 1776: Declaration of Independence by the Continental Congress.</td></tr>
<tr><td>1777</td><td>Continental Congress proclaims a national day of Thanksgiving for the harvest</td><td>First step toward a confession-spanning → civil religion.</td></tr>
<tr><td>1779</td><td>Virginia Parliament passes law on religious freedom</td><td rowspan="3">The leaders of the revolution and the elite of the United States had great problems with religion. Every state preference, or favoring of a particular domination, provoked massive opposition without fail, and endangered the national consensus. Thus, they decided on the model of a ‘Christian nation’ under strictly secular state power. On the other hand, the word “Christian” (or any approximation thereof) does not appear in the US Constitution, nor the Declaration of Independence. The Treaty of Tripoli (enacted 1797, with the full participation of the Congress and President John Adams) declared that “the Government of the United States of America is not in any sense founded on the Christian religion.”</td></tr>
<tr><td>1787</td><td>United States constitution agreed upon</td></tr>
<tr><td>1789</td><td>First Amendment: strict separation of church and state</td></tr>
<tr><td>1791</td><td>Forty-five royalist priests, as refugees from the revolution meet in Quebec</td><td>These new arrivals in a relatively small community reinforce the ultramontane spirit of Quebec Catholicism, which will have to endure it to the present.</td></tr>
</table>

round 1800	Second Great Awakening movement	Second of a series of Awakening campaigns, which were more or less regularly conducted as late as the last third of this century. They brought the definitive breakthrough of the Awakening sects to the status of determining forces of American Protestantism and its still valid division between 'mainline churches' and 'evangelicals.'
1804	Philadelphia Quakers petition United States Congress to abolish slavery
1830	Founding of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (Mormons) in Fayette, New York	The → Mormons are named after the Book of Mormon, the book 'revealed' to their founder, Joseph Smith. They are doubtless the most successful autochthonous American religious community. Their center has been Salt Lake City, Utah, since 1847.
1845	Southern Baptist Convention founded in Atlanta, Georgia	The Southern white Baptists created their own umbrella organization, owing to increasing criticism of slavery by their Northern coreligionists.
Era 4: Americanization of churches and growing secularization round 1870	First Black churches	Ex-slaves organize their own religious communities.
1875	Mary Baker Eddy (1821–1910) publishes Science and Health; founding of Christian Science	Christian Science became another of many religious communities that, especially, offer their members an alternative community lifestyle. Its doctrine and practice center on a form of spiritual healing.
1881	Beginning of the mass immigration from Eastern, Southeastern, and Southern Europe	The masses of European immigrants, of the most varied religious confessions, laid the cornerstone for the coming replacement of an America of Protestant pluralism by an America of Christian-Jewish pluralism.
1895	Founding of the Anti-Saloon League of America	The struggle over 'Prohibition' was classically Protestant. But it was also one of the first 'ecumenical movements.' Conservative Catholics had a special opportunity here, to show themselves to be 'good American Christians.'

1899	Pope Leo XIII condemns "Americanism"	Conservative Catholics in Europe were alarmed at the extent to which American Catholics were obviously adapting to the usages of a de-hierarchized and awakening-oriented piety.
1907	Walter Rauschenbusch publishes Christianity and Social Crisis	His experiences as a pastor in New York's "Hell's Kitchen" motivated Rauschenbach to become founder and exponent of the paternalistic Social Gospel movement.
1909	Publication of the Scofield Bible	Cyrus Scofield's annotated reference bible founded the religious mode of dispensationalism, that is (simply put), the use of holy writ as a prophesying book.
1910–1915	Publication of the pamphlet-series The Fundamentals: A Testimony to the Truth	Financed by a California oil-millionaire, this series of publications was meant to be a compendium of the normal faith content of Protestant Christianity, as opposed to a biblical exegesis marked by certain forms of literary criticism. This reaction to 'modern' theology also existed elsewhere, but only in the United States did fundamentalism achieve its effect on politics.
1917	American Friends Service Committee founded	In the year of the entry of the United States into the First World War, Quakers founded what is probably the most radical pacifist organization that had ever existed.
1918	Central Conference of American Rabbis passes "Program for Social Justice"	Non-Protestant churches, etc., especially Jews and Catholics, begin to speak out, as active participants in national life, with a right to public political speech, and now challenge their 'minority status' in a Protestant nation.
1919	Roman Catholic Bishops support a Program for Social Reformation
1919–1933	Prohibition	Proscription of the selling of alcoholic beverages. The repeal of Prohibition under Franklin D. Roosevelt can be seen as an indicator of Protestantism's loss of its hegemony.

round 1920	New formation of the → Ku Klux Klan	'White Protestant America' defends itself against the challenge to its hegemony. The resurrection of the Ku Klux Klan is a reaction to the 'infiltration' of Blacks, Catholics, and Jews into Protestant American society
1923	Charles A. Fuller starts supra-confessional radio program, The Old Fashioned Revival Hour	Fuller represents the early connection between old-fashioned religion and new-style technology in the United States. In the 1930s, Fuller had up to ten million listeners weekly.
1925	"Monkey Trial" in Dayton, Tennessee	This famous trial held as a result of the dispute over the teaching of evolution in schools was indeed a juridical victory for the fundamentalists, but a moral political one for their opponents. William Jennings Bryan made a last attempt to defend the social values of a 'Christian' America with an appeal to the Story of Creation, but was made to look laughable by Clarence Darrow.
1931	Catholics, Protestants and Jews open a common congress for unemployment	A further step along the way to a transformation of the political religious culture of the United States from a Protestant hegemony to the trinity of Protestantism-Catholicism-Judaism.
1946	Billy Graham organizes Youth for Christ	Graham (born 1918) becomes the most successful evangelist of the twentieth century. He contributes essentially to the resurrection of a high membership in the Protestant churches, which had descended in the 1930s to a 'rock bottom.'
1954	Supreme Court of the United States declares racial segregation in schools unconstitutional (Brown vs. Board of Education)	This decision provided the proponents of civil rights in the United States with an impetus. Especially, it now led to the undertaking, in the South of the United States, of systematic attempts to bring the letter of the law to practice and effect.
1955	Bus boycott in Montgomery, Alabama	The bus boycott in Montgomery, Alabama, initiated by Rosa Parks under the political and spiritual leadership of Martin Luther King, Jr., becomes the epochal moment of the battle for civil rights, and makes King a national figure practically overnight.

1960	John F. Kennedy becomes first non-Protestant President of the United States	Kennedy's election completes the process of the assimilation of the three great religious groups in Christian-Jewish America: the Catholic-Protestant-Jewish. In this sense, the United States today is no longer a Protestant nation, although the number of Protestant Christians contrinues to constitute two-thirds of its population.
1962–1965	Second Vatican Council	With its policy of 'openness,' and its liberalizing decisions, the Second Council of the Vatican—its name forever to be associated with that of John XXIII—contributed essentially to the strengthening of the Catholic Church in America.
Era 5: De-secularization and "religionization" of politics (since c. 1965)
1963	United States Supreme Court rules prayer and Bible reading in public schools unconstitutional	This decision of the Supreme Court stands in the tradition of state neutrality when it comes to confessions and denominations. But for the white Protestant majority it is another sign that foreign forces have taken over the country.
1964	Martin Luther King, Jr., receives Nobel Peace Prize	The international reverence of Martin Luther King, Jr. becomes felt just so by many. Finally, the amazing 'outsider' who leads the civil rights movement is classified by J. Edgar Hoover as a potential enemy of the state, and spied on around the clock by the FBI.
1968	King murdered by a white
1973	United States Supreme Court declares outlawing of abortion unconstitutional	This decision of the Supreme Court against the outlawing of abortion supplies the definitive incentive to conservative Protestants to organize a political movement that will attempt to block dangerous election victories on all levels of politics. Jerry Falwell's Moral Majority has defined the 'white' conservative reaction to modernizing changes and the new multiculturalism of the United States. After his defeat by Bush Senior in the 1988 primary elections, Pat Robertson's Christian Coalition emerges from his campaign organization. It becomes the most effective mobilization machine in the United States.
1976	Jerry Falwell founds Moral Majority
1988	Pat Robertson candidate for U.S. presidency
2000	George W. Bush chosen President of the United States, with decisive support of the Christian Coalition

Frank Unger

North America, Traditional Religions

The Importance of Place

1. Places, Names, Pluralities: Indigenous peoples and scholars increasingly agree that native traditions 'take place.' In this usage, place is understood as more than simply location; it is the geophysical anchor of identity (→ Place [Sacred]; Landscape). Place in this enriched sense refers to an embodied and storied landscape.[1] As Vine Deloria, Jr. has written with regard to American Indian religions, "[r]ecognizing the sacredness of lands on which previous generations have lived and died is the foundation of all other sentiments."[2] When seeking to understand native religions, one should therefore begin with a consideration of tradition-specific meanings of the land, as these will pertain to myth as well as to history. Because native North America is rich in locale traditions, it is not uncommon to read or hear accounts of a people who emerged from the earth here, a → trickster who lived on a mountain over there, a sacred buffalo on that plain, a power cave in this rock. Place—the natural world mapped according to cultural coordinates—is a primary agent in the religious world of these traditions. It acts and is acted upon in ways that are constitutive of the sacred. At the same time, places are marked through → ritual and rhetorical processes: they are possessive (e.g., "Mother Earth cares for her children"), possessed (e.g., "the Black Hills is our sacred center"), and dispossessed, the last an all too familiar story. But the story does not end there: places can be regained, re-told, re-inhabited. Place, therefore, is a central category for understanding native traditions, but it is not fixed in its possible meanings.

Mobility and Cross-Fertilizations

Another aspect of place deserves attention here: the category 'North American Traditional Religions' is an analytical construct, not a 'natural' subset of the world or cultures therein. Indigenous peoples are found around the globe, today as in the past. The Americas are no exception—native peoples inhabit the hemisphere from the northern tip of the Arctic to the southern tip of Chile (→ Northern Eurasia/Circumpolar Region; Central America; South America). Where these people came from is hotly contested, both within academic circles and within native communities. Appreciating and exploring the richness of native religions does not require entering this debate, though one might learn a good deal from observing it; in fact, the debate may be regarded as a generative site of religious claims, as native representatives give voice to → origin accounts over and against non-native perspectives and the epistemological implications these entail. In any event, it is important to note that people native to the Americas arrived from multiple origins, geographically, racially, and culturally speaking. These multiple groups have maintained their mobility and cultural fluidity through time. It is therefore a disservice to native peoples and the study of them to be rigid in our understanding of peoples relative to place. To insist on studying traditions by way of imposed geographical encapsulations of them is to preclude taking account of movements and cross-fertilizations.

Arbitrary Boundaries and 'Culture Areas'

What sense can be made of the tension between a recognition of the arbitrary character of scholarly emphases upon 'culture areas' and the considerable attention given to the category of place by native peoples as essential and central to their traditions? One helpful starting point is to acknowledge this tension and to remain conscious of the different voices, claims, and

F.D.2005
ESKIMO TLINGIT ESKIMO
HAIDA
TSIMSHIAN
CARRIER
ATHABASCAN
BEAVER
ESKIMO
CHIPEWYAN
MONTAGNAIS NASKAPI
CREE
NORTHERN SAULTEAUX
KWAKIUTL
NOOTKA
LILLOOET
THOMPSON
KUTENAI
BLACKFOOT
ASSINIBOIN
PLAINS OJIBWA
OJIBWA
MICMAC
WISHRAM
YAKIMA FLATHEAD
CROW
NEZ PERCE
NORTHERN CHEYENNE OJIBWA
OTTAWA
PENOBSCOT MOHAWK HURON
MENOMINI
WINNEBAGO
ONONDAGA IROQUOIS SENECA
DELAWARE
KLAMATH SIOUX ARAPAHO SHOSHONE SHOSHONE
OMAHA
PONCA
WINNEBAGO
ACHOMAWI
YUROK
KAROK
HUPA
POMO
SHASTA
UTE
PAIUTE YOKUTS
CHUMASH
CAHUILLA
MOHAVE
HAVASUPAI
NAVAJO
HOPI
YUMA
YAQUI
PAPAGO
PIMA APACHE LUGUNA
ZUNI
COCHITI
APACHE
APACHE
*OKLAHOMA TRIBES
CHEROKEE
CHOCTAW
CREEK
CHITIMACHA SEMINOLE
NATIVE AMERICAN TRIBES
CURRENT LOCATIONS FOR SELECT TRIBES
*OKLAHOMA TRIBES SOUTHERN CHEYENNE PAWNEE
OTO
ARAPAHO KIOWA
COMANCHE
DELAWARE
ILLINOIS
CADDO
CREEK
CHEROKEE
SAUK & FOX OSAGE
PONCA
MIAMI SEMINOLE POTAWATOMI
CHOCTAW

stakes of different maps and the territories they mark out. Approached in this manner, it is clear that the category 'North American Traditional Religions' represents a historically produced cartography of indigenous traditions that corresponds in obvious but not always noted ways with the geo-political boundaries of the United States and Canada (→ North America). This feature has negative implications for the utility of the category because it limits the field of study in dramatic respects. What of the peoples south of the border of the United States? What of those people, including groups of the Apache and Kiowa, who have generational histories of moving across that border? In view of these sorts of limitations, is there a defensible way to argue for the study of North American traditions as a cogent analytical framework? Increasingly, many scholars and native people suggest that there is not; instead a call is made for broader analyses of, say, 'Indigenous Traditions in the Americas.' This effort is commendable in its way, but it seems more to displace the question of arbitrary boundaries than to resolve it.

North America as a Paradigmatic Example

As problematic as the category is, a case for its relevance can be made on the basis of how geo-political boundaries have shaped and influenced native traditions. It can be argued that a central and defining feature of native traditions in North America is the fact that they have faced and responded to the reality of being encompassed by alien nation-states. If we engage in the study of these traditions from the perspective of the present, and if we acknowledge that culture-contact history is central to telling the story of various traditions—of their changes, departures, new beginnings, and not simply of their demise—then we see that North America is a revealing analytical frame. It is a context unlike any other wherein the ideals of democracy and liberalism and the realities of modern capitalist economies have come face to face with native communities grounded in their own senses of reality, entitlement, and hoped for futures.

Addressing this context, a productive analytical stance rests on two related insights: (1) Post-Columbian native traditions are worthy of study and appreciation and should not be viewed as derivative or otherwise impure when compared to pre-colonial traditions; (2) more radically, scholars have no access to language-based data of any North American traditional context that is free from non-native influence. Such influence may be as bald as forced schooling and English-only policies or as subtle as the introduction of a new class of gifts into the potlatch ritual. In this way, the native North American context is an instructive example of a general principle: traditions are historical (this recognition is often difficult because traditions are invested precisely in the erasure of any characteristics that reveal them to be historical products). It is possible and productive to study representations of traditional purity, but analysis falters and indeed becomes untenable if purity is sought at the level of → tradition itself. If we grant the relevance of historical and ideological influences to native traditions, then we can appreciate that the category 'North American Traditional Religions'—while limited and limiting—speaks to 'real world' conditions and consequences pertaining to the necessarily political contexts of lived native traditions.

The Politics of Naming

Rivaling the complexity of issues occasioned by the category of place is the category of naming. The dynamic here is similar as well. As a first principle, we should acknowledge that all names are historically produced. We should then also acknowledge that the politics of naming are differential, which should lead us to ask: Who names whom? What names are self-attributions? What names are imposed? What names stick? What names have become sticky? A quick conclusion we reach here is that many European-imposed names have been historically inadequate, if not down right inaccurate, as is the case with the most famous name of all: Indians. Just here, however, we see a lesson emerge. Against the grain of much popular expectation, today many native peoples in North America (at least in the United States) call themselves Indians, not Native Americans. Names, like places, maybe arbitrarily designated, but valuations of them are not—and value is as hard to predict in cultural worlds as in economics ones. In the case of 'Indians,' a crass misnomer with a checkered history caught on with native peoples just as it fell out of favor with certain sectors of the non-native public. Broad political utility is behind the former, political correctness the latter. In any case, the lesson is: ask, don't assume. In general, many of the indigenous peoples of North America prefer their local group name as rendered in their language. But this is often not the case, or one finds political factions within a tribe or nation, such that one prefers one designation (Navajo, for example) and another something else (Dineh, in the case at hand). In Canada the broad designation First Nations is popular.

Plurality

As is readily seen from the preceding considerations, a defining characteristic of North American traditional religions is their stunning plurality. While it is commonplace to refer to World Religions (e.g., Christianity, Buddhism, Islam) in the singular, many scholars have argued that such monolithic characterizations of these traditions are a disservice to them because they erase the variety that exists within these traditions. This position applies even more strongly to the religious traditions of North America. Despite a persistent tendency of people to speak of Indian Religion, Indian Belief, and Indian Culture, no such singular entity has ever existed in the sense usually implied. In the case of so-called World Religions, at least it can be said that each such tradition has a more or less shared idea of sacred history, a more or less shared sense of the tradition's founders, texts, and the like, however much these might be internally contested. For the native peoples of North America no such common set of referents has ever obtained in the same way. Scholars and students should therefore be wary of any formulations of native religious traditions that posit uniform terms and which imply a similarly uniform reality.

Processes of 'Singularization'

However, as with places and names, complexity lurks here too. As a caveat to an instance upon recognizing the plurality of native traditions, it should be noted that a relatively recent phenomenon cuts in the other direction. This is the Pan-Indian movement, which has precursors in the first multi-group responses to non-native encroachment and which has been increasingly visible from the twentieth century to the present. This movement emerges from a recognition on the part of Indian peoples that they share many common concerns and ideas, particularly with regard to their position vis-à-vis the dominant society. Cross-tribal affiliations, powwow networks, national and international lobby groups, and native media sources are aspects of contemporary Pan-Indianism. Increasingly, ritual life has moved in this direction, with a particular focus on ritual pipe smoking, the use of sweat lodges, vision quests, and, in some cases, Sun Dancing and the use of peyote. Pan-Indianism is also evident in institutional contexts such as prisons and the military and in urban settings where Indianness rather than specific tribal affiliation is the most visible marker of identity.[3]

No Generalizations

2. Conceptualizing Native Traditions: A number of excellent sources will orient the interested reader with reference to native histories, historiography, and religious thought.[4] An indispensable background and bibliographical resource is the Handbook of North American Indians.[5] Rather than attempt to offer summary accounts of the vast terrain covered in these and other volumes, the remainder of the present entry will be limited to exploring several conceptual issues pertaining to North American traditional religions. The central principle that should be adhered to by all scholars and students of native traditions is one that we cannot help but run afoul of here: do not generalize. Native traditions in North America are as diverse as the people who practice them. Many hundreds of distinct groups exist in the present as in the past. The peoples who compose these groups speak many different languages, practice an incredible range of life-ways, engage non-native worlds in varying degrees, and are otherwise diverse. Even participants in Pan-Indian movements are not single-minded in ways that exclude traces of local cultures; quite the opposite, Pan-Indian elements are often construed according to local ideas, ideals, habits, and accents. Thus, the best scholarly tradition is ethnographically based, seeking out detail and difference.

Specifying Features That Are Not Found

While necessarily engaging in generalization for efficiency sake, the path charted here is to proceed by specifying features not found, for the most part, in the traditional religions of North America. Describing traditional religions by peeling away layers of what they are not is illuminating because the study of religion as a discipline and the colonial disciplining of native peoples (→ Colonialism) share a common historical reliance on the explanatory and motivating power of various interpretations of Christianity. The desire to understand and act upon other peoples by way of one's own conception of salvation history has shaped popular and academic representations of native traditions in ways that have proven remarkably durable.[6] The study of native traditions in the Americas needs to move as far as possible from this tendential hermeneutic in an effort to conceive of these traditions in ways that respect the integrity, complexity, and multiplicity of the life-ways considered. That said, it is appropriate to give a word of caution: analysis of native traditions should not overcorrect in the effort to strip away Christian or other Western influences. Overcorrection of this sort leads to its own distortions. Much in the way many North American traditional peoples have embraced names not of their own creation, so too they have incorporated and embraced aspects of the non-native world, Christianity included.[7] In fact, a majority of Indians today identify themselves as Christian. What they mean by Christian often proves to notably dynamic and eclectic, but to discount this religious reality is to preclude the possibility of a full consideration of traditions in the present.

If we take a very broad view of religion as speech, action, and social structures that rest upon claims to knowledge and authority derived from sources that are transcendent (other than human) and not empirically falsifiable, then we have a definition encompassing enough to include many Western and non-Western forms of religious life. The task, then, is to separate out characteristics that are frequently taken to be representative of native religious traditions but which are more characteristic of Western ones. Doing so enables us to see the outlines of the religious traditions of North America as they emerge by way of contrast. When this analytic method is coupled with our earlier observations pertaining to the flexible and present-focused quality of tradition, the following features of these traditions stand out.

Orality

The native religious traditions of North America are not textual. The fact that 'New World' cultures were not literate is well known; the consequences of this for their religious traditions are not always fully appreciated (→ Oral Tradition; Text/Textual Criticism). Orality removes the possibility that a text will be fetishized or otherwise reified in dogmatic terms (→ Canon). Correspondingly, orality opens up tremendous room for variants and change. Most importantly, orality necessitates storytelling, which requires powers of → memory and presentation. As all accomplished storytellers know, a sure way to keep audiences' attention is to bring them into the story. This feat is just what oral traditions do: they contribute to the narrated life. Each person's life is cast and interpreted as part and parcel of a larger communal and cosmic story that reaches backward and forward in time and up and down into the elements. From many traditional points of view, the act of speaking and hearing oral tradition is constitutive of the world itself.[8] Similarly, many practitioners consider oral traditions to be the chief means of communication between humans and other entities: → animals, → ancestors, spirits all compose and are composed by story. Narrative is the mode that brings these native North American traditions to life, whether by way of songs, chants, folktales, genealogies or even legal testimony. The latter reveals that oral tradition has not been erased by modernity and literacy, though it has taken new forms as speakers have found novel vehicles and avenues for its expression. In many respects, oral tradition in the present has taken on a heightened oppositional status vis-à-vis the textual habitus of the dominant society.[9]

No Codified Dogma

Related to their orality and corresponding absence of codified dogma, native North American traditions tend to be non-propositional. That is, they usually have no creed or systematized set of truth claims that must be adhered to for one to be judged a believer. Indeed, it can be said that these traditions are not belief based. They are far more concerned with religious activity and ritual life, with what some call 'practice.' Native religious traditions of North America, like indigenous traditions around the globe, are principally focused on maintaining personal, communal, and cosmic balance through ritual actions. The range of ritual activity in such traditions is vast: some rituals mark life and status transitions, others are designed to bless, heal, or attract rain, still others are for purposes of witching and unwitching, but the general theme of all is to manage the 'power' of the world—to attract positive energy to where it is needed and to drive away dangerous power. Some rituals are cycle-based, like the Winter Ceremonial of the Kwakuitl or various first fruit ceremonies, others are performed on an as needed and as available basis, such as Navajo Sandpainting or the rituals of the Native American Church.

The fact that these traditions are oral and tend to be non-doctrinal does not mean that they are without mechanisms for constructing and exercising authority. Sentimental views of 'noble savage religion' are of no use in the project of understanding these traditions. An honest if sobering approach to religion includes regarding it as a heightened form of social and ideological capital that may confer tremendous rewards to those who wield it persuasively, or, conversely, may present serious problems to those who fail to do so. These dynamics are true of native traditions as much as of any other. This factor means that some groups of people are able to establish their power and position over and against others by way of their use of religion. Of native traditions the same questions should be posed as of any tradition: What groups and individuals do they serve? What groups and individuals do they disserve? Who may or may not participate in a ritual? How do various ritual experts attempt to extend their authority through ritual innovations and other action? Such questions continue to be relevant today, particularly as issues of → identity and → group membership have taken on centrality in recent years.[10]

In-Group Based Traditions

A related feature of native traditions of North America is that they are non-proselytizing. This aspect can come as a shock to well-intentioned non-Indians who are on spiritual paths that they believe lead to native religions. Unlike conversion-based religions such as Christianity, these traditions are ethnicity based. Either a person is part of the group—as reckoned culturally, which may or may not include genealogy and, by extension, race—or a person is not. If a person is part of the group, then the religion pertains to that person, for his or her place in the community and the cosmos depends upon it. If that person is not part of the group, he or she may well be regarded in religious terms (as having some sort of power), but it is highly unlikely that he or she will be regarded as part of the religious community.[11]

A Multitude of Spirits and Deities

Another feature of these traditions that seems alien to many non-native people is they are not focused, for the most part, on singular deities. Some traditions include references to maximal deities, though these seldom figure into practical religious life. Moreover, when maximal deities are invoked, the specter of missionary influence must be suspected. This is not to say that these religious traditions are without their gods or entities equivalent to gods—almost all traditions include reference to high order entities. These are often spoken of as 'master' spirits: e.g., that which controls the winds, that which controls the rains, or that which is the spiritual leader of a species of animals. In any event, such deities or spirits are not worshipped in an abstract sense for their own sake; they are ritually invoked and engaged as inhabitants and agents of the world itself. A similar situation obtains with regard to pivotal religious figures. Native traditions recognize their full share of prophets and visionaries, and these, like Sweet Medicine of the Cheyenne, are regarded in the highest terms. There are few examples, however, of anything approaching the status of Jesus in Christianity, Mohammad in Islam, or Moses in Judaism. This points us again to the ways native traditions are less about figures and beliefs than they are about relationships. Relationships may be mediated by prominent figures and deities, but they are ultimately about the peoples' connection to one another and the group to the larger world. More must be said about the world in this context.

Lack of Salvation History

Contrary to many Christian theologies, native peoples tend not to assume that this world is fallen or otherwise imperfect; rather, the question for them is how to integrate with the world and manage metaphysical 'power' within it. We can generalize here: the native peoples of North America seem to be unanimous in describing the world as having a subject quality, as a whole and in each part (→ Animism). Thus, each element of nature is understood to have personhood, which implies in many cases that all things in the world are related, can communicate and are engaged in reciprocal relationships, humans included. An important consequence of this idea is that these traditions are not, therefore, focused on 'salvation' or other such means of escaping or transcending this world. Likewise, these traditions tend not to be future-oriented in sense of conceiving of life as unfolding according to a master teleology. Rather, the privileged temporal referent is the past: the past is regarded as wellspring for modeling behavior in present and as an ideal pattern for the future. In fact, it may be argued that it is this desire to emulate and recapitulate the idealized past that causes insiders and outsiders alike to view these religions as 'traditional.' In any event, in these religions human history is not understood to be separate from that of natural world, but rather is viewed as a component of it. As human history is not divorced from natural history, neither is the body from the soul. While many native North American traditions distinguish bodies from souls in a variety of ways, the → soul does not usually receive disproportionate religious attention, nor is it necessarily ranked as a higher entity than the → body.[12] In fact, much religious attention is focused upon keeping body and soul united, and these connected to the family, clan, community, and cosmos. Many Native American mortuary practices and other ritual means for structuring relationships with the dead reflect this concern.

The Vitality of Traditional Religious Life

3. The Living Present: It should be clear that North American religious traditions are not dead. Eulogies for native traditions have been announced over and again by politicians, missionaries, and even scholars. This trend of sentimentally burying the 'Red Man' has been a defining feature of North American ideology over the past two hundred years. If one considers the nadir of native traditions in the late nineteenth century, when the Sun Dance and other traditions had been outlawed and the Ghost Dance provoked tremendous violence against the Lakota at Wounded Knee, it becomes conceivable why many observers announced the death of native traditions. Suffice it to say, these pronouncements were premature. Not only have native cultures persisted, they are now thriving. Demographically, native peoples' numbers have risen dramatically in the past century. This increase is partly due to improved health conditions, but it is principally due to the fact that identifying oneself as native has shifted from being a clear social liability to being a point of pride and a possible avenue to a variety of entitlements specific to native peoples by way of their relationships to the federal governments of the United States and Canada.[13] Correspondingly, native religious traditions have experienced a tremendous efflorescence over the past century, and particularly since the 1960s. Whereas many native ceremonies were banned in the nineteenth century, now various laws protect a number of native practices and sacred places. Native peoples have fought hard for these protections and continue to do so. These battles include but are not limited to protection of peyote consumption, the use of various animal parts such as eagle feathers in rituals, burial protections, repatriation rights, fishing rights, and the securing of religious rights for incarcerated members of their groups.[14]

'Survivance'

From this recognition of the contemporary vitality of traditional religious life in North America follow several related observations. Native traditions were not destroyed by colonialism, but neither were they unaffected by them. North American native religious traditions have persisted because, as Gerald Vizenor has argued, Indians are warriors of 'survivance.'[15] They have situated their identities, practices, and bodies in a variety of ways with regard to non-native agendas and the mechanism of representation through which these have been pursued. Fiction has been a primary genre through which Native Americans have explored this theme, well-known examples of which include N. Scott Momaday's House Made of Dawn and Leslie Marmon Silko's Ceremony.[16] At times, native traditions have been articulated as fierce and oppositional rejections of non-native presence; at other times native strategies of survivance have depended upon the technologies and assumptions of the non-native world. Further, a spectrum of possible modes of engagement rests between these polar responses. Native religious traditions are found across this spectrum. In this way, these traditions are not separable from realities of → colonialism and → modernity; these forces are constitutive of Native American traditionalism. An instructive exercise is to study various native traditions with an eye for how they might be located on this spectrum, though one should be forewarned that analysis here is far from simple. Analysis of contemporary religions of native North America suggests that the most stridently oppositional movements may make profound use of non-native elements, whereas some apparently accommodationist movements, like various forms of native Christianity, have maintained rather than abandoned a good deal of ancestral content.[17]

1. See, e.g., Momaday 1976; Basso 1996.
2. Deloria, Jr. 1994, 278.
3. For more on issues addressed in this section and for a broad range of issues in the study of Native American traditions, see, e.g., Thornton 1998 and Geertz 1994.
4. Good introductory sources include: Niezen, 2000; Deloria, Jr. 1999; Nabokov 2002; Joel 2001; Gill 2005. For a rich selection of primary sources, see Nabokov 1991.
5. Sturtevant 1986.
6. See Berkhoffer 1978; Pearce 1988.
7. On Native American Christianities, see Treat 1996.
8. For a discussion of this theme, see Sam Gill, "The Trees Stood Deep Rooted," in: Dooling/Jordan-Smith 1989.
9. On modern narrative traditions, see Allen 2002.
10. See, e.g., Lincoln 1994.
11. On the long history of non-Indians desires to be and act Indian, see Ph. Deloria 1998.
12. Regarding Native American soul theories, see Hultkrantz 1997.
13. See Cornell 1988; Nagel 1996.
14. On religious freedom issues, see Vecsey 1996.
15. Vizenor 1994.
16. Momaday 1968; Silko 1977. For poetry and short stories, see, e.g., Alexie 1992.
17. On law and literature in the context of contemporary North American traditions, see Weaver 2001.

Literature

Alexie, Sherman, The Business of Fancy Dancing, New York 1992; Allen, Chadwick, Blood Narrative: Indigenous Identity in American Indian and Maori Literary Activist Texts, Durham/London 2002; Basso, Keith, Wisdom Sits in Places: Landscape and Language Among the Western Apache, Albuquerque 1996; Berkhoffer, Robert, The White Man's Indian: Images of the American Indian from Columbus to the Present, New York 1978; Cornell, Stephen, The Return of the Native: American Indian Political Resurgence,

New York/Oxford 1988; Deloria, Philip, Playing Indian, New Haven/London 1998; Deloria, Vine, Jr., God is Red: A Native View of Religion, Golden [2]1994; Idem, For This Land: Writings on Religion in America. Edited and with an Introduction by James Treat, New York/London 1999; Dooling, D.M./Jordan-Smith, Paul (eds.), I Become Part of It: Sacred Dimensions in Native American Life, San Francisco 1989; Geertz, Armin, "On Reciprocity and Mutual Reflection in the Study of Native American Religions," in: Religion 24 (1994), 1-22; Gill, Sam, Native American Religious Traditions: An Introduction, Belmont [2]2005; Hultkrantz, Åke, Soul and Native Americans, ed. by Robert Holland, London 1997; Lincoln, Bruce, "A Lakota Sun Dance and the Problematics of Sociocosmic Reunion," in: History of Religions 34,1 (1994), 1-14; Martin, Joel, The Land Looks After Us: A History of Native American Religion, Oxford 2001; Momaday, N. Scott, House Made of Dawn, New York 1968; Idem, The Names: A Memoir, New York 1976; Nabokov, Peter, Native American Testimony, rev. ed., New York 1991; Idem, A Forest of Time: American Indian Ways of History, Cambridge 2002; Nagel, Joane, American Indian Ethnic Renewal: Red Power and the Resurgence of Identity and Culture, New York/Oxford 1996; Niezen, Ronald, Spirit Wars: Native North American Religions in the Age of Nation Building, Berkeley etc. 2000; Pearce, Roy Harvey, Savagism and Civilization: A Study of the Indian and the American Mind, Berkeley etc. 1988; Silko, Leslie Marmon, Ceremony, New York 1977; Sturtevant, William (ed.), Handbook of North American Indians, Washington 1986; Thornton, Russell (ed.), Studying Native America: Problems and Prospects, Madison 1998; Treat, James (ed.), Native and Christian: Indigenous Voices on Religious Identity in the United States and Canada, New York/London 1996; Vecsey, Christopher (ed.), Handbook of American Indian Religious Freedom, New York 1996; Vizenor, Gerald, Manifest Manners: Post-Indian Warriors of Survivance, Hanover 1994; Weaver, Jace, Other Words: American Indian Literature, Law, and Culture, Norman 2001.

→ Central America, Cosmology/Cosmogony, Dance, Landscape, Myth/Mythology, Nature, North America, Northern Eurasia/Circumpolar Region, Place (Sacred), Reception, Ritual, Shamanism, South America, Trickster

Greg Johnson

Northern Eurasia / Circumpolar Region

Age of the 'Socialist Mission'

1. At the beginning of the 1930s, the Soviet Union pressed to Northern Eurasia, and propagated the start of a new age. The 'Socialist mission' would lead the population of the far North out of its social and religious 'retardation' alike. Here the Communist worldview encountered the most varied religious traditions, and problems of understanding were frequent. For example, a young Communist teacher reported of his attempt to convince the spiritual leader of a group of Chukchi of Lenin's views and the positive results of the Revolution. After the leader had heard him out, he only answered: "So Lenin comes from the moon, from the dark side we cannot see?" In order to understand these puzzling words, one must know that, one hundred years before, Tsarist Russia had attempted to establish its power in the far North. The Tsar—symbol of the new order—was at that time introduced linguistically as the 'Sun King.' It was logical, then, for the indigenous population to see in his successor the work of cosmic forces of the opposition. The forces of the moon had replaced the power of the sun. These different manners of conception were followed by misunderstandings and problems of communication. They stand as examples of a confrontation of different world images during colonization (→ Colonialism). Religious con-

F.D.2005

NORTHERN EURASIA / CIRCUMPOLAR REGION

Language groups of Northern Eurasia and the Arctic

 Eskimo-Aleut

 Paleo-Siberian languages

 Tungusic

 Turkish languages

 Ural

Inuit — Ethnic groups (with example: Inuit)

Tomsk (1604) — Russian expansion in Siberia (with example and date: Tomak [1604])

 Centers of religious revival in Siberia

0 1000 2000 km

cepts corresponding to political expressions were sought in the languages of Northern Eurasia, so that the new power claims of the colonizers could be conveyed to the indigenous population.

Geographical Designations

2. Under the geographical designations of 'Northern Eurasia' and the 'Arctic' regions are included Northern Scandinavia, Siberia, Alaska, Northern Canada, and Greenland. This unification is very simplistic, and stamped with the Euro-centrist world image. Characteristic of this zone are Taiga and Tundra, the great forest belt of Eurasia, and the steppes to the north. The inhabitants of this living space belong to the most varied linguistic groups, have been exposed to the most varied worldviews and religions for centuries, and have frequently adopted some of their elements. Thus, one can scarcely speak of a unitary religious tradition. Christian Orthodox → missions penetrated Alaska itself, Protestant missionaries were active in Greenland, and in Southern Siberia the influence of Buddhist → Lamaism is evident. Most of these peoples form minorities in their home regions today, and the events of the twentieth century have altered their original lifestyle fundamentally.

In spite of the multiplicity of the most varied cultures, there are certain similarities in lifestyle and their religious conceptualizations. These congruities are occasionally ascribable to the homogeneous ecosystem of the Northern expanses. Climatic conditions—long winters and only brief periods of vegetation—exclude the possibility of agriculture. On these grounds, the traditional economy of all peoples of the far North has accommodated to hunting for land and water animals, and, to an extent, reindeer husbandry.

Animals and Hunting

3. The key role of hunting gives the → animal a place of special value in daily life, and is reflected in religion. A soul is attributed to beasts, just as it is to human beings. The Inuits of Alaska call this an inua. The inua is a kind of free spirit, possessing the ability to appear in various shapes. Behind this idea rests an understanding of the world that knows no basic distinction between the essence of human beings and that of animals. The mythologies of the Northern Asian peoples are familiar with a multiplicity of metamorphisms. Persons are transformed into animals, animals into persons, and animals into other animals. The supposed ability of human beings to transform themselves into other beings, always retaining their souls however, eliminates the possibility of ever being sure of the unambiguous identity of an ensouled being. Among the hunters of the region of the Bering Sea, the inua of an animal appears as a hidden, anthropoid face on its back, on its breast, or in its eyes. These faces, the physical form of the 'free soul'—often half human and half beast—are found once more, developed artistically, in the ritual masks of the Inuits of Alaska. When an animal dies, its inua transmigrates into the body of an unborn individual of the same species, there to exist once more.

This complex cosmos of transformation and wandering souls demands of the hunter an altogether special attention. Among the Yucagirs of Northern Siberia, for example, a hunter may fell no beast without having previously imprisoned its soul. Respect for animals calls for certain preparations for hunting, in order to do justice to their souls. Hunting rites can be divided simply into two different categories: (a) rites performed to attract wild life to the hunters, and (b) rites to free an animal's soul after its death. Hunting rituals accompany the hunter from society out into the wilderness, and present him with a pattern for behavior that symbolically supports him. These rituals also express the necessity of cooperation between hunter and prey: the fragile equilibrium of the universe of hunting must not be disturbed.

Especially important for hunters is the sustenance of indispensable beasts, and this is accorded still more attention. The regular return of this prey, and an assured regeneration, are of great importance for the meaning of life. The Inuits of Alaska, dependent upon hunting for sea mammals, celebrated the death of a whale for five days, to liberate its soul. This span of time was the same as that of the grieving period observed for a deceased human being. The annual 'bladder festival' performed a similar function. The bladders of seals hunted and killed over the course of the year were ritually restored to the ocean in December, in order to help ensure sufficient prey for the following year.

Animal Deities

In all of these hunting rituals, animal deities play an important role. Every species or genus of animals has a guardian being. This being is usually addressed by the hunter or by the religious specialist who is responsible for a successful hunt. As ruler of the beasts of the sea, Central Canadian Arctic goddess Sedna comes forward as the most important divinity of the animals. She is responsible for the regular surfacing of the hunting prey. In her dwelling on the floor of the sea, she gathers all sea animals about herself. Infuriated by a breach of taboo at the hands of human beings, she will keep the beasts or their souls at the bottom of the sea. In such a case, it is a shaman's task to descend to her in a trance, and persuade her to release the animals. When he has returned to his community once more, a collective confession of moral wrongdoing follows, in order to reestablish the disturbed order and harmony between human being and beast. Thus, the shaman is responsible for the relations obtaining between the world of human persons and that of the spirits and gods.

Many Northern Eurasian peoples entertain the notion of a layered world. According to this conceptualization, the earth is divided into an upper world, our own, and a lower world, the dwelling place of the spirits and the souls of the dead. With the support of spirit helpers, mostly in the form of birds, or merely with the drum as his 'steed,' the shaman ventures into these regions in a trance. Mediator and cosmological specialist, the shaman is especially the guardian of the indigenous image of the world (→ Shamanism).

Change through Soviet Politics

4. Ethnographic reports testify to the multiplicity of these cosmologies, and of the religious practices associated with them. However, most of these descriptions arose at the beginning of the twentieth century, and pretend a timeless and changeless North Eurasian world. At least by the time of the 'Sovietization' of the far North, which began in 1928, the world of the hunting cultures of Northern Eurasia was nonetheless transformed—to its very foundations. It was usually young teachers and ethnographers stationed at 'culture bases' in the Tundra and Taiga who brought the announcement of the dawn of a new age to the remote regions. Like the prophets of the eschatological movements, they promised the indigenous people a complete change of their society, and the betterment of their life, which in the eyes of the Soviets was backward and superstitious. In order to make this promise clear, they had recourse to symbolical practices, as if they had been shamans, in an attempt to suggest or conjure up an invisible world (the Communist world order). Busts of Lenin, savior of the Socialist movement, red flags, the hammer and sickle, were transported to almost all of the villages and Dancing shaman at the first Chukchi Folklore Festival, Moscow, autumn 1996. Under Soviet rule, new forms of religious expression developed in Northern Eurasia. Folklore groups and dance ensembles were often the only venues in which religious practices could continue to exist publicly. The adoption of Western styles of choreography and stage-settings, however, is controversial; many people regard this as a trivialization of religious tradition.

newly founded cities of Siberia. The symbolic presence of the new power was the outward indication of the change in the world order. A world picture impregnated with technology and enlightenment replaced the traditional cosmologies.

Along with the restructuring of economic life, in whose framework traditional economic processes had to yield to measures of collectivization, a campaign was waged against religious usages. Their representatives, the shamans, were regarded in the same way as were the Kulaks (large farmers) of Northern Eurasia, and were laid open to a similar persecution by representatives of authority. For many of them, 'Sovietization' ended with their deportation to a prison camp or with death. With publicly effective strategies, imitating the technique of the shamans, action was taken against those masters of transformation: youth and children had to attend Soviet schools, including boarding schools, sing derisive songs and present reviling theater pieces, in order to deprive the shamans' seductive power of its effect. Fire rituals, at which objects of shamanic accouterment and cult (robes, drums, and ritual objects) were heaped up and burned, destroyed the material foundations of indigenous guises of religion.

Myth and ritual reacted flexibly, however, to the societal change that had climaxed in Soviet rule. Tales of resistance arose in association with the latter. Even today reports circulate of the enigmatic deaths of Politcommissioners who had directed the persecutions. Accounts depict mysterious flights of deported shamans in metaphors also used for the flight of the soul. By way of example, the escape of a particularly powerful shaman from a camp to which, just days earlier, he had been brought in a helicopter, was explained by his having transformed himself into a bird to make his way back.

Societal changes generated new rituals, which bestowed a playful character on the new political circumstances. In the region around Lake Baikal, for instance, a new taligan (sacrificial festival) came into being, in honor of the 'new gods' of Communism: here, at the beginning of the fishing season, sacrifice is offered to a group of gods for the favor of being able to meet the prescribed Communist quota. Political pressure on traditional lifestyle, however, and especially on religion, was so strong that, in the course of two generations, a great proportion of the religious traditions fell into oblivion. Fragments of religious ritual survived only in state-sanctioned, and thereby controllable, folklore groups, or continued to exist in concealment. Acceptance in society, however, which had been so important for religious specialists, was destroyed.

After 1991

5. With the collapse of the Soviet Union, at the end of the twentieth century, the world of Northern Eurasian hunters and reindeer farmers changed once again. Along with an economy in shambles, the retreat of Soviet power from their lives left above all a symbolical vacuum. Various ethnic and cultural movements replaced a unitary ideology. A new consciousness of the old traditions became an important part of today's quest for identity. Meanwhile, shamanism is experiencing a cultural renaissance in the regions of Northern Eurasia. Many rituals and religious practices, however, have fallen into oblivion, and have to be reconstructed. Ethnographic reports from early in the twentieth century, as well as the knowledge of elderly persons then, who had known active shamans, serve as a source of information for the revival ('revitalization') of traditional belief. Here, new cultural and religious configurations and approaches are coming into existence: artists allow themselves to be inspired by spirit beings, theater groups conduct shamanic rituals before a broad audience, and, in many regions, nearly every household keeps a drum for personal rituals of healing.

One trait of these forms of new religious piety is the democratization of religious techniques. Before official proscription, the latter were in the hands of privileged individuals. Today, rituals for the community are once more becoming central to life, and participation in them is expanding. Their purpose is to reawaken collective identity, and so to heal the wounds of colonialism. The potential strength of these peoples lies in their ability to deal with a world of constant change by way of rituals, and effectively to react to their modern social environment by traditional means. The true identity of that environment may seem to them as ambiguous as the inua of a polar bear.

Literature

Bogoras, Waldemar, The Chukchee (The Jesup North Pacific Expedition, Vol. VII), New York 1907 (classic study); Diószegi, Vilmos (ed.), Popular Beliefs and Folklore Tradition in Siberia, Bloomington 1968; Eliade, Mircea, Shamanism: Archaic Techniques of Ecstasy, New York 1964; Fitzhugh, William W./Kaplan, Susan A., Inua: Spirit of the Bering Sea Eskimo: A Cultural Presentation of the United States of America, Washington 1982; Forsyth, James, A History of the Peoples of Siberia (1581–1990), Cambridge 1992; Gaski, Harald (ed.), Sami Culture in a New Era: The Norwegian Sami Experience, Karasjok 1997; Paulson, Ivar et al., Die Religionen Nordeurasiens und der amerikanischen Arktis, Stuttgart 1962; Pentikäinen, Juha (ed.), Shamanism and Northern Ecology, Berlin/New York 1996; Rasmussen, Knud, Intellectual Culture of the Iklulik Eskimos (Report of the Fifth Thule Expedition 1921–1924, vol. VII), Copenhagen 1929.

→ Animal I, God/Gods/The Sacred, North America (Traditional Religions), Shamanism

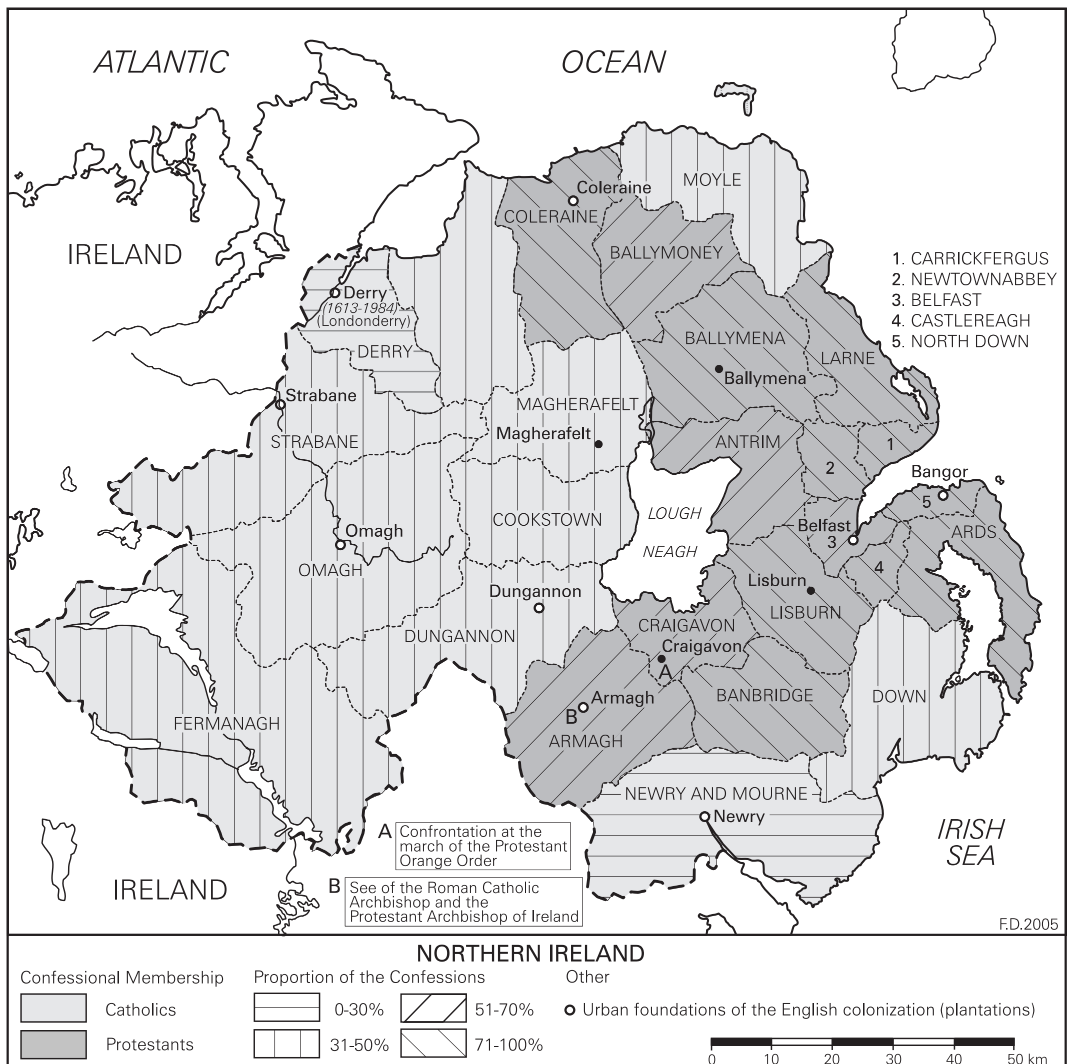
Tobias Holzlehner

Northern Ireland

1. The conflict over Ireland has seethed for about eight hundred years. Over the same period of time, the British government has stationed English occupation troops in Ireland. In the time of King Henry VIII (1509–1547), England was Protestant ('Anglican'), while Ireland remained Catholic. In order to acquire support for the forces of occupation, the English Crown settled Protestants from Scotland and England in Ireland's most fertile regions. There was resistance to the occupation troops, which was put down by brute force. Oliver Cromwell, for instance, distinguished himself for particular viciousness, putting down the 1649 Irish rebellion in the city of Drogheda so cruelly that 4,000 men and women were left dead. Subsequently, the majority of the Irish nobility were either murdered or forced into exile. Protected and covered by the military power of the English Crown, the (Protestant) victors took over the property capable of producing income, and thereby assumed power in Ireland. They made up the new upper class. After 1649, the large landowners in Ireland were almost exclusively of English and Scottish extraction. In 1690, the question of rule over Ireland was definitively decided, as the troops of the new King of England, William of Orange (William III) defeated the troops of James II, who was friendly to Rome, at the battle of the Boyne, north of Dublin. From this time on, at the latest, Ireland was colonized by England with greater intensity. Scottish Protestants were settled most of all in the Province of Ulster. Many uprisings on the part of the Irish population were put down. In particular, Ireland was plundered economically. At the same time, there were severe famines, and many Irish died or emigrated, especially to America. The 'colony' of Ireland was ever more difficult to control.



Catholics and Protestants

2. At this time, the terms 'Catholic' and 'Protestant' acquired a new meaning in Ireland. 'Catholic' became a synonym for Irish nationalism, and its rebellion against oppression. 'Protestant' became the synonym for the new rulers and their sense of alliance. Enmity therefore fed not on different religious membership, but on Ireland's colonial situation. It was the social, economic, and political differences that generated a growing confessional polarization. On the Protestant side, the latter was occasionally exacerbated and cemented by a prominent 'culture of memory,' with commemorative marches, 'processions,' on the anniversaries of historic victories. Since 1807, the Protestant Order of the Orange has conducted marches, annually, on July 12, in which it celebrates the victory of William of Orange in the year 1690. In traditional garb (including orange sashes), the 'Orangemen' march their traditional routes, in closed ranks, even through Catholic neighborhoods—which, of course, the latter experience as a provocation. The Order of the Orange was founded long ago, in 1795 in Portadown, as a secret anti-Catholic society.

Even today, it understands itself as custodian of the authentic Protestant tradition of Northern Ireland. The marchers are a minority today, among the Protestant North Irish—but a vociferous one, and one whose followers are very much prepared to perpetrate violence.

Twentieth Century: Split into Northern Ireland and Ireland

3. In 1920, the British government changed its policy vis-à-vis Ireland. In 1921, Ireland was divided into Southern Ireland, today's Republic of Ireland, and Northern Ireland, six of the nine counties of the former Province of Ulster. Southern Ireland was a republic with limited independence, Northern Ireland a half-autonomous province of England. In the six separated counties, at that point in time, the population was two-thirds Protestant—thus, descendants of the colonizers who had immigrated mostly from Scotland. Later, this group called itself 'loyalists,' or 'royalists,' and was characterized by an aggressive, broadening nationalism. The division had been very carefully thought through. As there was a secure Protestant majority in Northern Ireland, the likelihood of disapproval or rejection was nearly nonexistent. The systematic repression of the Catholic population extended to the very distribution of voting districts. In the city of Londonderry, for instance, the Catholic Irish were numerically in the majority, while in the city council there was a two-thirds majority of Protestants—by reason of the division of voting districts, and because the right to vote depended on home-ownership; but home-ownership was enjoyed almost exclusively by the Protestant population.

Northern Ireland had its own parliament, in Belfast, from June 1921 to March 1972 (the Stormont Parliament)—organized on the pattern of Westminster, with two chambers—as well as its own administration. As on the community level, the distribution of seats was structurally unjust: Protestants always constituted the government, as the distribution of seats was guaranteed to be Protestant in both houses—a classic situation of structural violence, soon to erupt overtly.

After 1968: Civil Rights Movement and Civil War

4. From 1968, the Catholic civil rights movement now forming in Northern Ireland demanded the obvious: a vote for each citizen, instead of a census voting-right dependent on home ownership. August 1969 marked the start of violent confrontation. Structural discrimination, and the British government's contempt for peaceful protest and resistance, won the militant IRA (Irish Republican Army) more and more sympathy on the part of the Catholic minority of the population. The IRA used bomb attacks and assassination to battle for reunification with (Southern) Ireland and equal rights for Catholics. But IRA terror provoked counter-terror, and solidified the confrontation. The oldest paramilitary Protestant organization is the Ulster Volunteer Force (UVF, founded in 1913). Additionally, in 1971 a still more brutal Ulster Defense Association (UDA; later Ulster Freedom Fighters, UFF) was founded. For it, de facto, all Catholics are potential targets of assault.

Beginning in 1969, a quasi-civil-war situation prevailed in Northern Ireland. With the introduction of British defense forces, the situation escalated further: in Londonderry or Derry, on January 30, 1972, a day that has gone down in history as 'Bloody Sunday,' British paratroopers shot and killed thirteen participants of a peaceful civil-rights demonstration. Subsequently, the British government under Prime Minister Edward Heath dissolved the Northern Irish Parliament, and from then on administered the Province of Northern Ireland directly. An ever more murderous spiral of force and counterforce began. Today some 3,600 persons have fallen victim to the war in Northern Ireland.

Throughout the historical development of the situation, both the Catholic and the Anglican Protestant Churches have participated in the escalation of the conflict. But over the last decades, representatives of the churches in Northern Ireland have had gradually become advocates of the peace process, with the Protestant side continuing to relate to it ambiguously. Although many prelates of the Church of Ireland have clearly supported taking a greater distance from the Orange Order, this has not yet occurred.

The Protestant and the Catholic side each have several representatives in Parliament. The most extreme and most nationalistic Protestant party is the Democratic Unionist Party. It owes its success especially to demagogic minister Ian Paisley. Its Catholic counterpart, the Sinn Féin (Gaelic, 'We Ourselves') at first regarded itself as the political arm of the IRA, but later, in a framework of the peace negotiations, was altogether prepared for dialogue and compromise.

Only on 10 April 1998, a peace plan for Northern Ireland was drawn up, in Belfast (Northern Ireland Peace Agreement, or Good Friday Agreement). In a referendum held on May 22, 1998, 71% of the voters in Northern Ireland approved the peace agreement, with 94.4% voting for it in the Republic. Today there is a single government for Northern Ireland, and two of three protagonists of the peace process, John Hume on the Catholic and David Trimble on the Protestant side, on 16 October 1998, received the Nobel Peace Prize. Passed over were Gerry Adams, friendly to Sinn Féin, who had been an essential collaborator in the process of turning the IRA away from its bomb policy, and on the English side, Northern Ireland Minister Mo Mowlan.

5. A description of the history and different interests of the Northern Irish conflict shows: the situation in Northern Ireland has very little to do with a conflict of religions. The polarity, 'Protestant versus Catholic,' is convenient, but it is not appropriate for an adequate description of foundational causes. The religious attachment of the adversaries, meanwhile, is actually rather scanty: in Northern Ireland, too, secularization has prevailed. At bottom, the trouble in Northern Ireland is a social conflict, not a religious war or conflict. It is a matter of jobs, housing, and legal or social equality (unemployment among the Catholic population in 1994 was double that among the Protestants). Many persons live in confessionally 'pure' neighborhoods: they feel themselves to be not inhabitants of Northern Ireland, but 'British' or 'Irish.'

On paper, and for the lines of conflict, religious membership continues to be important; in reality, however, the practice of religion plays a smaller and smaller role. In Northern Island, it has always been a question of the violent consequences of England's centuries-old colonial policy, and then of its abandonment. Religion was only a means—if an identity-defining one—to an end, that of the triumph of power interests.

Literature

Centre for the Study of Conflict, From Riots to Rights, Ulster 1997; Gallagher, Eric/Worrall, Stanley, Christians in Ulster, 1968–1980, Oxford 1982; O'Beirne Ranelagh, John, A Short History of Ireland, Cambridge 1983; Townshend, Charles, Ireland: The 20th Century, London/New York 1999; Wichert, Sabine, Northern Ireland since 1945, London [2]1999.

→ Catholicism, Conflict/Violence, Europe I, Protestantism

Tobias Pflüger

Nudity

Nudity as an Exceptional Condition

1. First and foremost, nakedness is an expression of human 'naturalness.' Further—as complete or partial nudity—it becomes the symbol of 'immediacy' in a framework of religious and magic practices. In art, nudity is a metaphor for the True, for Truth in the form of the nude woman. → Clothing defines the daily normal state, when, for instance, climatic conditions make the wearing of clothing necessary for protection from the cold. Clothing is also a social symbol. In 'normally' clad society, clothes are differentiated as an expression of status and function (uniform). The exceptional condition, then signalizes a condition of lack (poverty, helplessness). But in the constellation of normality and exceptional condition, nudity functions or functioned as a cultic or symbolical vehicle of meaning, as well as the conscious transgression of a boundary.

History

Even the nudity of the athletes in the ancient games of the Greeks (→ Olympic Games), often interpreted as a vestige of cultural nudity from archaic times, was an exceptional condition. The games were the 'sacred' place where nudity—further motivated, as it happens, by a 'corporeal enthusiasm,' by a thrust to display and behold the body—could be shown without penalty of sanction. In this sense, it was precisely the statues of gods and heroes presented as naked that represented the 'exceptional situation.' As an ideal of beauty, they mark our aesthetic sense even today. To the Christian conceptualization, ancient 'heroic nudity' was as suspect in its artistic signal of equality with the gods as it was in its corporeal concretion. Nudity was spiritualized in early times, then. Ideal nudity was strictly separated from the concrete naked body. Thereby it became the subject of symbolization. Gregory of Nyssa, about 370, describes virginal nudity as the immaculate mirror of the soul that had captured the shining purity of God. This approach also evinced virginity as a new option for a feminine self-determination over one's own body in the daily relationship of the sexes—at the price, to be sure, of a celibate life. In the course of the Middle Ages—not least of all because of the then-wavering symbolical meaning—nudity became a characteristic of many ascetical movements. Their nakedness expressed a radical wish to

The rebirth of the 'Oak King' is ritually presented at Bealtaine (Beltane), the Celtic-Gaelic 'Walpurgis' Night (April 30 to May 1, the Eve of May Day) by an Anglo-Irish Wicca coven (a ritual group with, as a rule, thirteen members; → Paganism/Neopaganism), under the leadership of Janet and Stewart Farrar. Two female assistants unveil the 'King,' and thus symbolize his rebirth. All of the actors are nude, or 'skyclad,' except for an older woman in the background (the High Priestess). The English Wicca cult adopts many elements from folklore traditions, but also from constructions of religious studies at the turn of the century. Thus, the myth of the dying and rising Oak King appeals to J. G. Frazer's monumental work of anthropology, The Golden Bough ([3]1905–1913). Cultic nudity was not devised ad hoc; its wellspring is erotic fertility magic, as well as, generally, a 'pagan' counter-model to Christianity; and it especially realizes a trait of the traditional pattern of the → witch. (Hubert Mohr) for another condition. For one thing, their concrete rejection of everything connected with clothing (power, festivity, hierarchies, defense) calls the normal societal system into question. For another, immaculate, pure nudity urges spiritual, ideal conversion. Nudity becomes the (counter-) sketch of complete piety. Granted, when the ideal becomes a threat to concrete relations of power, idealized nudity is persecuted. In the Middle Ages, Adamites gathered nude for their rites and cults, in intentional recall of the natural perfection of Paradise, or in the expectation of an apocalyptic end that would of course mean the destruction of any and all convention, and were stigmatized as dangerous sects. Alleged incest, sodomy, fornication, and perversion were some of the typical justifications, sprung from persons' exaggerated fantasies, and repressed desire for their own nudity, that were invoked for the violent act with which naked outsiders would be 'clothed' by society and thereby reintegrated into the social and religious system of control.

The interplay of repression (aggression) and ideal wishing worked itself out in behavior with the 'naked savages,' as well. The violent 'dressing' of the natives in the colonial campaigns of conquest was complemented by an 'exotic' view of them. The indigenous person became the object of the romantic idealization that the Adamite motif of Paradise actualized: natural perfection.

The 'nudity culture' movement of the nineteenth century was also grounded in a symbolical idealization of nudity. In a putatively spontaneous society, bereft of norm and measure, nudity is the expression of a spiritual nobility, frequently coupled to a pantheistic nature-piety. So-called 'clothing in light' became a 'clothing' in God. Remnants of this kind of proclamation are still found in today's FKK Movement (Freikörperkultur, Ger., 'Free Body Culture'). Today, to be sure, they serve rather for the solidification of group identity: the uniform of 'nudity' shapes social belonging.

Nudity in mode and lifestyle is a relatively new phenomenon. It makes a spectacle, with the erotics of a depersonalized and reified nude body displayed for show. These images concretize the naked human body's potential as merchandise.

Ritual Nudity

3. Complete or partial nudity is a symbol integrated into → ritual actions by nearly all cultures. In many fertility rituals, female nudity symbolizes the fruitful, hospitable 'Mother Earth' (e.g., the naked dancers in rain dances). By contrast, male nudity in such rituals expresses an influence on the presuppositions of nature that transcend the natural event (e.g., rituals that introduce the end of the rainy season). This complementary, mutual relationship, of female and male nudity, points beyond the concrete connection of a function (fertility ritual) to the principle of a dualistic universe—for instance, the female (passive principle) yin and the male (active principle) yang. In many rites of initiation, nudity symbolizes the status of innocence and purity at the moment of transition. It is a clear sign or premise of the attainment of the new, better state. For example, in the rite of baptism, the naked infant symbolizes the transition to new life. Contrariwise, nakedness expresses this transition in certain rites of mourning. With modern monks and ascetics, in Hinduism, Buddhism, and Jainism, nudity is a sign of complete renunciation, as, for example, with the ascetics who, since the sixth century, have followed the ascetical ideal of Mahavira in India. In spell rituals, as well (e.g., with charms), nudity expresses the extraordinary nature of the action. For the spell to work, charm-working must be performed nude. The magician's nudity symbolizes his or her position as servant of the charm. Again, in nineteenth- and twentieth-century → occultism, the sense of the obligation of nudity in rites of sexual magic reproduces this 'magical' rationality.

Nudity in the Modern Age

4. The nude body presented for public display has become an icon of modernity. However, the seeming obviousness of the gesture conceals the old dilemma. On the one side, the naked person is delivered from the constraints of society by—symbolically—discarding his or her clothing. In the context of a natural voyeurism and exhibitionism, as well, nudity is part of a sovereign interaction. Finally, it strives for a utopia drunk with yearning: "The true person is the naked person" (Goethe). On the other hand, a world of media and merchandise in which the nude body has been reduced to sheer spectacle, demystifies the ideal of paradise. Commercial requisition threatens to cashier the autonomy that has been gained. In the glare of the spotlight, nudity loses its halo.

Literature

Duerr, Hans Peter, Der Mythos vom Zivilisationsprozeß, vol. 1: Nacktheit und Scham, Frankfurt/M. 1994; Gernig, Kerstin (ed.), Nacktheit: Ästhetische Inszenierungen im Kulturvergleich, Cologne 2002; Kuntz-Stahl, Andreas, Der bloße Leib. Bibliographie zur Nacktheit und Körperlichkeit, Frankfurt/M. 1985; Marinatos, Nonnó, The Goddess and the Warrior: The Naked Goddess and Mistress of Animals in Early Greek Religion, London 2000; Miles, Margaret R., Carnal Knowing: Female Nakedness and Religious Meaning in the Christian West, New York 1991; Smith, Alison, The Victorian Nude: Sexuality, Morality and Art, Manchester 1996; Ziegler, Ulf Erdmann, Nackt unter Nackten. Utopien der Nacktkultur 1906–1942, Berlin 1990.

→ Asceticism, Body, Eroticism, Gender Stereotypes, Paganism/Neopaganism, Ritual, Sexuality, Utopia, Witch/Persecution of Witches

Hans-Georg Lützenkirchen and Helmut Zander

Number / Calculation

The Jewish 'tetragram,' or the 'Tetragrammaton': The total numerical value of the Hebrew name of God, YHWH (root letters Y = 10, H = 5, W = 6, Y = 10), is precisely the number of letters in the Hebrew alphabet. In the Sephardic tradition, it also corresponds to the number of knots in the prayer cord; in the Ashkenazi tradition, the expanded formula YHWH ehad ("God [is] one"), yields 39—the number of knots in the Ashkenazi prayer cord. Since the word ahavah ('love') has the same numerical value as ehad (1 + 5 + 2 + 5 = 13), the number 39 also stands for 'God's love.'

YHWH ("Yahwe"):
יהוה
5 6 5 10
26

YHWH ehad ("God is One"):
יהוה אחד
4 8 1 5 6 5 10
39

